The king is excommunicated. In the interim, the pope, finding that the interdict, which had now continued, above a year, did not answer his expectations, determined to pronounce, upon John, the sentence of excommunication, and committed the publication of it to the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester; but these prelates, having still a great regard for the king, did not execute their orders, so readily as his holiness desired. However, the news of John's excommunication was quickly spread over all parts of the kingdom; tho' the sentence was not yet published. The archdeacon of Norwich, one of the officers of the exchequer, receiving notice of it, resigned his office, without leave; alledging, that his conscience would not suffer him to serve an excommunicated prince. The king, for his disrespect, ordered him to be confined in a close prison; where, it is affirmed, a leaden cope being put upon him, with the pressure of it, and for the want of victuals, he died in a few days. M. Paris.

The bishop of Lincoln imposes upon him. Notwithstanding this instance of the king's severity, Hugh de Wells, lately elected bishop of Lincoln, wounded him, in a yet more sensible part; for, having obtained leave to be consecrated by the archbishop of Roan, instead of going to Normandy, he went directly to Rome, where he received his consecration from cardinal Langton. Had this prelate been in John's power, he would, doubtless, have sacrificed him to his resentment, as well as the archdeacon of Norwich; but he was forced to rest satisfied, with seizing on his revenues. As for Hugh, he was altogether unconcerned, plainly foreseeing, that the king would, at last, be obliged to submit to the pope; whereas, by

These, being apprehended, were hanged, a few days after, by the king's order, in contempt of the ecclesiastical liberty; upon which, near 3000 scholars left that university, some of whom went to Cambridge, and others to Reading. 1210. John leads an army into Ireland.

The sentence of excommunication made no impression on the king; and, besides, as it was not yet published, and, therefore, ignorance might be pleaded, the greatest part of the nobility still adhered to their sovereign. Nay, John entertained some hopes, that the sentence was no more than a penal threatening, which might be revoked, upon his giving some proofs of steadiness. However, he levied a numerous army, being very sensible, that nothing was more capable of disconcerting the pope's measures; and he made use of some commotions in Ireland, as a pretence for this armament, the charges of it being paid by the Jews, not voluntarily, but by the seizure of their effects *. John himself embarqued with his army at Pembroke, and safely arrived at Dublin; where he was met by above 20 petty princes, who came to swear allegiance to him. Having received their homage, he marched against the king of Connaught, the author of the troubles that occasioned his coming into Ireland; and, this prince being taken prisoner, in a battle, the war was happily ended, and the whole island reduced to the king's obedience. Before his departure, John established the English laws and customs in Ireland, and made John de Grey, bishop of Norwich, his justiciary, who caused the Irish money to be coined, of the same weight and fineness, as in England, that the same money might be common in both kingdoms; and it was expected in England, that, at his return, he would disband the army; but, for a pretence to keep it on foot, he quarrelled with the prince of Wales. In the mean while, having occasion for money, to maintain his troops, he imposed, by his own authority, a tax of 100,000 l. upon the estates of the clergy; and then, marching against the Welch, he forced them to deliver 28 hostages.

1211. The pope sends two nuncio's into England.

The steps taken by John, to render himself formidable, gave the pope the greatest uneasiness; for he plainly saw, that it would be equally dangerous to the holy see to desist from the contest, or to carry it on any farther, uncertain of the issue; and, indeed, it might be of very pernicious consequence, even with respect to other christian states. Before he came to a resolution, in this affair, Innocent sent Pandulph, a subdeacon, and Durand, a knight-templar, as his nuncio's, into England, under the pretence of promoting a reconciliation between the king and his clergy; tho' nothing could be more opposite to his real intention, which was to discover John's designs, that he might concert his measures accordingly. The nuncio's, upon their arrival, prevailed so far on the king, that he promised the ecclesiasticks leave to return to their churches; that cardinal Langton should enter into possession of the see of Canterbury; and that the church of England should be restored to all the liberties, privileges, and immunities, enjoyed in the time of Edward the Confessor. One would have imagined, that so considerable advantages should have contented the nuncio's; especially, since the king gave up the main point in dispute, in consenting to receive Langton, as archbishop. Besides, they should have previously considered, that, in an accommodation, it was reasonable, the pope and clergy should also make concessions, on their part; but this rule is overlooked, in affairs relating to the church. What she is pleased to stile an accommodation is nothing less than an entire submission to her orders, and an absolute compliance with all her demands. We have already seen a remarkable instance to this purpose, in the affair of Thomas Becket; and now we have another, which confirms the same truth, besides those that will occur, in the course of this History. Had John been more resolute, or, at least, waited, till the nuncio's, of their own accord, had made these proposals, and then seemed to accept them, with reluctance, he might, possibly, have obtained a reconciliation, upon these terms; but he was concerned with persons of greater subtlety than himself, whose sole view was to dive into his sentiments, in order to make the best use of them against him. When they found that he complied so far, they insisted on the restitution of all that was taken from the clergy, and an ample reparation of the damages they sustained, on the account of this contest; and, because he would not agree to this, which, in effect was impossible, the negotiation broke off, and the nuncio's returned, after publishing the king's excommunication, which the bishops, till then, declined.

The pope finding, from John's advances, that he was desirous of putting an end to this affair, at any rate, and that it was, merely, on the account of his inability, that he rejected the last article, resolved to make the best use of these discoveries, to promote his own advantage; but he artfully concealed his intentions, till he had constrained the king to cast himself upon his mercy. Tho' the reparation of the English clergy was the farthest from his thoughts, he continually insisted on that article, in order to have a handle to bring about his designs; and, as he was sensible, that John was not beloved by the people, and still less by the nobles, who were kept in obedience, purely, by their oath of allegiance, he judged it to be necessary to break that bond, by which they were still attached to their sovereign. He, therefore, taking occasion, from the king's inability, which he was pleased to call rebellion and obstinacy, published a bull, absolving John's subjects from their oaths, and enjoining them, on pain of excommunication, to refuse him all obedience; and this terrible blow had such a fatal influence, that most of the barons, transported to have so fair an opportunity of being revenged on the king, began to 1212. The king reſolves to invade Wales.

In the interim, John, who had received no intelligence of their intentions, lived in a ſecurity, that was matter of aſtoniſhment to all the world; for he ſpent his time in entertainments and diverſions, as if he had nothing to do, and the pope's bull was not of dangerous conſequence. At this juncture, the Welch, who were never long quiet, making incurſions into the Engliſh territories, John was ſo highly incenſed, that he commanded the 28 hoſtages he had in his power to be hanged; and then he determined to carry the war into Wales, and utterly extirpate the inhabitants of that country.

He is informed of a plot againſt him. M. Paris.

Whilſt he was making preparations for this expedition, the king of Scotland ſent him an account of a dangerous conſpiracy, that was in agitation againſt him, in England; but John, not giving any credit to his information, continued his march, at the head of his army, to Cheſter, with a view of beginning the war with the Welch. Upon his arrival at that city, he received freſh intelligence concerning the conſpiracy, which was confirmed, from ſo many different places, that he could no longer diſpute the truth of it; and then he began to conſider the officers of the army, as ſo many ſecret enemies, in whom he could not confide; and, therefore, diſmiſſing his troops, he retired to London, where, he imagined, he might remain, with greater ſafety. In proceſs of time, his fears being, in ſome meaſure, abated, by certain advice, that the barons were in no readineſs to put their deſigns in execution, he demanded hoſtages of them, as pledges of their obedience; and there were very few that ventured to refuſe a compliance with his demand *, leſt they ſhould be ſacrificed to his ſuſpicions, before they were in a poſture of defence. Indeed, their meaſures, as yet, were in a very precarious ſituation; and, if it be certain, that they had made application to the king of France, that monarch had not given them any poſitive promiſe of aſſiſting them; for, in all probability, he was enclined to ſtay, till matters were more embroiled, before he openly declared his intention.

Remarks on the hiſtorians of John's reign.

Here it is, that Matthew Paris takes occaſion to paint John's tyranny, in the blackeſt colours; for he affirms, that he had not the leaſt regard to the Engliſh; that he debauched the wives and daughters of the prime nobility; that he baniſhed ſome the realm, upon mere ſuſpicions, and reduced others, by the confiſcation of their eſtates and other illegal practices; but, as I have already obſerved, the monkiſh writers are to be read, with great caution, when they relate any affair, in which the court of Rome was concerned. Indeed, this hiſtorian, now and then, very ſharply inveighs againſt the perſon of Innocent III. yet it is, at the ſame time, manifeſt, that his deſign was to vindicate the pope's extreme rigour to king John; which he could not more artfully purſue, than by tarniſhing the reputation of that prince, in order to divert the reader's compaſſion. 1212.

The famous prediction of a hermit.

Whilſt the king was extremely ſollicitous, about the iſſue of the plots of his enemies, he met with an exceeding mortification, tho' he ſeemed to overlook it; for Peter de Pontefract, a hermit, who was famous in England, for predicting future events, publickly propheſied, that, by Aſcenſion-Day following, John ſhould be depoſed, and the crown transferred to another; upon which, the king ſent for the hermit, who, in his preſence, maintained what he had ſaid, and was, on that account, committed to priſon *.

The pope depoſes the king of England.

In the mean while, the pope took, at Rome, all neceſſary meaſures, to accompliſh his project; and, being deſirous of making it appear to the world, that a zeal for juſtice and religion was the ſole motive of his actions, he made it his particular ſtudy to ſhew, that he had no private intereſt in view, in his quarrel with the king of England. The more effectually to conceal his deſign, he cauſed a petition to be preſented to him by cardinal Langton, and the reſt of the proſcribed biſhops, humbly beſeeching him to apply a remedy to the evils, which had ſo long infeſted the church of England; and, this petition giving him a pretence to call a conſiſtory, he delivered a ſpeech to the cardinals, in which he aggravated, to the utmoſt of his power, the injuries John had done, and daily did, to the church; and he concluded with ſaying, that, as his obſtinacy was incapable of being ſubdued by the church's cenſures, he had ſummoned them together, to conſider of means to oblige this ſtubborn ſon to return to his duty. The reſult of the council was, that John, being convicted of rebellion againſt the holy ſee, deſerved to be depoſed; and that his holineſs ſhould place another prince on the throne of England. Purſuant to this advice, Innocent thunder'd out the ſentence of depoſition againſt king John; and then he commiſſioned Philip, king of France, to execute the ſentence, promiſing, for a reward, the remiſſion of all his ſins, together with the crown of England to him and his heirs for ever, as ſoon as he had dethroned the preſent tyrant. A few days after, he publiſhed a bull, exhorting all chriſtian princes to promote, as much as was poſſible, this expedition, which was ſolely intended to revenge the injuries done to the catholick church; and in it he likewiſe took under his protection all that ſhould contribute money, or other aſſiſtance, to conquer 1213. Philip accepts the pope's commiſſion to invade England. Mezerai. Philip having recived the pope's commiſſion, not ſatisfied with depriving John of a great part of his dominions in France, he devoured already, in his imagination, the kingdom of England; and his vaſt preparations evidently declared, how deſirous he was of ſucceeding, in this undertaking. The ſhips, of which his fleet was to be compoſed, came, from all parts, to the mouth of the Seine; whilſt the princes, his vaſſals, and the great men of his realm led their troops to Roan, where he had appointed the rendezvous of his army. King John was, for his part, equally ſollicitous to oppoſe the threatened invaſion; for he ſummoned all his tenants, in chief, to meet him at Dover, with their troops, on pain of the forfeiture of their fiefs, and of being exemplarily puniſhed, in their perſons. He likewiſe iſſued out orders, that all the ſhips, belonging to his ſubjects, ſhould be in readineſs, at the ſame place, threatening to baniſh the maſters, that ſhould fail to be there, on any account whatſoever; by which means, he ſoon aſſembled more ſhips and troops, than the was able to maintain; inſomuch that he was obliged to diſmiſs part of his fleet, and retain only 60,000 of the beſt ſoldiers ‡. However, this number was ſufficient to defend him from all inſults, had they cordially ſerved him; but this prince was more skilful, in procuring the fear than the love of his ſubjects ††.

Pandulph the pope's legate comes to John. Whilſt the two monarchs were, with equal ardor, preparing for an engagement; whilſt the ſea was covered with ſhips, and both ſhores with troops, expecting, every moment, to enter upon action, the pope gave his laſt inſtructions to Pandulph, one of the forementioned nuncio's, who, on this occaſion, was made legate for England. His publick inſtructions were, to exert himſelf to prevail on John to ſubmit to the church; but his private ones were, to give the finiſhing ſtroke to the pope's project. He paſſed through France, where, upon a review of Philip's great armament, he commended his zeal and diligence; and then he embarqued, in order to meet the king of England at Dover. He no ſooner came into his preſence, than he acquainted him, that his enemy's forces were able to make a conqueſt of England, even tho' the whole kingdom were united, for their common defence; but that John was very far from having any grounds to rely on the people's affections. To convince him of it, beyond all contradiction, he gave htm to underſtand, that Philip had received private aſſurances, from moſt of the great men of England, that they would do all that was poſſible, to promote his cauſe; which, being a confirmation of his former informations, ſo viſibly ſhook his reſolution, that he could not diſguiſe, from the legate, the terror that ſeized his ſoul. John's preſent diſpoſition of mind preciſely anſwered Pandulph's intention; who, making the beſt uſe of this advantage, repreſented to him, that there was only one way left, to ſecure himſelf from the impending danger, viz. to put himſelf under the pope's protection, who, as a kind and merciful father, was ſtill willing to receive him, with open arms; but, as he added, "To deſerve this "favour, you muſt become a dutiful ſon to the "church, and promiſe a faithful obedience to "all the pope's injunctions; who, in imitation of Him, whoſe repreſentative he is on "earth, deſires not the death of a ſinner, but "rather that he ſhould return from his evil "ways." 1213. M. Weſt. M. Paris.

No prince was ever in ſuch circumſtances as John; for, ſtanding between two precipices equally dangerous, he could not poſſibly avoid caſting himſelf down either the one or the other, nor had he leiſure to conſider, which of them was the moſt eligible. Pandulph inceſſantly ſollicited him to accept the pope's gracious offer; whilſt Philip, on the contrary, allowed him no time to conſult, what courſe he ſhould take; but his jealouſy of his army, and his dread of a treachery, the fatal conſequences of which he very plainly foreſaw, gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs. On which ſide ſoever he turned his eyes, he perceived, that he was on the point, either of falling into the hands of his moſt inveterate enemy, or lying at the mercy of the pope, who was the ſole author of his misfortunes; and, of theſe two extreams, the laſt ſeemed to be the leaſt inſupportable, becauſe he did not apprehend the pope's whole deſign. The legate did not, at once, acquaint him with all the conditions required by his

John complies with the legate's terms. Act. Pub.

Such was the ſtate, to which John was reduced, that he would have thought even theſe conditions to be tolerable, had nothing been added to them; but the oath, exacted from him, to obey the pope, in all things, included a tacit condition, the extent of which Pandulph did not judge it expedient to explain, before he was entirely engaged. However, the legate afterwards made the king ſufficiently ſenſible of the meaning of that article, when he told him, in ſo many words, that his offences againſt God and the church were of ſuch a nature, that, unleſs he reſigned his crown to the pope, he could not give him abſolution. This propoſal, doubtleſs, extremely ſurprized the unfortunate prince; but he had advanced too far now to recede. His late proceeding had entirely alienated thoſe of his ſubjects, who, till then, preſerved ſome remains of affection; and, as he could not confide in his troops, he was deſtitute of means to withſtand Philip's powerful attacks. He was, therefore, under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of ſubmitting to this rigid condition; which he would have infallibly rejected, had he, at firſt, underſtood the full extent of his oath. Accordingly, the next day, he repaired to Dover-church, attended by the legate and a numerous train of lords and officers of the army; and, in the preſence of all the people, taking off his crown, he laid it, with the other enſigns of royalty, at the legate's feet, as the pope's repreſentative. After this, he ſigned a charter, by which he reſigned to the pope the kingdom of England, with the lordſhip of Ireland; and, in the ſaid charter, he declared, that he made this reſignation, neither out of fear nor by conſtraint, but of his own free will, with the advice and conſent of the barons of the realm, as the only means of attonement, for his offences againſt God and the church. From that moment, he owned himſelf a vaſſal of the holy ſee, and, as ſuch, obliged himſelf to pay the annual rent of 1000 marks; viz. 700 for England, and 300 for Ireland. In fine, he agreed, that if he, or any of his ſucceſſors, denied the ſubmiſſion due to the holy ſee, he ſhould forfeit his right to the crown †, and then he did homage to the pope, in the perſon of the legate; who, to ſhew the grandeur of his maſter, ſpurned, with his foot, the money, that the king offer'd, as an earneſt of his ſubjection. The ſpectators of this ignominious ceremony were incenſed at theſe abject ſubmiſſions; tho' none of them had the courage to declare their ſentiments, except the archbiſhop of Dublin, who proteſted againſt them, but to no purpoſe. The legate, having obtained whatever he demanded, kept the crown and ſceptre, five entire days; and then he reſtored them to John, intimating to him, that he ought to conſider it, as a ſingular favour from the holy ſee. This extraordinary tranſaction had a natural effect on the minds of the people; for, if they had but a little regard for their ſovereign before, this ſhameful ſubmiſſion render'd him altogether contemptible, and they thought him unworthy to wear a crown, which he had ſo meanly reſigned to another. On the other hand, Innocent's extreme haughtineſs occaſioned reflections, to his diſadvantage; and, tho' one would have imagined, that John muſt, of courſe, be deeply affected with what had happened, he ſeemed to be the firſt that forgot it. He even appeared to triumph, in preſerving his crown, in ſpite of the hermit's prediction; and, tho' it was too fully accompliſhed, he was ſo cruel, as to order him to be hanged, as a falſe prophet.

Pandulph, having diſpatched his buſineſs in England, embarqued at Dover, for France, without taking off the interdict, or giving the king abſolution; and, when he came to Philip, he enjoined him, in the pope's name, to deſiſt from his intended expedition. He repreſented to him that, the king of England being now a dutiful ſon of the church, it was no longer neceſſary to execute the pope's ſentence againſt him; but Philip, who was exceedingly amazed at this diſcourſe, as he did not engage in the preſent undertaking, from a religious motive, openly refuſed to obey the legate's orders. He told him, that he had made theſe expenſive preparations againſt England, in compliance with the pope's preſſing ſollicitations, for the remiſſion of his ſins; and that, therefore, no contrary orders, nor all the menaces in the world, ſhould prevent him from purſuing his deſigns. Thus, reſolved, he called a council of the chief lords of the kingdom, and of the princes, his vaſſals, that then attended him; and, as he was highly exaſpera-

ted

1213. ted againſt Innocent, the terms he uſed, in ſpeaking of him to the aſſembly, were not very reſpectful ; and the leſs ſo, as it was greatly for his purpoſe, to paint the pope's proceedings, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt lively colours ; ſince his view was to prevail on all the lords to ſwear, that they would not deſert him, even tho' the pope ſhould thunder out his cenſures againſt him.

The princes and lords of the council were inclinable to a compliance ; for the earl of Flanders was the only one that oppoſed the propoſal, and in a manner that highly reflected on Philip's character. He affirmed, that the deſigned expedition againſt king John was, in itſelf, neither juſt nor honourable, and alſo become impracticable, by the pope's prohibition ; and that it would be much more conſonant to the rules of honour and equity, to reſtore what had been taken from that prince, in France, than to form new projects, to make an advantage of his misfortunes. Philip, reſenting theſe reproaches upon his conduct, reſolved, in the firſt place, to humble the earl of Flanders ; in order to deter the reſt of his vaſſals, by this example, and likewiſe to deprive the king of England of the aſſiſtance he might expect from ſo firm a friend ; and, poſſibly, he rejoiced at an opportunity of diſengaging himſelf from his preſent embarraſsment. He could not, without diſhonour, obey the pope's orders ; nor could he purſue his deſigns againſt John, without expoſing his perſon to an excommunication, and his kingdom to an interdict. However that be, he order'd his fleet to ſail to the coaſt of Flanders ; whilſt he led his army to attack the earl, by land. The progreſs of his arms, at firſt, was ſo great, that, in all probability, the earl of Flanders would have been ruined, if John had not ſent his naval force, to aſſiſt him ; but the earl of Salisbury, who commanded the Engliſh fleet, ſurprizing that of Philip, entirely deſtroyed it. It is related, that the Engliſh took 300 ſhips, and ſunk 100 ; and that the French themſelves ſet fire to the reſt, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy ; which fatal loſs, blaſting all Philip's meaſures, obliged him to relinquiſh his undertaking and return to Paris.

Philip turns his arms againſt the earl of Flanders. Rigord.

John reſolves to carry the war into France.

This victory, on a ſudden, animated the courage of king John ; and, as he was aſſured of the pope's friendſhip, he determined to carry the war into France, and attempt to recover his loſt dominions ; beſides, the emperor and the earl of Flanders promiſed to make a powerful diverſion, in his favour. He, therefore, order'd his army to march to Portſmouth, and his fleet to meet him there ; but, juſt as he was ready to embarque, the barons ſent him word, that they could not attend him, unleſs he was firſt abſolved from his excommunication. Upon this declaration, he diſpatched a ſafe-conduct to cardinal Langton and the reſt of the exiles, that they might come and abſolve him ; and he gave them to underſtand, that he would readily perform all his engagements, and particularly thoſe relating to them. The biſhops, upon their arrival, repaired to the king at Wincheſter ; who, throwing himſelf at their feet, intreated them to have compaſſion on him and the kingdom. The cardinal, raiſing him up, led him to the church ; where, before all the people, he adminiſtered to him the following oath : " That he would M. Paris. " protect the holy church, to the utmoſt of " his power ; re-eſtabliſh the good laws of " his predeceſſors, and eſpecially thoſe of king " Edward ; cauſe juſtice to be diſpenſed to " his ſubjects, according to the juſt judgment " of his court ; reſtore to corporations and " private perſons their rights and privileges ; " and, before Eaſter next, make ample ſatiſ- " faction for all the damages he had occa- " ſioned." After this, the king renewed his oath of fealty and obedience to the pope ; and then the cardinal gave him abſolution. John ſeemed to be ſo well pleaſed, to find himſelf, at length, freed from ſo many perplexities, that, to convince the cardinal he entertained no ſecret prejudice againſt him, he made him, that very day, dine at the ſame table with him.

This affair being over, John went to Portſmouth ; but, when he talked of embarquing, the barons, who came there, upon his ſummons, repreſented to him, they had ſtaid ſo long at Portſmouth, that all their money, intended for the preſent expedition, was ſpent ; and that, therefore, they were in no condition to attend him. Tho' he was extremely mortified at this diſappointment, he judged it adviſable to conceal his uneaſineſs ; and, fancying that, upon the point of honour, they would follow him, he, with his own family, ſailed for Jerſey. After he had waited there ſome days, perceiving that he was abandoned by all, he returned to England, to chaſtiſe the diſobedience of the barons *. Having raiſed M. Paris. ſome troops, he marched towards the center of the kingdom, deſigning to have it in his power, to prevent them from taking up arms, or oppreſs thoſe that ſhould firſt appear ; but the cardinal archbiſhop, coming to him at Northampton, acquainted him, that, as none of the barons were legally † condemned, he could not enter upon a war with the barons, without violating the oath he had lately made. The king, incenſed at this remonſtrance, replied, with a loud voice, that he did not want his advice ; and, refuſing to hear him any more, he continued his march, as far as Nottingham. However, Langton, following him, the next day, declared, that he would excommunicate all, who ſhould take up arms, before the relaxation of the interdict ; and, this menace leading John to apprehend, that his troops would deſert him, he was conſtrained to deſiſt from his undertaking ; yet he appointed a day for the barons, to appear and anſwer, for their diſobedience.

John reſumes his former deſign.

Langton's proceedings were ſufficient to ſhew, that he was not thoroughly reconciled to the king; but of this he, ſoon after, gave a more convincing proof; for, in an aſſembly of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, convened at London, about the reſtitution the king had promiſed to make, he took occaſion to inveigh very warmly againſt him. He ſaid, "That, before he abſolved the king, he "cauſed him to ſwear, that he would reſtore "to the church, nobility, and commons their "rights and privileges; tho' it was manifeſt, "that, inſtead of taking the leaſt ſtep, in or-"der to perform his oath, he would have "commenced a war againſt his barons, be-"fore they were legally convicted, which was "a plain evidence of his evil deſigns; that it "was, therefore, abſolutely neceſſary, for the "good of the publick, to preſs him to make "good his ſolemn engagements; and, as diffi-"culties might occur, in the particulars de-"manded of the king, he added, that a char-"ter might be uſed of one of their former "monarchs, of which he had fortunately found "a copy, in ſpite of the pains that were ta-"ken to bury it in oblivion." The charter, the cardinal mentions, was that granted by Henry I. to his ſubjects, in the beginning of his reign; authentick copies of which had been ſent to all the principal monaſteries, that were loſt by the negligence of thoſe, to whoſe cuſtody they were committed, or, perhaps, by the means of Henry I. himſelf, or his ſucceſſors; but this, which, probably, was the only one, that remained, Langton cauſed to be publickly read before the aſſembly. The barons, tho' they had only a confuſed notion of this charter, were extremely well pleaſed with its being found, but more ſo with the contents; and, therefore, they, at once, reſolved to make it the foundation of their demands. Upon this, they mutually obliged themſelves, by an oath, to uſe their utmoſt efforts, to obtain the re-eſtabliſhment of their antient privileges; and the cardinal likewiſe promiſed to do all that was poſſible, to promote their deſigns; which was the firſt league or confederacy made in England, in defence of the nation's intereſt againſt the king.

John implores the pope's protection.

Notwithſtanding the care of the barons to conceal their intentions, till a proper opportunity came in their way, the king ſoon received intelligence of their league; but, as it was not in his power to diſſolve it, he imagined, that the moſt effectual method, for his own ſecurity, would be to put himſelf under the pope's protection. Accordingly, he diſpatched a truſty meſſenger to his holineſs, to implore his aſſiſtance, in this critical extremity; and his requeſt was attended with a very handſome preſent *. Innocent was tranſported with joy, to find that there was a proſpect of a diſſention between the king and the barons; and, indeed, as the reſignation of the crown, which he had extorted from John, was, in itſelf, ſo repugnant to all the principles of juſtice and full of nullities, it muſt, of courſe, have been ſuperſeded, had there been a ſtrict and cordial union between the king and the nobles. The pope therefore, reſolved to make the beſt uſe of their diſcord, more firmly to eſtabliſh the ſovereignty he had lately acquired over England †; and, with this view, he ſent cardinal Nicholas, biſhop of Tuſculum, now Fraſcati, as his legate, into England, to relax the interdict, and reconcile the king and the clergy, as to the promiſed reſtitution. John offering 100,000 marks, the legate ſeemed to be contented with the ſum; but the biſhops openly rejected it, chuſing rather to ſuffer the kingdom to lie under the intolerable burden of an interdict, than recede, in the leaſt, from their pretenſions. The legate, upon this, acquainting the king with the pope's orders, repreſented to him, that he could never expect to enjoy uninterrupted tranquillity, till he had put himſelf entirely under the protection of the holy ſee; "that, to this purpoſe, it was neceſſary "to make a ſecond reſignation of his crown, "the firſt being liable to many exceptions; "and that then the pope, being indiſpenſably "obliged to ſupport him, would infallibly deli-"ver him from all his troubles."

1214. The pope ſends a legate into England. M. Paris.

John conſents to a ſecond reſignation of his crown.

John, having almoſt as many enemies as barons in the kingdom, was once more perſuaded to that ſervile compliance; ſince he had no other refuge, except the pope's protection, and, convening a general aſſembly at Weſtminſter, before all the lords, he, a ſecond time, ſolemnly reſigned his crown to the pope, with all the formalities the legate was pleaſed to demand. He likewiſe ſigned another charter, in which care was taken to ſupply all the defects of the former; and, to render it more authentick, it was ſealed with gold, whereas the firſt was only ſealed with wax; and then the king gave it to the legate, for the uſe of the pope, his maſter. The confederate barons plainly perceived, that their ſecret was diſcovered, and that John's ſecond reſignation was the price of the pope's protection; and, as nothing was more oppoſite to their deſign, than the vaſſalage to which John had ſubjected the kingdom, cardinal Langton proteſted againſt it, and laid his proteſtation upon the altar.

The pope commiſſions his legate to fill the vacant benefices.

Innocent was extremely incenſed, that a cardinal ſhould ſo directly oppoſe the intereſts of the holy ſee; tho' he durſt not, at this juncture, attack him, leſt it ſhould induce the Engliſh to join with Langton, in the defence of their liberties. Indeed, it was, by no means, adviſable for the court of Rome, to let the nation ſo ſoon feel the weight of their late ſubjection to the papal authority; but, however, to mortify the archbiſhop, the pope commiſſioned his legate, cardinal Nicholas, to 1214. fill all the vacant benefices in England; who, ſo ſcandalouſly abuſed his power, that he not only conferred the benefices on Italians, his relations and creatures, but even ſome of them on perſons unborn. Langton, being diſguſted, becauſe his commiſſion was given to another, took occaſion, from the legate's ill conduct, to appeal to the pope againſt his proceedings, and ſent his brother Simon to Rome, to proſecute his appeal; but his holineſs was very little inclined to take notice of complaints againſt the legate, who had, juſt before, done him ſuch ſignal ſervices. Moreover, Pandulph, who was diſpatched to Rome, with the charter ſealed with gold, had exceedingly blaſted the credit of the archbiſhop and all the Engliſh lords, by repreſenting them, as turbulent perſons, tho' he extolled the king, as the moſt pious of princes; and, therefore, Innocent, regardleſs of Langton's remonſtrances, ſent orders to his legate, to relax the interdict, which had now continued, above ſix years; but, as for the ſatisfaction demanded by the clergy, he order'd, that the king ſhould pay no more than 40,000 marks, in lieu of all the reſtitution.

Thus, at laſt, an end was put to this grand affair, which render'd the king of England the pope's vaſſal; and ſuch an extraordinary event furniſhes ample matter for reflections, which are left to the reader's diſcretion. I ſhall only remark, that, if, in the firſt negotiation, the pope would have been contented with ſo moderate a reſtitution, things would then have been brought to an accommodation; for that was the ſole obſtacle to a reconciliation, as the nuncio's were pleaſed with all the reſt of the king's propoſals. But John had not, as yet, reſigned his crown to the pope; whereas, after his reſignation, the 100,000 marks were reduced to 40,000. The clergy were very much diſappointed by this reduction; yet, not daring to contradict the pope's poſitive orders, they were conſtrained to reſt ſatisfied with a little, in compariſon of the immenſe ſums they expected. However, the biſhops took care to indemnify themſelves; ſince they did not give any ſhare of the 40,000 marks to the inferior clergy and monaſteries. The latter made their complaints to the legate; but he told them, that, as he had received no orders from the pope, it was not in his power to redreſs their grievance.

John carries the war into France.

John, perceiving that he was freed, tho' to his eternal ſhame, from this vexatious affair, reſolved to proſecute the deſign, which he was obliged to drop, by reaſon of the diſobedience of the barons; for he hoped to meet with more ſubmiſſion from his ſubjects now, than whilſt he lay under the ſentence of excommunication. Having made the neceſſary preparations, he came to Rochelle, with a numerous army, and, entering Poictou, ſubdued that province, with as much eaſe as it was taken from him; and, fluſh'd with this ſucceſs, he marched into Anjou, and rebuilt the walls of Angiers, which he had formerly demoliſhed. This ſudden attack ſurprized Philip, who being then engaged in the Low-Countries, in an important war with the emperor and the earl of Flanders, could not, ſo ſoon as was convenient, oppoſe this new enemy; yet his ſon, prince Lewis, raiſing an army, with all poſſible expedition, advanced towards Anjou; whilſt the Engliſh beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of La Roche au Moine. John, upon the approach of the French army, reſolved to raiſe the ſiege and give Lewis battle; but, the Poictevins refuſing to follow him, he was forced to retreat, and with ſome precipitation. The French hiſtorians relate, that, being vigorouſly attack'd, in his retreat, he ſuſtained a great loſs; but the Engliſh authors affirm, that Lewis, upon John's raiſing the ſiege, retired, without purſuing him. The King of England, in ſpite of this accident, had troops ſufficient for him to expect a good iſſue of the war, had it continued; but the news of the victory gained by Philip in Flanders, at the battle of Bovines, led him to think of a retreat. This victory, the moſt conſiderable that France had ever obtained *, convincing John, that the whole burden of the war would lie upon him, he demanded a truce for five years, by the mediation of the pope's legate; and, tho' a famous hiſtorian affirms, that Philip granted it, purely, in compliance with the pope's preſſing ſollicitations, it may be preſumed, that he did not conſent to it, with any reluctance; for he could deſire nothing more to his advantage, than that the Engliſh ſhould quit his dominions, ſince they had nothing to loſe, whilſt he might have ſuſtained the loſs of very conſiderable poſſeſſions.

The third part of John's reign.

We now proceed to the third period of John's reign, which was, to the full, as vexatious as the two former; for, in theſe, he contended with two foreign powers, who triumphed over him; but, in this, we ſhall find him engaged with his own ſubjects, and reduced, in order to ſupport himſelf on the throne, to lay waſte his own kingdom, with an army of different nations, till, at length, a foreign prince receives the oath of allegiance from the people of England.

The barons league for the reſtoration of their liberties.

The king, after ſo many misfortunes, in all appearance, expected, at the expence of his honour, to paſs the remainder of his days in peace; but his paſt conduct, mixed with arrogance, caprice, tyranny, imprudence, and cowardice, had created a great diſcontent in the minds of his ſubjects, that muſt, of courſe, produce fatal effects. As he loſt the hearts of the people, the barons became more imperious; for their hopes of ſucceſs, in their proceedings, were properly built on the little affection of the people for their ſovereign. No ſooner was

* This memorable battle was fought, on the 27th of July, between Tournay and Liſle; and tho' the allies, viz. the emperor Otho, Ferdinand earl of Flanders, with the dukes of Lovain and Brabant, had no leſs than 120,000 men, and Philip's army was much inferior, as to number, and he was, beſides, thrown off his horſe and trampled under foot; yet, at laſt, he entirely ſubdued his enemies. Otho was put to flight, and died, ſome time after, with grief; five earls were taken priſoners, one of whom was William Long-Sword, king John's baſtard brother; and no prince, after that, durſt oppoſe Philip. John 1214. John returned into England, from his French expedition, than the barons reſolved, to demand, in a body, the re-eſtabliſhment of their privileges; and the principal lords, under the pretence of a pilgrimage, met at St. Edmundſbury, where they came to a reſolution, to require of the king the confirmation of the charter of Henry I. which contained, in ſubſtance, the liberties enjoyed by the Engliſh, during the Saxon monarchy. Before they parted, it was agreed, that, immediately after Chriſtmas, they would wait on the king, in a body, and preſent their petition; and, in the interim, each of them went to their reſpective habitations, to provide men, horſes, and arms, to be in a condition to force the king, if there was occaſion, to comply with their demands. However, before I deſcend to particulars, it will be proper to enquire into the riſe of this quarrel; and the foundation of the barons pretenſions, and the king's refuſal of what they demanded, was, as follows.

M. Paris.

The ſtate of the caſe between the king and the barons.

It is undeniably evident, that, in the reigns of the firſt Norman kings, and eſpecially under William the Conqueror, the Engliſh were oppreſſed; nay, not ſo much as an Engliſhman was left in poſſeſſion of any conſiderable fee *; whilſt the Normans and other foreigners were decked with their ſpoils. The Engliſh, in thoſe days, to no purpoſe, alledged their privileges; for the Normans did not conſider it, as any injuſtice, for the king to exerciſe a deſpotick power, as long as it was advantageous to themſelves. The laws of Edward the Confeſſor were ſo little regarded, that it was almoſt treaſonable to mention them; but, when theſe very Normans were firmly ſettled in their new acquiſitions, they began to apprehend the dangerous conſequences of an arbitrary government, which might deprive them of the poſſeſſions, that the Conqueror had given their anceſtors; and, therefore, by degrees, they aſſumed the Engliſh genius, being entirely addicted to liberty, and were deſirous of the reeſtabliſhment of the Saxon laws. All diſtinction between the two nations was aboliſhed; and every one affected to be ſtiled Engliſh, rather than Normans. This was, perhaps, the chief reaſon, why the Norman language did not prevail in England; notwithſtanding the care and pains of William I. Upon all fair occaſions, the Normans expreſs'd themſelves, like Engliſhmen, and ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the revival of the laws of Edward; and they particularly made the beſt uſe of the circumſtances of William Rufus, Henry I. and Stephen, when they aſcended the throne. As theſe princes had not properly any right to the crown, they were obliged to ſatisfy the demands of their ſubjects; and, indeed, what the barons required would have been extremely reaſonable, from the mouth of an Engliſhman; but theſe very pretenſions, with reſpect to the Normans, might very juſtly be diſputed. Accordingly, tho' theſe three princes ſolemnly promiſed to revive the Saxon laws, they never, in good earneſt, ſet about the performance of their promiſes; yet it muſt be owned, that theſe repeated engagements gave the barons, of Norman deſcent, a right, which they wanted before. The circumſtances of the three firſt Norman kings, at their acceſſion to the throne, were, therefore, the true cauſe of theſe unjuſt proceedings, which were ſo very prejudicial to their ſucceſſors; for they knew, that their Norman ſubjects had no right to demand the revival of the laws of Edward, which muſt, of courſe, be violated, to ſettle them in the eſtates they poſſeſſed in England; but they were conſtrained to promiſe what they never deſigned to perform. The charter of Henry I. was never executed; and, whatſoever care was taken to ſend copies of it to the principal monaſteries, it was, by a great chance, that a ſingle one was found, 100 years after, by cardinal Langton. If, then, the rights of the barons be, originally conſidered, it muſt be concluded, that they were built upon a ſandy foundation, becauſe the chief fiefs were poſſeſſed by the deſcendents of thoſe, to whom they were granted by William the Conqueror; but, on the other hand, it muſt be confeſs'd, that the many ſolemn promiſes of all the kings, ſince the conqueſt, to reſtore the Saxon laws, commonly termed the laws of St. Edward, gave the Engliſh Normans a very plauſible right to demand the performance of them.

From what has been ſaid, it naturally follows, that, if the barons imagined they had a right to require the reſtoration of the privileges of the Engliſh nation, John believed that he was equally authorized to refuſe it; and, as this diſpute remained undetermined, during ſeveral reigns, both parties kept up their repective pretenſions. When the king was in a weak condition, the barons attempted the recovery of the Engliſh liberties; and the prince, at ſuch a juncture, was forced to put them off with fair promiſes, which he never intended to perform; but, under able and flouriſhing kings, the conteſt was ſtifled, and the barons waited for a more favourable opportunity. They thought a very fit occaſion now came in their way, which they reſolved to improve; for John was ſo deteſted and deſpiſed by his ſubjects, that he could never expect to regain their affection, and he had not the leaſt proſpect of the aſſiſtance of king Philip, his implacable enemy. The emperor and the earl of Flanders were both cruſhed by the battle of Bovines; and it was not to be ſuppoſed, that the king of Scotland would aſſiſt a prince, with

In general, fee is a name applicable to all ſeigneuries, Hors de ſon feo, Hors de ſa baronie, i. e. out of his barony; and it may be obſerved, that feoffment, originally, ſignified the grant of a feud or fee; tho', by cuſtom, it afterwards ſignified a grant, with livery and ſeiſin, of a free inheritance to a man and his heirs, reſpect being had rather to the perpetuity of the eſtate granted, than the feudal tenure. This has been termed a feoffment in fee-ſimple; and out of the fee-ſimple has been derived another ſort of inheritable eſtate, which has been called a conditional fee or fee-tail. There are alſo feoffments for life. Vid. Madox's Diſſert. on the Chart. and Inſtrum.

1214. whom he was diſguſted. As for the pope's aid, ſince it only conſiſted of ſpiritual arms, it did not give the barons the leaſt uneaſineſs; being ſenſible that ſuch weapons have no edge, but what they receive from fear and the circumſtances of time and place; and, as they had reaſon to hope, that the people would join them, in the defence of their common intereſts, they did not apprehend, that the papal thunderbolts would do them any conſiderable damage. John, therefore, was under a neceſſity of yielding, on the preſent occaſion; for, being deprived of the French provinces, he had no refuge againſt the Engliſh.

1215. The barons demand the reſtoration of the laws of St. Edward.

The barons, certain of ſucceſs, came to the king at London, and demanded, in expreſs and poſitive terms, the re-eſtabliſhment of the laws of St. Edward, with the other rights and privileges contained in the charter of Henry I. and they alledged, that, as this was no more than what he himſelf had ſolemnly promiſed, before his abſolution, their moſt humble petition could not be conſidered, as an innovation, much leſs as the effect of the ſpirit of rebellion. This petition, tho' it was expreſs'd, in the moſt reſpectful language, alarm'd the king; and, perceiving that they were reſolute, inſtead of rejecting it, he deſired them to wait for his anſwer, till Eaſter, aſſuring them, that he would then declare his intentions; but tho' it was obvious, the king only amuſed them, they were afraid of being blamed, if they did not acquieſce in this delay and retire.

John renews the fealty and homage of all his ſubjects.

In the interim, John cauſed the oath of fealty to be renewed by all his ſubjects, as well as homage by all his immediate vaſſals; after which, he aſſumed the croſs, as if he deſigned to go to the Holy-Land, in order to ſhelter himſelf under the church's protection *; whilſt, on the other hand, the pope ſent a letter to the barons, exhorting them to continue in obedience to their ſovereign, tho' it proved ineffectual.

The barons preſs him for an anſwer.

Eaſter was no ſooner come, than the great men met at Stanford, and made a powerful army, in which were above 2000 knights, beſides other horſe and foot, armed with divers weapons; inſomuch that the king, who was at Oxford, in expectation of their coming, did not think it convenient to expoſe his perſon, in a conference with them. Before they advanced any nearer, being then at Brackley in Northamptonſhire, he diſpatched the earl of Pembroke to enquire, what the laws and liberties were, which they mentioned, in their petition; upon which, they preſented a long memorial of the laws and cuſtoms, obſerved in the time of the Saxon monarchs; declaring that, if he would not confirm them, they were reſolutely determined to compel him, by ſeizing his caſtles. John, upon the peruſal of this memorial, was ſo furiouſly enraged, that he ſaid, with a loud voice, the barons wanted nothing leſs, than to deprive him of the regal authority; and he ſolemnly ſwore, "He never would grant "his ſubjects ſuch liberties, as would render "himſelf a ſlave."

They chuſe a general, and begin hoſtilities.

This anſwer convincing the barons, that force was abſolutely neceſſary, they choſe the lord Robert Fitz-Walter, for their general, ſtiling him the marſhal of the army of God and his holy church; and, marching to Northampton, they beſieged the caſtle fifteen days; but, that place holding out longer than they expected, they raiſed the ſiege, and went to Bedford, of which they became maſters. Soon after, receiving advice, that, by means of a ſecret negotiation with ſome of the principal burghers of London, one of the gates of that rich and powerful city would be reſigned to them, they ſet forward, with ſo great expedition, that, in two marches, they arrived at Aldgate; and, this gate being opened to them, they entered the city, at break of day, before the king, who was in the tower, had the leaſt intelligence of their approach. This great advantage animating them to engage in any enterprize, they reſolved to beſiege the king in the tower; and, whilſt they were employed in this ſiege, for which they were obliged to make great preparations, they ſent circular letters to all the lords of the king's party, as well as thoſe that ſtood neuter; aſſuring them, that their eſtates would be rifled, and their houſes demoliſhed, if they did not join them, in ſupport of the common cauſe of the kingdom. Theſe menaces prevailed on all the neutral lords to eſpouſe the cauſe of the barons; nay, ſome of the king's beſt friends abandoned him, to avoid the impending evils. The king, becoming more tractable, by reaſon of this defection, diſpatched the earl of Pembroke, to inform the barons, that he was ready to comply with their demands; which was, in effect, to throw himſelf upon their mercy; and, after a ſhort negotiation, it was agreed, that the king and the barons ſhould meet, on a day appointed, in a meadow named Runnemede †, to conclude this affair.

The king ſigns two charters. M. Paris M. Weſt.

The barons came, in a body, to the place prefixed, whilſt the king was attended only by five or ſix lords; among whom was the cardinal archbiſhop, who affected to act, as mediator, tho' he was the chief author of the commotions. As the barons would not, in the leaſt, recede from their pretenſions, the king could not deny any of their demands; and, moreover, he conſidered, that, the higher they were, he would have a more plauſible pretence to retract, when a proper opportunity offered; and, therefore, without objecting to any of the articles propoſed, he ſeemed freely to grant what, in reality, was extorted by compulſive methods. He ſigned two charters, in which the barons

* About this time, the king granted a charter, for the freedom of elections, to biſhopricks and abbies, to elect their biſhops and abbots, without the king's nomination; which was contrary to the practice of his anceſtors. M. Paris. The nomination of fit perſons, to be choſen biſhops, to abbies, deans and chapters, was, never after, fully reſtored, till the 25th of Henry VIII.

† Between Staines and Windſor. M. Weſt. tells us, that Runnemede ſignifies the mead of council; becauſe, in antient times, treaties concerning the peace of the kingdom had often been held there. Both parties met on the 5th of June, and pitched their tents in a meadow; and, on the king's ſide, appeared the archbiſhops of Canterbury and Dublin, and ſome other lords, both ſpiritual and temporal; but thoſe, on the ſide of the barons, were vaſtly more numerous.

1215. inſerted, whatſoever they pleaſed; the firſt of which was termed the Charter of Liberties, or the Great Charter *, and the other, the Charter of the Liberties of the Foreſt. From a peruſal of theſe charters which will be inſerted, at the end of this reign, it will appear, what oppreſſions the Engliſh had been expoſed to, ſince the conqueſt, and what privileges they obtained, on this occaſion; and, from that time, theſe two charters have been the foundation of the Engliſh liberties, in ſpite of the attempts of John himſelf, and ſome of his ſucceſſors, to annul them.

Act. Pub. M. Par. Theſe charters were ſigned by the king, and all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, ſealed with the great ſeal, and confirmed by the king's ſolemn oath; and there were choſen, with the king's conſent, 25 barons, to any four of whom all perſons might make their complaints of the violation of the charters. It was farther agreed, that the four barons, who were firſt to be informed of any grievance, ſhould acquaint the king with it; and, if it was not redreſs'd, within 40 days, ſhould give notice of it to all the barons, for whom, in that caſe, it ſhould be lawful to take up arms, and ſeize the king's caſtles, in order to compel him to redreſs the grievance; yet all violence to the king's perſon, the queen, and their iſſue was excepted. But, to remove the ſcruples of the people, about taking up arms againſt their ſovereign, the king conſented, that all perſons ſhould ſwear to aſſiſt the barons, in all caſes relating to the two charters; and, laſtly, he ſent his letters patent, directed to all his ſheriffs, commiſſioning them to take the oaths of all his ſubjects, that they would punctually obſerve the two charters; and, if it was neceſſary, force the king to obſerve the ſame †.

John repents of ſigning the charters. M. Par. The obſervation of an hiſtorian, on the like occaſion, is very pertinent here, "that "the king did not deſign to bind himſelf with "chains of parchment"; for all the precautions of the barons ſerved only to make him the more ſollicitous to find out means, to free himſelf from a yoke, that to him ſeemed intolerable. Thoſe, who attended him being, for the moſt part, foreigners, alſo inflamed his reſentment, by aggravating the pride and inſolence of the barons; for, as they knew, that theſe charters, which preſcribed bounds to the regal power, muſt be prejudicial to them, they inceſſantly repreſented to him, how injurious he had been to himſelf, in ſubſcribing them; and, in a word, all their diſcourſes turned upon this ſingle point, to put him upon meaſures to deliver himſelf from his ſubjection. They ſoon ſucceeded in their deſign; but the main difficulty lay in the execution of it. This unhappy prince, continually tormented by his own thoughts, and the virulent reproaches of his courtiers, grew ſo reſerved and melancholy, as ſufficiently expreſs'd his vexation; for, tho' he projected means to be revenged, he was at a loſs for men and money, to that purpoſe; and he could diſcover no other remedy, than to apply to the barons themſelves, againſt whom they were intended, which was entirely impracticable. At laſt, his deſpair ſuggeſted to him a way of raiſing troops, tho' he was not in a condition to pay them; viz. to ſend ſome of his confidents into France, Germany, and Flanders, with orders to promiſe ſuch, as would enter into his ſervice, the confiſcated eſtates of the rebellious barons, as he was pleaſed to ſtile them; and he farther empowered theſe agents to make grants, before-hand, of the lands of the Engliſh lords, and to paſs the deeds in form. Thus, William the Conqueror had formerly aſſembled a numerous army, which rendered him maſter of England; and his followers were amply rewarded. The conſideration of the noble eſtates, theſe had acquired in the kingdom, led others now to try the ſame experiment, in expectation of the ſame advantages; for, at all times, there are too many ambitious or deſperate perſons, who greedily catch at all opportunities of enriching themſelves, without any regard to the juſtice or injuſtice of the cauſe they eſpouſe. 1215.

He demands the popes aid. Act. Pub. M. Par. In the mean while, John, to ſecure the court of Rome, ſent a letter to the pope ††, informing him of the conſtraint put upon him, though, as he aſſures him, he had proteſted, that, being a vaſſal of the holy ſee, he could do nothing, without his conſent; and, at the ſame time, he ſent a copy of the charters, intreating his holineſs to obſerve, that all the articles were ſo many incroachments on the regal power, and conſequently on the lord paramount. Thus, he flatter'd the pope, in the moſt ſenſible part; and, on this foundation, he requeſted him to abſolve him from his oath, that he might, with a ſafe conſcience, exert himſelf, to ſhake off this yoke. Having taken theſe meaſures, with all poſſible ſecrecy, the more effectually to prevent a diſcovery of his intentions, he choſe the Iſle of Wight, for the place of his reſidence; where, for a conſiderable time, he converſed only with fiſhermen and ſailors, and diverted himſelf, by walking on the ſea-ſhore with his domeſticks. When it came to be known, that the king was retired to the Iſle of Wight, people were, in vain, inquiſitive, about the cauſe of his retreat; ſome jocoſely ſaid, that he was become a fiſherman, or merchant; and others, that he deſigned to turn pyrate; but, tho' he was no ſtranger to theſe ſcoffs, he entirely diſregarded them, and, during three months, waited patiently, for the return of his agents and the arrival of the foreign troops.

Innocent threatens the barons. M. Par. As for the court of Rome, Innocent fell into a moſt

He likewiſe ſent them a letter, enjoining them to renounce what they had extorted from their king; but the barons, deſpiſing his injunctions, and without any dread of his thunders, ſeized on Rocheſter, which cardinal Langton put into their hands *; where they found a prodigious quantity of ammunition, laid in by the king, for his own occaſions, which, perhaps, was the reaſon of their taking that place.

He annuls the charters, and abſolves the king from his oath.

In the interim, the pope annulling the two charters, and abſolving the king from his oath, John's affairs began to aſſume a new aſpect, by the intelligence he received, that his agents had enliſted great numbers of adventurers in his ſervice; upon which, he, with all ſpeed, quitted the Iſle of Wight, and went to Dover; where he had the ſatisfaction to ſee vaſt multitudes arrive from Brabant, Flanders, Normandy, Poictou, and Gaſcoigne, all of them ſoldiers of fortune, and ready to venture their lives, for an eſtate. Theſe adventurers were ſo numerous, that the hiſtorians, who mention their number, are ſcarce to be credited; but, by a ſudden accident, Hugh de Boves, one of the leaders, with 40,000 men, periſhed in the ſea. If theſe had ſafely landed, John might, doubtleſs, have treated the Normans ſettled in England, as William the Conqueror had formerly done the Engliſh; tho' there were troops enough ſtill left, to enable him to trample on the barons, who little expected ſuch a ſurprizing revolution. The king, firſt of all, beſieged Rocheſter, which, after a long reſiſtance, ſurrendered, at laſt, in ſpite of the attempts of the barons to throw in ſome ſuccours; and he was ſo highly incenſed, that he would have hanged the whole garriſon, if the generals had not repreſented to him, that he would expoſe his own troops to the ſame barbarous uſage †. Upon this ſucceſs, he divided his army into two bodies, giving the command of one to his natural brother, the earl of Salisbury, in order to ravage the ſouthern counties; whilſt he, with the other, marched into the northern parts, to make them feel the effects of his reſentment. England was never in ſuch deplorable circumſtances, having two armies of rapacious foreigners in her very bowels, who made moſt terrible devaſtations; and we may naturally conclude, that they did not ſpare the houſes and lands of the barons, who, finding that they were not in a condition to appear in the field, retired to London.

He excommunicates the barons.

In the mean time, the pope thundered out an excommunication againſt the barons, ordering Pandulph and the biſhop of Rocheſter, to enjoin cardinal Langton, in his name, to publiſh the bull; but the archbiſhop, under the pretence that the pope was impoſed upon, refuſed to comply, till he had himſelf acquainted his holineſs with all the particulars; tho', the truth is, he could not reſolve to proceed againſt thoſe, whom he had himſelf encouraged to take up arms againſt the king. Upon this, the two commiſſioners publiſhed the excommunication themſelves, and ſuſpended the archbiſhop, purſuant to their orders; but the barons, pretending that they were not particularly named in the bull, perſiſted in their endeavours to defend themſelves againſt the king. As for Langton, he was ſent for to Rome, where he was in danger of being depoſed; but the pope, relenting at the ſollicitations of the other cardinals, only confirmed his ſuſpenſion. Some time after, he voided his brother Simon's election, who was choſen archbiſhop of York, and placed his enemy, Walter de Grey, in his room; from whom, however, he exacted, for his pall, 10,000 l. ſterling ‡, for the occaſions of the holy ſee; and, after ſeveral mortifications at Rome, Langton's ſuſpenſion was, at laſt, taken off, on condition that he would not return to England, till the commotions were entirely appeaſed.

The barons are again excommunicated. Act. Pub.

Innocent alſo publiſhed another bull, in which the barons were excommunicated, by name; and their lands were laid under an interdict, as well as the city of London, which had eſpouſed their cauſe. As the barons expected this ſecond bull, they were determined to overlook it, and prevent the publication of it in London; alledging that it was obtained by falſe ſuggeſtions, and conſequently invalid; that, beſides, the pope had no right to interfere in temporal affairs, ſince St. Peter received from Chriſt only ſpiritual power; and, therefore, it was neither juſt nor reaſonable, that chriſtians ſhould tamely ſubmit to be governed, by the ambition and avarice of the popes. One would not have imagined, that they, who diſcourſed in this ſtrain, were the very perſons who refuſed to ſerve the king, becauſe he was excommunicated, if there were not 1000 inſtances to prove, how apt men are to ſquare their opinions by their intereſts; yet the pope had the mortification to find his authority deſpiſed, without being able to help it, becauſe the people were againſt him; in which, caſe, his thunders are always ineffectual. In the mean while, John continued his ravages in the kingdom, and eſpecially in the lands of the confederate barons; and numberleſs outrages and cruelties were committed, on this occaſion, which increaſed the animoſity of the barons againſt the king.

Such was the wretched ſtate of the confederate barons, that they, at laſt, came to a deſperate

‡ From hence it may be conjectured, what immenſe ſums of money the pope, in thoſe days, extorted out of England, as well as the vaſt riches of the clergy; when an archbiſhop was to pay the pope as much, as would now be equal to 50,000 l. It is ſaid, he was promoted to the ſee of York, for not having known a woman.

Nothing could be more agreeable to Philip, than this propoſal of the barons, who, once before, was intent upon the conqueſt of that iſland; and, if the loſs of his fleet, more than the pope's menaces, obliged him to deſiſt from his undertaking, he was ſtill ardently deſirous of accompliſhing it, upon a proper occaſion. The rupture between John and the barons giving him a favourable opportunity, he embraced it immediately; demanding only from the barons 25 hoſtages, for the performance of their promiſe; but, theſe hoſtages being arrived at Paris, prince Lewis, then in Languedoc warring againſt the Albigenſes, came to the king, his father, to prepare for this important expedition; and, ſending directly ſome troops to the barons, he aſſured them, that he would ſoon follow, in perſon, with more powerful ſuccours.

1216. Great preparations in France. M. Par.

The pope, receiving the news of theſe preparations in France, diſpatched Gallo, as his legate thither; who, having obtained an audience of the king, prohibited him, in the pope's name, to carry his arms into England, which was a part of St. Peter's patrimony, and threatened all perſons with excommunication, that ſhould, directly or indirectly, aſſiſt the Engliſh barons. Philip replied, that England was no patrimony of St. Peter, becauſe John could not ſubject his kingdom, without the conſent of the ſtates; that ſuch an extraordinary act was beyond the power of any king; and that the maxims, which his holineſs would introduce, were too prejudicial to all ſtates to be admitted *; yet this was the very ſame perſon, who, three years before, thought, that he was intitled to England, by the ſole authority of the pope. However, this is an inconteſtable proof, that the pope's exorbitant power was not allowed, from a religious principle, but from a motive of intereſt or fear; and from it we find, that, that the court of Rome, at certain times, met with mortifications, which ſhe readily connived at; whilſt, on other occaſions, ſhe exerted her authority, in the moſt haughty and imperious manner.

Lewis lands in England.

Lewis, in ſpite of the pope's prohibition, was ſoon in a readineſs to embarque for England, with a fleet of 700 ſail; whilſt John, tho' he went to Dover, upon the firſt notice of the deſigns of the French, not thinking himſelf in a condition to hinder their deſcent, retired to Wincheſter; inſomuch that Lewis landed his troops at Sandwich, without the leaſt interruption. After this, he marched a- 1216. gainſt Rocheſter, which made but a feint reſiſtance; and the taking of that city drew after it the whole county of Kent, except Dover-caſtle, where John had left an able garriſon, under Hubert de Burgh, who was a brave and faithful governor.

The abbot of St. Auguſtin excommunicates him. Thorn.

In the interim, the pope ſent Gallo, his legate, orders to repair into England, and to publiſh the bull of excommunication againſt the barons; and, at the ſame time, he empowered the abbot of St. Auguſtin's, to denounce prince Lewis excommunicated, the very moment he landed in England. Lewis, to divert this blow, repreſented to the abbot in a letter, his right to the crown of England; alledging, among other reaſons, that, as John aſcended the throne, only by the conſent of the barons, the ſame authority might depoſe him, and place another in his room; but the abbot, who was not convinced by his arguments, declared prince Lewis and his adherents excommunicated, purſuant to the pope's expreſs orders; yet this could not deter that prince from his undertaking. As ſoon as he was poſſeſs'd of Rocheſter he marched to London; where the barons and citizens ſwore allegiance to him, upon his ſolemn oath to reſtore to all their loſt eſtates, and to the nation their antient privileges. It does not appear, from the Engliſh hiſtorians, that this prince was crowned; tho' it is certain, that he diſpoſed of every thing relating to the government, as if he had been lawfully inveſted with the regal authority. He made Simon Langton his chancellor; who, being exaſperated againſt the pope, prevailed on the barons and Londoners to contemn his cenſures, and, in ſpite of the interdict, to attend divine ſervice, which was celebrated, as uſual; and Lewis readily conſented to what was ſo agreeable to his own intentions. He foreſaw theſe obſtacles, before he engaged in this expedition; and he was, therefore, reſolutely determined to diſregard them; copying, in this, after his father and the French biſhops, who appealed to the pope, when better informed, from the ſentence of interdict denounced on the whole kingdom †; for appeals to a future general council were not, then, much in uſe, nor the commodious diſtinction between the holy ſee and the perſon of the pope. Lewis makes great progreſs. M. Par. An. Waverl.

Lewis's party being daily augmented, as he continued his progreſs, he quickly ſubdued moſt of the ſouthern counties; and then he marched towards Norfolk and Suffolk, which alſo ſubmitted to him. During theſe ſucceſſes, he met with no oppoſition, except from William de Collingham, who, with 1000 archers, cloſely following the prince's army, attacked the French that ſtraggled, for the ſake of plunder. Soon after, Lewis's adherents in the north took the city of York, and intreated him to

Upon this, he returned to beſiege Dover; whilſt the Engliſh barons inveſted Windſor. About this time, Alexander I. king of Scotland, purſuant to Lewis's ſummons, came and did him homage, in perſon, for the lands he held of the crown of England; upon which, the prince and the barons ſwore, that they never would make peace, without his knowledge; tho' this promiſe was not afterwards punctually performed. Preſently after, John was deſerted by the Flemiſh and Poictevin troops; for Lewis found means to entice them from his ſervice.

He vindicates his claim to England, before the pope. M. Par.

In the mean while, the ambaſſadors, the prince diſpatched to Rome, exerted their utmoſt skill, to vindicate their maſter's pretenſions to the crown of England; and they chiefly inſiſted on his marriage with Blanche of Caſtile, alledging that, John being lawfully depoſed by the barons, the crown was devolved to Blanche, his niece *. The pope objected, that, admitting that John was lawfully depoſed, his children ought not to be involved in the ſame misfortune; and, ſuppoſing his children, young as they were, to be partakers of their father's crimes, Eleanor of Bretagne, Arthur's ſiſter, who was ſtill alive, preceded all others; and, finally, that the emperor Otho, ſon of Henry II's eldeſt daughter, ought certainly to have the preference to Blanche of Caſtile, who was born of the youngeſt. The ambaſſadors anſwered, that, Eleanor's father and Otho's mother being deceaſed, repreſentation could not take place; but, as the mother of Blanche was ſtill living, her daughter might juſtly repreſent her; but the pope replied, why ſhould Blanche be preferred to the king of Caſtile, her brother, and the queen of Leon, her eldeſt ſiſter? This queſtion was not eaſy to be reſolved; but, as the ambaſſadors, on this occaſion, were, not ſo ſollicitous, about the reaſon of the thing, as to advance ſome plauſible allegations, in order to ſatisfy the pope, they were not at a loſs, for an anſwer; affirming that, when there were ſeveral heirs, and the next of kin did not appear and put in his claim, a more diſtant relation might take poſſeſſion of the inheritance, ſaving to the other his right; and that, upon this foundation, their maſter had entered England; but, if afterwards a nearer than himſelf ſhould lay claim to it, he would be always ready to give him a reaſonable ſatisfaction. Innocent was obliged to acquieſce in this reply; as it ſhewed a deference to the pope, in debating the matter before him; tho', whatſoever his deciſion might be, Lewis was reſolved to proſecute his pretended right, which was founded more upon force than equity.

In the interim, John, who, till now, durſt not venture to take the field, leaving Winchester, marched into Norfolk and Suffolk, where he committed great ravages; but, hearing that the barons had raiſed the ſiege of Windſor, with a view of giving him battle, he retired to an advantageous poſt near Stanford; where it would have been extremely difficult to attack him. He took care not to hazard a battle, being apprehenſive, that the officers of his army, moſt of whom were ſubjects of the king of France, would, to be reconciled to Lewis, be guilty of ſome remarkable treachery; and, moreover, he expected ſome advantages, by prolonging the war; for he believed, that the Engliſh would, in a little time, become weary of the French, who already began to be very inſolent and aſſuming, and did not, in the leaſt, ſtudy to conform themſelves to their temper and manners; and, indeed, he had ſome reaſon to entertain theſe apprehenſions; for the barons were exceedingly diſguſted, to ſee all the rewards diſtributed to the foreigners, and their own eſtates beſtowed on the favourites of the prince, whom they had invited over, as if the Engliſh had no right to the conqueſts, that were made. However, all this, perhaps, would not have engaged them to take other meaſures, if what was diſcovered by the viſcount de Melun, one of Lewis's prime confidents, had not, in a manner, compelled them to provide for their own ſecurity. If certain authors may be credited, this nobleman, being ſeized by a mortal diſtemper, at London, ſent for ſuch of the barons, as were poſted there, to guard the city; to whom he declared, that he could no longer conceal a ſecret, which lay heavy on his conſcience, and, if not immediately diſcloſed to the Engliſh, would infallibly drag them to utter deſtruction. Then he repreſented to them, that the prince was reſolved to baniſh all the barons, that had taken up arms againſt king John, as traytors to their country; and he farther ſaid, that this reſolution was taken, in a council of 16 French lords, of which himſelf was one, and confirmed by the prince, with an oath. He aſſured them, upon the words of a dying man, that what he related was true; and he told them, that his veracity ought the leſs to be diſputed, as he was juſt on the point of appearing before the tribunal of God. The French hiſtorians ſtile this ſecret a fiction; and, indeed, it is not eaſy to conceive, what could be Lewis's motive, to make ſuch an oath, beforehand, in the preſence of 16 witneſſes, even on the ſuppoſition, that he deſigned to inſinuate, that this would be a means amply to reward their ſervices; for it would have been extremely imprudent to reveal ſo early ſuch a black deſign. However, whether this ſecret was real, or only invented to ſow diſſenſion between the French and the Engliſh, being whiſpered about, it made a very deep impreſſion on the minds of the barons; and it had the greater influence over them, as it agreed with their former ſuſpicions of the French. From this time, many repented of their calling in the foreigners; and no leſs than 40 ſecretly aſſured king John, that they

John carries his crown to Lynn.

In the mean while, that unfortunate prince, not knowing whom to truſt, being jealous even of his own friends, inceſſantly marched, from place to place, to diſconcert the meaſures of his enemies; but, thinking himſelf ſafeſt in the county of Norfolk, he choſe the little town of Lynn to be the repoſitory of his treaſures, his crown and ſceptre, and other things of value; and this town had expreſſed ſuch affection and loyalty for him, that, among other preat privileges that he granted it, as marks of his gratitude, he made it a mayor-town, and preſented the firſt mayor with his own ſword, which is carefully preſerved there, to this day. However, being preſs'd by the barons, he determined to remove his treaſures from Lynn to a certain place in Lincolnſhire, where he intended to retire; and he very narrowly eſcaped drowning with his whole army, in a large marſh *, that parts the two counties of Lincoln and Norfolk. Before he was quite over the tide, coming up the river Well-ſtream, which overflows the marſh-land, at high-water, expoſed him to the greateſt danger; but, tho' he eſcaped himſelf, all his baggage, was ſwallowed up by the waters. He arrived, that night, at Swine's-head-abbey, where he lodged; but his vexation for his loſs, which, in his preſent condition, was irretrievable, threw him into a violent fever, which was the more inflamed, by inconſiderately eating peaches; and, the next day, not being able to ride, he was carried in a litter to Sleford-caſtle; from whence, the day after, he proceeded to Newark. Here the king, perceiving his illneſs to increaſe, made his will, and appointed Henry, his eldeſt ſon, then only 10 years of age, to be his heir; and the care of his ſalvation employed his thoughts, during the reſidue of his ſickneſs, which put an end to his life, on the 18th of and 10 days. His body was removed to Worceſter, purſuant to his own order, and interr'd, with little funeral pomp, in the cathedral; where his tomb, with his image upon it, is to be ſeen, at this day †. Some relate, that he was poiſoned by a monk of Swine's-head-abbey; but this is very improbable, ſince it is not taken notice of by any of the contemporary hiſtorians.

John's character.

If this prince's character be drawn, from Matthew Paris, his chief hiſtorian, he muſt be repreſented, as one of the vileſt wretches that ever lived; but, as I have elſewhere remarked, the hiſtories of princes, who had any conteſts with the court of Rome, are to be very cautiouſly peruſed; and, therefore, in my opinion, to come at the truth, it is moſt expedient ſolely to examine the actions of this monarch, in order to trace his temper and inclinations. It muſt be confeſs'd, that his unjuſt proceedings naturally conveigh a very diſadvantageous idea of him, when we conſider his injurious treatment of Richard, his brother; the death of prince Arthur, of which he never fully acquitted himſelf; the perpetual impriſonment of Eleanor of Bretagne, his niece; his putting away Aviſa of Glouceſter; his extreme indolence, when Philip Auguſtus was employed in ſubduing his dominions in France; his ignominious reſignation of his crown to the pope; the breach of his faith with the barons; and his calling in an army of foreign mercenaries, to be revenged on his own ſubjects. However, after all that has been ſaid, if one was diſpoſed to undertake his vindication, with reſpect to moſt of theſe articles, it would not, perhaps, be ſo difficult, as it ſeems, at firſt view; but, without entering upon a ſubject, which would carry me too far, I ſhall only apply to this prince what I have already obſerved, concerning William Rufus; that, finding in king John ſcarce a ſingle valuable quality, it is not worth while to make a digreſſion, to juſtify ſome particular actions; tho' it is evident, that the writers of his life have painted him, in blacker colours than he deſerved. This prince had great failings; yet they would not have been ſo viſible or ſo aggravated by the hiſtorians, had he been contemporary with a king of France leſs politick and ambitious, a pope of leſs pride and more conſcience, and a nobility leſs turbulent and factious. As for levying taxes, without the conſent of the ſtates, it had been often practiſed, ſince the Norman conqueſt, as the reader muſt have remarked, in ſome former reigns; and yet ſeveral modern hiſtorians ſharply exclaim againſt him, as if, in thoſe days, England enjoyed the ſame privileges, as at preſent; whereas it is notorious, that the caſe was otherwiſe then, when there was a neceſſity to recur to the time of the Saxon monarchy, to diſcover the very foundations of thoſe privileges.

1216.

John's fortune never ſuited his natural temper; for, tho' he was a lover of eaſe and quiet, he was perpetually involved in troubles. He was fit neither for proſperity nor adverſity, the former rendering him extremely inſolent, and the latter, to the laſt degree, dejected; ſo that, doubtleſs, a middle ſtate of life would have moſt been agreeable to his diſpoſition.

M. Par. Hemingford.

He is charged with exceeding Henry II, his father, in luſt; a vice of which princes are ſeldom very reproachfully accuſed, unleſs with a determined view of defaming him for other reaſons. It cannot be denied, that the monks have attempted to repreſent him, in the moſt odious light, in order to excuſe the pope's proceedings againſt him; which is manifeſt from the calumny they caſt upon his memory, in aſſerting,

1216. asſerting, that he ſent ambaſſadors to the Miramolin of Africa, with an offer of his kingdom, and a promiſe to embrace the Mahometan religion, which is altogether improbable. However, ſome modern hiſtorians affirm it, for a truth; believing that Matthew Paris *, who wrote in the reign of Henry III, John's ſon, would not have preſumed to advance it, had it been groundleſs; but this argument does not ſeem to be concluſive, ſince that author has even expreſs'd himſelf in very diſreſpectful terms of Henry III, without any dread of his reſentment, from which, perhaps, he was ſcreened, when he wrote; and, beſides, books in thoſe days, were not immediately diſperſed, remaining often a great while concealed in the monaſteries, before they were publiſhed.

John was ever unfortunate; and, if we may give credit to the hiſtorians, always deteſted by his own ſubjects; tho' this conſtant hatred of the Engliſh is not to be reconciled with the great eaſe, with which he levied his armies, and even whilſt he lay under the ſentence of excommunication. We muſt, therefore, diſtinguiſh two periods in his reign; in the firſt of which, from his coronation to his reſignation of the crown to the pope, if he was not greatly eſteemed, it, at leaſt, does not appear, that he was ſo odious, as he was afterwards rendered by his imprudent conduct. The ſecond period, commencing at his reſignation, ends with his life; during which, it muſt be confeſſed, that his ſubjects had an extreme averſion to him; and yet, if his government be conſidered abſtractly from his perſonal qualities, it may be ſaid, that he was not one of the worſt of kings. He was the firſt or chief, that appointed thoſe excellent forms of civil government in London, and moſt other cities in the kingdom; and, according to Camden and others, the firſt that coined ſterling money. The ceremonies, obſerved in the creation of earls, owe their original to this prince; and, in fine, he eſtabliſhed the Engliſh laws in Ireland, and granted the cinque-ports the privileges they enjoy, at this day †. The moſt important foreign events, during this reign, were the taking of Conſtantinople by the arms of the French and Venetians, in 1204, and the Cruſade againſt the Albigenſes , which gave riſe to the inquiſition ††. Remarkable foreign events.

* He not only mentions the names of the ambaſſadors, viz. Thomas Hardington and Ralph Fitz-Nicholas, Knights, with Robert of London, a prieſt, but likewiſe deſcribes, at large, the manner of the audience they had of the black king; and how he deſpiſed their maſter, for his meanneſs of his ſpirit, and diſmiſs'd them with contempt. He likewiſe relates, that John, ſome time after he had made his peace with Innocent, declared, "That nothing had ſuc-"ceeded with him, ſince he was reconciled to God and the pope"; and, that, after a hunting, at the opening of a ſtag, he ſhould have ſaid, "See, how fat that deer is! and yet I dare ſwear he never heard maſs." M. Par.

† Becauſe they obliged themſelves, and their heirs, to provide the king, upon a reaſonable ſummons, 80 able veſſels, at their own charges, for 40 days, and, after that, to receive wages from the king. Knighton.

‡ He had alſo five natural ſons, viz. Richard, Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, Sir John Courcy, Osbert Giffard, and Oliver, and a daughter, named Joan, from whom many noble families are deſcended. Vid. Sandf. Geneal.

 About the year 1160, Waldo, a merchant of Lyons, who applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſcriptures, finding that there were no grounds for ſeveral of the Romiſh doctrines, particularly, tranſubſtantiation, publickly oppoſed them; and his followers, after him, were named Waldenſes, who, being chaced from Lyons, overſpread Dauphine and Provence. It is ſaid, that, to prevent their growth, Philip Auguſtus razed 300 gentlemen's ſeats, and deſtroyed ſeveral fortified towns; but, inſtead of extirpating them, this only diſperſed them over a great part of Europe, and they multiplied ſo faſt, that, in leſs than a century after Waldo, in the ſmall biſhoprick of Paſſau alone, there were upwards of 80,000. The articles of their faith, which they drew up and dedicated to the king of France, prove, that they agreed, in moſt points, with the preſent proteſtants; and, in 1200, in the province of Albigeois in Languedoc, from whence they were ſtiled Albigenſes, they ſtood upon their own defence; but Philip, warring againſt them, expelled them into Bohemia and Savoy, and ſeveral retired into England. The Cruſade againſt them, it is reported, conſiſted of 500,000 men, who wore their croſſes on their breaſts, to be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe that went to the Holy-Land, who wore them on their ſhoulders.

†† Pope Gregory IX. was the firſt that erected this horrid tribunal, eſtabliſhing it at Tholouſe, where it was ſoon pulled down, on the account of its cruelties. Italy and Spain embraced it; but Charles V, attempting to ſet it up in the Low-Countries, by this means, loſt thoſe provinces. This court is under the direction of the Dominicans, and takes cognizance of hereſy, Judaiſm, &c. and the delinquents, being confined in dungeons, never ſee the light, till they accuſe themſelves and their accomplices; for they never know or are confronted with their accuſers. The congregation of the inquiſition was eſtabliſhed by Paul III, and confirmed by Sixtus V, conſiſting of 12 cardinals and a great number of prelates and divines; and the cardinals are inquiſitors general, who depute ſubſtitutes in the provinces.

* Charta regis WILLIELMI Conquiſitoris.

WILLIELMUS rex Anglorum, dux Normannorum, omnibus hominibus ſuis Francis & Anglis, ſalutem.

De religione & pace publica.

I. Statuimus imprimis ſuper omnia, unum Deum per totum regnum noſtrum venerari, unam fidem Chriſti ſemper inviolatam cuſtodiri, pacem, & ſecuritatem & concordiam, judicium & juſtitiam inter Anglos & Normannos, Francos & Britones Walliæ & Cornubiæ, Pictos, & Scotos Albaniæ, ſimiliter inter Francos & Inſulanos, provincias & patrias, quæ pertinent ad coronam & dignitatem, defenſionem & obſervationem & honorem regni noſtri, & inter omnes nobis ſubjectos per univerſam monarchiam regni Britanniæ firmiter & inviolabiliter obſervari. Ita quod nullus alii forisfaciat in ullo ſuper forisfacturam noſtram plenam.

De fide & obſequio erga regem.

II. Statuimus etiam, ut omnes liberi homines fœdere & ſacramento affirment, quod intra & extra univerſum regnum Angliæ (quod olim vocabatur regnum Britanniæ) Willielmo regi domino ſuo fideles eſſe volunt, terras & honores illius omni fidelitate ubique ſervare cum eo, & contra inimicos & alienigenas defendere.

De Normanni ſeu Francigenæ cæde.

III. Volumus autem & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes homines, quos nobiſcum adduximus, aut poſt nos venerint, ſint ſub protectione & in pace noſtra per univerſum regnum prædictum; & ſi quis de illis occiſus fuerit, dominus ejus habeat intra V dies homicidam ejus ſi poterit; ſin autem, incipiat perſolvere nobis XLVI marcas argenti, quamdiu ſubſtantia domini illius perduraverit: ubi vero ſubſtantia domini defecerit, totus hundredus, in quo occiſio facta eſt, communiter ſolvat quod remanet.

De jure Normannorum qui ante adventum regis Gulielmi cives fuerant Anglicani.

IV. Et omnis Francigena, qui tempore Edwardi propinqui noſtri fuit in Anglia particeps conſuetudinum Anglorum, quod ipſi dicunt † Anhlote & Anſcote, perſolvat ſecundum legem Anglorum.

De clientelari ſeu feudorum jure, & ingenuorum immunitate.

V. Volumus etiam ac firmiter præcipimus & concedimus, ut omnes liberi homines totius monarchiæ regni noſtri prædicti, habeant & teneant terras ſuas & poſſeſſiones ſuas bene & in pace, libere ab omni exactione injuſta, & ab omni tallagio, ita quod nichil ab eis exigatur vel capiatur, niſi ſervicium ſuum liberum, quod de jure nobis facere debent & facere tenentur; & prout ſtatutum eſt eis & illis a nobis datum & conceſſum jure hæreditario imperpetuum, per commune concilium totius regni noſtri prædicti.

De nocturnis cuſtodiis.

VI. Statuimus etiam & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes civitates & burgi & caſtella & hundredi & wapentachia totius regni noſtri prædicti, ſingulis noctibus vigilentur & cuſtodiantur in gyrum, pro maleficis & inimicis, prout vicecomes & aldermanni, & præpoſiti & cæteri ballivi & miniſtri noſtri melius, per commune concilium ad utilitatem regni, providebunt.

De menſuris & ponderibus.

VII. Et quod habeant per univerſum regnum menſuras fideliſſimas & ſignatas, & pondera fideliſſima & ſignata, ſicut boni prædeceſſores ſtatuerunt.

De clientum ſeu vaſſallorum præſtationibus.

VIII. Statuimus etiam & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes comites & barones, milites, & ſervientes, & univerſi liberi homines totius regni noſtri prædicti, habeant & teneant ſe ſemper bene in armis & in equis, ut decet & oportet, & quod ſint ſemper prompti & bene parati ad ſervicium ſuum integrum nobis explendum & peragendum, cum ſemper opus adfuerit, ſecundum quod nobis debent de feodis & tenementis ſuis, de jure facere, & ſicut illis ſtatuimus, per commune concilium totius regni noſtri prædicti, & illis dedimus & conceſſimus in feodo jure hæreditario; hoc præceptum non ſit violatum ullo modo, ſuper forisfacturam noſtram plenam.

Ut jura regia illæſa ſervare pro viribus conentur ſubditi.

IX. Statuimus etiam & firmiter præcipimus, ut omnes liberi homines totius regni noſtri prædicti ſint fratres conjurati ad monarchiam noſtram & ad regnum noſtrum pro viribus ſuis & facultatibus, contra inimicos pro poſſe ſuo defendendum & viriliter ſervandum, & pacem & dignitatem coronæ noſtræ integram obſervandam, & ad judicium rectum, & juſtitiam conſtanter omnibus modis pro poſſe ſuo ſine dolo & ſine dilatione faciendam. [Hoc decretum ſancitum eſt in civitate London.]

Ne venditio & emptio fiat niſi coram teſtibus & in civitatibus.

X. Interdicimus etiam, ut nulla viva ‡ pecunia vendatur aut ematur niſi intra civitates, & hoc ante tres fideles teſtes, nec aliquam rem vetitam, ſine fidejuſſore & warranto: quod ſi aliter fecerit, ſolvat & perſolvat & poſtea forisfacturam.

De emporiis & jure urbium, pagorumque notæ melioris.

XI. Item nullum mercatum vel forum ſit, nec fieri permittantur, niſi in civitatibus regni noſtri, in burgis & muro vallatis, & in caſtellis & in locis tutiſſimis, ubi conſuetudines regni noſtri & jus noſtrum commune & dignitatis coronæ noſtræ, quæ conſtituta ſunt a bonis prædeceſſoribus noſtris deperiri non poſſunt, nec defraudari, nec violari, ſed omnia rite & in aperto & per judicium & juſtitiam fieri debent. Et ideo caſtella, & burgi & civitates ſitæ ſunt & fundatæ, & ædificatæ, ſcilicet, ad tuitionem gentium & populorum regni, & ad defenſionem regni, & idcirco obſervari debent cum omni libertate & integritate & ratione.

De purgatione forenſi in judiciis publicis.

XII. Decretum eſt etiam * ibi, ut ſi Francigena appellaverit Anglum de perjurio aut murdro, furto, homicidio, (Ran quod dicunt) apertam rapinam quæ negari non poteſt, Anglus ſe defendat per quod melius voluerit, aut judicio ferri, aut duello: Si autem Anglus infirmus fuerit, inveniat alium, qui pro eo faciat: Si quis eorum victus fuerit, emendet regi XL ſolid. Si autem Anglus Francigenam appellaverit, & probare voluerit judicio aut duello, volo tunc Francigenam purgare ſe ſacramento, non ferro.

Firmantur leges Edwardi regis.

XIII. Hoc quoque præcipimus, ut omnes habeant & teneant leges Edwardi regis in omnibus rebus, adauctis his, quas conſtituimus ad utilitatem Anglorum.

De juſtitiæ publicæ fidejuſſoribus.

XIV. Omnis homo qui voluerit ſe teneri pro libero, ſit in plegio, ut plegius eum habeat ad juſtitiam, ſi quid offenderit, & quiſquam evaſerit, talium videant plegii, ut ſolvant, quod calumniatum eſt, & purgent ſe quodam evaſo nullam fraudem noverint. Requiratur hundredus & comitatus (ſicut anteceſſores ſtatuerunt) & qui juſte venire debent & noluerint, ſummoneantur ſemel; & ſi ſecundo non venerint, accipiatur unus bos; & ſi tertio, alius bos; & ſi quarto, reddatur de rebus hujus hominis quod calumniatum eſt, quod dicitur Ceathgel, & inſuper regis forisfactura.

De ſervis & eorum manumiſſione.

XV. Et prohibemus ut nullus vendat hominem extra patriam; ſi qui vero velit ſervum ſuum liberum facere, tradat eum vicecomiti per manum dextram in pleno comitatu, quietum illum clamare debet a jugo ſervitutis ſuæ per manumiſſionem, & oſtendat ei liberas vias & portas, & tradat illi libera arma, ſcil. lanceam & gladium, deinde liber homo efficitur.

De ſervis.

XVI. Item ſi ſervi permanſerint ſine calumnia per annum & diem in civitatibus noſtris, vel in burgis muro vallatis, vel in caſtris noſtris, a die illa liberi efficiuntur, & liberi a jugo ſervitutis ſuæ ſint imperpetuum.

De ſuppliciorum modo.

XVII. Interdicimus etiam, ne quis occidatur vel ſuſpendatur pro aliqua culpa, ſed enerventur oculi & abſcidantur pedes, vel teſticuli vel manus, ita quod truncus remaneat vivus in ſignum proditionis & nequitiæ ſuæ, ſecundum enim quantitatem delicti debet pœna maleficis infligi: iſta præcepta non ſint violata ſuper forifacturam noſtram plenam. Teſtibus, &c.

Alia charta continens inſtitutiones ſive leges regis Willielmi; quæ videntur additiones prioribus §.

Willielmus Dei gratia, rex Anglorum, omnibus ad quos ſcriptum hoc perveniat, ſalutem & amicitiam, quod mando & præcipio per totam Angliæ nationem cuſtodiri.

De examine forenſi.

XVIII. Si Anglicus homo compellet aliquem Francigenam per ‡ bellum de furto vel homicidio vel aliqua re pro qua bellum fieri debeat, vel judicium inter duos homines, habeat plenam licentiam faciendi. Et ſi Anglicus bellum nolit, Francigena compellatus adlegiet ſe in jurejurando contra eum per ſuos teſtes ſecundum legem Normanniæ.

De eodem.

XIX. Item ſi Francigena compellet Anglicum per bellum de eiſdem rebus, Anglicus plena licentia defendat ſe per bellum vel per judicium, ſi magis ei placeat. Et ſi neutrum ſit, (id eſt invalidus) & nolit bellum vel non poſſet, quærat ſibi legalem defenſorem.

De eodem.

XX. Si Francigena victus fuerit, perſolvat regi LX ſolid. Et ſi Anglicus nolit ſe defendere per bellum vel per teſtimonium, adlegiet ſemper  Dei judicium.

De examine forenſi.

XXI. De omnibus utlagariæ rebus, rex inſtituit, ut Anglicus ſe purget ad judicium; & ſi Anglicus appellet Francigenam, de utlagaria & hoc ſuper eum inveritare velit, defendat ſe Francigena per bellum. Et ſi Anglicus non audeat eum probare per bellum, defendat ſe Francigena pleno juramento, non in verborum obſervantiis.

Charta libertatum regis HENRICI primi.

M. Paris. p. 55.

HENRICUS Dei gratia rex Angliæ, &c. Hugoni de Boclande vicecomiti & omnibus fidelibus ſuis tam Francis quam Anglicis in Herefordſyre, ſalutem. Sciatis me Dei miſericordia & communi concilio baronum, regni Angliæ regem eſſe coronatum.

I. Et quia regnum oppreſſum erat injuſtis exactionibus, ego reſpectu Dei & amore, quem ergo vos omnes habeo, ſanctam Dei eccleſiam liberam facio, ita quod nec eam vendam nec ad firmam ponam, nec mortuo archiepiſcopo vel epiſcopo, vel abbate, aliquid accipiam de dominio eccleſiæ, vel de hominibus, donec ſucceſſor in eam ingrediatur.

II. Et omnes malas conſuetudines, quibus regnum Angliæ injuſte opprimebatur, inde aufero, quas malas conſuetudines in parte hic pono.

III. Si quis baronum meorum, comitum, vel aliorum, qui de me tenent, mortuus fuerit, hæres ſuus non redimet terram ſuum, ſicut facere conſueverat tempore patris mei, ſed juſta & legitima relevatione relevabit eam: ſimiliter & * homines baronum meorum legitima & juſta relevatione relevabunt terras ſuas de dominis ſuis.

IV. Et ſi quis baronum, vel aliorum hominum meorum, filiam ſuam tradere voluerit, ſive ſororem, ſive nepotem, ſive cognatam, mecum inde loquatur; ſed neque ego aliquid de ſuo pro hac licentia accipiam, neque defendam ei, quin eam det, excepto ſi eam dare voluerit inimico meo.

V. Et ſi mortuo barone vel alio homine meo filia hæres remanſerit, dabo illam cum conſilio baronum meorum cum terra ſua.

VI. Et ſi mortuo marito, uxor ejus remanſerit, & ſine liberis fuerit, dotem ſuam & maritagium habebit, & eam non dabo marito, niſi ſecundum velle ſuum. Si vero uxor cum liberis remanſerit, dotem ſuam & maritagium habebit, dum corpus ſuum legitime ſervabit; & eam non dabo niſi ſecundum velle ſuum, & terræ liberorum cuſtos erit ſive uxor, ſive alius propinquior, qui juſtus eſſe debet: & præcipio, ut homines mei ſimiliter ſe contineant erga filios & filias & uxores hominum ſuorum.

VII. Monetagium commune, quod capiebatur per civitates vel comitatus, quod non fuit tempore Edwardi regis, hoc ne amodo fiat omnino defendo.

VIII. Si quis captus fuerit ſive monetarius ſive alius cum falſa moneta, juſtitia recta inde fiat.

IX. Omnia placita & omnia debita, quæ regi fratri meo debebantur, condono, exceptis firmis meis, & exceptis illis, quæ pacta erant pro aliorum hæreditatibus, vel pro illis rebus, quæ juſtius alios contingebant. Et ſi quis aliquid pro hæreditate ſua pepigerat, illud condono & omnes releviationes, quæ pro rectis hæreditatibus pactæ erant.

X. Et ſi quis baronum vel hominum meorum infirmabitur, ſicut ipſe dabit vel dare diſpoſuerit pecuniam ſuam: ita datam eſſe concedo.

XI. Quod ſi ipſe præventus, vel armis, vel infirmitate, pecuniam ſuam nec dederat, nec dare diſpoſuerit, uxor ſua, ſive liberi aut parentes, & legitimi homines ſui, pro anima ejus eam dividant: ſicut eis melius viſum fuerit.

XII. Si quis baronum vel hominum meorum forisfecerit, non dabit vadium in miſeria pecuniæ ſuæ, ſicut faciebat tempore patris, vel fratris mei, ſed ſecundum forisfacturæ modum: nec ita emendabit ſicut emendaſſet retro tempore patris mei vel fratris.

XIII. Quod ſi perfidiæ vel ſceleris convictus fuerit, ſicut culpa, ſic emendet.

XIV. Murdra etiam retro ab illa die, qua in regem coronatus ſum, omnia condono, & ea quæ amodo facta fuerint juſte emendentur ſecundum legem regis Edwardi.

XV. Foreſtas, communi concilio baronum meorum in manu mea, ita retinui, ſicut pater meus eas habuit.

XVI. Militibus, qui per loricas terras ſuas defendunt, terras dominicarum carucarum ſuarum quietas ab omnibus geldis & omni proprio, dono meo concedo; ut ſicut tam magno gravamine alleviati ſunt, ita equis & armis bene ſe inſtruant, ut apti & parati ſint ad ſervitium meum, & ad defenſionem regni mei.

XVII. Pacem firmam pono in toto regno meo, & teneri amodo præcipio. Legem regis Edwardi vobis reddo, cum illis emendationibus, quibus pater meus eam emendavit, conſilio baronum ſuorum.

XVIII. Si quis aliquid de modo, vel de rebus alicujus poſt obitum regis Willielmi fratris mei cepit, totum cito reddatur abſque emendatione; & ſi quis inde aliquid retinuerit, ille ſuper quem inventum fuerit, graviter mihi emendabit.

His teſtibus Mauricio Londonienſi epiſcopo, Willielmo Wintonienſi electo, Girardo Herefordenſi epiſcopo, Henrico comite, Simone comite, Waltero Giffard comite, Roberto de Monte forti, Rogero Bigod, & aliis multis.

W. Malm. de Geſt. Reg. p. 179.

I. EGO Stephanus Dei gratia, aſſenſu cleri & populi in regem Angliæ electus, & a domino Willielmo archiepiſcopo Cantuariæ & ſanctæ eccleſiæ Romanæ legato conſecratus, & ab Innocentio ſanctæ ſedis Romanæ pontifice poſtmodum confirmatus, reſpectu & amore Dei ſanctam eccleſiam liberam eſſe concedo, & debitam reverentiam illi confirmo.

II. Nihil me in eccleſia, vel in rebus eccleſiaſticis ſymoniace acturum, vel permiſſurum eſſe promitto.

III. Eccleſiaſticarum perſonarum & omnium clericorum, & rerum eorum juſtitiam & poteſtatem & diſtributionem bonorum eccleſiaſticorum manu epiſcoporum eſſe, perhibeo & confirmo.

IV. Dignitates eccleſiarum, privilegiis earum confirmatas, & conſuetudines earum antiquo tenore habitas, inviolate manere concedo & ſtatuo.

V. Omnes eccleſiarum poſſeſſiones, & tenuras, quas die illa habuerant, qua Willielmus rex avus meus fuit vivus & mortuus, ſine omnium calumniantium reclamatione eis liberas & abſolutas eſſe concedo.

VI. Si quid vero de habitis aut poſſeſſis ante mortem regis, quibus modo careat eccleſia, deinceps repetierit, indulgentiæ & diſpenſationi meæ vel diſcutiendum, vel reſtituendum reſervo.

VII. Quæcunque vero poſt mortem regis liberalitate regum, largitione principum, oblatione, vel comparatione, vel qualibet tranſmutatione fidelium collata ſunt confirmo.

VIII. Pacem meam & juſtitiam in omnibus facturum & pro poſſe meo conſervaturum promitto.

IX. Foreſtas quas Willielmus rex avus meus, & Willielmus avunculus meus inſtituerunt & tenuerunt, mihi reſervo. Cæteras omnes, quas Henricus rex ſuperaddidit, eccleſiis & regno quietas reddo & concedo.

X. Si quis autem epiſcopus vel abbas, vel alia eccleſiaſtica perſona ante mortem ſuam rationabiliter ſua diſtribuerit, vel diſtribuenda ſtatuerit, firmum manere concedo.

XI. Si vero morte præoccupatus fuerit, pro ſalute animæ ejus, eccleſiæ conſilio eadem fiat diſtributio.

XII. Dum vero ſedes propriis fuerint paſtoribus vacuæ, & ipſæ, & omnes earum poſſeſſiones, in manu & cuſtodia clericorum vel proborum hominum, ejuſdem eccleſiæ committantur, donec paſtor canonice ſubſtituatur.

XIII. Omnes exactiones & Meſcheningas, & injuſtitias, ſive per vicecomites, vel per alios quoſlibet male inductas, funditus extirpo. Bonas leges & antiquas & juſtas conſuetudines in murdris, & placitis & aliis cauſis obſervabo, & obſervari præcipio, & conſtituo: apud Oxeneford anno incarnationis Domini 1136. regni mei primo.

'The CHARTER of Liberties, or the GREAT CHARTER granted by king JOHN to his ſubjects in 1215.

The Great Charter.

'JOHN by the grace God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitain, and earl of Anjou; to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſticiaries of the foreſts, ſheriffs, governors, officers, and to all bailiffs and others his faithful ſubjects, greeting. Know ye, that we † in the ſight of God, and for the health of our ſoul and thoſe of our anceſtors and heirs, and to the honour of God, the exaltation of his holy church, and the reformation of our kingdom, by the advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church; Henry archbiſhop of Dublin, William biſhop of London, Peter of Wincheſter, Jocelin of Bath and Glaſtonbury, Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worceſter, William of Coventry, Benedict of Rocheſter, biſhops; and maſter Pandulph, the pope's ſubdeacon and antient ſervant, brother Aymerick maſter of the Temple in England, and the noblemen William Mareſcall earl of Pembroke, William earl of Salisbury, William earl of Warren, William earl of Arundel, Alan de Galoway, conſtable of Scotland, Warin Fitz-Gerald, Peter Fitz-Herebert, and Hubert de Burgh, ſeneſchal of Poictou, Hugo de Neville, Matthew Fitz-Herebert, Thomas Baſſet, Alan Baſſet, Philip de Albiney, Robert de Ropele, John Mareſcall, John Fitz-Hugh, and others our liegemen; have, firſt of all, granted to God, and, by this our preſent charter, confirmed, for us and our heirs for ever,

* There was not a duke, marqueſs, or viſcount then in England; for Edward the Black Prince was the firſt duke, being created duke of Cornwall, in 2 Edw. III. and Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, was created marqueſs of Dublin, in 8 Rich. II. The firſt viſcount on record, and that ſate in parliament, by that name, was John, viſcount of Beaumont, created 18 Henry VI. Coke, p. 5. and, as to the titles of earl and baron, Vid. Selden's Titles of Honour.

† When any of the king's tenants, in chief, died, the king, as the guardian of his heir, ſeized his lands, who kept them, till the heir was of age; but, upon his being 21 years old, the heir might ſue to have his eſtate, having done homage to the king, and paid a certain compoſition termed a relief, which, at firſt, was ſettled, in proportion to every man's degree, from an earl to a farmer; but, ſome time before king John's death, it appears, there was introduced a heavy incroachment of an uncertain relief, being entirely arbitrary, which, under a plauſible name, was called rationabile relevium, a reaſonable relief. The deſign of this clauſe, therefore, is to reſtore this affair to its antient ſtate. Vid. Coke's 2d Inſt. p. 7.

‡ Or rather 100 marks; for the antient relief of a barony was the fourth part of its yearly value, and the yearly value of a barony conſiſted of 13 knight's fees and a quarter, which, by a juſt computation, amounted to 400 marks.

 The heirs of the tenants in chief, during their minority, were ſaid to be in ward; but this wardſhip was aboliſhed by the ſtatute 12 Charl. II. c. 24.

†† Iſſues, i. e. the rents and profits of the lands or tenements of the ward; by cuſtoms are meant things due by cuſtom and preſcription, and appendant to the ſaid lands, viz. advowſons, commons, &c. alſo fines of tenants, by copy of court-roll; and ſervices are the drudgery and labour due from copy-holders to their lords. Coke, p. 12, 13.

*† Tho' the heir, upon his being made a knight, was out of ward, as to his body; yet his land remained in the cuſtody of the lord. Coke, p. 11.

'VIII. A widow, after the death of her 'husband, ſhall immediately, and without any 'difficulty, have her marriage † and her in-'heritance; nor ſhall ſhe give any thing for 'her dowry or her marriage, or her inheri-'tance, which her husband and ſhe held, at 'the day of his death; and ſhe may remain 'in the manſion-houſe of her husband, 40 days 'after his death; within which term her dow-'ry ſhall be aſſigned (b).

IX. Nulla vidua diſtringatur ad ſe maritandum, dum voluerit vivere ſine marito. Ita tamen quod ſecuritatem faciat quod ſe non maritabit ſine aſſenſu noſtro, ſi de nobis tenuerit, vel ſine aſſenſu domini ſui de quo tenuerit ſi de alio tenuerit.

'IX. No widow ſhall be diſtrained ‡ to 'marry herſelf, ſo long as ſhe is willing to live 'without a husband. But yet ſhe ſhall give 'ſecurity that ſhe will not marry without our 'conſent, if ſhe holds of us, or without the aſ-'ſent of the lord of whom ſhe holds, if ſhe 'holds of another.

X. Nec nos, nec ballivi noſtri ſeiſiemus terram aliquam nec redditum pro debito aliquo, quamdiu catalla debitoris ſufficiunt ad debitum reddendum: nec pleggii ipſius debitoris diſtringantur, quamdiu ipſe capitalis debitor ſufficit ad ſolutionem debiti.

'X. Neither we, nor our bailiffs , ſhall ſeize 'any land ††, or rent, for any debt, ſo long as 'the debtor's chattels are ſufficient to pay the 'debt (c); nor ſhall the ſureties of the debtor 'be diſtrained, ſo long as the principal debtor 'is ſufficient for the payment of the debt.

XI. Et ſi capitalis debitor defecerit in ſolutione debiti, non habens unde ſolvat, pleggii reſpondeant de debito; & ſi voluerint habeant terras & redditus debitoris, donec ſit eis ſatisfactum de debito quod ante pro eo ſolverint, niſi capitalis debitor monſtraverit ſe eſſe quietum inde verſus eoſdem pleggios.

'XI. And if the principal debtor fail in the 'payment of the debt, not being able to diſ-'charge it (d), then the ſureties ſhall anſwer the 'debt; and, if they will, they ſhall have the lands 'and rents of the debtor, until they ſhall be 'ſatisfied for the debt which they paid for 'him, unleſs the principal debtor can ſhew, 'that he is acquitted of it, againſt the ſaid 'ſureties.

XII. Si quis mutuo ceperit aliquid a Judeis plus vel minus, & moriatur antequam debitum illud ſolvatur, debitum non uſuret quamdiu heres fuerit infra etatem, de quocumque teneat; & ſi debitum illud inciderit in manus noſtras, nos non capiemus niſi catallum contentum in charta.

'XII. [If any one have borrowed any thing 'from the Jews, more or leſs, and dies before 'the debt be diſcharged, no intereſt ſhall be 'paid for that debt, ſo long as the heir is un-'der age, of whomſoever he may hold; and, 'if the debt falls into our hands, we will only 'take the chattel mentioned in the charter or 'inſtrument.]

And any man whatſoever in the 'realm may ſwear, that he will obey the orders 'of the 25 barons aforeſaid, in the execution 'of the premiſſes, and that he will diſtreſs us, 'jointly with them, to the utmoſt of his power; 'and we give publick and free liberty to any 'one that will thus ſwear, and never ſhall hin-'any perſon from taking the ſame oath.

'LXXII. As for all thoſe of our ſubjects, 'who will not, of their own accord, ſwear to 'join the 25 barons, in diſtreining and diſtreſ-'ſing us, we will, by our order, make them 'take the oath, as aforeſaid.

'LXXIII. And if any of the 25 barons 'dies, or goes out of the kingdom, or is hin-'dered any other way, from putting the things 'aforeſaid in execution, the reſt of the ſaid 25 'barons may chuſe another in his room, at their 'diſcretion, who ſhall be ſworn in like manner 'as the reſt.

'LXXIV. In all things that are committed 'to the charge of theſe 25 barons, if, when they 'are all aſſembled, they ſhall diſagree about 'any matter; or ſome of them, when ſummon-'ed, will not, or cannot come, whatſoever is 'agreed upon, or enjoined, by the major part 'of thoſe who are preſent, ſhall be reputed as 'firm and valid, as if all the 25 had given their 'conſent; and the foreſaid 25 ſhall ſwear, that 'all the premiſſes they ſhall faithfully obſerve, 'and with all their might cauſe to be ob-'ſerved.

'LXXV. And we will not by ourſelves, or 'others, procure any thing, by which any of 'theſe conceſſions and liberties may be revoked, 'or leſſened; and, if any ſuch thing be obtain-'ed, let it be null and void; nor ſhall we ever 'make uſe of it, either by ourſelves, or others.

LXXVI. Et

LXXVI. Et omnes malas voluntates, indignationes, & rancores ortos inter nos & homines noſtros, clericos & laicos, a tempore diſcordie, plene omnibus remiſimus, & condonavimus. Preterea, omnes tranſgreſſiones factas occaſione ejuſdem diſcordie, apaſcha anno regni noſtri ſextodecimo, uſque ad pacem reformatam, plene remiſimus omnibus clericis & laicis, & quantum ad nos pertinet plene condonavimus.

'LXXVI. And all the ill-will, anger, and 'malice ariſen between us and our ſubjects, of 'clergy and laity, from the firſt breaking out 'of the diſſenſion between us, we do fully remit 'and forgive. Moreover, all treſpaſſes occaſi-'oned by the ſaid diſſenſion, from Eaſter in the '16th year of our reign, till the reſtoration of 'peace, we hereby entirely remit to all, both 'clergy and laity, and, as far as in us lies, fully 'forgive.

LXXVII. Et inſuper, fecimus eis fieri litteras teſtimoniales patentes domini Stephani Cantuarienſis archiepiſcopi, domini Henrici Dublinienſis archiepiſcopi, & epiſcoporum predictorum, & magiſtri Pandulfi, ſuper ſecuritate iſta, & conceſſionibus prefatis.

'LXXVII. We have alſo granted them our 'letters patent teſtimonial of Stephen lord arch-'biſhop of Canterbury, Henry lord archbiſhop 'of Dublin, and the biſhops aforeſaid, and 'maſter Pandulph, for the ſecurity and conceſ-'ſions aforeſaid.

LXXVIII. Quare volumus & firmiter precipimus, quod Anglicana eccleſia libera ſit, & quod homines in regno noſtro habeant, & teneant, omnes prefatas libertates, jura, & conceſſiones, bene & in pace, libere & quiete, plene & integre, ſibi & heredibus ſuis, de nobis & heredibus noſtris in omnibus rebus & locis in perpetuum, ſicut predictum eſt.

'LXXVIII. Wherefore we will and firmly 'enjoin, that the church of England be free, 'and that all men in our realm have, and hold, 'all the foreſaid liberties, rights, and conceſ-'ſions, truly and peaceably, freely and quietly, 'fully and wholly, to themſelves and their 'heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and 'places for ever, as is aforeſaid.

LXXIX. Juratum eſt autem tam ex parte noſtra, quam ex parte baronum, quod hec omnia ſupradicta, bona fide, & ſine malo ingenio obſervabuntur.

'LXXIX. It is likewiſe ſworn, as well on 'our part, as on the part of the barons, that 'all the things aforeſaid ſhall faithfully and ſin-'cerely be obſerved.

Teſtibus ſupradictis, & multis aliis. Data permanum noſtram in prato quod vocatur Runingmede inter Windeleſor. & Stanes quinto decimo die Junii anno regni noſtri ſeptimo decimo.

Given under our hand in the preſence of the witneſſes aforeſaid, and many others, in the meadow called Runingmede, between Windſor and Stanes, the 15th day of June, in the 17th year of our reign.

Examined and compared with the original in the Cottonian library,
By David Caſsley, deputy-librarian.

There are two copies of this charter, in the Cottonian library, as antient as the time of king John; one of which has ſtill the broad ſeal, tho' part of it was melted by the flames, that, on October 23, 1731, conſumed part of the ſaid library, and alſo rendered a few letters of that charter not legible; but they were carefully ſupplied by the learned Mr. David Caſsley, & are diſtinguiſhed, above, in Italick letters. Both charters were evidently written by the ſame hand; and that, which is without a ſeal, has two ſlits at the bottom, from which, doubtleſs, hung two ſeals.—The few words, printed here at the end, are ſo placed in the original, and referred to by the ſame marks.

THE CHARTER of FORESTS*,

Granted by king JOHN to his ſubjects, in the year 1215 §.

JOHANNES Dei gratia, rex Angliæ, &c. Sciatis quod intuitu Dei & pro ſalute animæ noſtræ & animarum anteceſſorum & ſucceſſorum, ad exaltationem ſanctæ eccleſiæ, & emendationem regni noſtri; ſpontanea & bona voluntate noſtra dedimus, & conceſſimus pro nobis & hæredibus noſtris, has libertates ſubſcriptas, habendas & tenendas in regno noſtro Angliæ in perpetuum.

I. In primis omnes foreſtæ quas rex Henricus avus noſter afforeſtavit, videantur per probos & legales homines; & ſi boſcum aliquem alium quam ſuum dominicum, afforeſtaverit ad damnum illius cujus boſcus fuerit, ſtatim deafforeſtetur. Et ſi boſcum ſuum proprium afforeſtaverit, remaneat foreſta, ſalva communia de herbagio & rebus aliis in eadem foreſta, illis qui eam prius habere conſueverunt.

II. Homines qui manent extra foreſtam, non veniant de cætero coram juſticiariis noſtris de foreſta, per communes ſubmonitiones; niſi ſint in placito, vel plegii alicujus vel aliquorum qui attachiati ſunt propter foreſtam: omnes autem boſci qui fuerunt afforeſtati per regem Richardum fratrem noſtrum, ſtatim deafforeſtentur; niſi fuerint dominici boſci noſtri.

III. Archiepiſcopi, epiſcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, milites, & libere tenentes, qui boſcos habent in foreſta, habeant boſcos ſuos ficut eos habuerunt tempore primæ coronationis prædicti regis Henrici avi noſtri; ita quod quieti ſint in perpetuum de omnibus purpreſturis, vaſtis & aſſartis factis in illis boſcis poſt illud tempus, uſque ad principium ſecundi anni coronationis noſtræ. Et qui de cætero vaſtum, purpreſturam, vel aſſartum facient ſine licentia noſtra in illis boſcis, de vaſtis, purpreſturis, & aſſartis reſpondeant.

IV. Regardatores noſtri eant per foreſtas, ad faciendum regardum, ſicut fieri conſuevit tempore primæ coronationis prædicti regis Henrici avi noſtri, & non aliter.

V. Inquiſitio vel viſus de expeditatione canum exiſtentium in foreſta de cætero fiat, quando fieri debet regardum; ſcilicet de tertio anno in tertium annum; & tunc fiat per viſum

'JOHN, by the grace of God, king of 'England, &c. Know ye, that for the 'honour of God, and the health of 'our ſoul, and the ſouls of our anceſtors 'and ſucceſſors, and for the exaltation of the 'holy church, and for the reformation of our 'realm, we have, of our own free-will, given and 'granted, for us and our heirs, theſe liberties 'hereafter mentioned, to be had and obſerved 'in our kingdom of England for ever.

'I. Imprimis, All the foreſts, made by king 'Henry our grandfather, ſhall be viewed by 'honeſt and lawful men; and, if he turned 'any other than his own woods into foreſts, to 'the damage of him whoſe wood it was, it 'ſhall forthwith be diſforeſted. And if he 'turned his own woods into foreſts, they ſhall 'continue ſo, ſaving the common of paſture to 'ſuch as formerly uſed to have it.

'II. Is the LII. and LV. of the Great 'Charter put into one chapter.

'III. The archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, 'barons, knights, and free-tenants, who have 'their woods in any foreſts, ſhall have their 'woods as they had them, at the time of the 'firſt coronation of king Henry our grandfather; ſo as they ſhall be diſcharged for ever 'of all purpreſtures †, waſtes and aſſarts ‡, 'made in thoſe woods, after that time, to the 'beginning of the ſecond year of our coronation; and thoſe who, henceforward, ſhall 'make waſte, purpreſture or aſſart in thoſe 'woods, without our licenſe, ſhall anſwer for 'them **.

'IV. Our inſpectors ſhall go through the fo-'reſts to make a view, as it uſed to be, at the 'time of the firſt coronation of king Henry our 'grandfather, and not otherwiſe.

'V. The inquiſition, or view for lawing †† of 'dogs kept within the foreſt, hereafter, ſhall 'be when the view is made, i. e. every three 'years, and then ſhall be done by the view

* The foreſts, originally, belonged to the crown; but the kings had granted ſeveral parts and parcels to private men, who had grubbed them up and turned them into arable or paſture; tho' they ſtill were called foreſts. Theſe foreſts, being the kings own demeſnes, of which he was the ſovereign lord, continually occaſioned vexatious ſuits; not only againſt thoſe that held them of the king, but againſt the neighbouring freemen, under the pretence of the rights of the crown.

§ According to Matthew Paris. † That is, incroachments upon the king's lands.

 Every article of this charter evidently ſhews, how much the ſubject was oppreſſed, under the pretence of preſerving the royal foreſts. †† Cutting off their claws, &c.

& teſtimonium legalium hominum, & non aliter. Et ille cujus canis inventus fuerit tunc non expeditatus, pro miſericordia det tres ſolidos; & de cætero nullus bos capiatur pro expeditatione. Talis autem expeditatio ſit per aſſiſam communiter, quod tres ortelli aſcindantur de pede anteriori ſine poleta. Non expeditentur canes de cætero, niſi in locis ubi expeditari ſolent tempore primæ coronationis prædicti Henrici regis avi noſtri.

'and teſtimony of lawful men, and not otherwiſe; and he, whoſe dogs ſhall then be found 'unlawed, ſhall pay three ſhillings; and, for 'the future, no one ſhall be taken for lawing, 'and ſuch lawing ſhall be according to the 'common aſſize; viz. the three claws of the 'dog's forefoot ſhall be cut off, or the ball of 'the foot taken out; and, for the time to 'come, dogs ſhall not be lawed, unleſs in 'places where they uſed to be lawed, in the 'time of king Henry our grandfather.

VI. Nullus foreſtarius, vel bedellus, faciat de cætero ſcotallum, vel colligat garbas, vel avenam, vel bladum aliud, vel agnos, vel porcellos, nec aliquam collectam faciat; & per viſum & ſacramentum duodecim regardatorum, quando facient regardum, tot foreſtarii ponantur ad foreſtas cuſtodiendas, quot ad illas cuſtodiendas rationabiliter viderint ſufficere.

'VI. No foreſter, or bedel *, henceforward, 'ſhall make any ale-ſhots †, or collect ſheaves 'of corn, or oats, or other grain, or lambs, or 'pigs; nor ſhall make any gathering whatſo'ever, but by the view and oath of 12 inſpec'tors; and, when they make their view, ſo 'many foreſters ſhall be appointed to keep the 'foreſt as they ſhall reaſonably think ſufficient.

VII. Nullum ſuanimotum de cætero teneatur in regno noſtro, niſi ter in anno; videlicet in principio quindecim dierum ante feſtum ſancti Michaelis, quando agiſtatores veniunt ad agiſtandum dominicos boſcos, & circa feſtum ſancti Martini quando agiſtatores noſtri debent accipere panagium ſuum. Et ad iſta duo ſuanimota, convenient foreſtarii, viridarii, & agiſtatores; & nullus alius per diſtrictionem. Et tertium ſuanimotum teneatur in initio XV dierum ante feſtum ſancti Johannis Baptiſtæ pro fœnatione beſtiarum noſtrarum; & ad iſtum ſuanimotum convenient foreſtarii, viridarii, & non alii per diſtrictionem.

'VII. No ſwainmote, hereafter, ſhall be 'holden in our kingdom oftener than thrice a 'year; i. e. in the beginning of 15 days be'fore Michaelmas, when the agiſters come to 'agiſt the demeſne woods; and about the feaſt 'of St. Martin, when our agiſters are to receive 'their pannage ‡; and in thoſe two ſwain'motes, the foreſters, verderers, and agiſters 'ſhall meet, and no other by diſtreſs; and the 'third ſwainmote ſhall be held in the beginning 'of the 15 days before the feaſt of St. John the 'Baptiſt, about the fawning of our does; and 'at this ſwainmote ſhall meet the foreſters 'and verderers, and no others by compulſion.

VIII. Et præterea ſingulis quadraginta diebus, per totum annum convenient viridarii & foreſtarii ad videndum attachiamenta de foreſta tam de viridi quam de venatione, per præſentationem ipſorum foreſtariorum, & coram ipſis attachientur: prædicta autem ſuanimota non teneantur, niſi in comitatibus in quibus teneri conſueverunt.

'VIII. And moreover, every 40 days through 'the whole year, the verderers and foreſters 'ſhall meet to view the attachments of the fo'reſt, as well of vert , as veniſon, by pre'ſentment of the foreſters themſelves; and the 'offenders ſhall be forced to appear before 'them: but the aforeſaid ſwainmotes ſhall only 'be held in the counties, where they uſed to 'be held.

IX. Unuſquiſque liber homo agiſtet boſcum ſuum in foreſta pro voluntate ſua, & habeat panagium ſuum.

'IX. Every freeman ſhall agiſt †† his wood 'in the foreſt at his pleaſure, and ſhall receive 'his pannage.

X. Concedimus etiam quod unuſquiſque liber homo poſſit ducere porcos ſuos per dominicum boſcum noſtrum, libere & ſine impedimento; & ad agiſtandum eos in boſcis ſuis propriis, vel alibi ubi voluerit. Et ſi porci alicujus liberi hominis una nocte pernoctaverint in foreſta noſtra, non inde occaſionetur, ita quod aliquid de ſuo perdat.

'X. We grant alſo, that every freeman may 'drive his hogs through our demeſne woods, 'freely and without impediment, and may a'giſt them in his own woods, or elſewhere as 'he will; and if the hogs of any freeman ſhall 'remain one night in our foreſts, he ſhall not 'be troubled, ſo as to loſe any thing for it.

XI. Nullus de cætero amittat vitam vel membra pro venatione noſtra; ſed ſi aliquis captus fuerit & convictus de captione venationis, graviter redimatur, ſi habeat unde redimi poſſit, & ſi non unde redimi poſſit, jaceat in priſona noſtra per annum unum & unum diem. Et ſi poſt annum unum & unum diem plegios invenire poſſit, exeat a priſona; ſin autem, abjuret regnum noſtrum Angliæ.

'XI. No man, henceforward, ſhall loſe life 'or limb for taking our veniſon; but if any 'one be ſeized and convicted of taking veniſon, 'he ſhall be grievouſly fined, if he hath where'withal to pay; and if he hath not, he ſhall 'lie in our priſon a year and a day. And if, 'after that term, he can find ſureties, he ſhall 'be releaſed; if not, he ſhall abjure our realm 'of England.

XII. Quicunque archiepiſcopus, epiſcopus, comes vel baro veniens ad nos per mandatum

'XII. Every archbiſhop, biſhop, earl, or 'or baron, coming to us by our command, and

* Bailiff of the foreſt. † i. e. take ale, to excuſe the offender.
‡ Money for the feeding of hogs with maſte in the king's foreſts:
 i. e. the offences committed, in cutting wood, or killing deer. †† i. e. take in his neighbour's cattle to feed.

noſtrum, tranſierit per foreſtam noſtram, licet ille capere unam vel duas beſtias per viſum foreſtarii ſi præſens fuerit; ſin autem, faciat cornari, ne videatur hoc furtive facere: item licet in redeundo idem eis facere, ſicut prædictum eſt.

'paſſing through our foreſt, may take one or 'two deer by view of the foreſter, if preſent; 'if not, he ſhall cauſe a horn to be ſounded, 'leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſteal them: alſo in their 'return, it ſhall be lawful for them to do the 'ſame thing.

XIII. Unuſquiſque liber homo de cætero ſine occaſione, faciat in boſco ſuo vel in terra ſua, quam habet in foreſta molendinum, vivarium, ſtagnum, marleram, foſſatum vel terram arabilem, extra co-opertum in terra arabili, ita quod non ſit ad nocumentum alicujus vicini.

'XIII. Every freeman, for the future, may 'erect a mill in his own wood, or on his own 'land, which he hath in the foreſt; or make a 'warren, pond, marle-pit, or ditch, or turn it 'into arable, without the covert in the arable 'land, ſo as it be not to the damage of his 'neigbour.

XIV. Unuſquiſque liber homo habeat in boſcis ſuis ærias accipitrum, ſpervariorum, falconum, aquilarum & heironum; & habeant ſimiliter mel quod inventum fuerit in boſcis ſuis.

'XIV. Every freeman may have in his 'woods the ayries of hawks, ſpar-hawks, fal-'cons, eagles, and herons; and they ſhall alſo 'have the honey which ſhall be found in their 'woods.

XV. Nullus foreſtarius de cetæro, qui non ſit foreſtarius de feudo, reddens firmam nobis pro balliva ſua, capiat cheminagium, ſcilicet pro careta per dimidium annum, duos denarios, & per alium dimidium duos denarios; & pro equo, qui portat ſummagium, per dimidium annum, unum obolum, & per alium dimidium annum, unum obolum; & non niſi de illis, qui extra ballivam ſuam tanquam mercatores veniunt, per licentiam ſuam in ballivam ſuam, ad buſcam, meiremium, corticem, vel carbonem emendum, & alias ducendum ad vendendum ubi voluerint. Et de nulla careta alia, vel ſummagio, aliquod cheminagium capiatur; non capiatur cheminagium, niſi in locis illis, ubi antiquitus capi ſolebat & debuit: illi autem qui portant ſuper dorſum ſuum, buſcam, corticem vel carbonem ad vendendum, quamvis inde vivant, nullum de cætero dent cheminagium de boſcis aliorum; nullum detur cheminagium foreſtariis noſtris præterquam de dominicis boſcis noſtris.

'XV. No foreſter, for the time to come, 'who is not a foreſter in fee, paying us rent 'for his office, ſhall take cheminage *, i. e. 'for every cart two-pence for half a year, and 'for the other half-year two-pence; and for 'a horſe that carries burthens, for half a year a 'half-penny, and for the other half-year a 'half-penny; and then only of thoſe, who 'come as buyers, out of their bailiwick, to buy 'underwood, timber, bark or charcoal, to car-'ry it to ſell in other places, where they will. 'And, for the future, there ſhall be no chemi-'nage taken for any other cart or carriage-'horſe, unleſs in the places where it antiently 'uſed and ought to be taken; but they who 'carry wood, bark, or coal upon their backs 'to ſell, tho' they get their livelihood by it, 'ſhall, henceforward, pay no cheminage; and, 'for paſſage through the woods of other men, 'no cheminage ſhall be given to our foreſters, 'except in our own woods.

XVI. Omnes utlagati pro foreſta a tempore regis Henrici avi noſtri, uſque ad primam coronationem noſtram, veniant ad pacem ſine impedimento, & ſalvos plegios inveniant quod de cætero non forisfacient nobis de foreſta noſtra.

'XVI. All perſons outlawed for offences 'committed in our foreſts, from the time of 'king Henry our grandfather, until our firſt 'coronation, may reverſe their outlawries 'without impediment, but ſhall find pledges, 'that, henceforward, they will not forfeit to 'us † in our foreſt.

XVII. Nullus caſtellanus vel alius teneat placitum de foreſta ſive de viridi ſive de venatione; ſed quilibet foreſtarius de feudo attachiet placita de foreſta, tam de viridi quam de venatione, & ea præſentet viridariis provinciarum; & cum rotulata fuerint, & ſub ſigillis viridariorum incluſa, præſententur capitali foreſtario cum in partes illas venerit ad tenendum placita foreſtæ, & coram eo terminentur.

'XVII. No caſtellan or other perſon ſhall 'hold pleas of the foreſt, whether concerning 'vert or veniſon, but every foreſter in fee ſhall 'attach pleas of the foreſt ‡, as well concerning 'vert as veniſon, and ſhall preſent them to the 'verderers of the ſeveral counties; and, when 'they ſhall be enrolled and ſealed under the 'ſeals of the verderers, they ſhall be preſented 'to the chief foreſter, when he ſhall come into 'thoſe parts, to hold pleas of the foreſt, and 'ſhall be determined before him.

XVIII. Omnes autem conſuetudines prædictas & libertates, quas nos conceſſimus in regno tenendas, quantum ad nos pertinet erga noſtros, omnes de regno noſtro, tam laici quam clerici obſervent, quantum ad ſe pertinet erga ſuos.

'XVIII. And all the cuſtoms and liberties 'aforeſaid, which we have granted to be held 'in our realm; as much as it belongs to us to-'wards our vaſſals, all of our kingdom, as well 'laity as clergy ſhall obſerve, as much as be-'longs to them towards their vaſſals **.

8. HENRY III. ſirnamed of Wincheſter.

1216. HENRY III.

THE long reign of Henry III. abounds with ſo many various events, that, for the moſt part, have little or no connexion together, that, by a particular account of all the remarkable occurrences, during this period, I ſhould be apt rather to fatigue the reader, than conveigh to him any diſtinct ideas of the affairs of thoſe days; and I ſhall, therefore, confine myſelf to ſome principal heads, which contain the ſubſtance of what was tranſacted, in this reign. Firſt, I ſhall attempt to deſcribe the ſtate of the kingdom, the genius of the king, and the character and pernicious deſigns of his miniſters; ſecondly, I will ſhew the inſatiable avarice and tyranny of the court of Rome; thirdly, the barons league, to oppoſe the arbitrary and tyrannical power intended to be introduced into the kingdom; and, laſtly, the barons abuſe of the authority they uſurped, under that pretence, and how all their proceedings were rendered ineffectual. I ſhall run over theſe general heads, with all the brevity the nature of the ſubject will allow; and to theſe almoſt every thing, that ſhall afterwards be ſaid, will have ſome reference.

The ſtate of England.

John left his crown to his eldeſt ſon; but the young prince, being then only in the tenth year of his age, was very incapable of curing the diſorders of ſuch a diſtemper'd ſtate; and the few lords, who inviolably adhered to the late king, with an army of foreigners, in whom John himſelf never durſt place any confidence, were very unlikely inſtruments to promote the reſtoration of the royal family. There was the leſs proſpect of ſuch a favourable revolution, as almoſt all the peers of the realm, ſupported by the French forces, ſeemed to be firmly united againſt it; and, beſides, Lewis's great progreſs, in ſome meaſure, promiſed him the reduction of the whole kingdom. However, in ſpite of theſe, in all appearance, inſuperable difficulties, young Henry was enabled to maintain his title to the crown, by the means of the wiſe and valiant earl of Pembroke, a loyal ſubject, who was equally qualified to project and execute the greateſt deſigns; for this generous lord, far from being diſpirited at this critical extremity, undertook to raiſe the hopes of the honeſt Engliſh, and expel the foreigners out of the kingdom.

The earl of Pembroke's ſpeech.

Immediately upon John's deceaſe, the earl of Pembroke aſſembled that prince's adherents; and, preſenting young Henry to their view, he made a ſpeech, beginning with theſe words: "Behold our king." Then, after a ſhort pauſe, he told them, "That, tho' the late "king's conduct had furniſhed the confederate "barons with a plauſible pretence to complain, "it was unreaſonable to deprive a family of "the crown, that had enjoyed it ſo long, much "more to reſign it to a foreign prince; and "that, as John's faults were perſonal, it wuold "be unjuſt to puniſh his ſon, on that account, "whoſe tender age rendered him altogether "innocent. He farther added, that the re- "medy, uſed by the confederate barons, was "worſe than the diſeaſe, ſince it tended to re- "duce the nation to an ignominious ſervitude; "and that, therefore, in the preſent poſture "of affairs, nothing could deliver them from "the impending yoke, but their ſtrict union "under a prince, who was undeniably the "lawful heir to the crown." Upon this ſpeech, the whole aſſembly cried out, with one voice, "We will have Henry for our king *;" and tho' the earl of Cheſter made ſome oppoſition, at firſt, he afterwards deſiſted, and a day was prefixed for the coronation. The ceremony was performed, with little pomp, by the biſhops of Bath and Wincheſter, in the preſence of a few lords and Gallo, the legate, who eſpouſed young Henry's cauſe, to the utmoſt of his power; and, John's crown being lately loſt in the Well-ſtream, as I have already related, they were obliged to make uſe of a plain circle or chaplet of gold, becauſe they had neither time nor means to provide one that was better; but, before the crown was ſet on his head, the cuſtomary oath was adminiſter'd to him, and the legate, who was ever intent upon his maſter's intereſt, cauſed the young prince to do homage to the holy ſee. This was no proper juncture to diſpute that homage, leſt it ſhould occaſion the loſs of the pope's aſſiſtance, and increaſe the difficulties, that Henry was, in all likelihood, to encounter, in the beginning of his reign.

The earl of Pembroke is made regent. M. Paris.

Theſe ceremonies being over, the aſſembly of the lords, as the repreſentatives of the whole nation, elected William Marſhall, earl of Pembroke, to be the king's guardian, and declared him protector, i. e. regent of the kingdom; and they could not have choſen to that high office a perſon of more extenſive abilities, a greater patriot, or a more truſty friend to the royal family. From the late king's acceſſion to the throne, for whom he, in a great meaſure, procured the crown, by his addreſs and activity, he, to the laſt, was inſeparably attached to the ſervice of that prince, and never deſerted him, even in his moſt preſſing extremities; and, as his invariable loyalty had gained him his maſter's favour and confidence, he was always truſted with his ſecrets, and conſequently more qualified, than any other, to be at the helm of affairs, in ſo tempeſtuous a ſeaſon. He perfectly underſtood the cauſe of the troubles, as well as the intereſts and intrigues of thoſe that excited them; and he likewiſe knew, that moſt of the barons were extremely diſſatisfied with Lewis, whom they invited over, on which foundation he principally built his expectations. The private ſubmiſſions of 40 of them to the king led him to hope, that the reſt would

1216. quickly follow their example; and, indeed, nothing, except the deſpair of pardon, reſtrained the majority from abandoning prince Lewis; and, therefore, the regent was apprehenſive, that a declaration of the new king's readineſs to forgive would, in a little time, entirely diſſolve the confederacy. Moreover, it was not, in the leaſt, probable, that, after John's death, ſo many lords could reſolve to remain in ſubjection to a foreign prince, who daily gave them freſh occaſions to complain; and, in this belief, the earl of Pembroke ſent letters to all the barons and corporations in the kingdom *, to inform them of Henry's acceſſion to the crown, promiſing great rewards to ſuch, as would return to their allegiance. Theſe aſſurances and the regent's known probity induced ſeveral of the confederate barons, to entertain thoughts of making their peace with their lawful ſovereign; and prince Lewis's excommunication, which was publiſhed, every Sunday, was a farther and no leſs powerful motive to this purpoſe. It is not to be ſuppoſed, but that, among all theſe lords, there were ſome whoſe conſciences were ſo tender, as to give them ſome uneaſineſs about following the banners of an excommunicated prince; much leſs, could they ſuffer themſelves to be involved in the ſame ſentence; ſo that Lewis's affairs, on a ſudden, began to decline, at the very time, when they ſeemed to be the moſt flouriſhing. The raiſing the ſiege of Dover alſo contributed very much to diſconcert that prince's meaſures; for, tho' he often endeavoured to corrupt the loyalty of Hubert de Burgh, governor of that place, it was proof againſt all temptations; and the force he made uſe of was ſtill more ineffectual, being repulſed, with loſs, in all his aſſaults. King John's death happening, during the ſiege, Lewis imagined, that Hubert would become more tractable; and, therefore, he ordered him to be ſummoned afreſh to ſurrender; repreſenting to him, at the ſame time, that, as John's deceaſe releaſed him from his oath, he might, without any ſcruple, ſwear fealty to a prince, whom his countrymen acknowledged for their ſovereign, and who would rejoice to ſhew him marks of his eſteem. The brave governor replied, that, the late king having left a ſucceſſor, who had a juſt title to his allegiance, he would maintain his cauſe, to the laſt drop of his blood; adding, that he could never believe, the eſteem of any valiant prince could be gained by a notorious baſeneſs. Lewis's promiſes proving unavailable, he threatened Hubert, that he would put his brother, who was in his power, to death; but this menace made no impreſſion on the faithful governor, who continued to defend the place, committed to his truſt, with the ſame invincible reſolution. Lewis, at length, raiſed the ſiege, and inveſted the caſtle of Hertford, which made but a feint reſiſtance; and the taking of it gave the Engliſh lords freſh cauſe of complaint; for Robert Fitz-Walter, claiming the cuſtody of the caſtle, as belonging to him, by antient right, had the mortification to ſee a French governor placed there, with a garriſon of the ſame nation. The Engliſh barons were extremely diſguſted, to find their own inheritances given to foreigners, without the leaſt regard to their complaints; and their vexation was farther inflamed, by the indiſcretion of ſome Frenchmen, who upbraided them, as traytors, declaring that it was of dangerous conſequence to truſt them with the cuſtody of caſtles. Theſe expreſſions, together with what the viſcount of Melun is reported to have ſaid, cauſed among the Engliſh, and eſpecially among the nobility, an univerſal diſcontent, which Lewis did not, as yet, apprehend, tho' he, ſoon after, felt the effects of it; and, in the interim, he ſubdued ſome other places, before he returned to London, where he did not arrive, till towards the latter end of the year. 1216.

Lewis attempts to bribe the governor of Dover. M. Paris.

Whilſt Lewis was employed, in improving his advantages, the regent did all that was poſſible to ſupport young Henry's juſt rights; and the firſt and moſt neceſſary precaution, at this juncture, was to ſend the pope early intelligence of John's death and his ſon's coronation, and to intreat him to take the new king under his protection. Innocent very readily interpoſed, in an affair that ſo nearly concerned him, ſince England, which he conſider'd as St. Peter's patrimony, was in danger; and, accordingly, he diſpatched freſh powers to his legate, to renew the excommunication of Lewis and the confederate barons; but the prince of France proteſted againſt all that ſhould be done to his prejudice; tho', to prevent the new cenſure from having any influence over the Engliſh barons, he required all of them to renew their homage to him, on a day appointed. His proteſtation, however, did not hinder the legate from putting the pope's orders in execution; for he held a ſynod at Briſtol, where he excommunicated Lewis, with the uſual formalities; which furniſhed ſome of the lords with a pretence to refuſe the homage that Lewis demanded. The pope declares for Henry. M. Paris.

Chriſtmas approaching, both parties agreed upon a truce, during the holidays; and, in the mean time, Lewis convened a general aſſembly at Oxford; as did the regent another, tho' not ſo numerous, at Cambridge. The king's party propoſing to have the truce prolonged, Lewis, at firſt, refuſed to conſent to it; but, being informed, ſoon after, that the pope deſigned to ratify, in a full conſiſtory, the excommunication denounced by his legate, he agreed to prolong A truce between both parties.

1216. the truce, till a month after Eaſter, intending to go to Paris, in order to conſult the king, his father.

1217. The truce is improved to Henry's advantage.

The earl of Pembroke wiſely made the beſt uſe of this truce, to reinforce his army with new levies, and to bring over, by ſecret practices, ſome of the confederate barons; whilſt Lewis's abſence gave the barons an opportunity of concerting meaſures, to free themſelves from his yoke, by returning to the obedience of their lawful ſovereign. Several, in that interval, treated with the king; and, among the reſt, William Marſhall, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Pembroke, who, till then, had been one of the moſt zealous partiſans of France. The Cinque-ports alſo declared for Henry, and ſent out a fleet, to oppoſe Lewis's return; yet, though their fleet, engaging with the French, deſtroyed ſeveral of their ſhips, they could not prevent the prince's landing at Sandwich; but he was ſo highly incenſed at this furious attack, that he ſet on fire the town, where he landed, becauſe it was one of the Cinque-ports.

The truce being expired, the regent diſpatched the earl of Cheſter, to beſiege Mont-Sorel in Leiceſterſhire, where there was a French garriſon; and the loſs of this place, tho', in itſelf, of no great importance, might, at the preſent juncture, be extremely prejudicial to Lewis, as it was evidently his intereſt to hinder the king's party from appearing to be in a condition to recover any of his conqueſts. For this reaſon, the prince judged it to be expedient, at any rate, to raiſe the ſiege; and, with this view, he put the earl of Perche, at the head of 20,000 men, giving him orders to march to the enemy. The earl of Cheſter, upon the approach of this numerous army, raiſed the ſiege, and returned to the regent; but the French general being apprehenſive, that the earl of Pembroke was unable to withſtand ſo great forces, reſolved to lay ſiege to Lincoln-caſtle, which held out for the king, tho' the city had declared for the barons; and, in this march, the French troops made ſuch terrible devaſtations, that the hiſtorians repreſent them, as an army of devils rather than men; yet, perhaps, things are painted in a worſe light than they really were.

The regent marches to the relief of Lincoln-caſtle.

Such was the importance of the caſtle of Lincoln, that the regent reſolutely determined to uſe his utmoſt efforts, in order to relieve it; and, with this view, he aſſembled all his forces, and with ſo much expedition, that he advanced, as far as Newark, within 12 miles of Lincoln, before the beſiegers came to a reſolution, whether they ſhould expect him, or march out and give him battle. They had, all along, entertained hopes of taking the caſtle, before he could muſter his army together; but the French general, being ſurprized at the ſudden approach of the enemy, called a council of war, on that occaſion. Some gave it, as their opinion, that it was moſt adviſable to meet the enemy, becauſe, if a victory enſued, the caſtle would, at once, ſurrender; and, beſides, by going out of the city, they might have the benefit of their cavalry, in which their ſtrength chiefly conſiſted; whereas they would be entirely uſeleſs, within the walls. Others, on the contrary, affirmed, that, as the caſtle was reduced to extremities, it was more expedient to remain, within the city, and carry on the ſiege; that it was not difficult to defend the walls, till the city ſurrendered; after which, the earl of Pembroke would, of courſe, retreat, or, if not, might always be fought. This propoſal prevailing, all neceſſary preparations were made, for the defence of the city; whilſt the ſiege of the caſtle was continued. In the interim, the Engliſh army approaching, without any reſiſtance, the regent cauſed a body of choſen troops, commanded by Faulk de Brent, to enter the caſtle at a poſtern-gate, which opened into the fields; tho' it is ſtrange, that the beſiegers did not guard againſt this inconvenience; yet Faulk had no ſooner enter'd, than, purſuant to the regent's directions, he ſallied out upon the beſiegers, whilſt the king's army ſtormed one of the gates of the city. 1217.

The defeat of the French army at Lincoln.

The earl of Perche, finding that he was, thus, attacked from two different quarters, exerted himſelf, in a vigorous defence; but his troops not having room to fight, and being likewiſe deprived of the aſſiſtance of the horſe, were ſoon put in confuſion; and the royal army, animated by the preſence of the regent, and the indulgences, which the legate liberally beſtowed upon all that ſhould be ſlain in battle, continued to ſtorm the gate, in ſo furious a manner, that, in ſpite of the obſtinate reſiſtance of the French, they, at laſt, entered the city, whilſt Faulk de Brent preſs'd the enemy, on the other ſide. The earl of Perche, perceiving that his affairs were in a deſperate ſituation, reſolved not to ſurvive the ſhame of his defeat; and he was ſlain, reproaching the Engliſh of his party, for betraying him by their counſels. After the deceaſe of the general, a horrible ſlaughter was made of the French troops, who, almoſt to a man, periſhed, on this occaſion; and the city of Lincoln, which had, all along, eſpouſed the cauſe of the barons, was abandoned to a general plunder, where the ſoldiers found ſuch an ineſtimable booty, that they, therefore, ſtiled it Lincoln-fair *.

Lewis retires to London, and ſends to his father for ſuccours. M. Par.

In the mean time, prince Lewis, once more, attempted to take Dover-caſtle; but, meeting with no leſs oppoſition than before, he made no conſiderable progreſs in the ſiege; and, upon the news of the defeat at Lincoln, he retired to London, to take new meaſures. He no ſooner arrived at that city, than he ſent to the king, his father, for ſpeedy ſupplies, and proportionable to his exigences; or otherwiſe he aſſured him, he had not the leaſt proſpect of retrieving his affairs. Philip, to amuſe the pope, publickly ſent his ſon word, that he would not, any more, interpoſe in his concerns, and adviſed him to take care of himſelf; yet he ſecretly ſo contrived matters, that Blanche, his daughter-in-law, in her own name, quickly prepared a body of troops, with ſhips to tranſ-

Had these succours safely arrived, they might have repaired Lewis's loss at Lincoln; but he was no less unfortunate at sea than on land; for the commanders of the fleet of the Cinque-ports, being informed, that the French troops were to embarque at Calais, laid themselves in their way; and, giving them battle, the greatest part of the French fleet was either sunk or taken *.

He is blocked up in London.

Lewis had scarce received intelligence of the defeat of the succours he expected from France, before he perceived, that he was besieged, or, at least, closely blocked up, by the approach of the English army; and such a train of misfortunes, with the discontents of the English, which now manifestly appeared, and the papal thunders, that, in his present declining condition, began to inspire him with terror, convinced him, that it was high time to think of a retreat. He, therefore, determined to sue to the regent, for a peace; but, notwithstanding his unhappy circumstances, he represented to him, that he would consent to no terms, except such as were honourable, and would screen his English adherents from all prosecution. This prince's generous care of the English barons, by the way, is scarce reconcilable with the resolution, said to be imputed to him by the viscount of Melun; but, however that be, the earl of Pembroke immediately granted his demand. He considered, that the king of France was still in a condition to furnish his son with powerful supplies; and that, on the other hand, too great severity to the barons would involve the kingdom in fresh commotions. In a word, he foresaw, that the using his power, with moderation, would restore tranquillity to the nation, and put the young king in peaceable possession of the crown, which was the sole view of all his proceedings; and, therefore, he readily agreed to a treaty of peace, on the following conditions:

Articles of the peace. Act. Pub.

That all persons, who had espoused Lewis's cause, since the beginning of the war, should be restored to all the rights they were possess'd of, before the troubles.

That the city of London should enjoy her antient privileges.

That all the prisoners taken, since Lewis first arrived in England, should be released; but, as to those taken, on either side, before that time, commissioners should be appointed, to enquire, whether those of his party were engaged with him, when they were made prisoners.

That the ransoms, already paid, should not be returned, and those, now due, should be punctually paid; but that nothing should be demanded of the prisoners, whose ransoms were not settled.

1217. That all the English, of whatsoever rank or degree, whether prisoners or others, who took up arms against king John, should swear allegiance to king Henry.

That the hostages delivered to prince Lewis, for the payment of the ransoms, that were become due, should be directly released, upon the payment of the money.

That all the places, towns, and castles, in Lewis's possession, should be surrendered to the king.

That the king of Scotland should be included in the treaty, provided he restored all he had taken, during the war; and that the king of England should make him the like restitution.

The same thing was stipulated, in behalf of the prince of Wales.

That Lewis should cause all the islands to be restored, that were taken, in his name.

That he should renounce the homages received from the subjects of the king of England.

That whatsoever was due to him, and of which the time of payment was expired, should be punctually paid.

That in the first article, where mention is made of Lewis's adherents, ecclesiasticks are excluded, except with respect to the lay-fees they held, before the war.

M. Paris. A certain author adds two other conditions, that are not to be found in the treaty: First, that Lewis should endeavour, to the utmost of his power, to oblige his father to restore all the foreign dominions, that were taken from John; and, secondly, that, if he could not prevail, he should himself make restitution, upon his accession to the throne. Tho' these two particulars are not inserted in the treaty itself, in all probability, they were stipulated in the secret articles, since they are owned, even by the French historians; and, besides, it is certain, that, when Lewis came to the crown, the court of England demanded the performance of his promise, and St. Lewis, his son, entertained several scruples, on that very account, as the sequel will inform us. Mezerai.

Lewis returns to France.

The treaty being signed, and confirmed by the legate's authority, the king and prince Lewis swore to observe it, with the customary formalities; after which, Lewis was absolved by the legate *, and then the prince embarqued for France, having first borrowed 5000 l. of the city of London, for the payment of his debts.

Henry makes his entry into London.

Immediately after the prince's departure, Henry made his entry into London, where he was received, in a pompous manner, and with demonstrations of an universal satisfaction; and, indeed, the people had reason for this extraordinary joy, as the young king, notwith-

* This naval engagement happened, about the 24th of August; and, as the English had only 40 and the French 80 large ships, the king's fleet, not daring to attack them, in the front, tacked about, and, getting to the windward, they bore down upon them, making a great slaughter of them, with their archers; but what, most of all, contributed to their victory was their having great quantities of quick-lime in powder, which, being cast into the air, was blown by the wind into the eyes of the French and blinded them; whose admiral was one Eustace, who from a monk turned pirate, and at last was advanced to this high office over the French fleet; tho', according to M. Paris, he was afterwards beheaded by Richard, one of the natural sons of king John.

1217. ſtanding his late ſucceſſes, took a ſolemn oath to preſerve their privileges. Thus, by means of the regent's prudent conduct, the vanquiſhed barons obtained more ſubſtantial advantages, than they could have expected from a victory; which would have ſubjected them, and, perhaps, beyond a poſſibility of any redreſs, to a foreign yoke.

The legate proſecutes the eccleſiaſticks of Lewis's party.

The eccleſiaſticks alone, of all Lewis's adherents, were ſufferers by the treaty; for they were left to the pope's mercy, whom they had, to the laſt degree, offended. He was greatly diſpleaſed with the contempt of his cenſures, by Lewis and the barons; but he was ſtill more incenſed at the diſobedience of the clergy. No ſooner was the legate at liberty to proceed againſt them, than he ordered a ſtrict enquiry to be made, in all parts of the kingdom, after thoſe who deſpiſed the interdict; and all, that were found guilty, were either ſuſpended, deprived of their benefices, or obliged to repair their fault, by large ſums of money *; which is a remarkable inſtance of the wide difference between the eccleſiaſtical and the civil power.

The king of Scotland, who was excommunicated, for doing homage to a foreign prince, accepted the offer of being included in the treaty; and, coming to Northampton, he was abſolved by the legate, after he had done homage to Henry, for the fees he held in England; upon which, he ſurrender'd Carliſle, that he had taken, during the war.

Pope Innocent III. dying, this year, Honorious III. ſucceeded to the papal chair.

1218. New troubles in England. M. Paris.

It was not unlikely, that England would enjoy ſome quiet, to which ſhe had been ſo long a ſtranger; but it was impoſſible that a perfect calm ſhould immediately ſucceed ſuch a violent ſtorm. The treaty with Lewis occaſioned new troubles, which involved the regent in great perplexities; for the barons, that had inviolably adhered to king John, and upon whom were beſtowed the confiſcated eſtates of the rebels, could not think of reſtoring them to the former proprietors, purſuant to the tenor of the treaty; and, on the other hand, the eccleſiaſticks alſo loudly complained, becauſe they were entirely abandoned to the legate's perſecutions. However, the regent, reſolving, at all adventures, to put the treaty in execution, marched with a conſiderable body of troops, to bring to reaſon thoſe that forcibly with-held ſeveral caſtles and lands, from the old owners; and Robert de Gaugy was the only one, that withſtood a ſiege of eight days, in the caſtle of Newark, belonging to the biſhop of Lincoln; but, at length, deſpairing of any aſſiſtance, he reſigned the caſtle to the biſhop, upon the payment of 100 l. ſterling; and the reſt, diſcouraged by this example, made the like compoſitions. It was ſo neceſſary to execute the treaty, in order to reſtore tranquillity to the kingdom, that the regent thought the intereſts of 1218. a few private perſons, how loyal ſoever they had been to the late king, ought not to be preferred to the good of the whole nation; which would reſult from the punctual performance of his engagements. In the mean while, to eſtabliſh the young king on the throne, it was farther requiſite to give ſome ſatisfaction to the pope, who was not, in the leaſt, inclined to pardon the eccleſiaſticks, that deſpiſed his authority; for, in the beginning of a reign, when the fidelity of the ſubjects was, as yet, uncertain, and the king a minor, it would have been extremely imprudent, in the earl, to exaſperate the court of Rome, by eſpouſing the intereſts of the clergy. On the contrary, it was highly probable, that young Henry would ſtand in need of the pope's protection; and, therefore, he readily publiſhed, at the inſtance of the legate, a proclamation, commanding all the excommunicated eccleſiaſticks, that were not abſolved, to depart the kingdom, on pain of impriſonment; upon which, they were very expeditious, in ſatisfying the legate, who only wanted their money.

The regent orders the charters to be obſerved. An. Wav.

All the troubles being happily appeaſed, the Engliſh impatiently expected the performance of the king's promiſes, with reſpect to their liberties; and, accordingly, the regent, that Henry might make good his ſolemn engagements, ſent expreſs orders † to all the ſheriffs of the kingdom, to take due care, that the two charters of king John ſhould be punctually obſerved, and to puniſh, without mercy, all that ſhould preſume to violate the ſame. How happy would it have been for the Engliſh nation, if the ſucceſſors of this great man, in his high poſt and credit with the king, had followed the ſame maxims, and inſtilled them, early, into the mind of this young monarch! but, by taking contrary meaſures, they were the cauſe of all the ſucceeding troubles of the preſent reign.

The prince of Wales enters into a treaty with the king.

Whilſt the French continued in England, Lewellyn, prince of Wales, who was in alliance with them, had taken ſeveral places, of which it would not have been eaſy to diſpoſſeſs him, without re-aſſembling the diſbanded troops; but the regent was unwilling to diſoblige the ſubjects, by levies of men and money, at a juncture, when it was ſo neceſſary to gain their affection, by allowing them to enjoy the fruits of tranquillity; and, therefore, he granted the prince of Wales an honourable and advantageous peace, procuring him alſo the legate's abſolution, in order to induce that turbulent prince to remain quiet ‡.

This affair being over, Gallo the legate, who was recalled, ſet out for Rome; and Pandulph, whoſe name I have ſo often mentioned, in king John's reign, was his ſucceſſor, in that office **.

1219. dispatched itinerant justices into all the counties, to cause them to be more strictly observed; and, had his life been prolonged, he would infallibly have so firmly settled this affair, as that it should not easily have admitted of any alteration; but this truly great man, equally qualified for war and peace, died soon after, lamented by the whole kingdom, which he had, by his prudence and valour, delivered from slavery *. Peter des Roches, bishop of Winchester, succeeded him, as regent; and Hubert de Burgh, who defended Dover, was made chief justiciary of England †.

1220. Henry's second coronation. The coronation of the king having been performed at Gloucester, with so little solemnity, it was thought convenient to renew the ceremony, in the usual place; and cardinal Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, who returned into England, after the troubles were appeased, set the crown on the king's head, having first administered to him the customary oath, on such occasions.

1221. The earl of Albemarle opposes the king. Upon this, Henry, attended by the new regent, made a progress into several counties, intending to remove some, to whom the late king had committed the custody of castles, being such as the new regent judged it improper for him to confide in; and he met with no resistance, except from William, earl of Albemarle, governor of Rockingham-castle, who pretending to be a petty sovereign, or rather a tyrant, took little or no notice of the orders sent from court. The garrison seemed to be resolved upon their own defence; but, when they perceived, that the whole country was in arms, to assist the king, and free themselves from this oppression, instead of being constrained to surrender, they chose to procure some little advantages, by a capitulation.

M. Paris. M. West. This year, the new building of the abbey-church of Westminster was begun; and the king himself laid the first stone.

William de Forz, earl of Albemarle, in revenge of the loss of his castle, which he considered, as an injury, fortified himself in his castle of Biham, in Lincolnshire, by means of which he kept all the adjacent country in subjection; and he even forced merchants and tradesmen to take passes from him, for leave to go through the neighbourhood. Complaints of these oppressive proceedings being made to the parliament, then assembled at Westminster, he was summoned to make his appearance before them; and he set out, as it was believed, with a view of repairing to London; whilst, in the interim, he took the road to Northamptonshire; and, surprizing the castle of Fotheringay, he placed in it an able garrison, and then returned to Biham. Upon this news, the parliament came to a resolution, that an army should be immediately raised, to besiege Biham; and that the earl should be punished, for his insolence, according to the utmost severity of the law. Earl William, receiving intelligence, that the king's army was on their march, retreated into the north, leaving in his castle a governor, who did not surrender, till after a long defence; and it was thought, that the rebel would be pursued, or, at least, obliged to abandon the kingdom; but he found means to be reconciled to the king, by the mediation of the archbishop of York; who representing that, in reason, this offence ought to be balanced with the signal services he had done the late king, prevailed on the regent to interpose, in his favour; but this was a fatal precedent, and encouraged other barons to commit the same fault, with hopes of impunity! 1221.

Johanna's marriage to the king of Scotland. The court having made a progress, last year, to York, a marriage was concluded on between the king of Scotland and the princess Johanna, Henry's sister; but, being in the hands of the earl of Marche, to whose eldest son she was contracted, it was not an easy matter to remove her thence. However, after some negotiations, she was sent back to the king, her brother; and her nuptials to the king of Scotland were celebrated, this year; and, soon after, Hubert de Burgh, chief justiciary, married that prince's eldest sister; an honour, which, as it gained him the alliance of two monarchs, might hereafter raise some of his posterity to the throne of Scotland.

Pandulph is made bishop of Norwich. The term of Pandulph's legateship being expired, he resigned his office, and resided at the see of Norwich, which the pope procured for him, in reward of his services.

A quarrel between the Londoners and men of Westminster. M. Paris. M. West. Whatsoever care was taken by the late earl of Pembroke, and the present ministry, to preserve the peace of the kingdom, some persons were extremely sollicitous to interrupt it; and they took the opportunity of a quarrel between the citizens of London and Westminster. A great wrestling-match being made between the Londoners and the country people, a vast number of Westminster-men came to the place appointed; and, desiring to dispute the prize, their neighbours obtained the victory over them. This honour, tho' very inconsiderable, in itself, excited the resentment of the Westminster-men, who were exposed to the insulting railleries of the conquerors; and the steward of the abbot of Westminster, preposterously supposing, that his master's and his own honour were concerned, in this affair, undertook to revenge his fellow-citizens on their neigbours. With this view, he appointed another match at Westminster; to which the citizens of London flocked, in great numbers; but, as they went unarmed, they were rudely attacked by the Westminster-men, who wounded several, and put the rest to flight. This treachery occasioned a terrible commotion in London; and the mob, assembling together, resolved to retaliate the outrageous treatment they received at Westminster, the authority of the mayor not being able to restrain them. One Constantine, a citizen of London and an incendiary, who had been a zealous partizan for the French, did all that was possible to inflame their rage; representing to them, that it was, in vain, to expect justice from magistrates, who had no regard to the

He no ſooner perceived, that his ſpeech met with applauſe, than he cried, with a loud voice, "Monjoye St. Den-"nis," the watchword of the French; and, marching towards Weſtminſter at the head of the mob, he cauſed the ſteward's houſe to be pulled down to the ground, and then returned in triumph to London. The tumult being appeaſed, Hubert, the chief juſticiary, coming to the tower, commanded ſeveral of the citizens to appear before him; and Conſtantine, being there among the reſt, boldly aſſerted, in the juſticiary's preſence, "That the citizens of Lon-"don had done nothing, contrary to the law, "and were, therefore, determined to defend "their conduct." Hubert, incenſed at his inſolence, tho' he diſmiſs'd all the reſt, detained Conſtantine, and ordered him to be hanged, the very next morning, notwithſtanding his offer of 1000 marks, for his life; and, a few days after, he gave orders, that the principal rioters ſhould be ſeized in their houſes, ſome of whom had their hands, and others their noſes and ears cut off, and were ſent, thus, maimed into the city. After this, he turned out all the magiſtrates of London, obliging 30 of the moſt conſiderable citizens to be ſureties for the good behaviour of the city, to which the communities agreed by a charter, ſealed with their common ſeal *. This ſeverity might have been juſtifiable, if Hubert had not acted, in an arbitrary manner, and in direct contradiction to the great charter, purſuant to which, in conformity to the antient cuſtom of the kingdom, every man ought to be tried by his peers; and, therefore, this illegal proceeding render'd him odious to the Engliſh nation, eſpecially, the Londoners, who did not fail to be revenged on him, as ſoon as they met with an opportunity.

1223. The parliament petitions the king. On the account of theſe unwarrantable ſteps of the juſticiary, the parliament aſſembled, ſome time after, at London, in order to petition the king, that he would cauſe the charter of liberties, which he had ſworn to confirm, to be obſerved in all parts of the kingdom; but, ſince the earl of Pembroke's death, the court, with the new miniſtry, had taken up new maxims; inſomuch that, when they preſented their petition, William Brewer, one of his counſellors, replied, "It was unreaſonable to deſire the "execution of a charter extorted by violence." This raſh anſwer highly offending the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he took the freedom to aſſure the counſellor, "That, if he had, in "reality, the king's intereſt ſo much at heart, "as he pretended, he would not ſtudy to in-"volve the kingdom again in troubles, from "which it was happily freed." Henry, then only 16 years of age, approved of the archbiſhop's diſcourſe, and declared, that it was his intention to cauſe the charters of the king, his father, to be punctually obſerved; and, ſome days after, he ſent his orders to all the ſheriffs to ſee them put in execution †. If he had always continued in this diſpoſition of mind, a world of perplexities and misfortunes might have been prevented, which afterwards befel him; but, in the interim, the parliament, ſatisfied with the king's proceedings, granted him an aid of three marks for every earl, one mark for every baron, a ſhilling for every knight, and one penny for every houſe in the kingdom ‡. 1223.

Lewis ſucceeding Philip, his father, refuſes to perform his oath. Philip Auguſtus, king of France, dying about this time, had, for his ſucceſſor, Lewis VIII, his ſon; and Henry's council judged it expedient to ſend ambaſſadors to the new king, to demand the performance of his promiſe, as to the dominions that king John was deprived of by Philip. Lewis replied, that he did not think himſelf obliged to perform a treaty, which the king of England had firſt violated, in exacting large ranſoms from the priſoners, and in not reſtoring the antient laws, according to agreement; that, for his part, he held Normandy and the other provinces taken from the Engliſh, by right of conqueſt, and as their ſovereign lord; and that, if his right was diſputed, he would ſubmit to the judgment of his peers. Some affirm, that he likewiſe advanced the death of Conſtantine, which, he pretended, was in revenge, for his affection to France, as an argument, for his being releaſed from all his engagements; upon which, he diſmiſs'd the ambaſſadors, without any farther reply. M. Paris.

The juſticiary's great credit and power. In the mean time, the favour and credit of the chief juſticiary arrived to ſuch an height, that he openly aſſumed a power, which none in his office had ever claimed; tho' he was ſtill diſſatisfied, as he had a ſuperior, from whom he was obliged to receive orders, viz. the biſhop of Wincheſter, who, being appointed regent by the authority of parliament, could not eaſily be removed. As the regency was to continue ſome years longer, Hubert, to ſhorten it, obtained a bull from the pope, declaring the king of full age; by vertue of which, Henry was authorized to take the reins of government into his own hands. The bull alſo enjoined all, that had the cuſtody of the king's caſtles, immediately to ſurrender them to the king; but the barons refuſed to comply with this order, how expreſs ſoever, ſince it was directly contrary to the laws of the realm, purſuant to which the king could not be of age, till he was 21.

His artifice to deprive the barons of their caſtles. R. de Cogg. This artifice not anſwering Hubert's expectation, ſince the barons would not conſent to the pope's declaration, and it was impoſſible to force them to a compliance, whilſt they were 1223. poſſeſs'd of the caſtles, he invented a ſtratagem to wreſt them out of their hands; for he cauſed the king to demand of him the caſtles in his cuſtody, to which he ſubmitted, on condition that the reſt of the barons ſhould do the ſame. Accordingly, he delivered up to the king the tower of London and the caſtle of Dover, the two moſt important places in the kingdom; and ſome of the barons copied after his example, not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting any fraud in this proceeding; but, no ſooner was the king in poſſeſſion of their caſtles, than he reſtored to Hubert all thoſe he had voluntarily reſigned, in ſo glaring a manner, deriding their credulity. This ſtep, ſo unworthy of a prince, created in the minds of the barons an ill opinion of the king; and they were chiefly incenſed againſt the favourite, whom they conſidered, as the principal contriver of the cheat. Moſt of thoſe, that had places at court, being unable to bear the proud and imperious carriage of this miniſter, reſigned them and retired into the country, reſolving to make uſe of the firſt opportunity to be revenged; and in the mean while, as all the lords did not fall into the ſnare, Hubert, to reduce them to obedience, threatened them with excommunication. Some were deterred into a compliance; but others determined to ſtand their ground, in ſpite of the king and his juſticiary.

1224. The king of France attacks Saintonge, and takes Rochelle. M. Paris.

During theſe domeſtick commotions, Lewis VIII, king of France, in direct contradiction to his oath, confiſcated all the dominions held by the Engliſh in France, and, marching into Saintonge, ſubdued ſeveral places; after which he beſieged Rochelle, of which Savary de Mallion was governor. It is reported, that this lord, having received intelligence of the king of France's deſign, demanded a ſupply of money from the court of England; but that, inſtead of the money, a coffer was ſent him full of old iron. Such a ſhameful neglect for the preſervation of a place, that deſerved the whole care of the miniſtry, ſo exaſperated the governor, that he ſurrendered the city, in a few days, and went over to the French *. Lewis's pretence for breaking the peace was, that Henry, as duke of Guienne, did not aſſiſt at his coronation; but, the truth is, he was willing to take the advantage of that prince's minority, to expel the Engliſh entirely out of his kingdom. This war, commenced on ſo ſlight an occaſion, of which Lewis never ſo much as made the leaſt complaint, convinced the court of England, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſend an army into France; and a parliament was called, to conſider of ways and means.

Faulk de Brent's rebellion.

Whilſt the king and parliament were intent on this affair, the outrages committed by Faulk de Brent interrupted their debates; for, being encouraged by William of Albemarle's impunity, he tyrannized over his vaſſals and neighbours, inſomuch that he was condemned, in a fine of 100 l. ſterling, by three judges ſent down on purpoſe †; but, his fierce and imperious temper leading him to regard this ſentence, as a great injury, he reſolved to be revenged. Accordingly, he diſpatched William, his brother, to Dunſtable, where the judges were holding the aſſizes, with orders to ſeize them by force, and bring them before him; and, tho' two of them, Martin de Pateſhulle and Thomas de Multon, eſcaped, the third, Henry de Braibrock, was taken and carried to Bedford-caſtle, where he ſuffered a thouſand indignities. The news of this being brought to the parliament, then ſitting at Northampton, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that this diſturber of the peace ſhould be puniſhed, in an exemplary manner; and that all other buſineſs ſhould be laid aſide, till that affair was ended. Purſuant to this reſolution, Faulk's brother, who commanded in Bedford, having refuſed to ſurrender the town to the king, on his ſummons, was attacked ſo furiouſly, that he was, at length, compelled to ſurrender at diſcretion; and, in ſpite of all the attempts of his friends to pacify the king, he was hanged, with 24 knights found in the garriſon; after which, the caſtle was razed to the ground ‡. In the interim, Faulk, who had retired into Wales, upon the aſſurances given him by ſeveral lords, to ſupport him, perceiving that they did not perform their promiſes, implored the king's mercy, by the mediation of the biſhop of Coventry; who made uſe of the ſame arguments that were advanced, in favour of William of Albemarle, and obtained the rebel's pardon, as to life and limbs; but he was, nevertheleſs, delivered to the cuſtody of the biſhop of London, till the following year, when the parliament confiſcated his eſtate, and baniſhed him the kingdom. Henry procured, for the charges of this expedition, an aid of two ſhillings, upon every hyde of arable land.

1225. A ſubſidy is granted to the king.

However, he had occaſion for greater ſums, to carry on the war with France; and, therefore, he called another parliament, of whom he demanded a 15th upon moveables. The parliament aſſured him, they would readily grant him this ſupply, provided king John's charters, which had, all along, been neglected, were, for the future, punctually obſerved; and the king, in his preſent circumſtances, complied with their requeſt, in a very handſome manner, and even ſent commiſſioners into every county, to ſee the charters put in execution. Indeed, the effects of theſe orders did not continue long; but yet, ſo greatly were the people pleaſed with the king's good intentions, that no tax was ever levied, with more exactneſs, and the biſhops threatened to excommunicate all, that ſhould be guilty of any fraud.

The king applied this money, in raiſing an army, which he ſent into Guienne, under the command of prince Richard, his brother, lately made earl of Cornwall; and Richard, having the earl of Salisbury for his lieutenant, made ſome progreſs in Guienne, and took St. Macaire. The Engliſh hiſtorians affirm, that Richard gained a conſiderable advantage over the earl; but the French pretend, that, finding himſelf in no condition to hazard a battle, he retired beyond the Dourdogne, and ſoon after into England; yet it is certain, that Richard did not leave Guienne, till 1227, as appears from the Collection of Publick Acts.

1226. The year 1226 began with a parliament, in which the king, juſt recovered from a dangerous illneſs, was declared of full age, tho' he was not yet ſo old, as the law required; but this was not the only buſineſs for which they were aſſembled. A legate, lately arrived from Rome, had an extraordinary propoſal from the pope to lay before them, which concerned the whole kingdom, and particularly the clergy; and the ſubſtance of it was, that, ſince the holy ſee had long been under the ſcandal of doing nothing, without money, it would be for the honour and intereſt of all chriſtians to wipe off this aſperſion, by removing the cauſe; that it was notorious, the extreme poverty of the church of Rome indiſpenſeably obliged her to demand ſome acknowledgment, for the favours ſhe diſpenſed to her ſons; that ſhe could heartily wiſh to be in a capacity to proceed with moderation; and that the moſt effectual means to this purpoſe would be, for the faithful to grant her ſupplies, in proportion to her neceſſities. Then the legate propoſed, that, to ſupply the preſſing occaſions of the holy ſee, there ſhould be ſet apart, out of every cathedral, two prebendaries; and, out of every monaſtery, two monks portions; and that this grant ſhould be confirmed by parliament. He ſupported his propoſal with the moſt plauſible reaſons he could deviſe; tho' he did not promiſe, that the pope would take nothing for his future favours, but only inſinuated, that he would uſe more moderation, as to this particular. The parliament eaſily perceived the pope's deſign; and, therefore, all the legate's eloquence could not prevail with them, who did not even vouchſafe to return him an anſwer. When he would have complained of this diſreſpectful treatment of the pope, they told him, that, by reaſon of the abſence of the king and ſome of the principal biſhops, they could not enter upon the conſideration of ſuch a propoſal; yet, far from being diſcouraged by this repulſe, he required, that the parliament ſhould continue to ſit, till the arrival of the king and the abſent prelates; but, notwithſtanding his ſollicitations, the parliament broke up, without coming to any reſolution; and the legate was forced to wait with patience, till the next ſeſſion. In the interim, he took a journey into the northern counties; where, under the pretence of the right of procurations *, he ſo heavily oppreſſed the churches, that they were conſtrained to complain to the pope, who recalled him, leſt he ſhould incenſe the Engliſh, at ſo critical a juncture. However, his holineſs enjoined the archbiſhop of Canterbury to cauſe the parliament to meet again, and demand a poſitive anſwer to the legate's propoſal; but the king, having conſulted with the biſhops, ſent him word, that, as this affair concerned all Chriſtendom, he was ready to fall in with the reſolutions that ſhould be taken, in other chriſtian countries. This was, in effect, a civil denial; for it was notorious, that a legate had made the ſame propoſal in France, but it was altogether ineffectual.

M. Paris.

An extraordinary propoſal from the pope.

In the mean while, Henry continued his preparations againſt France; but he was, at length, obliged to ſuſpend them; for Lewis, having engaged to command, in a Cruſade againſt the Albigenſes, had obtained the pope's expreſs orders to all chriſtian princes, not to give him the leaſt interruption, during that expedition. Henry, by the advice of his parliament, put off the war, till the return of the king of France, who was then employed in the ſiege of Avignon; but he died, ſoon after he had taken this place, not without ſuſpicion of being poiſoned by the earl of Champagne, who was deſperately enamoured with the queen; and Lewis IX, his ſon, ſucceeded him, under the guardianſhip of Blanche of Caſtile, his mother, who, tho' a foreigner, procured the regency of the kingdom.

A Cruſade againſt the Albigenſes.

During the ſuſpenſion of the Engliſh arms, purſuant to the pope's orders, Henry began his majority with an act of injuſtice, that was altogether inexcuſable; for, not daring to demand any money of the parliament, who had ſo lately granted him a very conſiderable ſupply, he made uſe of an expedient, formerly put in practice by Richard, his uncle, on the like occaſion, after his return from the Holy Land, viz. to oblige all that had charters to renew them, upon the payment of a certain ſum; and this order, the only view of which was to fill the king's coffers, fell heavieſt on the monaſteries. All unjuſt means, invented by princes to extort money from their ſubjects, are ſo many inexhauſtible ſprings of oppreſſion; as their ſucceſſors ſeldom fail to copy after ſuch evil precedents and examples.

Henry, to raiſe money, orders all the charters to be renewed.

In the beginning of the next year, the ſudden death of the earl of Salisbury, natural ſon of Henry II, at a banquet, to which he was invited by the chief juſticiary, gave occaſion for violent ſuſpicions of that miniſter †; but, as no inquiry was made, none durſt preſume to attack directly a favourite, who had an abſolute ſway over the king. As Henry advanced in years, it appeared that he had qualities inconſiſtent with the character of a great prince; an inſatiable avarice, an amazing giddineſs, ex-

Tho' he was declared of age, the laſt year, he retained the biſhop of Wincheſter, near his perſon, for the ſake of his advice; but Hubert de Burgh repreſented to him, that he would always be conſidered, as a minor, whilſt that prelate was at court; and that it was conducive to his honour and intereſt to convince his ſubjects, that he was capable of governing by himſelf; and, this counſel being very agreeable to the king, who did not diſcern the motive, he diſmiſs'd the biſhop of Wincheſter, and ordered him to return to his ſee.

Hubert adviſes Henry to become abſolute.

Hubert was no ſooner without a rival in the miniſtry, than he attempted to ſet himſelf above the laws, by perſuading his maſter, that his whole deſign was to render himſelf abſolute; and, indeed, it was an eaſy matter to engage in this project a prince, that was already deſirous of an unlimited and arbitrary power. Beſides the foreſaid renewal of the charters, he had extorted 5000 marks from the Londoners; pretending they had lent the like ſum to prince Lewis, at his departure from England; and the town of Northampton was forced to pay him 1200 l. on the like frivolous pretences. The monaſteries met with no better treatment; and, tho' they appealed to the holy ſee, he had exacted from them large ſums, whilſt the affair was depending before the pope. Theſe unjuſtifiable proceedings leſſened the eſteem his ſubjects had for him; but what he farther did, by the advice of his juſticiary, entirely alienated their affection. When it was leaſt expected, he annulled the two charters of the king, his father, tho' he had ſolemnly ſworn inviolably to obſerve the ſame; alledging that he was not obliged to make good what he had promiſed, during his minority; and, as for Hubert, regardleſs of the murmurs of the people, who conſidered him, as the author of theſe pernicious counſels, he procured himſelf to be created earl of Kent, as a reward for the great ſervice he had lately done his maſter, in freeing him from the yoke of the charters.

A quarrel between the king and prince Richard. M. Paris.

The conduct of the king and his miniſter occaſioned a viſible diſcontent among the barons; and prince Richard, who returned from Guienne, ſoon after the revoking of the charters, improved their preſent diſpoſition, to brave the king, his brother, in a conteſt he had with him, on the following occaſion. King John, having given one Waleran, a German, a certain manor belonging to the earldom of Cornwall, Richard was no ſooner inveſted with that earldom, than he ordered Waleran to appear and produce his title, and, in the interim, cauſed the manor to be ſeized; but, whether Waleran had loſt his charter, or judged it to be defective, he refuſed to obey the ſummons; and, as if he had been uſed very unjuſtly, he carried his complaints to the king, who, without any examination of the affair, gave orders to the prince's officers to reſtore the manor. Richard, upon his arrival, repreſented to the king, that he had done Waleran no injuſtice, in requiring him to ſhew his original title; that he did not intend to deprive him of his lands, by force, but to have the matter determined by the laws, and, therefore, offered to refer it to the deciſion of the peers of the realm. Henry, incenſed at this propoſal, commanded his brother to reſtore the manor, by ſuch a time, or depart the kingdom; but Richard boldly replied, that he would do neither, without the judgment of his peers, and directly withdrew, without waiting for an anſwer. The juſticiary, who inceſſantly inſpired the king with violent maxims, adviſed him to take the prince into cuſtody; whilſt Richard, in the interim, retired from court, and poſted to the earl of Pembroke, to conſult him about this affair. Pembroke, approving of the prince's conduct, took this to be a favourable opportunity to cheque the arbitrary power, uſurped by the king; and, therefore, he aſſured him, that he was ready to aſſiſt him, with his life and fortune, and did not doubt, but moſt of the barons would do the ſame. Accordingly, ſoon after, by the diligence of the earl-marſhal, the earls of Glouceſter, Cheſter, Warren, Warwick, Ferrars, and Hereford, with many other barons, joining with Richard, took up arms, to compel the king to reſtore the charters; which greatly alarmed the juſticiary. To prevent any fatal conſequences, he choſe to procure a reconciliation between the two brothers; and, to ſatisfy prince Richard, the principal of the confederates, he prevailed on the king to ſettle upon him his mother's dowry, to which he laid claim, and alſo to augment his appenage with the lands held by the late earl of Boulogne. Richard, content with this liberality, no longer inſiſted on the reſtoration of the charters; and the confederacy was diſſolved. Thus, the great, under the pretence of the publick good, only promote their intereſts, or gratify their paſſions. 1227.

1228. Archbiſhop Langton's death. M. Paris.

Stephen Langton, cardinal and archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſurvived Honoroius, no more than a few months; and, immediately after his deceaſe, the monks of St. Auguſtin elected Walter de Homeſham, one of their fraternity; but the king, being offended at this election, as it was made, without his licenſe, refuſed to confirm their choice; alledging that the father of this monk was hanged, for theft. On the contrary, the ſuffragan biſhops of the province of Canterbury, diſpleaſed at his being choſen, without their conſent, refuſed to accept him; becauſe he had debauched a nun, by whom he had ſeveral children. Upon this, the king ſent agents to Rome *, in order to have this affair decided there; and, in the mean time the church of Canterbury remained vacant.

Commotions in France, which Henry neglects to improve. M. Paris. M. Weſt.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacted, the regency of Blanche, St. Lewis's mother, occaſioned commotions in France, that might have been improved to his advantage, had he been a prince of an enterprizing genius; but, if he ever formed any projects, it was always at improper junctures, whilſt he altogether neglected the moſt favourable. A fairer opportunity than the preſent had never offered, to recover the Engliſh provinces in France, had it been prudently managed; for the Normans, joining with the confederate barons againſt the queen-regent of France, acquainted Henry, that, if he would come, in perſon, he ſhould be received with open arms, and put in poſſeſſion of that wealthy province. The Poictevins likewiſe ſollicited him to come and ſeize ſuch of their towns, as were poſſeſſed by the French, and aſſured him of their aſſiſtance; and the Gaſcoigns ſent the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux to inform him, that, by making the beſt uſe of the troubles in France, he might expel the French out of the places they were maſters of, in Guienne. Such importunate invitations, at ſo proper a juncture, ſhould have excited Henry to make a vigorous puſh, for the recovery of what the king, his father, had loſt by his negligence; but, by an infatuation imputed to the counſels of the juſticiary, he anſwered, that he would wait for a more convenient opportunity; whereas it will appear from the ſequel, that he raſhly engaged in this undertaking, at a time when there was not the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs. Thus, this prince blindly ſuffered himſelf to be miſ-led by his miniſters, who abuſed his credulity and weakneſs, to promote their own affairs, without any regard to the intereſts of their maſter.

The pope nominates another archbiſhop of Canterbury. M. Paris.

In the interim, the diſpute, about the election of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, was carried on, with great warmth, at Rome, tho' his holineſs had not, as yet, decided the point; but, at length, the king's envoys offer to the pope of a 10th of all the moveables in England and Ireland, ſo opened his eyes, that he voided the election made by the monks; and, under the pretence of preventing any future conteſt, he conferred the archiepiſcopal dignity on Richard le Grand, chancellor of the church of Lincoln; in which he went farther than even Innocent III, who, at leaſt, kept up ſome form in ordering Langton to be elected by the monks that were ſent to Rome. Tho' Gregory's incroachment was of more dangerous conſequence than that of Innocent; yet the king and the ſuffragan biſhops received the new archbiſhop, pleaſed with having obtained the monks election to be voided; and, ſoon after, Gregory, who was deſirous of ſeeing the effects of the promiſes lately made him, diſpatched one of his chaplains into England to collect the promiſed 10ths, which were to be expended in his war with the emperor. The king having aſſembled the parliament, on this occaſion, the chaplain laid before them the pope's letters, urgently preſſing the performance of what he was made to expect; and all eyes were intently fixed on Henry, in hopes that he would oppoſe this exaction and diſclaim his envoys; but they eaſily apprehended, from his ſilence, that the promiſe had been given, by his order, or, at leaſt, that he had not the reſolution to contradict the pope's will. However, the lords unanimouſly reſolved not to ſuffer their lay-fees to be, thus, liable to the exactions of the court of Rome; tho', to give the pope ſome ſatisfaction, they propoſed to raiſe him a certain ſum, without inquiring into the effects of each particular perſon. In all probability, this method would have been taken, had not Stephen de Segrave, one of the barons, voluntarily ſubmitted to the pope's demands, and others been prevailed on by his example; but the number of thoſe, that were ſo drawn in, was, at length, ſo numerous, that the moſt reſolute oppoſers were forced to comply, leſt they ſhould incur the indignation of the king and the pope; much leſs, durſt the clergy venture to make any reſiſtance, for fear of being expoſed to the excommunication, with which they were threatened. The nuncio, having gained his point, produced a full commiſſion from his maſter to collect the tax, that was to be paid out of all moveables whatſoever; and he ſo rigorouſly executed his orders, that he received the 10ths of all ſorts of fruit, even of ſuch as were growing. Moreover, for the greater diſpatch, in levying this tax, he obliged the biſhops to advance money for the inferior clergy, authorizing them to reimburſe themſelves, as they ſhould think convenient. The prelates and abbots, then, were under a neceſſity of finding ready money; but, as ſeveral were unable to raiſe it, with ſufficient expedition, he brought with him certain Italian uſurers, who lent them money, at an unreaſonable intereſt. Thus, did the pope abuſe the king's weakneſs, who might, with eaſe, have prevented this exaction, by a vigorous oppoſition; for the earl of Cheſter, his ſubject, hinder'd the tax from being levied on his lands, by ſtrenuouſly maintaining, in ſpite of the nuncio's clamours, that the pope had nothing to do with lay-fees; but Henry was not only terrified by the example of the king, his father, which was continually in his view,

* As there was a wood near Montgomery-caſtle, which uſed to be a receptacle for robbers, the garriſon undertook, with the aſſiſtance of the country-people, to widen the road leading through that wood, and clear it of the thickets on both ſides; but, whilſt they were at work, the Welch attacked them, and compelled them to retreat into the caſtle, which they beſieged. The king and Hubert, to whom that caſtle belonged, came and raiſed the ſiege; and then they carried on the work, as far as a Ciſtercian monaſtery, termed Cridie, which they ſet on fire. Hubert, finding the place to be impregnable, ordered a caſtle to be built upon it; but the Welch ſo diſtreſſed Henry's army, which inwardly were in the intereſt of Lewelin, that he was obliged to enter into a diſadvantageous treaty; one article of which was, that this caſtle ſhould be demoliſhed, and Lewelin ſhould give Henry 3000 marks, for his charges. M. Paris.

1228. but he had another powerful motive to his present condescension. As he aspired after an absolute power, and proposed to levy money upon his subjects, by the most arbitrary and illegal methods, he was very sensible, that he should stand in need of the pope's protection, and that nothing could more readily procure it, than to let him share in these exactions; accordingly, the sequel of this reign will inform us, that the pope and king mutually defended each other, in all their attempts to extort money from the people of England.

Henry designs to carry war into France. M. Paris.

The nation had scarce forgot the pope's late oppression, when they were obliged to supply the king with means to make war upon France; for, after the commotions in that kingdom were appeased, Henry resolved to recover, by force of arms, the provinces taken from the king, his father; whereas he should have considered, that the posture of affairs in France was now exceedingly changed, the lords, that opposed the queen-regent, being all humbled, and consequently no longer in a condition to assist him. To put his design in execution, he determined to make vast preparations; and, therefore, he summoned all the vassals of the crown to meet him, after Michaelmas, at Portsmouth; where he assembled one of the finest armies, that had ever been raised in England *. However, this extraordinary armament proved to be useless; because there was not a sufficient number of ships to transport such a numerous body of troops. This disappointment threw Henry into furious a passion with Hubert de Burgh, who had undertaken to get all things in readiness, that he called him, "old traytor," charging him with receiving a bribe from the court of France, to put a stop to this undertaking; and, in his rage, he drew his sword to kill him; which, perhaps, he would have effected, if the earl of Chester had not interposed, not so much to preserve the justiciary, as to prevent the king from imbruing his hands in the blood of one of his subjects. It does not appear, whether Hubert acted with design, or negligence; but, however that be, the embarquement, on this account, was retarded, the whole winter. Besides, Peter de Dreux, earl of Bretagne, perceiving, upon his arrival, that so much time had been lost, in waiting for transport-ships, and that the English army, the season being too far advanced, would be forced to take up their winter quarters in his dominions, where they were to land, advised the king to defer his expedition, till the spring; during which interval, the justiciary regained the king's favour, and was entrusted with the administration of affairs, as before.

The affairs of Palestine. M. Paris.

The same year, the emperor Frederick, carrying his arms into Palestine, compelled the sultan of Egypt to surrender Jerusalem †; and he would have extended his conquests farther, if the excommunication, denounced against him, the preceding year, by the pope, had not, with the templars and hospitallers of the Holy Land, outweighed the valour of that prince. Their prejudice against him was so great, that they conspired to deliver him up to the sultan, to whom they had even intimated their design; but this prince, tho' an Infidel, detesting their treachery, generously made a discovery of it to the emperor; which generous action redounded more to his advantage, than the having Frederick in his power. By this means, he sowed, among the christians of Palestine, a dissension that was extremely prejudicial to their affairs; and the emperor, perceiving that he could not depend upon any assistance from the christians of the Holy Land, and that the pope applied to other uses the Crusades intended against the Saracens, entered into a 10 years truce with the sultan, and returned to Europe. 1228.

Henry, tho' he waited impatiently for the spring, in order to transport his army into France, during his stay in England, obtained a considerable present from the clergy, exacted a large sum from the city of London, and forced the Jews, then very numerous in the kingdom, to pay him a third part of their substance; and no sooner was spring come, than he embarqued with his army at Portsmouth, and landed at St. Maloes; where he was received by the earl of Bretagne, who resigned to him all his fortified towns and castles. In the interim, the French, who had all the winter to make preparations, were posted near Angers, designing to obstruct his march into Poictou; and they enjoyed leisure to fortify themselves, whilst Henry remained at Nantz, in expectation of the rest of his troops, that were to come from Ireland. Tho', by the prudent management of the queen-regent of France, the male-contents had returned to their allegiance; yet, the king of England being in Bretagne and all Lewis's forces employed in those parts, they began to raise new commotions; upon which, the king and queen-regent of France left Anjou, in order to put a stop to the designs of the male-contents, which they apprehended to be of more dangerous consequence, than the progress the English might make, in their absence. This was the juncture that Henry should have improved, with all possible vigour and application; especially, as the Normans importuned him to march into their country, where they were in readiness to receive and assist him. However, instead of passing into Normandy, tho' he was inclined to it, at the instance of his favourite, who represented that attempt, as clogged with mighty difficulties, he went directly to Poictou and took the castle of Mirabel; and then, as if he intended to convince the French male-contents, that they could expect nothing from him, he came to Guienne, to receive the fealty of the Gascoigns. In a word, having spent much time, to no manner of purpose, he returned to Bretagne, where, by his conduct, he demonstrated his little inclination to war. This gave occasion to suspect his ministers, of holding intelligence with the enemy, who had sufficient time to appease the troubles of the kingdom; and, accordingly,

At the approach of the French, Henry retires into England.

The queen-regent, having appeaſed the barons, ordered the army to march towards Bretagne; where Henry was employed, in profuſely ſpending the remainder of his money, on entertainments and diverſions, as if the ſole view of his expedition was to take his pleaſure *. Upon the firſt news of the approach of the enemy, his treaſures being ſpent, and fearing to draw upon himſelf all the forces of France, he ſhamefully retired into England; and he was not eaſily prevailed on to leave part of his army in Bretagne, under the command of the earls of Cheſter and Pembroke, to ſupport the earl, whom he had unſeaſonably engaged in the war; but theſe lords, more valiant than their king, with ſo few troops, not only prevented the French from entering Bretagne, but made incurſions into Anjou and Normandy, from whence they carried off a great booty. Thus, Henry, inſtead of gaining any advantages by this undertaking, only rendered himſelf deſpicable to his ſubjects; who would never, after his infamous miſmanagement, on the preſent occaſion, liſten to an expedition againſt France. He laid the whole blame on the treachery of the earl of Marche and the Poictevins; but, in all probability, they would not have deſerted him, if his proceedings had given them any reaſon to expect a powerful protection.

1230. M. Paris. Whilſt Henry was in Bretagne, the king of Connaught in Ireland, taking the advantage of the weakneſs of the Engliſh, whoſe beſt troops were ſent to the king, invaded their territories with a great army, or rather multitudes of unwarlike people; but Geoffrey de Maris, juſticiary of Ireland, vigorouſly oppoſed him, and, having ſlain 20,000 of the Iriſh, took their king himſelf priſoner.

1231. An aid is granted to the king. Tho' the king had profuſely ſquander'd the ſums granted him for the French war, he even made uſe of that diſhonourable expedition, as a pretence to demand a new ſupply; and the parliament, very unwilling to comply, at length, on the account of his preſſing wants, allowed him a ſcutage of three marks upon every knight's fee, held of the crown.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury is diſguſted, and goes to Rome. Soon after, Richard, archbiſhop of Canterbury, complained to the king, that, upon the deceaſe of the earl of Glouceſter, Hubert de Burgh had ſeized the caſtle of Tunbridge, though it was a fief of the archbiſhoprick; but Henry replied, that, as he had the wardſhip of the young earl of Glouceſter, it was his prerogative to diſpoſe of it to his juſticiary, during the heir's minority; adding, he was ſurprized, that he ſhould diſpute his right. However, this anſwer not ſatisfying the archbiſhop, he excommunicated all, without diſtinction, that injuriouſly detained the church's lands; and then he ſet out to carry his complaints to the pope.

1231. Prince Richard's marriage. About the ſame time, prince Richard, the king's brother, married Iſabella, the counteſs-dowager of Glouceſter, ſiſter of the earl of Pembroke, who died, ſhortly after his ſiſter's marriage; and he left his eſtate, by will, to Richard, his brother, who was ſtill in Bretagne, where he did the ſtate ſignal ſervices. A three months truce giving him leiſure to return into England, he claimed his brother's inheritance, ſeized by the king; and Henry, wanting an excuſe, anſwered, that he heard his brother's widow was with child, and, therefore, could not diſpoſe of the inheritance, till ſhe was delivered; but, being ſenſible of the falſhood of this, he invented a more plauſible pretence. He accuſed Richard of holding a treacherous correſpondence with France, whilſt in Bretagne; and, without permitting him to vindicate himſelf, commanded him to depart the kingdom, within 15 days. This treatment was ſhocking to an Engliſh earl; and eſpecially to the ſon of that earl of Pembroke, who placed the king on the throne, and eſtabliſhed him on it, in ſpite of his enemies. Richard, quitting England, went over into Ireland, where he took poſſeſſion of the caſtles and lands belonging to his family; and then, having raiſed ſome troops, he made himſelf amends, out of the king's demeſnes, for the inheritance that was unjuſtly detained from him in England. Whether Henry dreaded the conſequences of this revolt, or was convinced that the injuſtice he had done the earl was too glaring to be maintained, he recalled him from exile, gave him his eſtate, and inveſted him with the office of earl-marſhal, enjoyed by his brother; but it was the temper of this prince to behave imperiouſly to ſuch as he believed to be incapable of reſiſting him, and, on a ſudden, to yield to thoſe that oppoſed him.

Lewellyn, prince of Wales, having lately made ſome incurſions into the borders of England, Henry ſuffered him to proceed, for ſome time; but, when he thought that prince no longer expected to be attacked, he went, in perſon, to chaſtiſe him; yet, upon the firſt oppoſition, his martial ardor abated, and, without effecting any thing, he returned.

Several marriage-propoſals miſcarry. Act. Pub. Tho' Henry was now in the 25th year of his age, he was ſtill unmarried; becauſe all his projects, on that head, had miſcarried. He firſt deſigned to eſpouſe Yolante, daughter to the duke of Bretagne, to whom he was engaged by oath; but, whether the pope refuſed a diſpenſation, or, for ſome other reaſon, the deſign was not put in execution. A match was alſo propoſed between him and the duke of Auſtria's daughter, but with the ſame ſucceſs; and, ſome time after, he acquainted the archbiſhop of Cologne with his intentions, of entering into a ſtrict alliance with the empire, by marrying the daughter of the king of Bohemia, tho' it does not appear, that this affair was carried any farther. He was likewiſe diſappointed, this very year, in his deſign of eſpouſing the ſecond daughter

I ſhall only add here, to avoid the mention of it, in another place, that, four years after, he would have married the daughter of the earl of Ponthieu; yet, tho' he was contracted to her, and ambaſſadors were diſpatched, for the pope's diſpenſation, he altered his ſentiments, whilſt they were on the road, and ſent them orders not to take the leaſt notice of the affair.

The death of the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury ſo ſucceſsfully pleaded his cauſe at Rome, that he procured an order from the pope, to take poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Tunbridge, during the minority of the earl of Glouceſter; but death ſeized him, as he was returning to England. Upon the firſt news of it, the monks of St. Auguſtin elected Hugh de Neville, biſhop of Chicheſter and chancellor of the kingdom; and the king, confirming their choice, inveſted him with the temporalities; but the archbiſhop elect could never obtain the pope's confirmation, to whom he was repreſented *, as too much a courtier. This ſingle conſideration prevailed on the pope to void the election; and he commanded the monks to chuſe a perſon more devoted to the holy ſee.

1232. The king, demanding a ſubſidy, is refuſed.

In the beginning of the year 1232, the king, calling a parliament, demanded an aid, in order to diſcharge the debts contracted by his late expedition into France; but the earl of Cheſter replied, in the name of all the barons, that, as they had aſſiſted them with their money and perſons, they were releaſed from any farther obligation, on that account; and the clergy, who were no better affected to the king, deſiring time to conſider of the affair, the parliament was prorogued, rill Eaſter.

A confederacy againſt the foreign eccleſiaſticks.

The clergy, nobility, and commons were not only diſguſted with the king, by reaſon of his abuſe of the aids granted him by the parliament; but alſo becauſe he publickly countenanced the uſurpations of the court of Rome, and ſuffered the pope to trample daily on the rights of the church and the kingdom. The popes, not ſatisfied with exacting, from time to time, under various pretences, immenſe ſums from the clergy, evidently deſigned to get into their hands the diſpoſal of all the vacant benefices, and conſequently to aboliſh the rights of the reſpective patrons; and, beſides, the collation of almoſt all the vacant benefices on Italians, or other foreigners, muſt, of courſe, highly exaſperate the Engliſh. This diſcontent roſe to ſuch a height, that above eighty perſons of quality entered into a confederacy to deprive the Italian eccleſiaſticks of all their poſſeſſions in England; and, having choſen one Twenge † for their leader, they forcibly entered ſeveral houſes of theſe foreigners, and, carrying away what things of value they met with, diſtributed them to the poor. This was done, with ſo little noiſe, that not a ſoul ſtirred, either to reſiſt or puniſh the authors; but the pope, ſoon receiving intelligence of it, ſent ſo ſharp a letter to the king, that, from the contents, one would have concluded the church had been mortally wounded; and, without conſidering that the laws and cuſtoms of England required a previous proceſs and examination of matters, he commanded the king to puniſh immediately the diſturbers of the church's peace, on pain of excommunication and interdict, if he deferred, a moment, the puniſhment of the guilty. Theſe menaces obliging Henry to iſſue out orders, to make a ſtrict inquiry after the authors of the late violence, he found that there were more perſons concerned in it than he imagined, and that the biſhops themſelves had engaged in the plot, or countenanced it by their ſilence; yet, for the pope's ſatisfaction, the chief leader of the confederates was apprehended, and ſent to Rome, purſuant to his order. Some ſheriffs and other officers were impriſoned, for neglecting to ſuppreſs the riot; and, in all appearance, the number and quality of the rioters prevented any farther proſecution of this affair ‡. 1233.

Hubert's diſgrace.

How great a calm ſoever there ſeemed to be, for ſome time, in Henry's court, a ſtorm was ſecretly gathering againſt the juſticiary; which proved the more fatal, as it was ſudden and unexpected. Ever ſince Hubert's enemies perceived, that the king was capable of entertaining ſuſpicions of him, they inceſſantly did him ill offices; and their projects were ſo artfully managed, that Henry was prevailed on to recall the biſhop of Wincheſter to court, and make him one of his counſellors. This prelate was no ſooner reſtored to the king's favour and confidence, than he continually endeavoured to ruin the favourite; being ſenſible that his own ſafety depended on the ruin of his rival; and an opportunity quickly offered, which he took care to improve. The prince of Wales having made ſeveral irruptions into England, without the leaſt oppoſition, the biſhop of Wincheſter told the king, It was a great reproach, that ſo contemptible a people as the Welch ſhould thus plunder his ſubjects; and yet that no attempts ſhould be uſed to prevent it. Henry replied, "He was ſo far from being in a condition to "undertake a war, that his treaſurer had even "aſſured him, his revenues were ſcarce ſuffi-"cient for the neceſſary expences of his fami-"ly." Theſe words gave the biſhop what he wanted, viz. a pretence to blame the conduct of the prime miniſter. He repreſented to the king, "The want, he complained of, was the "effect of the miſmanagement of the treaſury; 1232. "that the perſons, through whoſe hands the "money paſſed, were not called to an account; "that the wardſhip of minors was always gi-"ven to private perſons, without any benefit "to his exchequer; that he received no pro-"fit from the vacant benefices, or the lands, "which, by death or confiſcation, fell to the "crown; tho' it was, by theſe means, his pre-"deceſſors filled their coffers, and, therefore, "not ſtanding in ſo much need of parliamen-"tary ſubſidies, lived in a ſtate of greater in-"dependence." Henry, improving theſe hints, called all his ſheriffs, and thoſe that had the management of his treaſury, to an account, and made Peter de Rivaux, the biſhop of Winchester's nephew, or rather ſon, treaſurer of his chamber; but this was only a trial of the prelate's credit, to pave the way for the execution of his main deſign. Theſe alterations were ſucceeded by ſome others, tending to remove from court the creatures of the juſticiary, whoſe intereſt viſibly declined, in proportion as that of his rival increaſed; and, in a word, the biſhop gained ſuch an influence over the king, that he procured Segrave, his principal confident, to be promoted to the office of juſticiary in the room of Hubert, who was degraded, tho' he had a patent for that dignity, during his life.

The fall of a favourite is generally heavy; for the prince's averſion is proportionable to his paſt affection. Princes, for the moſt part, on ſuch occaſions, act from a principle of pride, frequently imperceptible to themſelves; and, as their love cools, they labour to juſtify their inconſtancy, and often upbraid the favourite for that, which before was the cauſe of their affection; and of this the caſe of Hubert is a remarkable inſtance. This miniſter had formerly ſuch an aſcendant over his maſter, that his counſels, as they flatter'd all Henry's paſſions, were regarded, as ſo many oracles; but now he conſidered all his advices as ſo many treacheries. Indeed, it would be extremely difficult to vindicate the conduct of this favourite; but it may reaſonably be preſumed, that, among all the accuſations againſt him, there were ſeveral falſe and groundleſs imputations. However that be, a few days after his diſgrace, the king ſent for him, and demanded an account of all the money that had paſs'd through his hands *; and, as this was no eaſy task, Hubert endeavoured to be excuſed. Henry produced king John's charter, declaring he was ſo fully ſatisfied of his fidelity, that he diſcharged him from all accounts; but the biſhop of Wincheſter anſwered, that the charter might be valid, as to what was tranſacted in the late reign, but could not exempt him from giving an account of his adminiſtration, during the preſent; that he was charged with ſeveral other crimes, and particularly with giving the king pernicious counſels, to the great prejudice of his and the kingdom's affairs. Hubert, perceiving that his ruin was reſolved on, requeſted time to give in his anſwer; which was granted accordingly. The biſhop, who could not condemn him, without the aſſiſtance of the barons, was afraid of diſobliging them, by refuſing Hubert a privilege common to him and all the peers of the realm; and, poſſibly, they would have made it their own caſe, if the court had perſiſted in denying his requeſt.

The king commands Hubert to give in his accounts.

Whether Hubert was conſcious of his guilt, or deſpaired of vindicating his innocence, before judges, ſeveral of whom were his avowed enemies, inſtead of appearing, on the day appointed, he took ſanctuary in the priory of Merton; and, ſome time after, the parliament, being aſſembled at Lambeth, granted to the king an aid of the 40th part of the moveables of the whole kingdom; upon which, the lords petitioning that Hubert de Burgh's trial might proceed, he was ſummoned to appear, but refuſed to obey. The king, who was of an impetuous temper, gave orders to the mayor of London to force him from his ſanctuary, and bring him, either dead or alive; and the citizens, who mortally deteſted Hubert, ever ſince his ſeverity in the affair of Conſtantine, immediately flock'd together, to the number of 20,000, being reſolutely determined to execute the king's orders, in a mercileſs manner. In the interim, ſome of the principal Londoners, dreading the conſequences of ſuch a violent order, went and conſulted with the biſhop of Wincheſter, who aſſured them, that, at all adventures, the king muſt be obeyed; but the remonſtrances of the earl of Cheſter to the king himſelf were more effectual. He told him, that ſuch a tumultous aſſembly might raiſe a ſedition in the city, not eaſily to be appeaſed; and that ſo raſh an action would be blamed by all the world, and eſpecially by foreigners; who, not being prejudiced, like the Engliſh, againſt the party accuſed, would be aſtoniſhed at his treatment, ſince there were other means to puniſh him, if guilty. Finally, he reminded him of the pope's reſentment, who would never ſuffer the ſacredneſs of the ſanctuary to be violated, with impunity; and Henry, diſſuaded by theſe reaſons, countermanded the mayor of London, who found it extremely difficult to diſperſe the mob.

The king's raſh order againſt Hubert.

Of all Hubert's former friends, the archbiſhop of Dublin was the only one, that had the courage to interpoſe, in his behalf; who, by his ſollicitations, prevailed on the king to allow Hubert a longer time, to prepare his anſwer. In the mean while, Hubert came out of his ſanctuary, to viſit his wife at St. Edmundsbury; but the king, hearing of it, cauſed him to be purſued by ſome ſoldiers, who found him in a ſmall chapel, at Brentwood in Eſſex, with the croſs in one hand and the hoſt in the other; and, having wreſted both theſe from him, they chained his feet under his horſe's belly, and ſo conducted him to the tower of London. All churches, as well as what belonged to them, being, in thoſe days, ſo many ſanctuaries, the 1232. king's proceeding alarmed the whole body of the clergy; and the biſhop of London, waiting on the king, declared, that he would excommunicate all, that, directly, or indirectly, were concerned in the violation of the church's privileges. Henry, terrified by theſe menaces, ordered Hubert to be ſent back to the chapel, from whence he was forced; but, at the ſame time, he commanded the ſheriffs of Hertfordſhire and Eſſex, on pain of being hanged, to watch the church ſo narrowly, that the priſoner might neither eſcape, nor be ſupplied with victuals. The archbiſhop of Dublin, upon this, interceded for him, once more, intreating the king, with tears in his eyes, to inform him, what he reſolved to do with the priſoner; and Henry replied, that he deſigned to have him condemned, as a traytor, unleſs he would acknowledge himſelf guilty, and abjure the kingdom for ever.

Hubert is confined in the tower. M. Paris.

Hubert, thinking this condition too rigid, voluntarily ſurrendered himſelf to the ſheriffs, who carried him to the tower, fettered and chained, amidſt the acclamations of the people, who took a pleaſure in inſulting over his misfortunes.

Henry relents.

However, whilſt he anxiouſly expected the rigorous ſentence, with which he was threatened, his affairs began to aſſume a new aſpect, by reaſon of the king's fickle diſpoſition of mind; and, beſides, two other circumſtances concurred to promote this change. Firſt, the death of the earl of Cheſter *, Hubert's profeſſed enemy, tho' he diſapproved of the king's illegal methods to deſtroy him; and, ſecondly, a large ſum of money lodged by the priſoner in the hands of the knights templars, and readily delivered by him to the king, upon demand. Thus, Henry's indignation againſt Hubert cooled, by degrees, in the moſt ſurprizing manner; and this ſudden alteration alarmed the biſhop of Wincheſter, who, dreading the revival of the king's affection for his former miniſter, made a freſh attempt, to compleat the ruin of his formidable rival. He accuſed him of fraud and rapine, on account of the money lodged with the templars; alledging that it was impoſſible to accumulate ſuch immenſe riches, by lawful means; which charge was ſupported by all Hubert's adverſaries, who, perceiving the king to relent, came, in a body, and petitioned his death; but Henry reſolutely replied, that he would never conſent to the death of a perſon, who had done ſuch ſignal ſervices to himſelf and the king, his father. He, therefore, put a ſtop to his proſecution; and, leaving him in poſſeſſion of his inheritance, and the lands he had purchaſed, with his own money, he only deprived him of the reſt. Some of the lords, who, till now, had not dared to ſpeak for Hubert, ſollicited the king, in his behalf, and ſo far prevailed, that he was ſent to the caſtle of the Devizes, till farther orders; and, thus, ended this affair, which had made ſo great a noiſe, to the mortification of the biſhop of Wincheſter, who expected, that Hubert would not have come off, without the loſs of his head.

The biſhop of Wincheſter reſolves to govern abſolutely. M. Paris.

Hubert's diſgrace, one would have thought, ſhould have obliged the new miniſter to keep within the bounds of moderation; whereas, inſtead of taking different meaſures from thoſe of his predeceſſor, his only view was to govern with an abſolute power, and ſcreen himſelf from the plots of thoſe that ſhould oppoſe his deſigns. He repreſented to the king, "That "very few of the barons were, in reality, de- "voted to his ſervice; that their ſole intent "was to render themſelves independent; and "that, therefore, it was abſolutely neceſſary "to reſtrain their inſolence, tho' it would be "next to impoſſible to ſucceed, whilſt they were, "in a manner, maſters of the kingdom, as "they enjoyed all the places of truſt and pro- "fit; in a word, whilſt they remained in poſ- "ſeſſion of the moſt effectual means to increaſe "their audaciouſneſs; that their power was to "be undermined, by degrees, by removing "them from their poſts, offices, and govern- "ments, which might be conferred on fo- "reigners, who ſhould be invited into Eng- "land, that the king might rely on their aſſi- "ſtance, in caſes of neceſſity; and that, the "fortified places and moſt important poſts be- "ing poſſeſs'd by ſuch, as were, by gratitude "and intereſt, attached to the king, it would "be to no purpoſe for the Engliſh barons, to "attempt the re-eſtabliſhment of their pre- "tended rights." This advice, being agreeable to the king's inclinations, was immediately put in execution; and, ſoon after, above 2000 knights, Gaſcoigns and Poictevins, arrived, whom the biſhop of Wincheſter, their countryman, and Peter de Rivaulx, his nephew, had ſent for; who not only were promoted to the moſt conſiderable poſts and governments, but had likewiſe the wardſhips of the young nobility committed to them by the king, by which means, they procured for one another very advantageous matches, to the great prejudice of all the noble families. This proceeding highly incenſed the barons; but the biſhop of Wincheſter hindered their murmurs from reaching the ears of the king; or, if he could not avoid it, had the addreſs to prevent their making any impreſſion on his mind.

The earl of Pembroke makes a remonſtrance to the king. M. Paris.

Richard, earl of Pembroke, was the firſt, that had the reſolution openly to complain of theſe proceedings; who boldly told the king, that, in placing his whole affection on foreigners, he ſo alienated the hearts of his ſubjects, that, at laſt, their diſcontent muſt be attended with fatal conſequences; and he roundly repreſented to him, that, if he perſiſted in this practice, the barons would be forced to ſeek means, to rid the kingdom of theſe blood-ſuckers. The prime miniſter, being preſent, did not give the king time to reply; who told the earl, that his inſo-

This imperious and imprudent anſwer occaſioned a general diſcontent among the barons; and, from this time, they began to withdraw from court and form a confederacy, to put a ſtop to the deſpotick power aſſumed by the king.

The barons refuſe to meet in parliament. M. Paris.

Some time after, the king ſummoning a parliament, the barons, purſuant to a reſolution they had taken among themſelves, refuſed to meet; and they were afterwards ſummoned again, but to no purpoſe. At laſt, hearing that a freſh troop of foreigners had landed in England, to ſtrengthen the court-party, they met, in a body, to conſult together, on that occaſion; and the reſult of their conſultation was to ſend deputies to the king, to acquaint him, that, if he did not remove, from his perſon and counſels, the biſhop of Wincheſter and the Poictevins, they were reſolved to place on the throne a prince, that ſhould better obſerve the laws of the realm. The prime miniſter, upon this formal declaration, did all that was poſſible to excite the king to make uſe of the moſt violent methods, to reduce them to their allegiance; and Henry, blindly giving himſelf up to the direction of the biſhop, compelled ſome of the lords to deliver their children, as pledges of their obedience *. After this, he made preparations to proſecute, by arms, thoſe that refuſed to ſubmit; and then he called a parliament, deſigning to cauſe the moſt obſtinate to be condemned. The barons obeyed the ſummons; but they came ſo well attended, that they were in no danger of violence. The precautions of the barons diſconcerting the king's meaſures, he prorogued the parliament, leſt what he had projected ſhould fall upon himſelf; and, his deſign of cauſing the parliament to proceed againſt the barons being defeated, he determined to act, with open force. Accordingly, he ſummoned all the vaſſals of the crown to meet him, with their troops, at Glouceſter; but the earl of Pembroke and ſome others did not think it proper to obey. This refuſal furniſhing him with a plauſible pretence to attack them, he ordered their eſtates to be plundered, their parks to be deſtroyed, their houſes to be rifled, and their ſpoils to be diſtributed among the Poictevins; yet, if the barons had inviolably adhered together, the king would never have ventured to proceed to ſuch outrages; but, a diſſenſion ariſing among them, ſome broke the confederacy †, and left the reſt expoſed to the king's reſentment. The earl of Pembroke, being deſerted by the greateſt part of his aſſociates, applied to Lewellyn, prince of Wales, who granted him his protection and aſſiſtance.

In the interim, Henry, having received a freſh ſupply of Poictevin troops, marched as far as Hereford, in order to ſeize the earl of Pembroke's caſtles in that county; but his ardor preſently abated, by the oppoſition he met with from the firſt caſtle he beſieged. As he loſt his time before the caſtle, he deviſed a project that proved ſucceſsful; for he pretended to be willing, to refer the deciſion of his quarrel with the barons to the parliament, that was to meet in October, and he even paſs'd his royal word, that he would take their complaints under his conſideration; and, as his paſt conduct had rendered his word doubtful, ſome of the biſhops became ſureties, for the performance of his engagements. Upon this, he required, that the caſtle ſhould be ſurrendered to him, promiſing to reſtore it to the earl of Pembroke, within 15 days; and it was, on this condition, delivered to the king; but, the 15 days being expired, he laughed at the earl's credulity, and refuſed to perform his promiſe. Such were the inſtructions he received from the biſhop of Wincheſter; viz. to overlook the violation of his faith, and to act ſo, as to lay his ſubjects under a neceſſity of demanding pledges, for the performance of his word.

The remonſtrances of the parliament. M. Paris.

The parliament meeting on the 9th of October, purſuant to agreement, all the lords ſtrenuouſly intreated the king to replace his confidence in his ſubjects; and they repreſented to him, that the adminiſtration of publick affairs more naturally belonged to the peers of the realm than to foreigners; but, above all things, they intreated him not to introduce the pernicious cuſtom of treating, as rebels and traytors, thoſe that were not legally condemned. The biſhop of Wincheſter, who, on ſuch occaſions, always anſwered for his maſter, made ſuch a reply, as evidently ſhewed what maxims he inſtilled into the mind of the young king; for he aſſerted, that it was the heighth of arrogance, in the peers of England, to pretend to be on a level with thoſe of France; and that it was a notorious incroachment on the royal prerogative, to preſume to deprive their ſovereign of his right of employing what judges he pleaſed, to puniſh the diſobedient. Upon theſe words, the biſhops unanimouſly threatened the prelate with excommunication; but he deſpiſed their menaces, alledging, that, as he was conſecrated by the pope, he was not ſubject to their juriſdiction; and he even appealed, beforehand, to his holineſs, from their ſentence. Such appeals were ſo ſacred, in thoſe days, that the biſhops, not daring to excommunicate him by name, only darted their thunders, in general, on all thoſe who alienated the king's affection from his natural ſubjects.

The earl of Pembroke retakes his caſtle.

In the mean while, the earl of Pembroke, finding that all his inſtances for the reſtitution of his caſtle were ineffectual, beſieged and took it, in a few days; and the king, being enraged againſt the earl, on that account, commanded 1233. the biſhops to excommunicate him; but they told him, they could not apprehend any juſt cauſe to pronounce that ſentence againſt the earl, who had only recovered his own right, and what the king had promiſed to reſtore. Henry, not being able to prevail on the biſhops, reſolved to revenge this affront, by force of arms; and, accordingly, he ſummoned all the lords to meet him at Glouceſter, with horſe and arms, the day after All-Saints. Having muſtered his army together, he marched into Wales; but, arriving there, he was in extreme want of proviſions and forage, the earl of Pembroke having laid waſte all the places through which the royal army was to paſs; and, therefore, he entered Monmouthſhire, where he continued, ſome time, to give orders for their ſubſiſtence. In the interim, the earl of Pembroke, receiving intelligence that the king and moſt of the general officers were lodged in the caſtle of Groſmont, whilſt the army was quartered without in tents, attacked the camp by night, and, ſurprizing the army, put them to the rout; but this event ſo confounded the king, who loſt in the action about 600 horſes, with almoſt all his baggage, that, tho' his army was ſuperior to that of the earl, he retired to Glouceſter. Pembroke, upon Henry's retreat, determined to beſiege the caſtle of Monmouth, commanded by Baldwin de Guiſnes, a Flemiſh officer of great reputation; but this commander, being confident that the earl would approach, with a ſmall number of ſoldiers, to take a view of the caſtle, laid an ambuſh for him, which took him priſoner. This accident would have infallibly proved the ruin of the earl and his whole party, if, as he was conducted to the caſtle, Baldwin had not been deſperately wounded with an arrow; for, his men being obliged to halt, in order to aſſiſt him, the earl's army had not only time to reſcue their general, but alſo to kill or take priſoners all that came out of the town.

Hubert, making his eſcape, flies to a church.

During theſe tranſactions in Wales, Hubert de Burgh projected means to avoid a new impending danger; for he was given to underſtand, that the biſhop of Wincheſter, deſigning to diſpatch him, the more effectually to accompliſh his purpoſe, had importunately deſired of the king the cuſtody of the caſtle of the Devizes; but Hubert had the good fortune to gain ſome of his guards, who gave him an opportunity to eſcape, and take ſanctuary in a neighbouring church; yet no ſooner was his eſcape known, than the governor ordered him to be purſued by ſome of the garriſon, who, finding him before the altar, dragged him thence, in a very violent manner, and brought him back to the caſtle. Had he been apprehended in any other place than a church, few would have concerned themſelves about it; but the violation of the privilege of ſanctuary the clergy conſidered, as a thing of ſo dangerous conſequence, that the biſhop of Salisbury made it his own cauſe; ſince the outrage was committed in a church in his dioceſe. He directly repaired to the Devizes, and attempted to prevail on the governor to ſend the priſoner back to the place from whence he was taken; but, his ſollicitations proving unſucceſsful, he excommunicated the whole garriſon, and immediately carried his complaints to the king. He was aſſiſted by the biſhop of London and ſome other prelates, who were ſo urgent with the king, that he ordered the priſoner to be ſent to his ſanctuary; but, at the ſame time, he commanded the ſheriff of the county, to prevent his being ſupplied with victuals; yet, the next day, he was reſcued by a troop of armed men, who furniſhed him with means to make his eſcape into Wales, where he joined the earl of Pembroke.

The pope annuls Blund's election.

The election of John Blund to the ſee of Canterbury being declared void by the pope, leſt the monks ſhould make another miſtake, he empowered them to chuſe Edmund, canon of Salisbury; and, thus, by degrees, the popes became maſters of the elections of the archbiſhops of Canterbury, by annulling them, till thoſe they intended to promote were elected.

1234. The earl of Pembroke's progreſs.

After the king's retreat, the earl of Pembroke, continuing his progreſs, daily gained ſome advantage; and, in the beginning of the year 1234, he defeated a ſmall army commanded by John de Monmouth, who thought to ſurprize him, tho' he was ſurprized himſelf. Upon this, he ravaged the lands of the king's counſellors, lying in the Marches of Wales, and burnt the town of Shrewsbury, whilſt the king, who remained ſtill at Glouceſter, inſtead of oppoſing the earl, removing from Glouceſter, for the greater ſecurity of his perſon, ſhut himſelf up in Wincheſter, leaving the counties near the Severn to the mercy of the enemy. Several biſhops and others adviſed him to make peace with the earl; but, being entirely ſwayed by the biſhop of Wincheſter, he refuſed to conſent to any accommodation, unleſs the earl of Pembroke would come and throw himſelf at his feet *, and declare himſelf a traytor. It was no eaſy matter to prevail on the earl voluntarily to ſubmit to ſuch hard terms; and it was no leſs difficult to force him to a compliance, ſince the king had not the leaſt proſpect of any aids from the parliament, to carry on a war ſo diſagreeable to all. However, the biſhop of Wincheſter, as the council entirely conſiſted of his creatures, eaſily engaged them in a means made uſe of by him, to bring about his deſigns; and he cauſed an order to be directed to the king's officers in Ireland, ſigned by 12 privy counſellors, to plunder the eſtates of the earl of Pembroke, and to take him, dead or alive, if he ſhould come into that country. To this order was annexed a promiſe, in the king's name, of the earl's confiſcated eſtates in Ireland, if they punctually put it in execution; and the governors of Ireland promiſed, upon this, to exert themſelves in giving the king the ſatisfaction he deſired. However, they wiſhed to be ſecured by a charter, in form, of what was promiſed; and the biſhop, having proceeded already too far to recede, a charter being drawn, by his direction, he procured it to be ſigned by the king among other papers of no conſequence, and the great ſeal was affixed

to

1234. to it by the chancellor, who, probably, was concerned in the plot *. The Iriſh governors, upon the receipt of this charter, under ſome pretence, levied an army, and, entering the lands of the earl of Pembroke, committed great ravages, in order to draw that lord into Ireland; and this artifice fully anſwered the biſhop of Wincheſter's expectations. Pembroke, incenſed at the injuries done him in Ireland, directly repaired thither, reſolving to be revenged on thoſe that ſo wantonly attacked him; but he was baſely betrayed by his pretended friends, who engaged him in a battle, where he loſt his life †, by a ſtab in the back with a dagger.

The biſhop of Wincheſter's diſgrace. M. Paris.

Whilſt the biſhop of Wincheſter uſed the king's authority, without his knowledge, to ſcreen himſelf from his enemies, the new archbiſhop of Canterbury ſecretly attempted to undermine him; for ſuch was his zeal for the publick good, and alſo that of the king, that he inceſſantly repreſented to Henry, that it was his intereſt to remove from his perſon a miniſter ſo deteſted by all his ſubjects; and that the foreigners, who alienated the affection of his people, would infallibly prove the cauſe of his ruin. The king's eyes were, at length, ſo far opened by theſe remonſtrances, that he ſeemed to be thoroughly diſpoſed to reform his conduct; and, accordingly, he iſſued out poſitive orders for the prime miniſter to depart from court and return to his dioceſe. Afterwards, Peter de Rivaulx, the treaſurer, Segrave, the juſticiary, Robert de Paſſelew, and all the reſt of the foreigners, promoted by the biſhop of Wincheſter to the principal poſts in the ſtate, were not only ſhamefully degraded, but ordered to give an account of their management, and of all the money that paſſed thro' their hands; and then the king ſent the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the biſhops of Cheſter and Rocheſter, into Wales to negotiate a treaty with Lewellyn, which they concluded, to the advantage of the nation.

The king is informed of that prelate's treachery to the late earl of Pembroke.

This happy change reſtored tranquillity to the kingdom; and, in all probability, it would have recovered its former ſplendor, if the king had, all along, continued in the ſame diſpoſition. In the interim, the new miniſters made the beſt uſe of this peaceable interval, to convince the king of the injury he had done himſelf, in placing his whole confidence in ſtrangers; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, being informed of the particulars of the plot againſt the earl of Pembroke, ſhewed him a copy of the order and charter ſent by the biſhop of Wincheſter into Ireland. Henry, aſtoniſhed at his preſumption, proteſted he was not, in the leaſt, concerned in that affair; and he even ſeemed to lament the death of the earl, and to be extremely exaſperated againſt his miniſters, who had ſo notoriouſly abuſed his confidence.

The day appointed for the late miniſters to give in their anſwers being come, the parties accuſed, who, doubtleſs, were conſcious of their guilt, choſe to take ſanctuary in the churches, pretending that they were juſtly apprehenſive of ſome violence from their enemies; but the new miniſters ſo ordered matters, that the king removed the pretence for their non-appearance, by granting them a ſafe-conduct. Peter de Rivaulx, who appeared firſt, expreſs'd himſelf in ſuch arrogant terms, and behaved in a manner ſo very unſuitable to his condition, that Henry, for his inſolence, impriſoned him in the tower; where he remained no more than three days, before, by the archbiſhop's advice, he was ſent back to his ſanctuary. Segrave requeſted a longer time to prepare his anſwer; which was granted him, upon the archbiſhop's interceſſion; but the biſhop of Wincheſter, not daring to truſt to his ſafe-conduct, continued in his cathedral; and it was thought improper to force him from thence. 1234. The old miniſters are proſecuted.

In the mean while, the truce with France being expired, Lewis vigorouſly attacked the duke of Bretagne; and, according to the maxims of policy, this ally ſhould have been powerfully aſſiſted; but Henry ſent him no more than 60 knights and 2000 foot; which ſupply being diſproportioned to his neceſſities, he found himſelf obliged to demand a three months truce. However, he could not obtain it, but on the condition, that, if the king of England did not come, in perſon, to his relief, he ſhould ſubmit to whatever ſhould be required of him; and, during this interval, he exerted himſelf to prevail with Henry to come into Bretagne; but, being diſappointed, he did full homage to Lewis for his territories, which made his ſubjects give him the name of Mauclerc, that is, Bad Scholar ‡. Thus, Henry, by his negligence, loſt an ally, that might have been extremely ſerviceable to him, in his war with France. 1235. Lewis invades Bretagne.

In the beginning of the next year, Segrave and Paſſelew, the king's old miniſters, having each of them made him a preſent of 1000 marks, were diſcharged from any farther proſecution. 1236.

Soon after, was ſolemnized the marriage of Iſabella, the king's ſiſter, with the emperor Frederick II. ; and, tho' it was unuſual to grant the king an aid, for the marriage of a younger ſiſter, the parliament was ſo highly pleaſed with his late proceedings, that they allowed him two marks on every plough-land. Vid. M. Paris and Selden's notes on Poly-Olbion.

1236. probably, the prelate purchaſed this favour, at a dear rate, as he was concerned with a pope that embraced every opportunity, to accumulate money. The truth of this appears, from a ſtep that he took, this very year; for, Frederick's 10 years truce with the Saracens being now almoſt expired, he cauſed a freſh Cruſade to be publiſhed, as if he deſigned to make a vigorous puſh, to reſtore the affairs of Paleſtine; but, when great numbers of chriſtians had taken the croſs, and were preparing for their departure, by another bull, he diſpenſed with their going, for a certain ſum of money.

Henry's marriage.

Henry, the kingdom, at preſent, enjoying a profound tranquillity, eſpouſed Eleanor, ſecond daughter of Raymund earl of Provence *; and the nuptials were celebrated with great rejoicings, and in a magnificent manner; which ſeemed to preſage the king more happineſs than attended this marriage; and, the ſolemnity of the wedding and coronation † of the new queen being over, the king called a parliament at Merton; where ſeveral ſtatutes were enacted, which were, for a long time, in force, but are now, for the moſt part, repealed ‡.

The end of the French war.

The war with France ended, without any treaty of peace between the two crowns; for as Henry, who was not of a martial temper, had done nothing, in order to continue it, the queen-regent of France was very glad, that the Engliſh did not come into France, during the minority of the king, her ſon.

The ſtate of England. M. Paris.

However, tho' England was not diſturbed by foreign wars, it was infeſted, at home, with the diſcontents of the nobility, upon the promotion of William of Provence, the queen's uncle, who was elected biſhop of Valence, tho' not yet confirmed by the pope; for this prelate, being lately arrived in England, had ſo gained the king's affection, that nothing was tranſacted, without his advice, and the adminiſtration of publick affairs was entirely left to his direction. This highly diſguſted the Engliſh barons, who were reduced to the ſame ſtate, from which they imagined they had freed themſelves, by the expulſion of the Poictevins; and, at a parliament, aſſembled this year, in April, they ſo boldly complained of theſe proceedings to the king, that he judged it expedient to retire to the tower, where he expected that the barons would have followed him; but, perceiving that none of them came to him, he returned, of his own accord, into the city, and endeavoured to ſatisfy them, upon ſome of their grievances, in order to induce them to overlook what they apprehended to be the principal. He removed ſeveral ſheriffs, that abuſed their authority; and, the prince, his brother, one Richard Sward having ſhewn him ſome diſreſpect, upon his complaint, obtained that Sward ſhould be baniſhed the realm, for his inſolence. In a word, Henry, by reaſon of ſome changes at court, to gratify the barons, imagined that he had given them entire ſatisfaction; but, being deſirous of removing the biſhop of Chicheſter from the chancellorſhip, who had diſcharged that office with integrity, that prelate refuſed to reſign it; alledging, "That he was "placed in that exalted poſt by the parlia- "ment, and could not, therefore, quit it, un- "leſs by the ſame authority. 1

The emperor demands the empreſs's portion.

Though the parliament granted the king a conſiderable aid, for the marriage of the empreſs, his ſiſter, ambaſſadors from Frederick came to court, to demand the portion promiſed their maſter; and, if the people's reflections, as to the miſapplication of the money, were diſadvantageous to the king, thoſe that they had, ſhortly after, occaſion to make, about his inconſtancy, were equally prejudicial to his reputation; for, when they leaſt expected it, on a ſudden, he recalled to court Segrave and Rivaulx, and placed an entire confidence in them again, tho' he had, juſt before, commenced a proſecution againſt them, on the account of their miſdemeanours. The pernicious effects of their councils ſoon viſibly appeared; for they were ſcarce reſtored to their poſts, when, in a parliament, held, June the 14th, at Wincheſter, Henry, by vertue of a bull from Rome, would have annulled all his grants, during his minority, becauſe they wanted the pope's confirmation. This trifling pretence evidently proved, that he was extremely ſollicitous to enſlave himſelf ſtill more effectually to the court of Rome; but this proceeding, ſo directly inconſiſtent with the rights and prerogatives of the crown, ſo highly incenſed the parliament, that they refuſed to conſent to the revocation of theſe grants, principally becauſe of the bull, on which the king's motion was founded.

Henry dreads a war.

As Henry's conduct rendered him contemptible to his own ſubjects, foreign princes no longer conſidered him, as a formidable neighbour; and, on the contrary, his own knowledge of the ſentiments of the Engliſh obliged him to make uſe of all poſſible precautions, to avoid a war with his neighbours; tho' he choſe rather to give way to them, of his own accord, than involve himſelf in troubles; from which he found he could not free himſelf, with honour. This was the reaſon of his deſerting the duke of Bretagne; and, therefore, it was, that he tamely yielded to the pretenſions of the king of Scotland, who, this very year, demanded the county of Northumberland, in ſuch a haughty manner, as would have met with a mortifying repulſe, had he been concerned with any other prince . However, Henry meanly purchaſed a peace, with the annual penſion of eighty marks, which was ſettled on the king of Scotland; and he even went to York, on purpoſe to negotiate this diſhonourable treaty; under the pretence that he was afraid of the Scots entering into a league with the Welch, and that Gilbert Marſhall, earl of Pembroke,

In the interim, as the king daily perceived, that the affection of the great men was alienated from him, and that it would, therefore, be difficult to raiſe money, to fill his empty coffers, he fixed upon an expedient, which, he believed, would infallibly prove ſucceſsful; and he called a parliament, to which all the lords of the kingdom were ſummoned, in order to conſult about ſome important affairs of ſtate. However, as ſoon as the lords were aſſembled, a certain prieſt *, famous for his eloquence, repreſented to the lords, "That he was commanded to "acquaint them with the occaſion of their "meeting"; and, after a ſhort pauſe, he added, "That the king, having ſeriouſly conſidered "the abuſes crept into the government, was "exceedingly ſorry for contributing to the "ſame, by his negligence and miſmanagement; that he owned, with concern, that "he had employed imprudent and ſelfiſh miniſters, who, by evil counſels, had led him "to act, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms of "the realm; that, to repair, as far as was "poſſible, the evils occaſioned by his own indiſcretion, and the unfaithfulneſs of his miniſters, he was reſolved to be directed no "longer by the advice of foreigners, but to "commit the adminiſtration of publick affairs "to his native ſubjects; that he was confident, "they would exert themſelves, to prevent the "oppreſſion of the people, cauſe juſtice and "the laws to flouriſh, and reſtore the crown to "its former luſtre". The orator, having laid down theſe preliminaries, farther added, "That "the king deſired his parliament to conſider, "that the miſmanagement of the treaſury, "and the debts he had contracted, were not "the leaſt of the miſdemeanours chargeable "upon his miniſters; and, therefore, he was "in hopes, that they would, firſt of all, apply "a remedy to this, upon his aſſurance, that he "would conſent to any expedients, for the redreſs of other abuſes; that, on this account, "he demanded an aid proportionable to his "preſent exigences; and, to convince them of "his ſincerity, he previouſly conſented, that "commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to take "care that the money ſhould be diſpoſed of, "for the neceſſary uſes of the kingdom". Had not the parliament ſufficiently known, to what a height Henry could carry his diſſimulation, this plauſible harangue might have had a ſudden influence over them; whereas, as the caſe ſtood, all theſe ſubmiſſive expreſſions were loſt upon them. They replied, "That they had "often granted aids to the king, without ever "receiving, in return, the leaſt mark of his af"fection; and that, ſince his acceſſion to the "throne, his dominions were conſiderably di"miniſhed, tho' he had frequently exacted "from his ſubjects very large ſums, which were "profuſely expended upon foreigners." To this it was anſwered, "That his own and his "ſiſter's marriage had entirely exhauſted his "treaſure; but, if they would grant him a "13th part of their moveables, he promiſed "them, upon his honour, that he would never "oppreſs any baron of the realm." This promiſe was of no weight with the lords, who could not rely upon the king's word; and, therefore, they replied, "That he had miſapplied "the aid they had already granted him, for "the empreſs's marriage; and ſince he had "married, without conſulting their advice, he "might take what ſteps he pleaſed, to defray "the expences of his wedding". This anſwer convincing him, that he wanted a more powerful engine, to gain his point, he promiſed to re-eſtabliſh his father's charters; and, to ſhew that he was in earneſt, he ordered the execration, formerly denounced by cardinal Langton upon thoſe that violated the charters, to be publiſhed in all the churches. In a word, he added to his council three lords †, who were very acceptable to the nobility; and ſo many advances from a ſovereign, and eſpecially the re-eſtabliſhment of the charters, at length, procured the deſired effect. However, tho' the parliament, deceived by theſe pretended demonſtrations, at length, complied with his demand; yet they clogged their grant with two conditions, that were not very grateful to the king. Firſt, that, for the time to come, he ſhould reject the counſels of the foreigners, and adhere to thoſe of his ſubjects; and, ſecondly, that four knights ſhould be elected, in every county, to collect and ſecure the money in ſome monaſtery, that it might be reſtored to every one again, if the king ſhould break his word; yet no ſooner was the money raiſed, than Henry ſeized it and ſquander'd it away in idle expences, even in preſents to his favourite foreigners, who continued in his council, as before.

Prince Richard's remonſtrance.

Henry's conduct occaſioned ſuch loud murmurs, that prince Richard, his brother, judged it to be neceſſary to repreſent to him, in the ſtrongeſt terms, the danger to which it would infallibly expoſe him; but Henry was too much attached to the counſels of the foreigners, as they were moſt agreeable to his inclinations. Hiſtorians particularly take notice, that Simon de Montfort, ſon of the famous earl of Montfort, general of the Cruſade againſt the Albigenſes, was one of thoſe that had the chief aſcendant over the king; for this young nobleman, who, for ſome diſguſt, quitted the court of France, to make his fortune in England, in all reſpects, conformed himſelf to his humour; but I ſhall, hereafter, have frequeut occaſion to mention him, under the title of the earl of Leiceſter.

Lewellyn does homage to Henry.

Tho' Henry did not, in the leaſt, think of extending his dominions over the neighbouring counties, a fortunate juncture procured him, before the end of this year, an advantage, which was, in vain, ſought for by the moſt illuſtrious of his predeceſſors; for Lewellyn, prince of Wales,

1237. Wales, being old and infirm, and alſo perſecuted by his ſon Griffyn, for his own ſecurity, put himſelf under the king of England's protection, to whom he did homage for his dominions. This proceeding was the more remarkable, as he himſelf, as well as his anceſtors, had, all along, done all that was poſſible, to prevent this ſubjection; and if, at any time, force of arms obliged them to acknowledge this ſovereignty, they were always ready to diſown it, when they met with a proper opportunity.

A legate arrives. M. Paris.

In the mean while, the Engliſh had, unexpectedly, a freſh cauſe for uneaſineſs, by the arrival of Otho, the pope's legate, who was ſent to plunder them of what they had left, after the extortions of the king and his foreign miniſters; and the clergy, eſpecially, juſtly dreaded theſe extraordinary legateſhips, the ſole view of which was to extort their money.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury greatly blamed the king, for ſuffering the legate to come into the kingdom, without any apparent neceſſity, or the knowledge of the clergy and parliament; but his expoſtulations were ineffectual; for it was evident, that the king privately ſent for him, in order to ſcreen himſelf, under his protection, from the attempts of his ſubjects. The pope joyfully embraced this oportunity of ſending a legate into England, expecting that, by means of the king's authority, he might, with impunity, rifle the churches; and, thus, the king and the pope were united together, for the deſtruction of the Engliſh nation.

The legate propoſes to go into Scotland, but is repulſed by the king.

However, the legate's view was not confined to England; for he deſigned to drain Scotland alſo, which had, hitherto, been free from the exactions of the court of Rome; and he fancied he had met with a convenient opportunity, at an interview between the kings of England and Scotland, held on account of the latter's pretenſions. No ſooner was the conference ended, by which the king of Scotland obtained an augmentation of his penſion *, than the legate, who had found ſome excuſe to be preſent, repreſented to him, that he intended to go into Scotland, to regulate the affairs of the church. Alexander replied, that no legate had ever been ſent into Scotland, and there was ſtill leſs occaſion for any, in his reign; that he would not ſuffer ſuch an innovation, whilſt he wore the crown; and that if, notwithſtanding this declaration, he perſiſted in his reſolution, he warned him, before-hand, that he was not abſolute maſter of his own ſubjects, and, perhaps, ſhould be incapable of protecting him, if the people, fierce and untractable, ſhould fail in the reſpect due to his character. Theſe laſt words, probably, induced the legate to drop his deſign; and, therefore, he remained with the king of England, whom he found to be more pliant and obſequious.

The earldom of Cheſter is annexed to the crown.

John, late earl of Cheſter, dying, this year †, without iſſue, the king annexed that earldom, which enjoyed very great privileges, to the crown; and he paid, in money, to the earl's ſiſters what was due to them from thence, or allowed it to them out of other lands.

About this time, the emperor Frederick ſent Henry an account of the birth of a ſon, by Iſabella, his wife, named Henry; and that he deſigned the kingdom of Sicily for the new-born prince. 1237.

Matthew Paris concludes his relation of the occurences of this year, with a lively deſcription of the court of Rome, which is the more credible, as it is penn'd by a contemporary monk; tho' it is this very narrative, which has raiſed him ſo many enemies, who have called in queſtion his veracity.

1238. Simon de Montfort, perceiving that he had great intereſt at court, aſpired to nothing leſs than being married to Eleanor the counteſs of Pembroke, the king's ſiſter; but, forſeeing mighty obſtacles, he ſecured the affection of the princeſs, before-hand, and ſo contrived matters, that the king was obliged to cauſe them to be privately married in his own chapel. Prince Richard was highly incenſed at this marriage, and remonſtrated to the king, that he acted very imprudently, in marrying his ſiſter to a younger brother, whoſe fortune was not, in the leaſt, anſwerable to a royal family; but Henry excuſed his conduct, from the neceſſity of haſtening the marriage, adding, that there was now no remedy, as the nuptials were ſolemnized and the princeſs with child. However, Montfort, apprehenſive that prince Richard would attempt to annul his marriage, went to Rome, where he procured it to be confirmed by the pope; and then he returned to the king, who gave him a very gracious reception.

The barons enter into a league againſt the king. M. Paris.

Richard was alſo as much diſguſted, at the great influence the foreigners had over the king, as the reſt of the barons; and they all unanimouſly complained, that the king had violated his promiſes, and that all the money exacted from his ſubjects, under various pretences, was ſolely employed in inriching the queen's relations. As prince Richard ſeemed to be very zealous for the good of the publick, they imagined, that, under ſuch a leader, they ſhould, probably, obtain from the king the ſatisfaction they deſired, eſpecially with reſpect to the foreigners; and, therefore, chuſing him for their head, they entered into a league, and ſent the king word, that they intreated him to remember his engagements. This confederacy conſtrained Henry to put on a ſeeming moderation, which was his uſual practice, on ſuch preſſing occaſions; and he even appointed a day to give them a favourable anſwer; but they would not ſuffer themſelves again to be deceived by this outward mildneſs; and being ſenſible, that Henry's ſole view was to amuſe them, they came to London, on the day appointed, guarded with horſe and arms, in a readineſs to force the king to a compliance. Henry, as the caſe ſtood, did not make any reſiſtance, but aſſured them, that he really intended to redreſs all their grievances; and, for their farther ſatisfaction, he propoſed to ſubmit to the arbitration of a certain number of lords, the half of which to be named by himſelf. Upon this, commiſ-

The legate insulted by some Oxford scholars.

The legate did not meet with the same respect at Oxford, that was paid him at court; for, going there upon some business, tho' the university, in a body, received him with the deference due to his character, the insolence of his domesticks highly incensed some of the scholars, who, offering to enter his lodgings *, were uncivilly repulsed by the porter; and, whilst they were yet in the house, some of them found, in the kitchen, a poor Irish scholar begging for relief of the cook, who, instead of an alms, threw a ladle-ful of boiling water in his face; which so provoked a Welch student, who was a spectator of it, that, having a bow in his hand, he shot the cook dead on the spot, with an arrow. The legate, being informed of this tumult, was so terrified, that he retired into the tower of the church, where he remained till night, dreading that the insolence of the scholars would even extend to his own person; but, as soon as he could with safety, he set out for London, and complained to the king of this outrage, charging it upon the whole university, which he had now laid under an interdict. The king seemed to be extremely enraged, on the account of this insult; and he, forthwith, dispatched the earl of Warren to Oxford, with orders to seize the offenders †; but this affair, which, at first, made a great noise, was, at length, hushed, by the mediation of the bishops, who prevailed on the university to make all the submissions the legate required ‡.

A quarrel between the king and the pope.

Had this accident fell out, a little later, it would have been more prejudicial to England; for, soon after, the pope was so highly disgusted, because Henry supplied the emperor with a body of troops, that, for some time, the English ecclesiasticks were denied admittance at the court of Rome; which led the emperor to hope, that he should gain the king, his brother-in-law, over to his interest against the pope; and, accordingly, he directly sent ambassadors to him, who did all that was possible, to prevail on him to espouse his cause, but to no purpose. The king and the pope too much wanted each other's assistance, to continue long at variance; and, tho' his holiness considered himself, as lord paramount of England, he was not insensible, how averse the barons were to his pretensions, which the king's authority alone, was, in some measure, capable of supporting; and it was only thro' his countenance and connivance, that he could rifle the English clergy, with impunity. On the contrary, Henry saw, that none but the pope could support him against the barons; and that he could not fill the principal church-preferments with his creatures, as he intended, without the papal authority; and, therefore, it is no wonder, the king and pope were soon reconciled, for their mutual advantage. 1238.

The bishop of Winchester's death.

The bishop of Winchester's death, at this juncture, gave the king an opportunity of making the first overtures towards a reconciliation with the pope; for he ardently desired to procure that wealthy see for the bishop of Valence, his uncle, whom he pressingly recommended to the monks, the electors; tho', in spite of his sollicitations, they elected the bishop of Chichester, high chancellor of England. However, tho' Henry was disappointed, as to the monks, he promised himself success, another way, being confident that the pope was desirous of nothing more than his advances towards a reconciliation; and, in this belief, he dispatched ambassadors to Rome, who, after making some submissions, in their master's name, procured the election of the bishop of Winchester to be annulled by the papal authority **.

The late bishop of Winchester was justly esteemed to be one of the principal authors of the troubles of this reign; for it was he that advised the king to annul his father's charters, and invite foreigners into the kingdom, in order to entrust them with the administration of publick affairs; which articles perpetually occasioned discontents among the nobility, and, at length, were attended with fatal consequences. The death of this prelate was preceded by that of Johanna, queen of Scotland, Henry's sister.

A conspiracy against the king.

The manner, in which England was governed, gave such uneasiness to all, that it is no wonder, some of the people attempted to dispatch the king; and, this year, a villain ††, feigning madness, found means to get into his chamber, by night, with a design to kill him; but, being disappointed, by reason of Henry's passing that night in the queen's apartment, he was taken and punished, according to his desert. Before his death, he declared, that William de Maris was the author of the conspiracy, in which several others were engaged; tho', either thro' negligence, or some other reason, there was no enquiry made into this affair.

1239. Instances of Henry's inconstancy.

I shall introduce my account of the events of the year 1239, with the relation of some effects of Henry's capriciousness and inconstancy; for an insight into the genius and character of this prince is absolutely necessary, to form a just idea of the springs and causes of the transactions in this reign. As his love and hatred were entirely directed by the dictates of those who had the ascendant over him, it is not so surprizing, that he so often altered his inclina-

1239. tions and maxims. I have already obſerved, that, after he had perſecuted the earl of Pembroke, he reſtored the office of earl-marſhal to Gilbert, his brother; but Gilbert was extremely aſtoniſhed to find, that, when he, one day, came to wait upon the king, he was, contrary to cuſtom, denied admittance. He made a complaint to the king himſelf, by the means of one of his friends, who deſired him to ſhew the reaſon, why ſuch an affront was offered to a lord of ſo great diſtinction; and Henry anſwered, It was becauſe Richard, the earl's brother, was a traytor, and perſiſted in his treaſon, to the day of his death; adding that he repented of giving him the office of earl-marſhal, which, however, he could recall, whenever he pleaſed. This reply obliged the earl to retire from court into the north of England, for his ſecurity from the plots of his enemies, who had prejudiced the king againſt him.

Henry, likewiſe, was ſo far from reſenting Simon de Montfort's affront to the royal family, that he continued him in his favour, and, at laſt, made him earl of Leiceſter; and yet, a few days after he had conferred this honour upon him, he publickly charged him with debauching his ſiſter, and bribing the pope, to confirm his marriage; whereas the proper ſeaſon, to proſecute him for this action, was elapſed, and he had cauſed the nuptials to be celebrated, in his preſence, and in his own chapel. However, the earl, departed, that very day, with his lady for France, where he remained, till the king's indignation was appeaſed.

I ſhall only preſent the reader with another inſtance of the capricious conduct of this monarch, of which there are evident proofs, in almoſt all the actions of his life. The preceding year, he diſobliged the pope, by ſending ſuccours to the emperor againſt him; but, when Frederick, a few months after, was ſolemnly excommunicated, he ordered the bull of excommunication to be publiſhed in all the churches of his kingdom; was which the more ſurprizing, becauſe, as brother-in-law to the emperor, he might have plauſibly excuſed himſelf, or, at leaſt; have ſhewn, by his tardineſs, that it was done with reluctance.

The birth of prince Edward.

The ſame year, the queen was delivered of a prince, named Edward; who, in proceſs of time, ſucceeding his father, proved one of the moſt illuſtrious monarchs that ever ſate on the Engliſh throne.

The legate's exactions. M. Paris.

The daily exactions of Otho, the legate, conſtrained the biſhops, at length, to complain to the pope, who had twice recalled him, by his letters; tho' he was ſtill, notwithſtanding, detained by the king. At laſt, the prelates, tired with the perpetual and unreaſonable demands of the cardinal upon the clergy, reſolved to have a meeting, to conſult about a remedy for this evil; and they had ſcarce begun to treat of their affairs, when the legate, coming into the aſſembly, demanded an aid for the preſſing occaſions of the holy ſee; which ſo highly incenſed them, that, to prevent any farther ſollicitations, they broke up immediately, tho' this peremptory denial only cauſed him to apply to the religious houſes, who were forced to ſupply what was refuſed by the biſhops.

1239. The legate's new attempt upon Scotland. M. Paris.

The legate, having, with impunity, extorted large ſums from England, in ſpite of the repulſe he had already received, determined to act the ſame part in Scotland; and, with this view, he departed, attended by ſome Engliſh barons, without ſo much as asking, beforehand, the king of Scotland's conſent. Upon his arrival on the borders, he was met by the king, not out of reſpect, but to hinder his progreſs; but, tho' this oppoſition was no more than what he might reaſonably have expected, he was ſo offended at it, that, in his paſſion, he threatened Alexander, who, by his anſwer, convinced him, that he deſpiſed his menaces; but the Engliſh lords, at length, tho' with extreme difficulty, prevailed with the king of Scotland, to grant the legate his licenſe, for this one time, to enter into his kingdom; but, after all, Alexander would not give his conſent, unleſs the legate acknowledged, under his hand and ſeal, that this was done out of a particular condeſcenſion to his perſon; and that it ſhould not, hereafter, be advanced, as a precedent. Thus, all obſtacles being removed, the legate proceeded to Edinburgh; where he exacted money from the clergy, which was the ſole deſign of his journey.

Henry proſecutes afreſh Hubert de Burgh.

If the Engliſh clergy laboured under the oppreſſions of an avaricious cardinal, the reſt of the king's ſubjects were in no better circumſtances; for Henry embraced every opportunity of extorting money from private perſons, and by all poſſible means. Hubert de Burgh, whom he had left unmoleſted, for ſome years, was proſecuted afreſh, for the very crimes of which he had formerly been accuſed, and which were thought to be forgotten; and, being ſolemnly tried, before an aſſembly of the barons, it is ſaid, that he vindicated his innocence, by inconteſtable proofs. However, as the king was very active, in ſolliciting a ſentence againſt him, he judged it moſt expedient to compound this affair; and, accordingly, he reſigned four of his beſt eſtates to the king, which prevailed on him to deſiſt from his intentions.

1240. The great exactions of the king and pope. M. Paris.

I find myſelf under a neceſſity of frequently returning to the ſame ſubject, viz. the exactions of the king and court of Rome, becauſe they are the principal occurrences of this reign, at leaſt, as to the time we are now ſpeaking of; and tho' theſe things ſeem to be of no conſequence, in themſelves, they are of uſe to diſcover the true ſtate of the kingdom, which was inceſſantly pillaged, either by the king, or the pope. It is extremely ſurprizing, that the Engliſh ſhould ſo patiently bear ſuch immoderate extortions, under ſo weak a prince as Henry, who was deſtitute of all aſſiſtance, except that of the court of Rome; but the calamities of the late reign, on this very account, led them to dread the leaſt apprehenſions of involving the kingdom in the like confuſion. However, it appears, that the biſhops came to a reſolution of taking ſome meaſures, to ſcreen themſelves from theſe oppreſſions, in a ſynod convened at London, for that purpoſe; and they openly complained, that the king reſerved,

1240. for his own uſe, all the vacant benefices, and obſtructed all elections, till ſuch were choſen as were agreeable to his inclination. They even excommunicated the authors of theſe pernicious counſels; tho' Henry deſpiſed their complaints, being aſſured of the pope's protection; to whom, in return, he ſhewed ſuch a ſervile deference, as ſurpaſſes all imagination. When the emperor ſent ambaſſadors, to remonſtrate about his cauſing the ſentence of excommunication to be publiſhed againſt him, he moſt ſhamefully replied, that, being the pope's vaſſal, he could not diſpenſe with ſubmiſſion to his authority; and, in the mean time, the legate continued his exactions. Having extorted immenſe ſums from the churches and monaſteries, under a thouſand various pretences, he demonſtrated, by a new ſort of oppreſſion, how little moderation the court of Rome obſerved, with reſpect to the Engliſh; for he ordered it to be publiſhed, in all parts of the kingdom, that he was authorized to abſolve, from their vow, all that had taken the croſs, and even to oblige them to compound for their abſolution, by money, under pain of excommunication.

The pope's unreaſonable demands from the clergy.

But this was nothing, in compariſon of what the legate, ſoon after, demanded of the clergy; for, under colour of maintaining the peace of the church, againſt the pretended aſſaults of the emperor, the pope required, of all the Engliſh eccleſiaſticks, a fifth part of their goods; and the king did all that was poſſible, to promote this exaction. The biſhops, at firſt, not only refuſed to comply with the legate's demands, but even to contribute any thing, on the preſent occaſion; but, at length, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, dreading the effects of the pope's imperious temper, conſented to give, in lieu of a fifth of his goods, a fifth part of his rents, and the reſt copied after his example. However, the legate, for a conſiderable while, rejected an offer ſo diſproportionate to his demands, as if the buſineſs had been to give the clergy his maſter's own goods; tho' this was the laſt money the pope ever received from the archbiſhop of Canterbury; who, apprehending it impoſſible to redreſs the grievances daily introduced, into the church as well as the ſtate, retired into France, to the monaſtery of Pontigniac, where he died, the ſame year; and he was canonized by the council of Lyons, ſeveral years after his deceaſe.

The pope nominates 300 Italians to the vacant benefices.

The court of Rome, upon the archbiſhop's retreat, had no farther regard for the Engliſh clergy; for this impoſition was ſcarce levied, when one Peter Roſſi *, the pope's nuncio, arrived with orders to all the biſhops and patrons of livings, to preſer to thoſe, that were vacant, 300 Italians, nominated by the pope, with an expreſs prohibition to confer any benefice, till theſe were provided for; but the principal end of his coming was to extort money from the monaſteries, under the pretence that his holineſs wanted an extraordinary ſupply, to protect the church againſt her enemies. The pope had, hitherto, acted with authority; but, at preſent, he judged it more expedient to make uſe of art and policy; and, accordingly, the nuncio, viſiting all the religious houſes, attempted, both by promiſes and threatenings, to prevail on every abbot, in particular, to aſſiſt the pope in his preſſing neceſſities. He repreſented to them, that ſuch an abbot had promiſed ſuch a ſum; and that, therefore, it would be diſhonourable, and, perhaps, of dangerous conſequence, not to imitate ſo good an example. Having procured promiſſory notes, under ſome of their hands, he made uſe of them, to induce the reſt to the ſame compliance, enjoining them all to ſecrecy, on pain of excommunication; but the abbot of St. Edmundsbury and Battle complained of theſe unuſual and arbitrary proceedings to the king, even in the legate's preſence; tho' Henry gave them a very diſagreeable reception, and offered the legate one of his caſtles to impriſon them. This ſtratagem being detected, the nuncio durſt not proceed any farther, in the execution of his deſign; but the legate, once more, convened the clergy, in order to obtain a freſh ſupply, even under the pretence of the war with the emperor. To this new demand the clergy replied, that as the emperor was only excommunicated by the pope, and not by the church, they would not engage in the quarrel; that they were not in a condition to anſwer all the pope's exactions; and that, if they were able, they would no longer ſuffer the church of England to be, thus, tributary to the ſee of Rome. The legate, during his long reſidence in England, had ſufficiently diſcovered, that it was imprudent to exaſperate the Engliſh too much, in their preſent diſpoſition, with regard to the pope; yet, at laſt, by dividing the clergy, in which the king effectually promoted his deſign, by promiſing ſome of them penſions and preferments, and deterring others by menaces, he was ſo ſucceſsful, that each of them complied, ſingly, to what they had refuſed, in a body; and the moſt obſtinate were forced to fall in with the majority.

Henry ſends juſtices all over England to extort money.

Whilſt the clergy were, thus, expoſed to the oppreſſions of the court of Rome, the king ſent itinerant juſtices, into all the counties of the kingdom, under the pretence of redreſſing the grievances of the people; but it ſoon appeared, that this was only a means contrived, on purpoſe, to diſtreſs ſeveral private perſons, by fines and confiſcations, which brought in very conſiderable ſums to his treaſury †.

He recalls the earls of Leiceſter and Pembroke.

Such was the natural fickleneſs of Henry's temper, that he recalled, this year, the earl of Leiceſter, who, ſoon after, went to the Holy Land, tho' he did not continue there long; and Gilbert, earl of Pembroke, was alſo reſtored to his favour, through the powerful mediation of prince Richard; which prince, having, the preceding year, taken the croſs, departed for Jeruſalem, being accompanied by the earl of Salisbury and ſeveral other lords.

* Petrus Rubeus. M. Paris.

† This year, Henry removed Simon the Norman and Geoffrey the Templar, who were joint commiſſioners of the great-ſeal, for refuſing to affix it to a grant, made by the king to Thomas earl of Flanders, of a toll of four-pence upon every bag of wooll, brought from England into his dominions; and the ſeal was given to Richard, abbot of Eveſham. M. Paris.

Towards

1240. Towards the end of this year, the earl of Flanders, coming to London, did the king homage, for an annual penſion of 500 marks; tho' ſome queſtion, whether it was uſual, in thoſe days, to grant penſions, in fee, to be held by military ſervice and homage; but the truth of this is evident from the agreements between the kings of England and ſeveral foreign princes, the tenor of which may be ſeen, in the Collection of Publick Acts *.

1241. The legate is recalled. In the beginning of the year 1241, England was, at length, delivered from Otho, the legate, who was recalled, by an expreſs order from Rome; and, tho' he had, hitherto, been continued, thro' Henry's interceſſion, he did not think it adviſeable to deſire him to interpoſe in his behalf, on the preſent occaſion. He knew, that the pope was ſeized by a diſtemper, which, in all probability, would prove mortal; and, therefore, he did not judge it expedient to remain in England, until the arrival of the news of his death; for he had reaſon to fear, that, during the vacancy of the holy ſee, the vaſt ſums, he had amaſs'd together, might be ſeized on by the king, as they were levied in his dominions. It is ſaid, that he carried off more money than he left to the churches and monaſteries; and, Gregory IX. dying, preſently after, the emperor immediately ſent Henry an account of it, that he might ſtop what was collected, in his kingdom for the deceaſed pope; but Otho, however, had the misfortune, in his return to Italy, of falling into the hands of ſome of the emperor's people, who ſtripp'd him of all his riches; and, thus, the money, that this cardinal exacted from the Engliſh, under the pretence of employing it againſt the emperor, turned, at the long-run, to the emperor's advantage.

Schiſm after Gregory's death. The death of Gregory IX. cauſed a ſchiſm, which laſted till the enſuing year; and, during this time, Roſſi and Supine, whom the legate left in England, as nuncio's, continued their extortions, without moderation or juſtice. Supine, being gone to Ireland, with the king's leave, exacted from the clergy there 1500 marks, a very large ſum, at that time, for a country where money was extremely ſcarce; inſomuch that the death of Gregory IX. brought but little relief to the Engliſh, though they thought they had reaſon to rejoice, as at a ſignal deliverance, ſince no pope had ever carried his exactions to that heighth. The following inſtance clearly proves what he was capable of performing; for, ſome time before his death, he cauſed to be propoſed to the abbot of Peterborough, that, if he would give him, under a fictitious name, one of the monaſtery's livings, of 200 pounds a year, he would farm it out to him, at an 100, and ſo they ſhould ſhare the benefice between them; but the abbot was too honeſt, to agree to ſuch a bargain. He even acquainted the king with it, who, being made ſenſible of the ill conſequences, prevented, by his authority, the abbot from being forced to a compliance. Had the pope ſucceeded, in this deſign, all the benefices in England would ſoon have been in the hands of the pope, biſhops, and abbots; at leaſt, it is to be preſumed, Gregory would not have been contented with that, but deſigned it only, as an eſſay of a more general project. 1241.

The king extorts money from the Jews. The clergy were not the only ſufferers in England; for the people were no leſs expoſed to the king's oppreſſions, than the clergy to the pope's. The Jews, in particular, were, every now and then, ſeverely treated; and it was from them, that the king uſually raiſed money, to defray his extraordinary expences. Thomas earl of Savoy, the queen's uncle, arriving, this year, in England, the king received him with ſuch magnificence, that, in order to provide money for this extraordinary charge, he forced the Jews to preſent him with 20,000 marks, on pain of being expelled the kingdom.

Henry procures the queen's brother to be archbiſhop. M. Paris. The king was ſo deſirous of enriching the queen's relations, that he was never weary of ſhewing them marks of his affection; and, the archbiſhop of Canterbury dying, the laſt year, as was obſerved, Henry uſed ſo many inſtances, and other leſs lawful means, that he procured Boniface, the queen's brother, to be elected to the archiepiſcopal ſee. Thus, was ſeen, at the head of the church of England, a young foreigner, ignorant of the laws, cuſtoms and language of the kingdom, and conſequently incapable of duly diſcharging the functions of that dignity.

The earl of Pembroke's death. Gilbert, earl of Pembroke, dying this year, Walter, his brother, demanded of the king the inveſtiture of the office of earl-marſhal, hereditary in their family. Henry, at firſt, in a great paſſion, denied him, alledging, that his two brother's were traitors and rebels; and that he himſelf was preſent at a tournament, contrary to his commands; yet this lord, making the queen his friend, obtained, at length, what he demanded.

The affairs of Wales. The affairs of the Welch employed the king, a conſiderable part of this year. Lewellyn, prince of Wales, departing this life, in a very advanced age, left two ſons, David and Griffin, who were to ſhare his inheritance; but David not only ſeized the whole, but detained his brother in priſon. Though, ever ſince the homage voluntarily paid by Lewellyn, Henry might juſtly conſider Wales, as a fief of the crown, he would not, perhaps, have concerned himſelf in this affair, had he not been induced by Griffin's wife; for this princeſs, imploring his protection, promiſed him, in her husband's name, a preſent of 600 marks, and an annual tribute of 300, if he would free that prince out of priſon, and put him in poſſeſſion of his right. Henry, accepting this propoſal, required David to releaſe the priſoner, and reſtore him his part of the inheritance; threatening him, in caſe of refuſal, with a fierce war, till he ſhould be reduced to obedience. David, not being able to reſiſt, at a time when many of his ſubjects were in his brother's intereſt, took, as he thought, a ſurer courſe than

As Henry had only a view to his own advantage, in granting his protection to Griffin, he readily, from being Griffin's protector, turned his enemy; and, leſt that prince ſhould eſcape, he undertook to ſee him ſafely confined in the tower of London. Thus it was, that this prince made no conſcience of ſelling his protection to the two oppoſite parties, without regarding the juſtice of either ſide, or his prior engagements.

Death of the empreſs and Eleanor of Bretagne. M. Weſt.

The ſame year, the empreſs Iſabella, the king's ſiſter, died in child-bed; and her death was ſoon followed by that of Eleanor of Bretagne, who had been a priſoner, in Briſtol-caſtle, 40 years; tho' ſhe could never be brought to recede, in the leaſt, from her pretenſions, in order to obtain ſome favour, which ſhe could not expect, upon any other terms *.

Occaſion of a freſh war. M. Paris.

Henry, ſhortly after, was engaged in a vexatious affair; of which he got clear, as uſual, with diſhonour, and forfeited entirely the little eſteem his ſubjects had ſtill left for him. Before prince Richard's departure to the Holy Land, he inveſted him with the earldom of Poictou; though France was poſſeſſed of a conſiderable part of it, ſince the conqueſts of Philip Auguſtus. This province being, thus, divided between the two crowns, Lewis thought he had alſo a right to put his brother, Alphonſo, in poſſeſſion of it; which proved the occaſion of a war between the two monarchs.

1242. The earl of Marche engages Henry to carry the war into Poictou. M. Paris.

Henry, being extremely incenſed at Lewis's inveſting the prince, his brother, with Poictou, determined to be revenged; and the more, as the queen, his mother, was concerned. This princeſs, who, after the death of king John, eſpouſed the earl of Marche, her firſt lover, behaved with the ſame haughtineſs, ſhe had aſſumed, whilſt queen of England. As the territories of the earl, her ſpouſe, were in that part of Poictou, poſſeſſed by France, he had, all along, done homage to Lewis; but, when Alphonſo became earl of Poictou, ſhe could not bear to ſee her husband kneel to a brother of the king of France; tho' this was certainly a miſtaken pride, ſince there was a wide difference between the ſovereign and the vaſſal. However, ſhe ſollicited her husband, with ſo much importunity, that, at length, ſhe prevailed on him to refuſe homage to prince Alphonſo, though he had now poſitively promiſed to perform it; and this refuſal was even accompanied with ſome offenſive words; which, enraging the king of France, led him to reſolve to chaſtiſe the earl's inſolence. In the interim, the earl, maintaining what he had done, implored the protection of the king of England; and he repreſented to him, it would be very eaſy to expel the French out of all Poictou; and, in caſe he would bear the expence of the war, that province would ſupply him with troops ſufficient for a numerous army. Henry, pleaſed with theſe hopes, ſummoned a parliament, and demanded a ſubſidy anſwerable to the intended expedition; but, inſtead of obtaining it, he was ſharply upbraided, for laviſhing away his ſettled revenues, and the ſums daily exacted from his ſubjects by diſhonourable means. They likewiſe told him, that, the truce with France not being yet expired, the parliament was unwilling to incur the guilt of the violation of his oath; and, in a word, complaints were made of the breach of his promiſe, with reſpect to the two charters, which he had ſo often ſworn to obſerve. 1242.

Henry raiſes money for the war. M. Paris.

Theſe reproaches were the more mortifying, as the king had nothing to reply, in his own vindication; yet he, perſiſting in his deſign, extorted what he could from private perſons, by way of gift or loan, or other means; in which employment, he ſpent the whole winter. After this, he ſummoned all the military tenants of the crown, to meet him at Portſmouth, on a day appointed; but, inſtead of horſe and arms, he ordered them to bring each a ſum of money, depending upon the earl of Marche's words, that he ſhould find men enough in Poictou. As ſoon as the ſeaſon was fair, he embarqued at Portſmouth, attended by the queen, his mother, and prince Richard, his brother, newly arrived from the Holy Land; and, upon his departure, he committed the regency to the archbiſhop of York. He landed in Saintonge; where he was joined by ſome Poictevin noblemen. The earl of Marche met him alſo, but ſo thinly attended, that it was viſible, he was not in a condition to perform his promiſe; and, when an army came to be raiſed in thoſe parts, the officers and ſoldiers liſted ſo ſlowly, under the Engliſh banners, that it was eaſy to foreſee the enterprize would not prove ſucceſsful. In the mean while, the king of France, advancing with a powerful army, beſieged Fontenay, one of the ſtrongeſt places in Poictou; and, during this ſiege, Henry ſent ambaſſadors to him, to demand all that Philip Auguſtus had taken from the Engliſh, and Lewis VIII. had promiſed to reſtore; and, in caſe of refuſal, to declare war againſt him. Lewis, who was ſainted after his deceaſe, being of a tender conſcience, could hardly ſatisfy his ſcruples, on account of his father's oath to reſtore theſe provinces. In this diſpoſition, he gave the Engliſh ambaſſadors an honourable reception, and anſwered them, with great moderation, that he was aſtoniſhed, that the king, their maſter, could break a truce, confirmed by a ſolemn oath; and, to demonſtrate his ſincere deſire to preſerve a good underſtanding between them, he offered to renew the truce, for three years. In fine, he conſented to deliver up part of Poictou and Normandy, provided Henry would withdraw his protection from his rebellious vaſſals; who unreaſonably refuſed to pay him the obedience they owed. Theſe propoſals were as advantageous, as Henry could have wiſhed them to be; and, by accepting them, he might have procured, for the earl of Marche, an honourable accommodation, which Lewis, in his preſent temper of mind, doubtleſs, would not have refuſed; but, being guided by the violent counſels of the queen, his mother, and the earl of Marche, he ſcornfully re-

1242. jected these offers. Some days after, he rashly sent two knights hospitallers to defy Lewis, though he was in no condition to support his haughtiness; but, in spite of this bravado, Lewis, who could hardly conquer his scruples, made overtures for a peace. However, at length, means were found to remove his uneasiness, by representing to him, that his father's oath was no farther obliging, than whilst the king of England should perform, on his part, what he had promised; that the said prince had sworn not to exact any ransom from the prisoners, nor to treat ill such of the English as adhered to France; that he had violated both these articles, and thus had rendered void the engagements of the other party. In all probability, Lewis, notwithstanding his piety, sought not to ease his conscience entirely, but only to appease it, for the present, since he was prevailed upon by so weak a pretence. However that be, he continued the siege, and took the city, by storm; and, natural son of the earl of Marche being taken prisoner with 400 knights, Lewis was advised to put them all to death; but he replied, the son could not help obeying his father, and the rest their sovereign; and, therefore, it was unreasonable that the innocent should be punished for the guilty. This first success gained Lewis the possession of several places, in that part of Poictou belonging to the English, Henry being unable to stop his progress; who went and encamped near Taillebourg, on the banks of the Charente, the river being between him and the enemy. Lewis, receiving intelligence of it, posted himself, on the other side of the river; and, with his engines and cross-bow-men, he forced the English to remove 2000 paces farther; which retreat gave him an opportunity of easily becoming master of Taillebourg-bridge, the only way for him to come at the English. As the day was too far spent, to pass his whole army, he was contented with guarding the bridge, resolving to attack the enemy, by break of day. Henry, who was not in a condition to stand a battle, took the advantage of the night to retire; whilst prince Richard, his brother, attempted to amuse the French with proposals of a truce; tho' he could obtain no longer, than the rest of that night. As soon as it was expired, Lewis pursued the English; and, overtaking their rear, made them suffer some loss. This, at least, is the idea the English historians give of this action, which the French represent, as much more considerable; but, on such occasions, it is extremely difficult to discover the truth exactly, by reason of the partiality of the historians. However, it is highly probable, that this affair was otherwise than it is related by the English, since the French give a particular account of this battle, at which, they say, both the kings were present; that Lewis was in great danger; and that 4000 English were made prisoners of war. Besides, it is certain, the king of England fled, as far as Xaintes, where he was followed by Lewis; and that the earl of Marche, making a sally, was the occasion of the two kings coming to a second engagement, no less fatal to the English than the former; but Henry, apprehensive of being blocked up in Xaintes, fled to Blaye, and afterwards retired to Bourdeaux. 1242.

Lewis takes Fontenay.

The king of France's extraordinary successes, in this war, struck a terror into the earl of Marche; and, perceiving that the king of England was not able to protect him, he resolved, though a little too late, to provide for his security; and, accordingly, he sent his eldest son to the king of France, to try to obtain some tolerable terms. The favourable reception, Lewis gave the young lord, induced the father to go to his camp, with his wife and children, and throw himself entirely upon his mercy; and Lewis, who was extremely generous, very readily pardoned him, though he was sufficiently convinced, that the countess-queen had suborned people to poison him; and he was satisfied with having three of their castles, to secure their fidelity. In all probability, he would have enlarged his conquests upon the king of England, if the plague, which arose in his army, and a distemper which himself was seized with, had not prevented him from carrying his arms, as far as Bourdeaux; and, perhaps, some remains of his former scruples led him to consent to a five years truce.

The earl of Marche enters into a treaty with Lewis.

Tho' Henry had, now, no business in France, he pass'd the winter, at Bourdeaux; where he lavished away the remains of his treasure in entertainments and diversions, as if he had been victorious, in the late campaign. In the mean time, his troops were destitute of all things, the Gascoigns being unwilling to maintain an English army, in time of peace, and without any necessity; insomuch that the king was obliged to send, for cloaths and provisions for the soldiers, to the archbishop of York, his regent in England; ordering him, at the same time, to confiscate the estates of some English barons, who had retired, without license. The first of these orders was put in execution; but the regent prudently declined meddling with the last, lest it should occasion commotions in the kingdom, during Henry's absence. This first supply was scarce received, before the king sent fresh orders to the regent, to demand of the Cistercians one year's profit of their wooll; but the abbots, by the excuses they made, evidently shewed, they would not consent to it, without force, which the archbishop did not care to use. In fine, the archbishop, continually pressed to send money to Bourdeaux, obtained of the parliament a scutage of 20 shillings upon every knight's fee; which might have supplied the king's present necessities, had it been managed with discretion. 1243.

Henry, passing the winter at Bourdeaux, sends for money from England. M. West.

In the interim, Henry, continuing still at Bourdeaux with his army, when his coffers were empty, demanded fresh supplies of the regent, who was at a loss to answer all his extravagant demands; and the only means left was to borrow money, in the king's name, of such private persons, as were reputed to be rich; which caused great murmurings among the people, the constant effect of such arbitrary proceedings. The regent, however, exposed himself to these complaints, expecting, by that means, to draw the king from Bourdeaux; and he 1243. he even ſent him word, that there was no poſſibility of raiſing any more money, and, therefore, it was high time for him to think of returning to England. This declaration obliged the king, in good earneſt, to prepare for his departure; and, as ſoon as he came to a reſolution, he ſent orders to all the barons of England to be ready to receive him at Portſmouth, who obeyed; but he made them wait ſo long, that they were highly diſguſted, on the account of the expence they were at, during their ſtay. Before he left Bourdeaux, Henry ratified the five years truce with France; by which, beſides Lewis's conqueſts, Henry was obliged to pay him, annually, 5000 l. ſterling. This was the reſult of this ill-concerted, and ſtill worſe managed expedition; yet, tho' he ought rather to have been aſhamed of the ill ſucceſs of his late expedition, he would be received at London, with extraordinary pomp, as if it was poſſible, by this outward ſplendor, to make his ſubjects believe, that he was returned victorious. All the money that was ſent him being ſpent, he was no ſooner at London, than he quarrelled with the Jews; who, to appeaſe him, were conſtrained to give him a very conſiderable ſum; of which, Aaron, a Jew of York, paid no leſs than four marks of gold, and 4000 of ſilver.

The marriage of prince Richard.

Henry was not long in England, before he expended what he had exacted from the Jews; and the arrival of the counteſs of Provence, his mother-in-law, who came to celebrate the nuptials of her daughter, Cincia, with prince Richard, furniſhed him with an opportunity to conſume a larger ſum; for the wedding-dinner, alone, conſiſted, as it is ſaid, of 30,000 diſhes.

Innocent IV, pope.

The holy ſee, having been vacant, 18 months, was filled, this year, by cardinal Senebaldo of Genoa, who aſſumed the name of Innocent IV. and he was no ſooner conſecrated, than he confirmed the excommunication denounced upon the emperor *.

* 1244. The parliament refuſe the king an aid.

Since Henry's entering upon the adminiſtration of the government, every year, he demanded money of the parliament; and, tho', at firſt, he generally met with a denial, at length, the parliament was gained by the king's aſſurances, that he would cauſe his father's charters to be punctually obſerved. He was deſirous of uſing the ſame artifice, now; but the nobility and clergy were ſo ſtrictly united, that he deſpaired of ſucceſs; and he even perceived, that it was dangerous to ſuffer them to be aſſembled too long, being ſenſible, that they were taking meaſures to deprive him of the adminiſtration of affairs, which they deſigned to commit to four of their own body, who were to tranſact every thing, in his name. Such a project, of courſe, alarming him, he promiſed, in general, to reform what was amiſs; and, after ſome fruitleſs endeavours to divide them, he prorogued the parliament.

The pope vexes the clergy.

In the interim, the new pope, ſent into England one Martin, as his nuncio, to exact money from the clergy, who was empowered to puniſh ſuch as diſputed his authority; who executed his orders, with ſo much rigour, 1244. that, for the leaſt trifle, he ſuſpended prieſts, abbots, and even the biſhops; which render'd him extremely odious both to the clergy and laity, eſpecially, when he produced the pope's letter to demand an extraordinary aid, to diſcharge the debts contracted by Gregory IX, in his wars with the emperor; alledging that, this war being undertaken, in defence of the catholick faith, and St. Peter's patrimony, all eccleſiaſticks, and particularly the Engliſh, were obliged to contribute to the expence. Before the clergy came to any reſolution, the king reaſſembled the parliament, and renewed his demand of an aid; but, as he knew he ſhould obtain nothing, unleſs he gave the barons ſatisfaction, with reſpect to their grievances, he promiſed, with an oath, to ſee the two charters ſtrictly put in execution; and he even conſented, that the biſhops ſhould excommunicate him, if he violated his oath. Upon theſe aſſurances, the parliament granted him 20 ſhillings, for every knight's fee; but, as no preſſing neceſſity could be pretended for this extraordinary ſubſidy, it was ſaid, the money ſhould be expended in the marriage of his eldeſt daughter, tho' it was notorious, that it was deſigned for other uſes.

The nuncio, to no purpoſe, ſollicits the clergy.

When the nuncio found, that the parliament had complied with the king, he preſſed the biſhops and abbots to ſhew the ſame condeſcenſion to their ſpiritual, as the parliament had done to their temporal father; who deſpiſed this frivolous reaſon, and advanced much ſtronger arguments, to juſtify their refuſal. The ſteadineſs of the prelates obliged the nuncio, at length, to deſiſt; yet he ſtill continued, by vertue of the commiſſion he received from the pope, to diſpoſe of the vacant benefices, in a moſt ſcandalous manner †.

Affairs of the Welch.

In the interim, an accident happened, which broke the ſtrict underſtanding between the king and the prince of Wales, ever ſince their agreement; for Griffin, who was confined in the tower of London, attempting to eſcape out of the priſon-window, fell into the ditch and broke his neck. Whilſt he was alive, his brother David durſt not diſpleaſe the king, leſt he ſhould ſupport him in his pretenſions; but, upon his deceaſe, he made an irruption into the borders of England, under colour of being revenged, for certain breaches of the late treaty. As the king took no care to repel this inſult, the Engliſh, that inhabited thoſe parts, armed themſelves, in defence of their country; but, being too weak, and ill-conducted, they were continually defeated.

The king of Scotland refuſes to do homage to Henry.

At the ſame time, Alexander II, king of Scotland, having lately married a French lady, acquainted Henry, that he would do him homage no longer, for the lands he held of the crown of England. How little inclined ſoever Henry was to war, he could not help, on this occaſion, exerting himſelf, ſo greatly were the Engliſh exaſperated at this bravado; and, therefore, he ſummoned all the vaſſals of the 1244. crown to meet him at Newcaſtle, the rendezvouz of the army deſigned againſt Scotland. When Alexander reſolved to refuſe the homage due to Henry, he did not imagine, that it would have involved him in a war; for, being no ſtranger to Henry's weakneſs and irreſolution, he expected, that the difference would be decided, as formerly, by a negotiation, which might turn to his advantage; but, when he perceived, that the Engliſh army were ready to enter his territories, he became more ſubmiſſive, and ſent ambaſſadors to Newcaſtle, to ſue for peace. Henry, notwithſtanding his ſeeming reſolution to puſh the war, with vigour, readily conſented to a treaty, which furniſhed him with an excuſe to lay down his arms; and Alexander ſubmitted to the homage, uſually paid by himſelf and his anceſtors; and, an union between the two monarchs being perfectly reſtored, before they parted, a marriage was agreed upon between Alexander's eldeſt ſon, of the ſame name with himſelf, and Margaret, Henry's eldeſt daughter.

The prince of Wales offers to become the pope's vaſſal. M. Weſt.

The army, raiſed for the war with Scotland, not having occaſion to act, the king was adviſed to employ it, to reduce the prince of Wales to obedience; but, inſtead of improving ſo favourable a juncture, he diſmiſſed the troops, being impatient to call a parliament, in order to demand an aid of money; tho' he could not obtain it. The prince of Wales ſo little queſtioned Henry's uſing the means he had in his power, to chaſtiſe him, that, to free himſelf from the imagined danger, he applied to the pope, repreſenting to him, that he was compelled to declare himſelf a vaſſal and tributary to the king of England; and, therefore, he intreated the pope to annul the treaty, offering to become a vaſſal to the holy ſee, and to pay him the annual tribute of 500 marks. Innocent IV, being no leſs avaricious than his predeceſſors, was pleaſed with this propoſal; yet, to ſhew, that he did not pretend to decide the matter, without a hearing of the cauſe, he empowered two Welch abbots to take informations, concerning the pretended conſtraint alledged by their prince; and he alſo commiſſioned them to annul the treaty, and abſolve the prince of Wales from his oath, if it ſhould appear, that he had been really compelled. It was eaſy to foreſee the ſentence of the judges; for the two abbots, proud of their power, inſolently ſummoned the king of England to appear before them, as if he had been a private perſon and ſubject to their juriſdiction. This proceeding extremely incenſed the king and his council, as well as the whole nation; and, now, they were ſorry, that the army was diſbanded, but, as there was no remedy, it was reſolved, another ſhould inſtantly be raiſed to chaſtiſe the prince of Wales, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit; for it was then the middle of winter; and, at the ſame time, the great men conſulted about means, to put a ſtop to the attempts of the court of Rome.

Lewis expels the Engliſh.

Whilſt theſe two affairs were in agitation, the court received intelligence, that the king of France had ſent away all the Engliſh in his dominions; and, tho' the truce was far from being yet expired, Lewis thought it adviſable to take this ſtep, to prevent the king of England's ſubjects, in France, from being too well informed of the affairs of the kingdom. With this view, he aſſembled, at Paris, all who had eſtates in France, and, declaring to them, that it was impoſſible to ſerve faithfully two maſters, at once, he gave them their choice to prefer which they pleaſed; and thoſe, that declared for England, were ordered to depart out of France, within ſuch a time, with aſſurance of retaining their lands. Henry did not act, with the ſame juſtice; for he was no ſooner informed of Lewis's proceedings, than he ſeized all the lands held by the French, in England, without any regard to the remonſtrances of the king of France; however, Lewis did not judge it expedient to break the truce, for the ſake of ſome private perſons. 1244.

Shortly after, the emperor Frederick ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, complaining of the frequent aids of money given the pope; and he ordered them to tell him, that, for the future, he would treat all the Engliſh, that ſhould fall into his hands, as his enemies; but his complaints had no other effect, than that the clergy took occaſion, from thence, to oppoſe the exactions of the court of Rome, whoſe continual pretence was the war with the emperor.

The war with the Welch. The war with the Welch, which was deferred, till the ſpring, was begun, at that time; but the Engliſh proceeded, with ſo little vigour, that, inſtead of attacking their enemies, they were ſcarce able to defend themſelves.

The vigorous reſolutions of the barons againſt the pope. M. Paris. This was not ſo much owing to their weakneſs, as to their being employed in other affairs, which, to them, ſeemed of greater importance than the war with Wales; for they, at length, reſolved to free themſelves from the tyranny of the court of Rome. Martin, the nuncio, uſed his authority, with ſo little diſcretion, that it was not poſſible to bear it any longer; for the barons, who ſaw, with concern, all the money of the kingdom remitted to Rome, being very ſenſible, that the clergy always gave way, when the pope came to be oppoſed, were, at laſt, determined to exert themſelves, to prevent ſuch common exactions. After frequent conferences, they reſolved to act, by their own authority; and, without waiting any longer for the king's protection, they iſſued out orders to the wardens of the ports, to ſtop all perſons that ſhould bring any bulls, or mandates, from the court of Rome. Purſuant to theſe orders, which were every-where obeyed, without regarding, whether they were approved by the king, a meſſenger from Rome was ſeized with ſeveral bulls about him, empowering the nuncio to exact money from the clergy, on various pretences. The nuncio complained to the king, who commanded every thing that was ſeized to be reſtored to him; but the barons ſtrongly remonſtrated to him, how much he injured his ſubjects, in perpetually countenancing the rapines of the court of Rome. For his conviction,

1245. they laid before him the true value of the income enjoyed by the Italian eccleſiaſticks in England, amounting to 60,000 marks, per annum, a ſum exceeding, at that time, the whole revenue of the crown. Henry, who had never made ſuch an exact calculation, could not help ſhewing his ſurprize; but, as he durſt not venture, of himſelf, to redreſs this grievance, for fear of the pope's reſentment, he was ſatisfied with permitting the barons to write to the general-council, then aſſembled at Lyons, to repreſent the intolerable oppreſſions, which England ſuffered from the court of Rome. Accordingly, the barons wrote to the council, in the name of the whole nation, inſerting in their letter, ſent by ambaſſadors, on purpoſe, all their grievances; but, as they knew that, on ſuch occaſions, the court of Rome always uſed delays and evaſions, they reſolved to take a more ſpeedy and effectual courſe; and, therefore, they agreed to meet, under the pretence of a tournament, to concert the neceſſary meaſures for executing their deſign. The king, dreading the conſequences of this aſſembly, prohibited them to be preſent at the tournament, tho they did not think proper to obey; and, meeting at the place appointed, after ſome conference, they immediately ſent a knight to the nuncio, who commanded him, in their name, to depart the kingdome. The knight diſcharged his commiſſion, in a very rough manner; for, upon the nuncio's demanding, who gave him this authority? he replied, the whole nation; and that, if he remained, three days, in England, he ſhould infallibly be cut in pieces. Martin carried his complaints to the king; but Henry aſſuring him that he was not in a condition to protect him, he demanded a paſs-port, and departed directly, to the great ſatisfaction of all the people. The pope, who had never met with ſuch a repulſe, in England, was ſo provoked, that he was heard to ſay: "I evidently perceive, that "I muſt make peace with the emperor, that I "may humble theſe petty princes; for, the "great dragon being once appeaſed, I ſhall "more eaſily be able to cruſh the ſmaller ſer-"pents.

The ambaſſadors lay open the grievances of the nation. M. Weſt.

In the interim, the Engliſh ambaſſadors, being arrived at Lyons, preſented their letter to the council, where the pope preſided, in perſon; and, the letter being publickly read, Innocent was ſo ſurprized, that he ſaid not a word, in his own vindication. When the ambaſſadors had waited, ſome time, to ſee if he had any thing to alledge againſt the contents of the letter, one of them gave a particular account of the grievances of their nation, and chiefly inſiſted on two articles; the firſt of which related to the tribute of the 1000 marks, which king John promiſed to pay, every year, to the holy ſee. He maintained, that king John could not render his kingdom tributary, as his engagement was never confirmed by the barons; and the other article concerned the clauſe of Non-obſtante, inſerted by the pope, in all his bulls, a clauſe entirely deſtructive of the rights of biſhops, abbots, moniſteries, and patrons of benefices. For example, when the pope was inclined to diſpoſe of a benefice, he inſerted this clauſe in his bull, "Non-obſtante i. e. "Notwithſtanding "the right of patronage, or other privilege to "the contrary; which, in effect, annihilated all the rights and liberties of the church of England; and, to theſe two grievances, the ambaſſador added many others, concerning the perpetual extortions of the nuncio's and legates, and, in general, all the oppreſſions to which the Engliſh nation had long been expoſed, 1245.

They proteſt againſt the tribute, and retire.

The ambaſſadors, to no purpoſe, expected an anſwer from the council; for the pope continually hindered the affair from being taken under conſideration; but finding that, at length, they were only amuſed, preſenting to the council a proteſtation againſt the tribute granted by king John, they withdrew. Whilſt they were at Lyons, the pope never made the leaſt advances, to give them ſatisfaction; but, upon their departure, he endeavoured to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the council, by aſſuring them, that he intended to redreſs the grievances complained of. Accordingly, two bulls were drawn up, the firſt of which permitted the Engliſh patrons to preſent, whom they pleaſed, to the livings in their gift; and, by the ſecond, it was ordered, that, when a beneficed Italian died, or reſigned his perferment, another ſhould not ſucceed. He made a great flouriſh, on the account of theſe bulls, as if he had granted ſome very ſignal favours to England; but he ſtaid, till the departure of the ambaſſadors, leſt they ſhould remonſtrate, how diſproportionate this ſlight ſatisfaction was to their grievances. As to the tribute, againſt which they proteſted, Innocent did not deſign to give the Engliſh nation any ſatisfaction; but, on the contrary, when the council broke up, the pope wrote thundering letters to the Engliſh prelates, expreſly enjoining them to ratify and ſet their ſeals to the charter of tribute granted by king John to the holy ſee. The biſhops durſt not diſobey, for fear of the threatened excommunication; and, tho' the king ſeemed, at firſt, diſpleaſed at the pope's haughty proceedings, he ſoon reſumed his uſual complaiſance for whatever iſſued from the court of Rome.

The war with Wales was the reaſon, why this affair lay dormant, for ſome time; for Henry, who had long ſuffered the Welch to infeſt his borders, with impunity, at laſt, appearing at the head of his army, threatened utter deſtruction to their country; but he no ſooner entered Wales, than, miſſing the enemy, who were retired to their mountains, he grew weary of the war, and, having built the caſtle of Ganoc, on an advantageous ſituation, returned to London. Walter earl of Pembroke dying, this year, without iſſue male, Anſelm his brohter, then dean of Salisbury, was his heir, and alſo ſucceeded him in his office of earl-marſhal; but he did not long enjoy it, being ſeized by death, a few months after. Thus, the noble family of Pembroke and Striguil became extinct; of which the five laſt earls, who were brothers, were inveſted with the dignity of earl-marſhal, hereditary in their family.

The quarrel with the court of Rome was, in ſome meaſure, ſuppreſſed, when the pope renewed it, by an impoſition upon the eccleſiaſticks, greater and more inſupportable than all the former, for the clergy were ſo awed by the Roman pontiffs, that they durſt not take any ſteps, to free themſelves from their yoke; but it was otherwiſe with the lay-barons, who concerted meaſures, to oppoſe theſe oppreſſions. In a parliament aſſembled, during lent, it was reſolved that the grievances of the nation ſhould be committed to writing, and ſatisfaction demanded of the pope in a letter, ſigned by the king, biſhops, and temporal lords; the principal of which were as follows:

Grievances of the nation.

I. That the pope, not ſatisfied with the annual payment of Peter-pence, exacted from the clergy large contributions, without the king's licenſe, againſt the cuſtoms, liberties, and rights of the church and realm of England.

II. That the patrons of churches could not preſent qualified perſons to the vacant livings, the pope conferring them, generally, on Italians, who were ſtrangers to the Engliſh language, and carried out of the kingdom the money ariſing from the income of their benefices.

III. That the pope oppreſſed the churches, by inſiſting on penſions from them.

IV. That, upon the deceaſe of an Italian eccleſiaſtick, his benefice was immediately beſtowed on one of the ſame nation, as if the Italians had a right to ſuch a number of benefices in the kingdom; and that, whilſt the Italians were inveſted, without trouble or expence, the Engliſh were obliged to proſecute their right, at Rome, contrary to the indulgences granted to England by former popes.

V. That, in the churches filled by the Italians, there were neither alms, nor hoſpitality; neither was there any preaching, but the care of ſouls was entirely neglected.

VI. That the clauſe of Non-obſtante, uſually inſerted in all bulls, abſolutely deſtroyed the laws, cuſtoms, ſtatutes, and privileges of the church and kingdom.

It is evident, from theſe articles, that the bulls granted by Innocent, at the council of Lyons, were not put in execution; ſince the very grievances, they ſeemed to redreſs, ſtill occaſioned ſuch complaints from the great council of the nation.

The pope continues his oppreſſions. M. Paris.

The letter of the king and barons proved altogether ineffectual; for the pope, alledging that the clergy extorted it by their importunities, inſtead of redreſſing their greivances, oppreſſed them, with new and unheard of taxes. He not only forced the biſhops to ſign the emperor's excommunication; but alſo commanded each of them to ſupply him with a certain number of men, well provided with horſes and arms, to ſerve againſt that prince, pretending that all churches were equally concerned in the war; and, upon this, he introduced a new grievance, by claiming the adminiſtration of the goods of ſuch eccleſiaſticks, as died inteſtate. At firſt, 1246. the king oppoſed the execution of all theſe articles; but the dread of a threatened interdict and excommunication obliged him, as formerly, to ſubmit to the pope's pleaſure. This compliance rendered his holineſs ſo imperious, that he impoſed a freſh tallage, of a third part of their moveables, upon clergymen that reſided on their livings, and of one half upon non-reſidents; and it is no wonder, that the popes were ſo unwilling to make peace with the emperor, ſince the war furniſhed them with a pretence to levy ſuch frequent taxes upon the clergy. The biſhop of London was appointed to execute this new order, being empowered to excommunicate and ſuſpend the diſobedient; but, whilſt this prelate and ſome others were aſſembled, on this occaſion, the king ſent them word, by no means, to conſent to this impoſition, upon which they broke up their meeting; and, if Henry had as vigorouſly oppoſed all the other attempts of the court of Rome, he would have been equally ſucceſsful; for the pope dropp'd this affair, as ſoon as he found a reſolute oppoſition.

Biſhop of Lincoln's attempt. M. Paris.

The abſolute power, the pope claimed over chriſtians, cauſed pernicious effects among ſome Engliſh biſhops, who imagined the church's authority to be unlimited; and, therefore, they pretended to extend it over civil affairs. The biſhop of Lincoln, full of this notion, this year, made ſtrict and ſevere inquiſitions, as to the life and manners of each particular perſon, in his dioceſe; and, poſſibly, it was done with a good deſign; yet the danger was, that this incroachment would be imitated by others, and, at length, degenerate into a real tyranny. Accordingly, it was deemed a downright uſurpation, to which the king put a ſtop, by his own authority.

Iſabella, counteſs of Marche and queen-dowager of England, the king's mother, died, this year, who lived in no great reputation, if we may give credit to certain hiſtorians.

1247. The pope's exactions. M. Paris. M. Weſt.

The year 1247, as well as the preceding, was ſpent, almoſt wholly, in conteſts between the pope and the clergy; for the firſt increaſed his oppreſſions, in proportion as the others vainly attempted to prevent them. In the beginning of this year, the biſhops and abbots were compelled to make a preſent of a 1000 marks to a new legate, ſent by the pope into England, with no other view than to exact money from the clergy; and, at the ſame time, and on the ſame account, there was a nuncio in Ireland, who procured 500 marks. As the king was ever ready to countenance the exactions of the court of Rome, the pope was willing, in his turn, to demonſtrate his gratitude; and, accordingly, he ſent him a bull, ordaining, that, for the future, no Italian, not even the nephew of a cardinal, or the pope himſelf, ſhould be admitted to any benefice in England, without the king's conſent; an ample recompence for the prodigeous ſums extorted every year, by the pope, out of the kingdom! a privilege, alſo, that was very inſignificant, ſeeing the pope was very ſure of obtaining the king's conſent, when ever he ſhould vouchſafe to requeſt it.

To

1427. To compleat the misfortunes of the Engliſh, the king's three half-brothers, viz, Guy de Luſignan, William de Valence, and Athelmar, ſons of the earl of Marche, came into England; for the earl, their father, ſent them to the king, expecting that he would make a ſuitable proviſion for them. At their arrival, they were entirely deſtitute; inſomuch that Henry was obliged not only to maintain them, but alſo to gratify their avarice and ambition, with preſents, places, and benefices, to the prejudice of the Engliſh.

The ſame year, William earl of Holland, a young prince of 20 years of age, was elected king of the Romans, by the intrigues of the pope, who had depoſed Frederick, in the council of Lyons; but his holineſs found it more difficult to put him in poſſeſſion of the empire, than to procure him the votes of part of the electors.

1248. Notwithſtanding the fair promiſes the king made the parliament, upon their granting him the laſt aid, he performed nothing; and, therefore, when he demanded a freſh ſupply of the parliament, aſſembled in the beginning of the year 1248, he received a very mortifying anſwer. He was asked, how he could, without bluſhing, renew his demands, after ſo frequent violations of his word; and he was upbraided, for his exceſſive liberalities to the foreigners; for his contempt of his native ſubjects; for neglecting to encourage trade, and protect merchants, of whom he even exacted impoſitions which were not due; and very lively complaints were made of his keeping in his own hands the vacant benefices, and conferring the prime offices of the ſtate, on perſons not qualified, without ever vouchſafing to conſult his parliament. Henry, perceiving by the boldneſs of theſe reproaches, that it would be an impracticable undertaking to bring the barons to any temper, prorogued the parliament, to gain time to conſider, what ſteps were moſt proper, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs.

1248. Henry receives a mortifying anſwer from the parliament M. Paris.

He is entirely guided by foreigners.

During the prorogation, his miniſters prejudiced him more and more againſt his ſubjects, and induced him to be entirely governed by the foreigners; of which there, preſently after, appeared an evident proof, in the extraordinary courage they inſpired him with, of which he was naturally incapable. When the parliament met, he reproached the barons, for attempting to impoſe upon him laws, to which they themſelves would think it a hardſhip to be ſubject; that every one of them was a maſter, in his own family; made uſe of what counſellors he pleaſed; put in, and turned out his domeſticks, at pleaſure; but that he alone was treated, like a ſlave by his own ſubjects. In a word, he declared, that he deſigned to be maſter, in his own kingdom; and that it was their duty to obey. As for the other grievances, he only gave general anſwers; and then he told them he expected a ſpeedy ſupply of money, to enable him to recover the French provinces. This unſeaſonable haughtineſs, more than ever, exaſperated the barons; who bouldly replied, that, ſince he would not reform what was amiſs, they were not ſo ſtupid as to continue to diſtreſs themſelves, for the ſake of foreigners, under the pretence of an imaginary war. This reply entirely defeating Henry's expectations, he choſe to diſſolve the parliament, leſt they ſhould proceed to more vigorous reſolutions; and, in the interim, his treaſure being quite exhauſted, he was forced to ſell his plate and jewels, which were ſoon bought up by the citizens of London. He was extremely incenſed, to ſee the Londoners ſo readily find money to purchaſe his jewels, and yet always plead poverty, when he wanted an aid; and, therefore, he eſtabliſhed a new fair at Weſtminſter, during which, all commerce was prohibited in London. He was ſo far from hearkening to the complaints of the merchants, on this occaſion, that he gave them freſh proofs of his diſpleaſure, in keeping his chriſtmas in the city, and compelling them to preſent him with large new-years-gifts; and, ſoon after, he likewiſe demanded a ſupply of money, and, in ſpite of their endeavours to the contrary, they were conſtrained to give him 2000 l. ſterling.

1249. However, this trifling ſum not being anſwerable to his wants, he reſolved to borrow money of the barons, biſhops, abbots, merchants, and the richer ſort of citizens in the kingdom; but, as he was in no condition to make uſe of compulſive methods, he applied to them, in ſo cringing a manner, that one would have imagined he was begging an alms. He was, after all his condeſcenſions, refuſed by the majority, who pleaded poverty, though he pretended to be under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of making war upon France; for it was notorious, that he was ſtrictly prohibited by the pope, to diſturb the territories of the French king, during his abſence, who went, this year, to the Holy Land. The real cauſe of his anxiety after money was his being greatly involved in debt and, at the ſame time, unable to diſcharge it; and, beſides, his brothers, to whom he could not refuſe any thing, never conſidered his neceſſities, but continually preſſed him with their unreaſonable demands; and ſuch was his fondneſs for them, that he embraced all opportunities of accumulating favours on them, tho' he could not be inſenſible, that each of theſe favours gave freſh occaſion of diſcontent to the Engliſh barons.

He makes uſe, in vain, of other means to raiſe money. M. Paris.

He tries, to no purpoſe, to make his brother biſhop of Durham. M. Paris.

Shortly after, the biſhoprick of Durham becoming vacant, Henry powerfully recommended Athelmar, the youngeſt of his brothers, though he was far from being of a ſufficient age and capacity to govern ſo large a dioceſe; and, accordingly, that objection was made to him by the monks of Durham. They alſo remonſtrated to him, that he had often promiſed to leave to the churches the freedom of elections, and humbly beſought him to make good his engagements; but Henry, offended at theſe remonſtrances, replied, that, ſince they thought his brother too young, he would keep the biſhoprick in his own hands, till he ſhould be of a proper age.

Alexander II, king of Scotland, died, this year, leaving Alexander III, his ſon, eight years of age, to be his ſucceſſor.

Earl of Leiceſter is ſent into Guienne.

About this time, the king being informed, that ſome Gaſcoign lords were revolted, diſpatched into Guienne Simon de Montfort, earl of 1249. of Leiceſter, who reduced the rebels to their duty, and acquired a great reputation.

1250. In the beginning of the enſuing year, prince Richard, the king's brother, ſet out with a pompous retinue, to confer with the pope, who remained ſtill at Lyons; but this journey, and the extraordinary honours conferred upon him by the pope, furniſhed matter for divers ſpeculations, which employed the wits of the politicians; tho' the real motive of it was unknown, till ſome years after.

Prince Richard confers with the pope.

Henry takes the croſs.

The king, notwithſtanding his preſſing neceſſities, taking the croſs from the hands of the legate, vowed to go and war againſt the Saracens of Paleſtine; and his example was followed by above 500 knights, and an incredible number of eſquires and people of an inferior condition. After all the denials Henry had met with from the parliament, he muſt have foreſeen, how difficult it would be, to obtain an aid ſuitable to ſuch an undertaking; and, therefore, his deſign was not to go the voyage, but to draw from the parliament a large ſubſidy, under that pretence, believing that they durſt not deny him. At leaſt, he was perſuaded, that the methods he ſhould make uſe of, to exact money from his ſubjects, would be authorized by ſo plauſible a reaſon; and, beſides, he was very ſenſible, that, with part of the money, he could eaſily procure a diſpenſation of his vow; and his conduct, afterwards, confirmed this conjecture.

However that be, thoſe, that had taken the croſs with the king, prepared themſelves, with all expedition; and, finding that he made no preparations, they offered to depart, without him; but Henry was greatly diſpleaſed at their haſte, as it too manifeſtly diſcovered his backwardneſs in a cauſe, in which all the world were ambitious of giving proofs of their zeal. To remedy this inconvenience, he deſired the pope to prohibit his ſubjects from going, before he was in readineſs to head them; which favour was readily granted, and the intereſts of the king of France, who might have been a gainer by this reinforcement, were ſacrificed to the pope's deſire of contenting the king of England. Innocent forbade the Engliſh, under pain of excommunication, to ſet out, before the king; and, thus, all the charges they had been at, for their voyage, became uſeleſs. If this prohibition occaſioned many murmurs, in England, it was not more favourably conſidered, in France; for every one openly ſaid, it was evident that the pope was not much concerned, whether Lewis ſucceeded in his expedition, ſince he deprived him of the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh Croiſes.

Inquiſitions concerning the foreſts.

In the mean while, Henry, not daring to demand money of the parliament, tried all ſorts of methods to raiſe it elſewhere; and one of his moſt effectual means was, to commiſſion a judge entirely attached to him, to make inquiſition in all the counties, concerning treſpaſſes upon the royal foreſts. This commiſſion was, in itſelf, very deteſtable, as it included all the caſes, excepted in king John's charter; but the manner, in which it was executed by the inquiſitor, rendered it ſtill more intolerable. He puniſhed the leaſt fault, by exceſſive fines, or confiſcation of eſtate; and, by theſe arbitrary proceedings, he procured the king a large ſum of money, tho', at the ſame time, he drew on him the hatred and curſes of the people. 1250.

During theſe tranſactions, Henry was not unmindful of his relations; for the biſhoprick of Wincheſter, the richeſt in the kingdom, being vacant, the king powerfully recommended his brother, Athelmar, whom the chapter of Durham had refuſed, the preceding year. He not only ſent recommendatory letters, but went, in perſon, to Wincheſter, to ſupport his intereſt, by his preſence; and, on the day of his election, coming into the chapter-houſe, he made a ſhort ſermon upon this text, "Righte-"ouſneſs and peace have kiſſed each other," which he applied, in the beſt manner he was able, to the buſineſs in agitation. Tho' he, at firſt, met with great oppoſition, on the account of the youth and inſufficiency of the perſon recommended; yet, by his promiſes and menaces, he, at laſt, obtained his deſire; for the pope, to gratify the king, did not fail to confirm the election, deſigning to ask him another favour, in his turn.

Henry procures his half-brother to be elected biſhop of Wincheſter.

The king of France is taken priſoner by the Saracens.

The ſad news of the king of France's misfortune, in falling into the hands of the Saracens, who detained him in priſon, by this time, was ſpread, all over Europe; and France openly charged the pope with being the cauſe of their monarch's diſgrace, by abſolving, for money, thoſe that had taken the croſs, from performing their vow. In the interim, Innocent paſſed his time very heavily at Lyons, dreading an attempt upon his perſon; for Charles and Alphonſo, St. Lewis's brothers, came, on purpoſe, to upbraid him, in an outrageous manner, and proceeded ſo far as to threaten him. To extricate himſelf from this perplexity, and from the complaints which perpetually ſounded in his ears, he deſired leave of the king of England to reſide at Bourdeaux; and Henry would have granted his requeſt, had he not been prevented, by the remonſtrances of the clergy and barons. They were apprehenſive, that the pope would paſs from Bourdeaux into England; and, at their inſtances, the king delayed ſending an anſwer, which the pope interpreted to be, what, in reality, it was, a civil denial.

The affairs of Sicily.

As I ſhall have occaſion, preſently, to conſider an affair, which entirely employed Henry, ſeveral years, it will be convenient to ſhew, by way of digreſſion, its riſe and progreſs; I mean, the pope's donation of the kingdom of Sicily to prince Edmund, Henry's ſon; but, to give ſuch an idea of this matter, as may give light to the ſequel, it will be neceſſary, not only to take notice of what was tranſacted in Italy, at the time of this donation, but alſo to examine the thing, from its firſt original. This digreſſion will not ſeem impertinent, when it ſhall appear, hereafter, to be a fertile ſource of oppreſſions upon the Engliſh, as well from their king as the Roman pontiffs; and it will alſo diſcover three things equally remarkable, in the hiſtory of this reign; firſt, Henry's character, and his indiſcretion to engage in the moſt difficult cult undertakings, without foreſeeing the obſtacles attending them. Secondly, the authority aſſumed by the popes in England, as well as their manifeſt abuſe of it. Laſtly, we ſhall find, that this was the principal occaſion of the troubles, in the end of this reign. Though the events, I am about to relate, formerly made a great noiſe in the world; yet, as they do not belong properly to the Hiſtory of England, I ſhall abridge them, as much as poſſible, and ſay no more than is abſolutely neceſſary, for the ſequel of this reign.

All that are, in the leaſt, acquainted with the hiſtory of Europe, know, that, that towards the end of the XIth century, ſome Norman lords, ſons of Tancred de Hauteville, conquered the iſland of Sicily from the Saracens, and Apulia, Calabria, and ſeveral other ſouthern provinces of Italy, from the emperors of Conſtantinople; and theſe firſt conquerors, from a religious principle, or ſome other motive, did homage to the pope, for their conqueſts; making themſelves vaſſals and feudatories to the church of Rome, though ſhe gave them nothing, in return, nor had even promoted their undertakings; but, whatever their policy might be, in ſubmitting ſo voluntarily to the holy ſee, the fact itſelf is not to be diſputed. The conqueſts of the Normans were, at firſt, divided into ſeveral parts; of which Sicily beyond the Faro, or the iſland of Sicily, made a kingdom of itſelf; and the reſt was divided into dukedoms, or principalities, under the name of Sicily on this ſide the Faro, of which Calabria and Apulia were the chief; which was afterwards ſtiled the kingdom of Naples. All theſe ſeveral parts, viz. the two Sicily's, were, at length, reduced into one kingdom, under Roger I, Tancred's youngeſt ſon, who aſſumed the title of king of Sicily; who had, for his ſucceſſor, William I, his ſon, ſirnamed the Bad, to whom ſucceeded William II, his ſon, called the Good, to diſtinguiſh him from his father. William the Good dying, without iſſue, the Sicilians placed on the throne Tancred, baſe ſon of Roger I, who added, to the title of his predeceſſor, that of king of Naples, or Sicily on this ſide the Faro; and it is neceſſary to obſerve, that, by Sicily, is meant ſometimes the iſland of Sicily alone, ſometimes both the Sicily's together, as conſtituting only one kingdom.

Clement III, who ſat in the papal chair, in the time of Tancred, conſidered the proceedings of the Sicilians, as an incroachment upon his rights; pretending that, by the death of William the Good, without heirs, the two Sicily's were devolved to the holy ſee, and that, as lord paramount, he could diſpoſe of them, at his pleaſure. In the mean time, as ſpiritual weapons were incapable of dethroning a prince in actual poſſeſſion, Clement ſent, into Apulia and Calabria, an army, which, at firſt, made ſome progreſs; but he was, ſoon after, prevented by death, from puſhing his enterprize any farther. Celeſtine III, his ſucceſſor, determined to proſecute what was begun by his predeceſſor; but, perceiving that he could not compaſs his ends, with his own forces, he judged it neceſſary to engage, in this quarrel, ſome prince, who was in a condition to ſupport him. With this view, he inveſted the emperor, Henry VI, with the two Sicily's, on condition of the homage to the Roman church, to which the firſt Norman kings had obliged themſelves. However, it was to be feared, that ſuch an arbitrary act, eſpecially, in favour of a foreigner, would exaſperate the Sicilians, and attach them more firmly to Tancred's intereſt; and, therefore, to prevent this inconvenience, and give, at the ſame time, ſome colour of juſtice to what he had done, he cauſed Conſtantia, daughter of Roger I, then 50 years old, to be taken out of the monaſtery of St. Saviour's at Palermo, of which ſhe was abbeſs*; and, abſolving her from all her vows, the pope gave her in marriage to Henry, to add a more plauſible right to the grant he had made to that monarch. Beſides, by means of this marriage, he expected to ſow, among the Sicilians, ſeeds of diſſenſion, of which himſelf and the emperor might make an advantage; and Henry, ſupported by this additional right, immediately heading his army, marched into Apulia, tho' he made no great progreſs there, by reaſon of the peſtilence that raged among his troops, and of ſome other affairs which obliged him to return to Germany; ſo that Tancred enjoyed the crown of Sicily, till his death, in 1145, being ſucceeded by his ſon, William III.

Henry no ſooner received intelligence of Tancred's death, than he marched back into Italy, and beſieged the city of Naples, which made a vigorous defence; and, the reſiſtance of the Neapolitans cauſing the emperor to deſpair of accompliſhing his enterprize, by force, he reſolved to make uſe of artifice; and, accordingly, he propoſed to the king of Sicily, to decide their quarrel, by a treaty. William readily conſented to be diſpoſſeſſed of a part, in order to purchaſe peace, of a competitor much more powerful than himſelf; and by, the treaty, it was agreed, that the emperor ſhould have the iſland of Sicily, and William the kingdom of Naples. Purſuant to this agreement, Henry came to Palermo, and was crowned; but, while William was preparing to retire to his kingdom, Henry, ſeizing his perſon, ordered him to be conducted to Germany, where this unfortunate prince was deprived of his ſight, and caſtrated; and, Henry being, thus, without a rival, took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, in ſpite of certain lords of the Norman race, to the contrary.

The emperor's affairs being ſo ſucceſsful, he ſent for his empreſs, who was big with child, tho' 52 years of age; and, her time of delivery being come, whilſt ſhe was on the road, ſhe ſtaid at Geſſi, a little town on the frontiers of Ancona, where ſhe ordered all the women of the town, that had the curioſity, to be eye-witneſſes of her delivery. With this view, ſhe cauſed a pavilion to be erected in the middle of the market-place, were ſhe was delivered of a prince, named Frederick; and, from that time, Henry kept poſſeſſion of the two Sicily's, till his death, which did not happen, before the year 1199.

This monarch left his ſon Frederick, aged 11 years, under the guardianſhip of his mother, Conſtantia; who immediately procured him to be acknowledged king of both Sicily's, and to be crowned, two years after, at Palermo. After that, he was inveſted by Innocent III, then pope; and Conſtantia, his mother, dying, three years after, left the guardianſhip of her ſon to Innocent, who governed the Sicily's by a cardinal, during Frederick's minority. This young prince, being arrived at 14 years of age, married Conſtantia, daughter of Alphonſo IV, king of Caſtile; and, two years after, he was elected emperor, by the oppoſite party to Otho of Saxony, who was excommunicated by the pope. He could not, however, prevail with Innocent to ſet the imperial crown on his head; the pope dreading it might be dangerous to the holy ſee, to raiſe to the empire a prince of the houſe of Suabia, who had been ſo troubleſome to his predeceſſors. In the year 1220, and after Otho's death, Frederick was crowned by Honorius III. and Conſtantia, his wife, dying, two years after, left him a ſon, named Henry, who, in 1223, was elected king of the Romans. Afterwards, he married Yolante, daughter of John de Brienne, titular king of Jeruſalem, who departed this life, in 1228, leaving him a ſon, called Conrade. In fine, in 1235, Frederick took, for his third wife, Iſabella of England, who died in 1241, having brought him two princes, Jordan and Henry, the firſt of which died a child.

Having given an account of the emperor Frederick's ſeveral marriages, I ſhall proceed to treat of his conteſts with the popes. Ever ſince Richard, King of England, quitted Paleſtine, the affairs of the chriſtians, in thoſe parts, were in a very ill ſituation; for the Saracens, taking advantage of the coldneſs of the Europeans, with reſpect to the Cruſades, made a great progreſs againſt them. Honorius III, who ſat in the papal chair, in the beginning of the reign of Frederick II, deſirous of retrieving the loſſes of the chriſtians in the Holy-Land, publiſhed, in the year 1224, a Cruſade, in which infinite numbers of people, of all conditions, engaged; and an hiſtorian aſſures us, that above 60,000 Engliſh took the croſs, for this expedition; of which Frederick was to be head, both as emperor, and as ſon-in-law to John de Brienne, titular king of Jeruſalem.

Whilſt all Europe was preparing for this undertaking, ſome diſputes, unexpectedly ariſing between the emperor and certain cities of Italy, retarded that prince's preparations; upon which Gregory IX, ſucceſſor to Honorius, wrote him a letter, exhorting him to perſevere in his pious reſolution; in which he repreſented to him, that the ſucceſs of the Cruſade depended on him, as the management of it was committed to his care. In the interim, the Croiſes of the ſeveral ſtates of Europe repaired, in multitudes, to the Holy-Land, expecting to be ſoon followed by their general; but Frederick choſe rather to employ his forces againſt the revolted cities of Italy, than againſt the Saracens. Nevertheleſs, as he was earneſtly ſollicited by the pope, he pretended to prepare, indeed, and even went and embarqued at Brindiſi; but, having been three days at ſea, he ſailed back to land, feigning a ſudden illneſs, as it is affirmed by moſt of the hiſtorians. The news reaching Paleſtine, above 40,000 of the Croiſes, returned, in the ſame ſhips that brought them thither; and the pope, incenſed to ſee ſo fair an opportunity loſt, by the emperor's negligence, publickly excommunicated him, and ſent the bull of excommunication to all the princes of Chriſtendom, to be publiſhed in their reſpective dominions; tho it is not univerſally believed, that the pope's ſeverity to Frederick was, purely, the effect of his zeal for religion; for ſome aſſert, that it was no other than a pretence, to diſconcert the emperor's meaſures in Italy, in favour of the revolted cities, which were privately countenanced by the court of Rome. However that be, it occaſioned a quarrel, which introduced innumerable calamities into Europe, and particularly Italy; for Frederick, reſenting the pope's proceedings, not only took care to juſtify his conduct to all the potentates of Europe, by letters, in which his holineſs was ſeverely treated; but, by means of a powerful party in Rome, he expelled Gregory, forcing him to take refuge at Perugia. However, to demonſtrate, that his indiſpoſition was the ſole cauſe of his delay, and conſequently the excommunication denounced upon him was unjuſt, he ſet out, the next year, for Paleſtine; and ſo rapid was the progreſs of his arms, that he ſoon compelled the ſultan of Egypt to ſurrender up Jeruſalem, and he would have puſhed his conqueſts farther, if the knights hoſpitallers, who were gained by the pope, had not continually laid obſtacles in his way, by their plots againſt him. Gregory, on the contrary, offended, that the emperor, regardleſs of his cenſures, ſhould preſume to undertake this expedition, before he was reconciled to the church, and without making, as he charged him, preparations ſuitable to ſuch an important undertaking, renewed his excommunication, for two contrary faults, viz. for deferring his departure, and departing too ſoon; and the pope, not only attacking him with ſpiritual, but temporal arms, ſent John de Brienne, father-in-law to Frederick, at the head of an army, into the kingdom of Naples, with the title of vicar of the holy ſee, to deprive his ſon-in-law of that part of his dominions.

The quarrel between the emperor and the pope daily increaſing, all the cities of Italy declared either for the one or the other; and then were formed the two factions of the Guelfs and Gibelines, which, for ſo long a time, haraſſed that country, the former for the pope, and the latter for the emperor. It is entirely needleſs to give the reader a particular account of all the bloody wars that enſued; which led many to be of opinion, that zeal for religion was not the principal motive of the Roman pontiffs. It is ſufficient to obſerve, in brief, that Gregory's ſucceſſors vigorouſly purſued his project of wreſting from Frederick not only the Sicily's but all Italy, and even the empire it ſelf; and, in a word, Innocent IV, having publickly depoſed poſed him in the council of Lyons, cauſed William earl of Holland to be elected emperor in his room; yet, notwithſtanding this pretended depoſition, Frederick kept poſſeſſion of the throne, till his death, about the end of the year 1250.

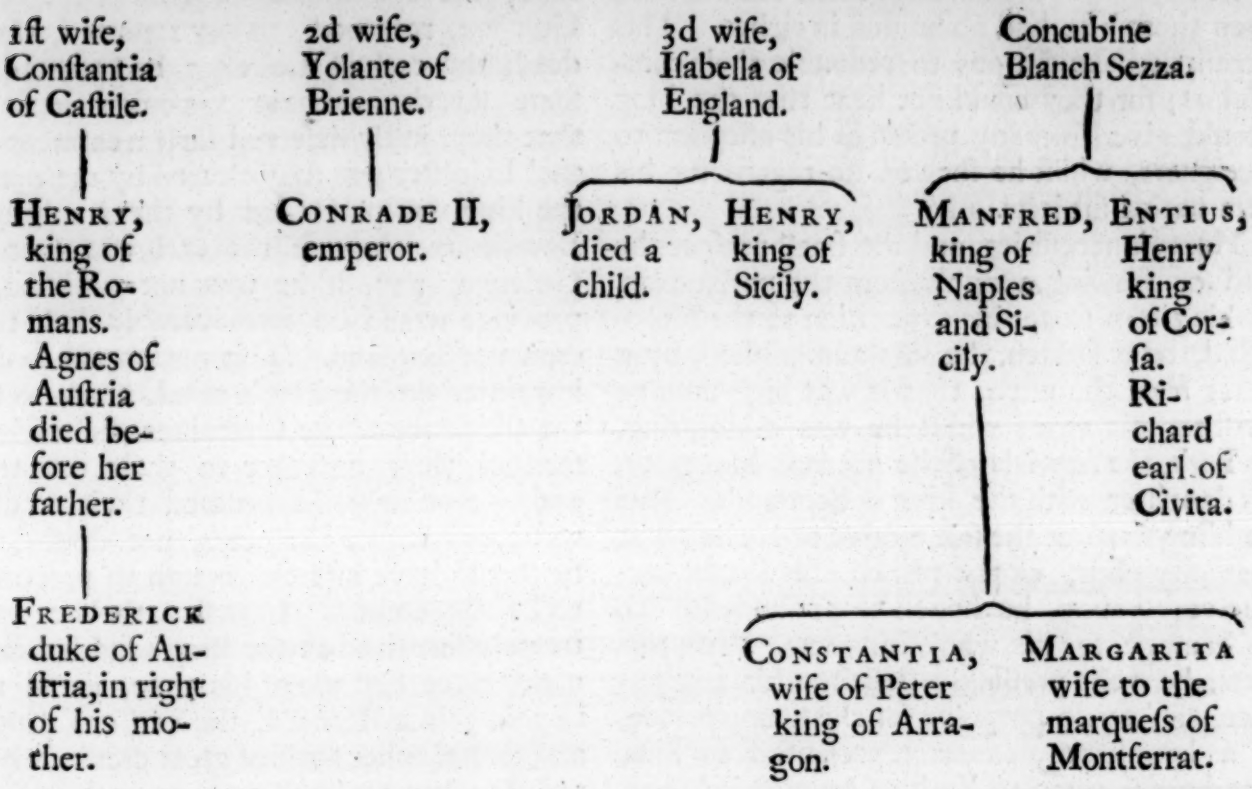
To conveigh a diſtinct idea of the affairs of Sicily, in which England was, ſoon after this, greatly concerned, it may not be improper to add a part of the genealogy of the family of Frederick II. extracted from the hiſtory of Naples, by Giovanne Summonte.

FREDERICK II. Emperor.



Frederick, making a will, on the very day of of his death, left Auſtria to Frederick, his grandſon, of which he was already in poſſeſſion, in right of his mother; to Conrade, his ſecond ſon, he gave the kingdom of Naples, or Sicily on this ſide the Faro, upon this condition, that, if he died, without iſſue, his brother Henry, ſon of Iſabella of England, ſhould be his ſucceſſor; and that, if Henry died, without an heir, Manfred, his natural ſon ſhould inherit the ſame. The ſaid Henry, was to be king of the Iſland of Sicily; and Manfred was to have the principality of Tarentum, with the regency of the two kingdoms, viz. of the firſt, in the abſence of Conrade, and of the ſecond, during Henry's minority.

Frederick was no ſooner in his grave, than Manfred would have taken poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, in the name of Conrade; but the pope's party were grown ſo powerful, upon the emperor's deceaſe, that the chief cities, as Naples and Capua, ſhut their gates againſt him. This oppoſition obliged him to call his brother, Conrade, into Italy, who, upon Frederick's death, aſſumed the imperial title, tho' William, earl of Holland, was acknowledged by the pope and his party; but Conrade, arriving, made the Neapolitans often repent of eſpouſing the pope's quarrel. In the interim, Innocent uſed all poſſible means to retard his progreſs; for he not only thundered his cenſures againſt Conrade, but, by aſſiſting the Guelfs, his adherents, he kept up the war in Italy, in expectation of a more favourable juncture. Here I ſhall end this tedious digreſſion; which I hope will not be thought impertinent, when it is conſidered, how far England was concerned in this quarrel. But to return to the Hiſtory of England.

In the beginning of the year 1251, the clauſe of Non-obſtante was firſt inſerted in the king's orders, in imitation of the pope, who uſed it, long ſince, in his bulls; and the biſhop of Carliſle having a law-ſuit depending with a certain lord of his dioceſe, being obliged to go to France, obtained an order from the king, that the ſuit ſhould be delayed, till his return; but, during his abſence, his adverſary found means to procure a contrary order with this clauſe, Non-obſtante, or Notwithſtanding the former order, the baron's cauſe ſhould not be deferred *. 1251.

Beſides the principles of arbitrary power inſtilled by Hubert de Burgh and the biſhop of Wincheſter into Henry, during his minority, and which he uſually made the rule of his conduct, he had alſo another reaſon to induce him to diſregard his ſubjects; I mean the advantages gained by the earl of Leiceſter over the rebels of Guienne. Ever ſince the earl was governor of that province, he had ſerved his maſter, with ſo much fidelity, that, in all probability, he would have nothing to fear, for ſome time, from the inconſtancy of the Gaſcoigns; and, as Henry was ſoon diſpirited, ſo a very trivial matter was ſufficient to animate his courage. The chaſtiſement of the Gaſcoigns leading him to imagine, that their example would keep the Engliſh in awe, he fancied, that, for the future,

* M. Paris affirms, theſe orders, with that deteſtable clauſe, became afterwards ſo frequent, that Roger de Thurkeby, one of the king's juſtices, ſaid with a deep ſigh, "Alas! Into what times are we fallen! Behold, the civil court "is corrupted, in imitation of the eccleſiaſtical; and the river is poiſoned from that fountain." This is the original and riſe of Non-obſtante's, in the king's writ and charters; and Tyrrel obſerves, that this is omitted by Dr. Brady.

1251. future, he might uſe them, at his pleaſure. Accordingly, deſpiſing the continual murmurs of the barons, on account of the preference given to foreigners, he affected to receive, with exceſſive civilities, Guy de Luſignan, his half-brother, who accompanied the earl of Leiceſter, when he came to acquaint him with what was tranſacted in Guienne; whom he loaded with preſents, that would have appeared extravagant, even though he had abounded in riches. This occaſioned the barons to redouble their complaints; for they could not bear that the king ſhould give ſo many proofs of his affection to foreigners, whilſt he ſhewed no regard for his own native ſubjects.

An interview between the kings of England and Scotland. M. Paris.

Henry's neceſſities, and the ſmall proſpect he had of drawing a ſupply from the parliament, making him forget his expedition to the Holy-Land, on a ſudden, he was admoniſhed, by a letter from the pope, that it was high time to perform his vow; whilſt he was celebrating, at York, the nuptials of the princeſs Margaret, his daughter, with the king of Scotland. This wedding was not the ſole motive of his being at that city; but, as the prince, his ſon-in-law, was very young, he hoped to perſuade him to do homage, for his whole kingdom. With this view, he very preſſingly ſollicited his compliance, tho' to no purpoſe; for the young prince, in a handſome manner, repreſented to him, that he was come to York to be married, and not to debate an affair that was attended with ſo many difficulties, and upon which he could determine nothing, without conſulting the ſtates of his kingdom. However, he did the cuſtomary homage, for the lands held of the crown of England; but, whether Henry thought his pretenſions were groundleſs, or was unwilling to diſturb the nuptial-feaſt, by inſiſting on his demand, the affair was dropp'd; tho' we ſhall find, in the next reign, that theſe very pretenſions were the occaſion of a bloody war between England and Scotland.

1252. The king extorts money from the Jews. M. Paris.

This interview being over, to the ſatisfaction of both monarchs, Henry ſeemed willing to prepare, in good earneſt, for his voyage to the Holy-Land; and, under the pretence of this voyage, he extorted great ſums from the Jews, and alſo from his chriſtian ſubjects; tho, after all, he did not raiſe what was ſufficient for an expedition to the Eaſt, worthy a ſucceſſor of Richard, whoſe memory was ſtill freſh among the Saracens.

The Gaſcoigns complain of the earl of Leiceſter. M. Paris.

Whilſt the king was employed, in preparing for his pretended voyage, deputies arrived from the Gaſcoigns, complaining of being unjuſtly oppreſſed by the earl of Leiceſter; but the earl, waiting on the king to juſtify himſelf, denied whatever was laid to his charge; adding that he was aſtoniſhed, the king ſhould liſten to the frivolous complaints of the rebellious Gaſcoigns, againſt one that had ſerved him ſo faithfully, and ſpent all his eſtate, in a poſt, in which others uſually inriched themſelves. Henry replied, he gave no credit to theſe accuſations; and that, to render his innocence the more conſpicuous, he was reſolved to ſend commiſſioners into Guienne, to take informations concerning the behaviour of the Gaſcoigns; and, in the interim, to convince him, that theſe accuſations had made no ill impreſſions on his mind, he ſupplied him with money, and other ſuitable accommodations, for his return to Guienne. 1252.

The archbiſhop of Bourdeaux renews the charge againſt Leiceſter. M. Paris.

Before the earl was in readineſs to depart, the Gaſcoigns, having intelligence of the king's deſign, deputed the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, to renew their complaints; and, in the mean, time, the commiſſioners, that were ſent to Guienne, returned. They reported, that, indeed, the earl of Leiceſter had treated, with ſome ſeverity, certain Gaſcoign lords; yet that they juſtly deſerved ſuch treatment; but, tho' Leiceſter was fully cleared by theſe reports, the king was perſuaded by the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, that, if the earl was ſent back Guienne, nay, if he was not puniſhed, that province would be irrecoverably loſt to the crown of England. This notion was ſo deeply imprinted on the king's mind, that, to ſecure the allegiance of the Gaſcoigns, he reſolved to ſacrifice their governor to their reſentment; and, accordingly, he ordered their accuſation to be laid before the peers, not doubting but he ſhould have intereſt enough to procure him to be condemned. Leiceſter, tho' he was extremely ſurprized at the king's ſudden change, making the beſt uſe of his time, found means to gain prince Richard, the earl of Glouceſter, and ſeveral other lords of great credit, who promiſed to ſupport him; and, upon this aſſurance he appeared in court, and vindicated himſelf, with ſuch convincing evidence, that the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux was at a loſs how to maintain his accuſation; beſides, whenever he offered to ſpeak, in defence of what he advanced, the principal lords were always prepared to improve the arguments of their friend. The king, perceiving this, could not help ſhewing his uneaſineſs, and even dropping ſome expreſſions highly injurious to the party accuſed; but the earl of Leiceſter, not content with juſtifying his actions, boaſted of his ſervices, and boldly called upon the king to reward him, according to his promiſe. Henry replied, "He did not think "himſelf obliged to keep his word with a tray-"tor;" but this anſwer ſo exaſperated the earl, who was in a paſſion before, that he, in ſo many words, told him, "He lied; and that, were "he not a king, he would compel him to eat "his words." He, after ſome inſolent expreſſions, farther added, "That it was ſcarce cre-"dible, that ſuch a prince was a chriſtian, or "had ever been at confeſſion. Yes, replied, "the king, I am a chriſtian, and have often "been at confeſſion. What ſignifies confeſſion, "ſaid the earl, without repentance? I never "repented any thing ſo much, replied the king, "as the beſtowing my favours on one that is "ſo rude and ungrateful." After this, Henry would have had him apprehended; but, as the earl's friends were ready to oppoſe it, he durſt not put his deſign in execution; nay, he permitted them to ſpeak in the earl's behalf, and, inſtead of revenging the inſult he had received, he was contented with a ſlight ſatisfaction, and ſeemed to be reconciled to him. However, the earl's inſolence made ſuch an impreſſion upon his mind, that he could never reflect upon it, without 1252. without horror; which is the leſs ſurpriſing, becauſe this, doubtleſs, is the only inſtance of a ſubject's giving his ſovereign the lye, to his face; and, therefore, one ſhould hardly believe ſuch an extraordinary fact, were it not unanimouſly atteſted by all the hiſtorians.

The earl is ſent to Guienne. M. Paris.

Notwithſtanding the king's mortal averſion to the earl of Leiceſter, he ſent him governor again to Guienne*, in order to remove him from England, where his credit was too great; and he was alſo apprehenſive, that the earl would obſtruct his deſign of conferring Guienne on prince Edward, his eldeſt ſon, which was immediately done, after his departure. The Gaſcoigns were overjoyed, on this occaſion, as they had no longer the ſame reaſon to fear Leiceſter, who was going to be recalled; and they laid ſo many ſnares for him, that he had like to have been ſurpriſed; but, for his part, he made them frequently feel the effects of his reſentment, before he quitted the province.

Prince Edward is inveſted with Guienne.

Henry demands a ſubſidy of the clergy. M. Paris.

The affront, lately received from the earl of Leiceſter, was not the only thing that gave the king uneaſineſs; for he was ſtill more ſenſibly mortified with the clergy's denial of a ſubſidy. As he was convinced, that a bare demand would be ineffectual, he took care to have it ſupported, by an expreſs order from the court of Rome; and Innocent, alledging that the king could not poſſibly proceed, without an extraordinary aid towards his voyage to the Holy-Land, ordered all eccleſiaſticks to pay him the tenths of their revenues, for three years. The clergy being aſſembled, for this purpoſe, three or four biſhops gained by the king, and particullary the biſhop of Winchеſter, his half-brother, voted in his favour; but the biſhop of Lincoln ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and prevailed on the majority to agree to petition the king, for his ſoul's health, to deſiſt from his demand. The petition of the biſhops ſerved only to exaſperate the king; who ſent them word to take care what they did, ſince they not only oppoſed their temporal and ſpiritual ſovereign, but alſo the univerſal church, and Jeſus Chriſt himſelf; but, without regarding theſe menaces, the clergy returned a very offenſive anſwer, upbraiding him, in very harſh terms, for his extortions, tyranny, and violation of promiſes and oaths, and then broke up, without waiting his anſwer, under the pretence that, both the archbiſhops being abſent, they could do nothing, without the conſent of their primates. Henry, finding that he could obtain nothing from this aſſembly, attempted to gain the principal members, by careſſes; and, with this view, he ſent for the biſhop of Ely; and, cauſing him to be brought into his cloſet, received him very graciouſly, deſigning to extort ſome promiſe from him; but this prelate, who was no courtier, far from having the leaſt complaiſance for the king, expreſly told him, that it was imprudent to engage in an expedition to the Holy-Land, and that he ought to take warning by the unfortunate example of the king of France, who now lay languiſhing in the hands of the Infidels; and Henry, perceiving, contrary to his expectation, that the biſhop aſſumed the air of a counſellor, not having patience to hear him any longer, commanded him to depart out of his preſence †. 1252.

The mutual animoſity between the king and his ſubjects.

As the Engliſh perſiſted, in refuſing money, the king, being offended, placed ſtill greater confidence in the Poictevins; whilſt the continual favours, he heaped on the foreigners, entirely alienated the hearts of the barons. It was, therefore, next to impoſſible but theſe mutual diſcontents ſhould produce, at laſt, very fatal effects, as it afterwards happened; and it is even a wonder, that the rupture, between the king and the barons, did not ſooner break out; for, to ſuch a height, was this animoſity arrived, that, as he had no regard for his ſubjects, they, on the other hand, uſed as little ceremony, in their complaints againſt his male-adminiſtration. The Londoners, eſpecially, were greatly incenſed, on the account of the frequent exactions impoſed on them; but they had ſoon freſh cauſe to complain of a tax of 20 marks of gold, laid on the city by the king. This impoſition was inconſiderable, in itſelf, and only concerned the city of London; yet the whole kingdom murmured at it, as it flowed from an arbitrary power, of which they dreaded the conſequences. However, a few days after, the king, entirely regardleſs of the Londoners, commanded them to ſhut up their ſhops, during Weſtminſter-fair, which laſted, 15 days. This innovation, being eſteemed a direct breach of the privileges of the city, occaſioned loud murmurs, among the inhabitants, and a reſentment, the effects of which became viſible, upon the firſt opportunity.

He attacks Leiceſter again, tho' in vain.

Whereas princes uſually make uſe of ſeemingly favourable junctures, Henry had a very particular talent to form all his projects, at the moſt improper ſeaſons. He was not in-

* Matthew Paris relates, that the king told him, at his departure, That, if he was ſuch a lover of war, he might there find ſufficient employment, and alſo a reward anſwerable to his merits, as his father had done before him. To which the earl boldly replied, That he would go over, and never return, till he had entirely ſubdued the enemies, and reduced the rebellious ſubjects of an ungrateful prince. M. Paris.

† The king ordered his officers to turn him out of doors, as an ill-bred fellow; nor was the king better uſed by the widow counteſs of Arundel, who waited on him, about her right to a certain wardſhip, which the king challenged, becauſe of a ſmall parcel of land held in Capite. When the counteſs perceived, that ſhe could not prevail on him, ſhe boldly accoſted him, in the following terms: "My lord the king, why do you turn your face from juſtice? for no body can obtain "any right in your court: You are placed between God and us, but you govern neither yourſelf nor us, as you ought: "Are you not aſhamed, both to oppreſs the church and diſquiet the nobles of your kingdom?" The king, bending his brows, replied, "What do you mean, lady counteſs! have the great men of England commiſſioned you to be their advocate?" but ſhe (though young) ſmartly made anſwer, "Not, ſo Sir, the nobles have not made me any ſuch charter, "though you have violated that which you and your father have granted, and ſworn inviolably to obſerve, for which "you have ſo often extorted money from your ſubjects: Where are the liberties of England ſo often reduced into writing? ſo often granted, and yet ſo often redeemed? Therefore, I though a woman, with all your natural ſubjects, do appeal, from you, to the tribunal of God, the great and terrible judge; and let him revenge us." At which reply, the king, being confounded, was ſpeechleſs, becauſe his own conſcience told him, ſhe ſpoke no more than the truth. He only ſaid, at length, "Did not you ask a favour, by reaſon of your being my couſin?" To whom ſhe replied, "Since you have "denied me right, how can I expect any favour?" The king, thus reproved, ſaid no more; and the counteſs went away, without taking leave, or any other ſatisfaction than that of having freely ſpoken her mind. M. Paris.

1252. senſible, that the nobles were diſſatisfied, and in a ſort of combination to protect the earl of Leiceſter; he had, juſt before, given the clergy a freſh cauſe of diſguſt, by procuring a bull to abſolve him from his oath, and entirely alienated the affections of the Londoners, by the violation of their privileges; yet, at this very juncture, he undertook, once more, to have the earl of Leiceſter tried by his peers, whom he convened, for that purpoſe. Accordingly, the event of this affair was far from being anſwerable to his expectations; for, inſtead of condemning the earl, the barons openly declared, that the king had done him very great injuſtice, in giving Guienne to prince Edward, before the term of his government was expired, and without making him any ſatisfaction; but this declaration, which, probably, would have been followed by ſome reſolution diſagreeable to the king, made him diſſolve an aſſembly, which ſeemed ſo little inclinable to favour his deſigns.

1253. The king is entirely governed by foreigners.

Thus, this weak prince, by an unſteady and capricious conduct, increaſed the enmity of his barons, which, above all things, he ought to have dreaded, had he been wiſe enough to take warning by his father's unhappy example; and, being continually beſet with indiſcreet and avaricious foreigners, he was prevailed on by his miniſters to believe, that, as long as he was ſupported by the court of Rome, he might deſpiſe the vain and feeble efforts of his ſubjects. Theſe counſels induced him perpetually to countenance the extortions of the pope, and the avarice of his relations and miniſters, to whom he continually made preſents, with incredible profuſeneſs. Thus, he exhauſted the clear revenues of the crown; and, by a management ſo very inconſiſtent with his own intereſt, he kept himſelf always poor, whilſt his relations, his counſellors, and the pope's creatures, daily enriched themſelves, at the expence of his ſubjects. The biſhop of Lincoln, deſiring to open his eyes, cauſed an exact eſtimate to be taken, this year, of the annual income enjoyed by the foreigners in England; and it was found to amount to above 70,000 marks, when the revenue of the crown, at the ſame time, ſcarce exceeded a third part of that ſum. To this we may add another particular, to ſhew the eaſineſs of this prince, and the rapaciouſneſs of his miniſters; that of Manſel, one of his favourites, a clergyman, who enjoyed no leſs than 700 eccleſiaſtical preferments, at once, which brought him in, yearly, 4000 marks.

The affairs of Sicily.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacted in England, the emperor Conrade and pope Innocent IV. continued their wars in Sicily; but to the great diſadvantage of the laſt, whoſe ſpiritual arms were altogether ineffectual, againſt a prince that deſpiſed them. The pope finding, that he was not in a condition to compaſs his ends, imagined, that, by offering the crown of Sicily to ſome opulent prince, he ſhould eaſily perſuade him to ſupply whatever was neceſſary for the conqueſt; and, of all the European princes, he thought none better qualified to embarque in this undertaking than Richard earl of Cornwall, brother to the king of England. This prince was not only maſter of a large eſtate, which he knew how to manage better than the king, his brother; but it was very probable, that he would be dazzled with the luſtre of a crown, that of England ſeeming to be too remote from him, as the king had two ſons; and, upon this reſolution, Innocent diſpatched one Albert, as his nuncio, to offer him the crown of Sicily, on condition that he would wreſt it from the ſons of Frederick. Richard did not reject the propoſal; yet he inſiſted on certain preliminary articles, which were diſagreeable to the pope. I. That the conqueſt of Sicily ſhould be carried on, at his and the pope's joint charges. II. That Innocent ſhould deliver him up certain places in the kingdom of Naples, as well for his ſecurity, as for magazines. III. That he ſhould give him hoſtages, for the performance of his word. Innocent flattered himſelf, that Richard, conſidering the bare grant of Sicily, as a ſingular favour, would engage to ſupply what money was neceſſary for the conqueſt, and rely on the word of him that made him ſuch a noble preſent; but, perceiving that he would not be his dupe, he dropped the project, and recalled his nuncio; and, this negotiation being rendered abortive, he was obliged to continue the war, at his own expence, till he could engage in the undertaking a prince, that was more pliant and obſequious. 1253.

The ſecret practices of the Gaſcoigns. M. Paris.

Henry fancied, that he had prevented the revolt of the Gaſcoigns, by removing the earl of Leiceſter from the government of Guienne; but it, ſoon after, appeared, that the earl's vigilance, which they conſidered, as an inſuperable obſtacle to their pernicious deſigns, was the real motive of their complaints. Leiceſter had no ſooner reſigned his patent, than a plot was diſcovered in Guienne, to ſurrender that province to the king of Caſtile; for tho' that prince had, hitherto, concealed his pretenſions to Guienne, when he found his party ſtrengthened by the earl of Leiceſter's retreat, he began openly to declare himſelf; pretending a grant of that country from Henry II, confirmed both by Richard and John. It is true, indeed, theſe charters were never produced; but he had artfully perſuaded ſome diſcontented lords, that they were in his hands. Upon this foundation, he formed in Guienne a powerful party, headed by Gaſton de Moncade, viſcount of Barne; and it is very likely, that Henry's want of courage inſpired the king of Caſtile with the thoughts of becoming maſter of Guienne, upon this frivolous title; at leaſt, he believed, that, either by force of arms, or by way of treaty, he ſhould obtain ſome part of that province. However that be, theſe pretenſions, tho' apparently groundleſs, raiſed commotions in Guienne; which made Henry often repent of removing the earl of Leiceſter. In a word, the male-contents, aſſiſted by the king of Caſtile, made ſuch a progreſs, that Henry was conſtrained to go, in perſon, to ſave the country; but there was occaſion for money, and it was in vain to alledge the war in Guienne, to procure any from his ſubjects, who were too much diſſatisfied with all his martial expeditions. He judged it, therefore, moſt expedient to make uſe of his old pretence,

1253. pretence, namely, his voyage to the Holy-Land; and, having convened a parliament, on that account, he demanded a large ſum, to enable him to perform his vow; repreſenting, that, as it was impoſſible for him, hitherto, to undertake the voyage, the chriſtians of Paleſtine muſt have ſuffered exceedingly by theſe delays.

An aid is granted, on condition the charters are kept. M. Paris.

Tho' the barons were fully convinced, that the king did not deſign to go to the Holy-Land, they were afraid, however, of giving him ſome advantage, by refuſing an aid, demanded on ſo plauſible a pretence; and, therefore, they reſolved to grant it, but clogged with conditions, from which they expected ſome benefit, whether the king executed his project, or, as was ſuſpected, applied the money to other uſes. This reſolution being taken, they ſent deputies to him with their anſwer, the ſubſtance of which was, that, provided he would leave to the churches the freedom of elections, and punctually obſerve the king his father's charters, they would do all that was poſſible, to give him ſatisfaction; but Henry, who expected this meſſage, in his reply, owned, that, on certain occaſions, he had carried the prerogative royal ſomewhat too far; tho' he firmly reſolved never to be guilty of the like fault, for the time to come; adding, that they might be aſſured, the charters of king John ſhould be inviolably maintained. Upon this, addreſſing himſelf to ſuch of the deputies as were of the clergy, he intreated them to conſider, that moſt of the prelates, who then governed the church of England, were promoted to their dignities, by means of that prerogative royal, of which they complained; and he enquired, whether they themſelves, at the time of their elections, would have wiſhed for that freedom they, now, ſo ſtrenuouſly demanded? He farther obſerved, that, ſince they expected, that he ſhould correct what was amiſs in the government, they themſelves ought to ſhew him a good example, by reſigning their biſhopricks and abbies, acquired by illegal ways; and he promiſed them, that their places ſhould be filled with perſons of unexceptionable learning and probity. The biſhops, being confounded at this ſharp reprimand, had nothing to anſwer, only "that the "buſineſs, at preſent, was not to undo what "was paſt, but to prevent the like evils, for "the future." As the king's ſole view was to draw money from the parliament, contented with having a little mortified the clergy, he declared, that he was willing to join with the parliament, in all neceſſary meaſures to redreſs the grievances; upon which, the clergy granted him the tenths of their revenues, for three years, and the barons, three marks of every knight's fee held immediately of the crown.

A curſe is denounced againſt all that ſhould violate the charters. M. Paris.

The king having ſo expreſly promiſed to obſerve the charters, without any ſollicitation, convened, in the great hall of the palace of Weſtminſter, an aſſembly, at which were preſent all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, with lighted tapers in their hands; but the king would not hold one, alledging, he would lay his hand upon his heart, during the whole ceremony, to demonſtrate, that he ſincerely conſented to what was about to be pronounced. Then the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſtanding up before all the people, denounced a terrible anathema againſt all, that, henceforward, ſhould oppoſe, directly or indirectly, the obſervance of the two charters; and alſo againſt thoſe that ſhould, in the leaſt, violate, diminiſh, or alter the laws and conſtitutions of the kingdom. This curſe being denounced, the two charters were read aloud, and confirmed by the king, who ſtill kept his hand on his breaſt *; and then every one threw down his taper upon the ground, wiſhing that thoſe, who violated the charters, might thus ſmoke in hell.

Henry endeavours to break through his engagement.

One would have imagined, that the king's aſſent to a curſe, ſo ſolemnly denounced, was an undoubted proof of his intent religiouſly to perform his promiſe; and, perhaps, he really intended it, when he laid his hand upon his heart; yet the parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, than he contrived all poſſible means, to evade it. Henry was naturally inconſtant, and not over-ſcrupulous; and, beſides, it is aſſerted, that he was perſuaded by ſome of his favourites, that, whilſt theſe charters remained in force, he ſhould be no more than the ſhadow of a king; but, perceiving that he was reſtrained by the conſideration of his oath, they adviſed him to apply to the pope, intimating that, for two or three hundred marks, he might eaſily procure it to be annulled. This pernicious advice was agreeable to his inclinations; and, therefore, he immediately embraced it, trampling on the dictates of honour and religion, and entirely diſregarding its fatal conſequences; but, if it be ſtrange, that this weak prince ſhould ſo little regard his word and oath, there is no leſs reaſon to be ſurprized that ſuch principles ſhould be authorized by the common practice of him, who ſtiles himſelf the vicar of Chriſt.

He ſets out for Guienne.

In the interim, Henry expended, in preparations for the war in Guienne, the money granted by the parliament, for the voyage to the Holy-Land; and, when all things were in readineſs, he came to Portſmouth, where his troops were ordered to meet him; and then, leaving the regency to the queen and prince Richard, he embarqued, attended by a great number of lords, who, being his military tenants, were obliged to that ſervice. Upon his arrival at Bourdeaux, he headed his army, and beſieged Reole-Caſtle then in the power of the rebels, who, depending upon the king's uſual indolence, neglected to fortify the places they had ſeized; by which means, he eaſily became maſter, not only of this, but of all the other caſtles that were in their hands. In the mean time, as the king of Caſtile did not ſupport his adherents, Henry imagined that he waited for his departure, to raiſe freſh commotions in the province, and was apprehenſive, that would be always

* M. Paris ſeems to intimate, that only the biſhops held tapers in their hands, when he ſays, "that the king "would not hold one, becauſe he was not a prieſt;" and the ſame author farther obſerves, that, the whole ceremony being over, Henry expreſs'd himſelf, thus: "So help me God, I will inviolably obſerve all theſe things, as I am a "chriſtian, a knight, and a crowned and anointed king."

1253. the caſe; which gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs, becauſe, to prevent his enemy's deſigns, he found himſelf obliged to keep a ſtanding army in Guienne, tho' he was not in a condition to maintain it. In this perplexity, he diſpatched an ambaſſador to Spain, with orders to propoſe a marriage between Edward, his eldeſt ſon, and Eleanora, ſiſter to Alphonſo, king of Caſtile. Alphonſo, perceiving that there was no proſpect of his becoming maſter of Guienne, ſince the arrival of the Engliſh ſuccours, and alſo conſidering that the match propoſed was very advantageous for the princeſs, his daughter, readily conſented to it, and, thereupon, reſigned to prince Edward all his pretenſions to Guienne; but this affair was tranſacted, with the greateſt ſecrecy, Henry deſigning to uſe the pretence of the war, to obtain a freſh ſupply from the parliament. In the interim, the earl of Leiceſter, who retired into France, finding Henry engaged in a war with the Gaſcoigns, levied ſome troops, at his own charge, and came and offered his ſervice; and the arrival of the earl, with the report of a private treaty, between Alphonſo and the king, deterring the rebels, cauſed them to return to their allegiance.

Henry tries in vain to procure money from the parliament.

In the mean while, Henry, pretending that he was afraid of the attacks of the Caſtilians, ſent orders to the queen, to ſummon a parliament and demand an aid; but the parliament, having received ſome intelligence of the treaty, negotiating in Spain, replied, that all the barons would be ready to ſerve the king, with their lives and fortunes, upon the firſt notice of his being invaded by the Caſtilians. This was not ſuch an anſwer, as the king expected; but, believing that the treaty of Burgos was yet a ſecret, he wrote to the queen and prince Richard, that he was extremely embarraſſed, having received certain advice, that the king of Caſtile was preparing to invade Guienne, with a formidable army of Moors; and, therefore, he commanded them to preſs the parliament to grant an aid anſwerable to his neceſſities. However, the news of the treaty with Alphonſo being confirmed by the earl of Leiceſter, who was returned into England, the queen durſt not ſollicit the parliament, upon ſo frivolous a pretence; and Henry, being diſappointed, was forced to ſend orders to the prince, his brother, to extort money from the Jews, by all poſſible means. Richard diſcharged his commiſſion, with ſo much rigour, that the miſerable Jews deſired leave to depart the kingdom; but, even that being refuſed them, they were conſtrained to pay the king a greater ſum than ever.

The marriage of prince Edward.

As ſoon as the queen was informed, that her ſon's marriage was concluded, ſhe haſtened to Bourdeaux, with Edward and Edmund, her ſons, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and, immediately after her arrival, prince Edward was ſent, in great ſtate, to Burgos, where he married the infanta Eleonora; and, in a few days, he departed with his bride, for Bourdeaux, where the king and queen waited for them. During their ſtay in that city, the king confirmed, by a new patent, the grant of Guienne to the prince, his ſon, to which he annexed Ireland, with the ſovereignty of Wales; and, having diſpatched his buſineſs in Gaſcoigne, he prepared for his departure; but, to avoid the fatigues of the ſea, he deſired leave of the king of France, who had happily purchaſed his liberty of the Infidels, with a vaſt ranſom, to paſs through his dominions, and embarque at Bouſogne; who not only very courteouſly granted his requeſt, but, meeting him at Chartres, conducted him to Paris, where he entertained him, eight days, in a handſome manner. 1253.

Henry exacts money from London. M. Paris.

Henry made his entry into London, with extraordinary pomp, and received from the city a preſent of 100 l. ſterling, which the Londoners uſually gave, on the like occaſions; but, as he did not ſeem to be ſatisfied, they preſented him alſo a rich piece of plate, of exquiſite workmanſhip, with which he was contented; tho', a few days after, he extorted from the city a more conſiderable ſum. A certain prieſt, accuſed of murder, having eſcaped out of Newgate, where he was confined by the biſhop, he amerced the city in no leſs than 3000 marks, as a puniſhment for its neglect; which ſentence was eſteemed to be the more unjuſt, as it was proved, by ſubſtantial evidence, that the biſhop's officers favoured the priſoner's eſcape.

The affairs of Sicily.

To return to the affairs of Sicily, Conrade and pope Innocent being very hotly engaged in war, the pope, at length, departed from Lyons, to repair to Genoa; from whence he deſigned to go and relieve the city of Naples, which Conrade cloſely beſieged; but, this reſolution being taken, too late, the emperor had time to take the capital, and afterwards all the reſt of the kingdom. This fortunate ſucceſs inſpired him with the deſign of ſeizing alſo the iſland of Sicily; which, if we may give credit to certain authors, he accompliſhed by a notorious treachery. It is ſaid, that, enticing, to Melphi, young Henry, his brother, to whom Frederick II. bequeathed Sicily, he procured him to be murdered; which prince, according to an hiſtorian of Naples, of all Frederick's ſons, was the worthieſt and moſt hopeful.

Henry refuſes the offer of the two Sicily's. M. Paris.

Before the death of the young prince, the pope, his affairs being in great confuſion, by Conrade's progreſs, diſpatched to England the ſame Albert formerly mentioned, to offer Henry the crown of both Sicily's; but he rejected this offer, becauſe of his nephew, whom he was unwilling to depoſe. Innocent, not ſucceeding in this project, took occaſion, from the death of the king of Sicily, to renew Conrade's excommunication, whom he charged with the murder of his brother; but the emperor, whether he was innocent, or thought it would be difficult to convict him of this crime, not only boldly denied it, but wrote to the king of England, to acquaint him with the death of the young prince, and to expreſs his extreme grief, on that account. This is not a proper place to examine, whether his ſorrow was ſincere; for it is ſufficient, to obſerve, that, if he was guilty of the murder, he did not long enjoy the fruits of his treachery. He died, five months after, poiſoned, as 1253. as was reported, by a phyſician bribed by Manfred, his baſtard brother; but, not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting the hand, which was the occaſion of his death, he left the guardianſhip of his ſon, Conradin, to the ſame Manfred.

Innocent becomes maſter of the kingdom of Naples.

The death of Conrade, in 1253, entirely altered the poſture of affairs in the two Sicily's; for Manfred, under the pretence of acting for his pupil, who was in Germany, formed the project of becoming maſter of the two kingdoms; but he foreſaw ſo many difficulties, that he was obliged to conceal his deſign, till a more favourable opportunity. In the interim, Innocent, who then reſided at Perouſe, headed an army, and marched into the kingdom of Naples, where the people declared in his favour; and Manfred himſelf, perceiving that it was not poſſible for him to oppoſe the torrent, waited on him at Naples; when he ſo artfully diſſembled, that the pope, believing him to be really in his intereſt, admitted him to all his councils, and confirmed to him the emperor his father's grant of the principality of Tarentum. Manfred, finding himſelf ſo much in the pope's favour, began to contrive how to render it ſubſervient to his deſigns; and, with that view, he adviſed him to diſperſe his troops all over the kingdom, ſeconding his advice with two reaſons, by which Innocent ſuffered himſelf to be enſnared. The firſt was, the neceſſity of eaſing the inhabitants of Naples, to prevent their revolting; and the other reaſon was grounded upon its being equally important to keep in awe the Germans, left by Conrade in the country, under the command of two Bavarian princes. This ſtratagem anſwering his expectation, he applied to the two German princes, who, probably, were as eaſily to be deceived as the pope; and, by means of ſome ſecret emiſſaries, he repreſented to them, that he was in the intereſt of Conradin, and only feigned, out of policy, to adhere to the pope. Then he magnified the pope's forces in the kingdom, and adviſed them to go to Germany, for recruits; and what farther induced theſe two princes, to follow his advice, was the aſſurance he gave them, that, during their abſence, he would take care of their troops. He promiſed, that he would undertake to engage the pope to ſupply them with neceſſaries, in hopes of ſending them back to Germany, and, in the mean while, prolong the negotiation, till their return. Thus, by this double advice, Manfred weakened the pope's forces, by cauſing him to diſperſe them, and freed himſelf from the troubleſome preſence of the two German princes, keeping their troops to be employed, as occaſion offered.

Innocent offers Sicily for prince Edmund.

The army, brought by Innocent into the kingdom of Naples, could not be maintained, without a greater expence than he was able to bear; and being apprehenſive that his troops would quickly diſband themſelves, if he did not find money to pay them, he made a freſh attempt upon the king of England, and with better ſucceſs than before. Under the pretence of acquainting Henry with the circumſtances of the death of his nephew, late king of Sicily, he ſent a nuncio, to offer him, in his name, the crown of the two Sicily's, for prince Edmund, his ſecond ſon; intimating to him, 1254. that his ſcruples were no longer ſeaſonable, ſince the death of the young king, his nephew; that, beſides, he ought to look upon this offer as a very particular mark of his eſteem and affection, which any prince in Europe would conſider, as a great honour; and that a crown was a preſent to be accepted, without much deliberation. Henry, without conſulting his brother or the parliament, from whom alone he could expect the neceſſary aids for this undertaking, accepted this imaginary preſent, with the utmoſt gratitude; and, from that moment, he cauſed prince Edmund to aſſume the title of king of Sicily; but this imprudent prince, being raſhly engaged in this affair, never had the power, or policy, to avoid the ſnares laid for him by the pope, under that pretence. Innocent aſſured him, that, with an inconſiderable ſum of money, he might have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing, in a little time, his ſecond ſon on the throne; and that a crown, like that of Sicily, well deſerved ſome pains, to obtain it. Upon this, Henry readily ſent the pope all his own money, all that the prince, his brother, would lend him, and all that he could extort from the Jews, or his other ſubjects, by means of itinerant juſtices ſent into every county; but, his holineſs being ſtill diſſatisfied, he was ſo very imprudent, as to oblige himſelf, under pain of being excommunicated and deprived of the royal dignity, to pay all ſuch ſums as the pope ſhould borrow, in order to accompliſh their enterprize. Innocent, having this unlimited power, by borrowings, real or pretended, involved Henry ſo deeply, that his ordinary revenue could not poſſibly anſwer the expence; and, therefore, he was frequently under a neceſſity of making ſuch demands upon the parliament, as rendered him daily more deteſtable to his ſubjects; but he was ſo fond of this affair, that he deſpiſed the complaints and murmurs of the people, to find the neceſſary money, to put it in execution.

The pope uſes ſeveral means, to get the king money. Act. Pub.

Innocent was very ſenſible, that it was not in the king's power to perform his engagements; but he hoped, by making uſe of the plenitude of his apoſtolical authority, to furniſh him with means ſufficient, to procure money from his ſubjects. He, firſt of all, ſent a bull, directed to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and biſhop of Cheſter, impowering them to borrow money of perſons of all conditions, in the name of the church of Rome, with orders to pay the ſums, thus raiſed, to the king; and it is obvious, that the pope uſed the name of the church of Rome, becauſe he knew that no one would lend the king money, and that the church could compel people, eſpecially eccleſiaſticks, to lend their money.

The voyage to the Holy-Land gave the pope a pretence, to grant the king two tenths upon the clergy; but, at the ſame time, he commanded the money to be depoſited in a ſafe place, from whence it could not be taken, without his orders, under the colour of preventing the king from applying it to any other uſe, than the expedition to Paleſtine; tho', in reality, theſe ſums were intended for the conqueſt of Sicily. By a third bull, he granted the king a 20th part 1254. of the church's revenue in Scotland, provided the money could be raiſed, without giving offence; and, in the interim, as he had himſelf engaged to contribute to the charges of this projected conqueſt, he promiſed to be anſwerable to prince Edmund, for 100,000 French livres, half of which was to be paid, upon his arrival at Lyons. A vaſt contribution towards an enterprize of this nature! yet the obligation was clogged with the following clauſe, "unleſs the pope ſhould have occaſion for the "money himſelf, for the defence of the holy "ſee."

Notwithſtanding the pope's care to procure the king money, he was afraid it would not be ſufficient, or that the king would ſquander away the treaſure he ſhould raiſe; and, therefore, he admoniſhed him, by a letter, to retrench all ſuperfluous expences, even thoſe deſigned for pious uſes, becauſe the conqueſt of Sicily was above all other works of charity. Tho' Edmund, as yet, had only an empty title, the king, his father, blinded with the hopes inſtilled by the pope, conſidered this young prince, as the real monarch of both Sicily's; and, in this belief, he cauſed him to give, by an authentick patent, to Thomas earl of Savoy, the queen's uncle, the principality of Capua, which, like the reſt of the kingdom, was ſtill in diſpute between the pope and Conradin. However, tho' the pope ſeemed to diveſt himſelf of this kingdom, in favour of Edmund, he did not ſuffer him to diſpoſe of any thing, without his conſent; and there are, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral grants made by the pope, in this very kingdom, to the marqueſs of Hoemburch, his general, and others.

Manfred aims at being king of Sicily.

Whilſt the pope continued his negotiations in England, with all poſſible ſecrecy, leſt he ſhould alarm the Sicilians, Manfred, the Baſtard, took meaſures, at Naples, to procure the crown of the two Sicily's; for he tamper'd with the German troops brought thither by the emperor Conrade, and ſecured the aſſiſtance of the Saracens, who were very numerous in both kingdoms. As ſoon as matters were ripe, he only waited for an opportunity to declare himſelf openly; and it was not long before he met with a proper juncture. Having killed a man that affronted him, at the pope's court, and being obliged to abſcond, he was ſummoned to appear and take his trial; and, upon his refuſal, Innocent orders his troops to march to the little town of Nocera, inhabited by Saracens, where the murderer fled for refuge. This furniſhed Manfred with a pretence to aſſemble his friends, who were already prepared; and, with the ſuccours that came to him, from ſeveral parts, he met the troops that marched againſt him, and, attacking them, with advantage, between Troya and Foggia, killed a part, and put the reſt to flight. Innocent was extremely ſurprized, at the defeat of his army, and to find him to be a freſh enemy, whom he deſigned, as his inſtrument, to rid the kingdom of the Germans; but, this incident convincing him that Manfred had deceived him, he perceived, ſince the Germans eſpouſed the cauſe of the Baſtard, it would be difficult to maintain himſelf in the kingdom, without other forces; and, in this belief, he repeated his inſtances to the king of England, for men and money, with an Engliſh general, threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to give the crown of Sicily to another prince; but, this ſupply being, as yet, very remote, he was ſo mortified to ſee his affairs, in ſo ill a ſituation, that he fell into a fit of ſickneſs, which laid him in his grave. Tho' moſt hiſtorians reckon above a year, between the death of Innocent IV. and the election of Alexander IV, his ſucceſſor, it evidently appears, from the Collection of the Publick Acts of England, that Alexander IV. was elected, a few months after Innocent's deceaſe; and, indeed, we find there bulls of both theſe popes, dated the end of the year 1254. 1254

Innocent dies, and is ſucceeded by Alexander IV.

1255. Alexander, copying after his predeceſſor, reſolved to proſecute the war againſt Manfred, who, ſtill concealing his deſigns, declared for Conradin, leſt he ſhould diſguſt the German troops which he really wanted; and, as he had no leſs occaſion for the ſuccours from England, inſtead of menacing Henry, as Innocent did, he ſent the biſhop of Bononia, with a ring, to inveſt, by that mark, prince Edmund with the kingdom of Sicily; but, whilſt the legate was on the road, Alexander's affairs were intirely ruined. The pope, borrowing money from all hands, on the king of England's account, drew together an army of 60,000 men, and gave the command to cardinal Octavian Ulbaldini Florentinus, with orders to beſiege Manfred in Nocera; and the cardinal had, for his lieutenant-general, the marqueſs of Hoemburch a German, who had long ſerv'd Innocent IV, tho' he was now corrupted by Manfred. Upon the approach of his army to Nocera, the marqueſs, who watched an opportunity, to engage Octavian in ſome falſe ſtep, repreſented to him, that it was not only needleſs, but would leſſen his honour, to employ ſo great an army againſt a paultry town; that the country adjacent afforded no forage; and, beſides, that it was plain Manfred could make no great efforts, ſince he kept himſelf ſo cloſely immured. The eccleſiaſtical general, who was not verſed in the art of war, conſidering the marqueſs, as an able and faithful ſoldier, was eaſily perſuaded to divide his army, on the groundleſs notion of his enemy's being afraid; but he had no ſooner committed this error than Manfred ſallied out of Nocera, and, ſuddenly attacking the army, which was coming to beſiege him, entirely put them to the rout. The pope's loſs, in this action, was ſo great, that he was obliged to abandon the country; and, thus, Manfred eaſily became maſter of the two Sicily's, and was crowned at Palermo, after ſpreading a report that young Conradin was deceaſed in Germany.

1255. Alexander levies a great army againſt Manfred. Act. Pub.

The legate inveſts Edmund with the Sicily's M. Paris.

Though Alexander had no refuge in Italy, he did not deſpair of reſtoring his affairs, by means of the king of England, who was very little accquainted with the late revolution, in a country were he was ſo greatly concerned; for the biſhop of Bononia came to London, and, without mentioning what was tranſacted in the kingdom of Naples, or Manfred's coronation, 1255. ronation, inveſted prince Edmund with the two Sicily's; and with a ſolemnity, that increaſed Henry's ſatisfaction. This weak prince was as highly pleaſed with the ceremony, as if Edmund had been actually put in poſſeſſion of a crown; but, if ſome of his creatures congratulated him, upon this augmentation of glory, it gave great uneaſineſs to the wiſe and judicious, to find that their ſovereign become more and more the pope's dupe; and, indeed, it was eaſy to perceive, that he was engaged in an undertaking, which all the ready-money in the kingdom would not be ſufficient to accompliſh.

The king demands an aid of the parliament. M. Paris.

Henry had no reaſon to expect any great aids from his ſubjects, whom he had extremely diſguſted; much leſs could he hope to gain the barons approbation of a project, ſo raſhly undertaken, without conſulting thoſe, who alone could furniſh him with means to come off, with honour; yet he demanded of a parliament, ſummoned, this year, a ſubſidy, with the ſame aſſurance, as if he was labouring, purely, for the good of the publick. Though the parliament was unconcerned about the ſucceſs of the affairs of Sicily, they expected, however, to reap ſome advantage from the king's neceſſities, by improving this opportunity to procure, in a laſting manner, the obſervance of the two charters; and, with this view, they repreſented to the king, that they would grant him an aid, on the following conditions: That the charters ſhould be obſerved; and that the juſticiary, treaſurer, and chancellor, nominated by the parliament, ſhould be render'd incapable of being turned out, unleſs by the ſame authority; but the king, judging it improper to conſent to theſe terms, prorogued the parliament, till Michaelmas.

In the interim, Henry took a journey to Scotland, on account of the queen, his daughter, who complained of her ill uſage from thoſe that governed the kingdom, during the king her husband's minority; and the preſence of the king of England was very ſerviceable, in ſettling the affairs of that kingdom; tho' he made but a ſhort ſtay in Scotland, being impatient to return into England, on account of the affairs of Sicily.

Ruſtand, the pope's nuncio, comes into England with ſeveral bulls. M. Paris.

The ſums, pretended to be borrowed by this and the former pope, for the affairs of Sicily, were ſo exceſſive, that the king ſaw it impoſſible to ſatisfy the creditors, real or fictitious; but Alexander, imagining that the Engliſh, and particulary the clergy, were reſponſible for their ſovereign, uſed all poſſible means, to extort money from England, which was already ſo much exhauſted. His firſt attempts were made by Ruſtand, a nuncio, whom he furniſhed with ſeveral bulls, in order to exact money from the clergy; and the firſt, produced by the nuncio, was an order to collect a tenth in England, Ireland, and even Scotland, as well for the pope's as the king's uſe. The pope laid this impoſition on them, "Notwithſtanding any former letters, "indulgences, privileges, exemptions, or other "grants, under any form, and for any cauſe "whatſoever, and notwithſtanding all objections "which could be deviſed." And a ſecond bull impowered the nuncio to change the king's vow to go to the Holy-Land, into that of undertaking the conqueſt of Sicily; a conqueſt, according to the pope, much more important than that of Jeruſalem; and Henry engaged in this new vow, by a ſolemn oath on the reliques of St. Edward, as he had done, with regard to the firſt. The nuncio likewiſe ordered a Cruſade to be preached againſt Manfred, as an enemy to the chriſtian name, promiſing the pardon of their ſins to all that ſhould aſſiſt the holy ſee againſt that excommunicated prince; but the publication of this Cruſade was of little conſequence in England, tho' its effects were felt in Paleſtine, as it obliged the chriſtians in that country, when they found the ſuccours, intended for them, diverted to other uſes, to conclude with the Saracens a truce for ten years. 1255.

The parliament meets.

The parliament, that was prorogued, being aſſembled, the king ſollicited, in vain, for a ſupply; tho' he had ſummoned none of the lords, that ſhewed moſt ſteadineſs, in the laſt ſeſſion; but, for this very reaſon, the parliament took occaſion to refuſe his demand; alledging that, purſuant to the tenor of the great charter, they were not obliged to debate any buſineſs, unleſs all, that had a right to ſit in parliament, were ſummoned. Henry, as there was no proſpect of procuring any money from this aſſembly, diſſolved them, and made uſe of other means, to attain his ends; and he would fain have borrowed, once more, of the prince, his brother; but Richard, inſtead of complying with his requeſt, was diſpleaſed, that the king ſhould raſhly engage in this affair, without vouchſafing to conſult either him, or the barons of the realm.

1256. Several bulls, to procure money from England. An. Burt.

However, what Henry could not accompliſh, by his own authority, he attempted to effect, by the pope's concurrence, who was the more ready to aſſiſt him, as his own intereſt was nearly concerned; and it may be ſafely affirmed, that, in this unhappy century, the court of Rome had loſt all ſenſe of ſhame. Of this what I am about to relate is an inconteſtable evidence, not founded upon the teſtimony of a ſingle hiſtorian, whoſe fidelity ſome have diſputed, but upon the very bulls of Alexander IV, extant in the records of England, as printed in the Collection of the Publick Acts; tho', by the way, nothing more effectually confutes all that has been alledged, to weaken the authority of Matthew Paris, than the harmony between the bulls and his Hiſtory. What is ſtill more ſurprizing, in the conduct of Alexander, is, that he did not even employ, in the war againſt Manfred, the vaſt ſums continually drawn from England, under that pretence; for, by comparing together the Hiſtories of England and Sicily, we ſhall find, that, whilſt the pope was draining England of money, for the projected conqueſt, he ſuffered Manfred quietly to enjoy his crown, without uſing any effectual endeavours to dethrone him. Thus, the conqueſt of Sicily was only the pope's decoy, to procure large ſums from Henry, upon the vain expectation of placing his ſon Edmund on the throne; for, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, under the year 1255, there are ſeveral bulls, which clearly ſhew, with what rapaciouſneſs the Roman pontiff exhauſted wretched England.

In

1255. In one of these bulls, he orders Henry to pay 4000l. to the bishop of Bononia, for the charges of his legateship.

In another, dated the same month, he confirms the change of the king's vow to go to the Holy-Land, into that of an expedition into Sicily, in order that the money, intended for the war against the Saracens, might be applied to discharge the debts contracted for the conquest of that kingdom.

By one of the same sort, directed to the archbishop of Canterbury, he makes the same change, with respect to the vow of the king of Norway and his subjects; and then he commands them to send into England, for the pretended expedition to Sicily, the money raised for the voyage to the Holy-Land.

A third enjoins all the English, who received any money, for their journey to Palestine, to pay it to certain commissioners, to be employed in the Sicilian expedition.

Though he had, before, confirmed the change of Henry's vow, he granted him, however, by a bull, the 20th part of the clergy's revenue in Scotland, to be employed in the expedition to the Holy-Land; but this bull, being of a later date than that, by which the king's vow was changed, must be considered, as a real cheat, to persuade the Scots, that their money should be expended in the war against the Infidels.

After this, by another bull, he absolves the Scots from their vow of going to the Holy-Land, on condition that they would send into England a certain sum, to be employed in the conquest of Sicily.

He granted the same favour to the English, by a bull, dated in August, the same year.

Lastly, by another in October, he commanded his nuncio to compel the English bishops, to pay the tenths granted to the king, in order to discharge the debts contracted, since his engagements with Innocent IV.

If the originals of all these bulls were not to be found, among the records of England, it would be scarce credible, that Christ's vicar had so little of the christian, as to prefer his own private quarrel before the cause of God, the name, then, given to the Crusades against Infidels; nor is it less surprizing, that Alexander should oblige the Scots and Norwegians, who lived, in the utmost bounds of the north, to contribute to the charges of his quarrel with the house of Swabia, about a kingdom situated, in the most southern parts of Europe; but, if what M. Paris adds be true, which, by the way, is, to the last degree, probable, it will be easy to perceive, that, to raise money, there was no means, however unjust, but what was approved by the present pope.

The sums borrowed, in the king's name, amounted, according to the pope's account, to 135,540 marks, principal money, besides interest; tho' he was sensible, that the king's revenue was hardly sufficient for his necessary expences; and, therefore, he caused Henry to allow that all the extraordinary levies of money, in his kingdom, should be applied to that use, for which, he undertook to find means himself, to raise what sums were requisite, on this occasion. 1255. It was not so much the purses of the people, or barons, as of the clergy, that were to be drained; for as the clergy had most ready money, so they more tamely submitted to the pope, than the people would to the king.

A strange means used by the pope, to extort money from the clergy. M. Paris. An. Burt.

Accordingly, Alexander made use of a very extraordinary means, suggested to him by the bishop of Hereford, by causing a great number of promissary notes to be drawn, whereby each bishop, abbot, or prior in England, acknowledged to have received of such a merchant of Sienna, Florence, or some other place in Italy, the sum of-----, for the occasions of his church, and obliged himself to repay it, at a limited time; and, upon this, endeavours were used to constrain each of them to sign one of these notes, as if he had really borrowed the money; but this was such an oppression, that it would be difficult to find a parallel instance, among the most infamous tyrants.

Rustand, having assembled all the prelates of the kingdom, acquainted them with the pope's pleasure, that each of them should sign one of these notes and bind himself speedily to pay the sum mentioned therein, under pain of excommunication; but this proposal so greatly surprized them, that the bishop of London could not forbear saying aloud, "That he would "sacrifice his life, rather than submit to so ty-"rannical an oppression. The bishop of Wor-"cester declared as much; and, in a word, the "prelates replied, that the clergy of England "would not be slaves to the pope." The nuncio complained to the king of this obstinate answer, intimating that the bishop of London was the author of the disobedience of the clergy; upon which, Henry, falling into a violent passion with that prelate, assured him, that, since he was afraid neither of his, nor the pope's indignation, he should presently feel the effects; but, this menace being incapable of daunting the prelate, he replied, "He very "well knew, that the king and the pope were "more potent than he; but that, if he was "deprived of his mitre, he would clap a hel-"met, in its place." However, notwithstanding this resolution, the nuncio pursued his project; and, by the help of the bishop of Hereford, he sowed dissension among the chief of the clergy, by caressing some, deterring others, and procuring accusations to be brought against some, from whence he took occasion to excommunicate them; and these censures were the more terrible, because, if, within 40 days, they did not sue for absolution, which could only be obtained, by submitting to the pope's pleasure, at once, all their revenues were confiscated. 1256. M. Paris.

However, what the king and pope extorted from private persons, by these compulsive methods, could not amount to a sum sufficient to answer their occasions; and there was a necessity of prevailing with all the clergy to sign the notes. Rustand, therefore, once more, summoned the prelates, about this affair; but the absence of the archbishop of Canterbury, who was out of the kingdom, and the vacancy of the see of York, furnished the bishops with a pretence to desire a delay, which could not be refused 1256. refuſed. They were in hopes, that time would produce ſome favourable turn, to exempt them from paying the money demanded; but the nuncio, falling into a rage, declared, that, he was extremely aſtoniſhed, that his maſter's will ſhould meet with the leaſt oppoſition. Leonard, a deputy or prolocutor for the clergy, inveighing againſt the injuſtice of the pope's demand, Ruſtand commanded him to ſay, whether he ſpoke for himſelf, or in the name of the prelates; and then he wrote down the deputy's words, ſaying, he would inform the pope of his inſolent expreſſions. Another clergyman, willing likewiſe to ſpeak, ſomewhat freely, of this matter, the nuncio told him, in a furious tone, that, if he had not a regard for the biſhops, he would not leave him a hair on his head.

The reſpite granted the clergy being expired, all the prelates, with the archdeacons, the repreſentatives of the inferior clergy, aſſembled at London; and, as this affair was the occaſion of their meeting, Ruſtand renewed his inſtances, the very firſt day. The clergy replied, by Leonard, their prolocutor, that their poverty prevented them from complying with the pope's demand, eſpecially as it was neither juſt nor reaſonable; but the nuncio made anſwer, "That, as all "churches belonged to the pope, he might, "in juſtice, diſpoſe of their incomes, at his pleaſure. "Leonard replied, in the following terms: "Indeed, all churches might be ſaid, "in ſome ſenſe, to belong to the pope, as he "is their protector and defender; but he had "no right to appropriate them to his private "uſe. In like manner, as we ſay in England, "all things are the king's, tho' no man ever "imagined, that he was the proprietor of all "the eſtates of his ſubjects; ſo, with reſpect "to the lands of the church, it can never be "proved, that it was the intention of the foun-"ders to give them to the pope." This reply only, ſo much the more, incenſed the nuncio; who not judging it expedient to argue and diſpute any longer, contented himſelf, with ſaying, in a menacing tone, "Let every one ſpeak for himſelf, "that the pope may know his friends from his "enemies." However, his violent proceedings did not anſwer his expectation; for the prelates, exaſperated at this treatment, unanimouſly replied, that they neither could, nor would ſubmit to ſuch an unreaſonable exaction; that this was their final reſolution; and that they were ready to ſuffer death, in a cauſe much more juſt than that, for which the bleſſed St. Thomas Becket endured martyrdom. The nuncio, upon this, grew more calm, and ſaid, that he would go himſelf and confer with the pope, about the difficulties which occurred, in the execution of his orders; and the clergy ſent alſo the dean of St. Paul's, as their repreſentative, to acquaint his holineſs with the reaſons of their refuſal. To finiſh, at once, this affair, I ſhall mention, here, the preſſing terms the clergy obtained from the court of Rome, after frequent and preſſing ſollicitations. As the pope pretended, that the ſums, in diſpute, were really borrowed, for the ſervice of the king and church, he ordered that each prelate ſhould contribute his quota, in proportion to his revenue; but that the money, ſo paid, ſhould be deducted out of the tenths, which ſhould, hereafter, be granted to the king; and, after this deciſion, the clergy were forced to pay money they had not borrowed, and to the payment of which they were obliged, without their knowledge. 1256.

The nuncio attacks the Ciſtercian abbots

Some time after, the ſame nuncio, having convened all the abbots of the Ciſtercian order, demanded one year's revenue of their wooll, to ſupply the occaſions of the pope and the king; but they replied, that they could not grant ſuch a demand, unleſs it was firſt debated, in a general chapter of their order. This reply diſpleaſing the Italian prelate, he fell into a paſſion, and ſwore, that, if he could not prevail with them, in a body, he would treat them in ſuch a manner, ſingly, that they ſhould be conſtrained to comply; and, accordingly, for trivial or pretended faults, he attacked them, one after another, cauſing them to be grievouſly fined; but this order had ſuch powerful protectors, about the pope, that the nuncio was commanded to drop his deſign. The bull of Alexander IV. M. Paris.

The tyranny, exerciſed by the court of Rome, upon the Engliſh clergy, was of ſo ſtrange a nature, that the hiſtorian, who relates all theſe facts, leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected of inventing them, inſerts, at large, in his hiſtory, one of Alexander's bulls, which ſhews, that nothing was done, in the affair of the notes, without his expreſs orders. This bull, directed to Ruſtand, concludes thus: "You "ſhall take care to inform the king, that all "this is our will and pleaſure. Wherefore, "I ſet down, in theſe preſents, what each "abbot and prior ſhall be obliged to pay. "The prior and monaſtery of Durham, 500 "marks; of Bath 400; of Thorney 400, &c. The parliament refuſes the king money. Ann. Burt.

Let us now return to the king, who was equally ſollicitous, for the aids demanded of the barons, to place the prince, his ſon, on the throne of Sicily; and the archbiſhop of Meſſina was lately arrived from Rome, on purpoſe to ſecond the king's demand, with the pope's letters to the lords, exhorting them to give the king ſatisfaction; but neither the pope's eagerneſs, nor the archbiſhop of Meſſina's preſſing inſtances, proved ſucceſsful. The parliament evidently perceived, that the money was to be put into the pope's hands, from his zeal and aſſiduity, on this occaſion; and, beſides, they could not reſolve to ſuffer troops to be ſent into Italy, as the pope and the king deſired, being perſuaded that it would expoſe them to certain ruin. Theſe conſiderations induced them, to deny the king the aid he demanded; and, to juſtify their refuſal, they preſented an addreſs, containing their reaſons. I. The difficulty of the undertaking. II. The poverty of the nation. III. The dread of an invaſion, from the neighbouring ſtates, if the forces of the kingdom were ſent to ſo remote a country. IV. That this project was formed, without the conſent of parliament. V. And laſtly, That the condition, annexed to the grant of Sicily, left the pope at his liberty to re-1256. voke it, whenever he pleaſed, which was reciprocal.

Henry will have the clergy bound for him.

As the king demanded of his parliament an extraordinary aid; ſo he would, moreover, have the clergy ſtand obliged for the ſums, the pope pretended were ſtill due to him, and conſent that the tenths, granted for three, ſhould be continued for five years. Theſe demands were ſo exorbitant, that the clergy could not reſolve upon a compliance with them; but the pope no ſooner ſpoke, in an imperious tone, by the mouth of his nuncio, than the clergy tamely ſubmitted, and granted the king the greateſt part of his demands.

The war with the Welch.

Notwithſtanding the immenſe ſums, lately drawn out of England, Henry ſtill continued his exactions, as well upon the citizens of London, as the reſt of the kingdom; and he made even the Welch, whom he conſidered, as his ſubjects, ſince they were become his vaſſals, feel the effects of his avarice. The oppreſſions they endured, under various pretences, wearing out their patience, having recourſe to arms, they invaded the frontiers of England, from whence they carried off a great booty; and prince Edward would have chaſtiſed them, were it not impoſſible for him to raiſe a ſufficient number of troops, to ſtop their progreſs. The king's treaſury was ſo exhauſted, as well by the pope as his own favourites, that, not being able to furniſh money for this war, he was obliged to ſuffer the Welch to plunder his borders, with impunity; and ſuch was his fondneſs for his half-brothers, and the queen's relations, that he not only loaded them with immenſe preſents, which render'd him incapable of defending his kingdom, but permitted them to oppreſs his own ſubjects, by forbidding the chancellor to iſſue out any writs, to their prejudice.

The pope preſſes the king for money.

In the interim, the pope, who was not contented with the vaſt ſums drawn from England, continually preſs'd the king to remit him money, threatening to revoke the grant of Sicily, if he did not ſpeedily perform his promiſes; but Henry repreſented, that he could not, as yet, ſend troops into Italy, with an Engliſh general, becauſe, inſtead of being in a condition to defray this freſh expence, he could not accompliſh the payment of the ſums demanded by the pope. However, to ſatisfy him, in ſome meaſure, he remitted him 5000 marks, and ordered prince Edward, his ſon, who was to ſucceed him, to ratify the agreements relating to Sicily; and, in another letter, he acquainted him, that the barons of England refuſed to ſubſcribe to the terms that were required of him, apprehending them to be ſomewhat unreaſonable, eſpecially as the affairs of Sicily were altered, by the treachery of the marqueſs of Hoemburch. The pope, finding that the great men began to murmur, thought it high time, to procure all he could expect from England, plainly foreſeeing, that the game, he was playing, would ſoon be at an end; and, therefore, he diſpatched John de Die, as his nuncio, into England with ſeveral bulls, all of them tending to draw money from the king, in order to diſcharge his pretended debts. By the firſt, he enjoined the biſhops punctually to pay the tenths granted to the king, notwithſtanding all former letters, indulgences, or privileges; and, in all probability, the deduction they were, before, allowed to make, was rendered ineffectual, by this clauſe. Another bull granted the king, for his voyage to the Holy-Land, from which he had already been exempted, all the revenues of the vacant benefices; and, by a third, he gave him the incomes of non-reſidents. A fourth granted him the tenths of all the eccleſiaſtical revenues of the kingdom, according to their extended value; whereas they were uſually rated, according to the antient taxations. A fifth commanded Ruſtand to adjudge, to the king, the chattels of clergymen, who died inteſtate; and, by a ſixth, he ordered the ſame nuncio, to tax all the eccleſiaſticks of the kingdom, for the aid they were to give the king, notwithſtanding all former privileges, exemptions, or objections, to the contrary. A ſeventh excommunicated all the prelates, who ſhould not pay their tenths, within a limited time; and there were ſeveral others, which it is needleſs to mention, ſince they all tended to the ſame end. The importunity of the creditors of Sienna and Florence always furniſhed a pretence for theſe oppreſſions; and tho' theſe debts ſhould have been overpaid, by all the levies of money made in England, on that account, yet, like the Hydra, their heads continually revived. 1256.

In this unhappy reign, a concourſe of malignant influences ſeemed to meet in England, to impoveriſh the nation; every circumſtance contributed to their miſery, and events, in all appearance the moſt remote, at length, promoted the ſame end. William, earl of Holland and king of the Romans, being killed in a ſkirmiſh with the Friſons, the electors of the empire were divided, about the choice of a ſucceſſor; but the majority gave their votes for Richard, brother to the king of England, whilſt the reſt elected Alphonſo, king of Caſtile. Richard, more diligent than his competitor, ſet out, immediately, to be crowned at Aix la Chapelle, and ſupported his pretenſions, by his preſence in Germany, whilſt Alphonſo acted only, by ambaſſadors. However, Richard had no other advantage over his rival, than that of being crowned; an honour which he gained, at ſuch a vaſt expence, that Alphonſo would have been extremely ſorry to purchaſe it, at ſo dear a rate. It is ſaid, that Richard carried into Germany 700,000 l. in ready ſpecie, an immenſe ſum, in thoſe days; which, added to what the pope had drawn out of the kingdom, occaſioned an exceeding ſcarcity of money. The meaner ſort of people were great ſufferers by it, becauſe the harveſt, not being very plentiful, they were unable to buy proviſions, which were grown extremely dear; tho' all theſe calamities made no impreſſion on the king; but, infatuated with his Sicilian project, he preſſed the clergy for a new ſubſidy, that 1257.

1257. of the laſt year not being ſufficient, as he aſſured them, even to pay his debts. As he expected great oppoſition from the prelates, he brought into the aſſembly prince Edmund, his ſon, dreſſed in a Sicilian habit, fancying, that, charmed, like him, with the ſight, they would readily comply with his demand; but this artifice would have proved abortive, had not the prelates been again over aw'd by the nuncio, who compelled them, by his menaces, to grant the king 42,000 l. ſterling.

The continuation of the Welch war.

To all the other calamities of this year, in England, muſt be added the war with Wales; which was vigorouſly carried on by the Welch, tho' very faintly by the Engliſh. Prince Edward, who undertook to chaſtiſe theſe turbulent people, was compelled to retreat before them, with ſome loſs; and their daily progreſs obliged the king to march againſt them. Upon his approach, they retired to their mountains, having themſelves laid waſte their borders, and ſo prevented Henry from proceeding; but, when he imagined the Welch at a diſtance, and ſeized with terror, they ſo effectually took advantage of his negligence, as to ſurpriſe him, and cut in pieces a conſiderable part of his army; upon which he retired.

The king demands of France the reſtitution of Normandy.

It muſt, of courſe, aſtoniſh the reader, that, at this juncture, Henry ſhould think of affrighting the king of France; yet, even in his preſent circumſtances, he ſent ambaſſadors to him, to demand the reſtitution of Normandy, and the other provinces in France, taken from the Engliſh. It is not known, with what view, or from what motive, he renewed this pretenſion, in ſo proud and imperious a manner, that one would have thought, that he was able to ſupport this bravado; but Lewis, who was better acquainted with his affairs than himſelf, forbearing, however, to inſult him, contented himſelf, with roughly denying this unſeaſonable demand.

The king petitions the pope.

In the mean while, Ruſtand, the nuncio, went to Rome, for new inſtructions; and he ſoon returned into England, with power to excommunicate the king, if, purſuant to his engagements, he did not ſpeedily undertake the projected conqueſt. Henry, ſurpriſed at theſe menaces, and not knowing how to ſatisfy the pope, cauſed his ſon, Edmund, humbly to intreat him, to render the terms more eaſy, on which he had accepted the grant of Sicily; but, this petition proving ineffectual, Henry was, at length, forced to ſend ambaſſadors to Rome, to renounce, in the name of the prince, his ſon, the grant of this imaginary crown, which had already been ſo expenſive to him. The pope, far from accepting this renunciation, diſpatched a new nuncio, one Arlot, impowering him to make ſome alteration, in the agreement about this affair; but, at the ſame time, he ordered him to do all that was poſſible, to engage the king more deeply, by procuring him ſome freſh grants, which coſt him nothing, ſince they were made, at the expence of the clergy. With this view, he commanded his nuncio to publiſh a new bull, enjoining the biſhops to pay the tenths granted to the king, under pain of excommunication; "notwithſtanding all objections, appeals, and letters obtained, or to be obtained, to the contrary." What is yet more ſurpriſing, and hardly conceivable, is, that the vaſt ſums, remitted to the pope, inſtead of promoting the conqueſt of Sicily, had never been applied to that uſe; ſince, after the defeat of Nocera, the pope had no army on foot; and tho', beſides the tenths, and other aids, frequently paid by the clergy to the king, on this account, the parliament had furniſhed conſiderable ſupplies, there appeared no bottom to this gulf, which ſwallowed up all the riches of the kingdom. The clergy were extremely uneaſy, under theſe oppreſſions; and the laity likewiſe murmured, when they conſidered, that the money already raiſed, in England, which, it is ſaid, amounted to 950,000 marks, was inſufficient to ſatisfy the avarice of the pope. 1257.

1258. The barons begin to take meaſures againſt the king.

The barons were ſtill more aggrieved than the people, as the moſt important poſts, to which they thought themſelves, alone, entitled, were enjoyed by foreigners; and this uſually excites the zeal of the great men, and inſpires them with a mighty concern for the good of the publick; whereas, if their own private intereſt be out of the queſtion, it is in vain to expect, that the nobles will expoſe their lives and fortunes, in defence of the liberties of an injured people. This is a remark, at which no nation, in particular, ought to be diſguſted; ſince it agrees with all times, as well as with all places. The great men, who then lived in England, were of the ſame character; for the credit and riches of the foreigners were the principal grievance of the barons, and the real motive of their complaints; and, if they urged ſome other abuſes, it was becauſe they themſelves had no advantage from thence, or to gain the people to their party. They, hitherto, thought to oblige the king to alter his conduct, by ſolemn oaths; but they, at length, perceived, that this Proteus, as an hiſtorian M. Paris; ſtiles him, was not to be ſecured, without more violent methods; and, therefore, they began to hold ſecret conferences together, to concert proper meaſures to reform the government, and eſpecially to exclude the foreigners. The king, ſoon after, having called a parliament, demanded, according to cuſtom, a powerful ſupply for the affair of Sicily; for, as to the voyage to the Holy-Land, it was no longer mentioned; but the parliament, purſuant to the reſolution already taken by the principal barons, inſtead of granting his demand, vehemently complained of the violation of his promiſes, and of all the grievances, in general, ſpoken of, in the courſe of this reign. Henry, finding that a haughty carriage would not anſwer his purpoſe, had recourſe to his old artifice of appeaſing the lords, by acknowledging his guilt, and promiſing to rectify what was amiſs; but, for once, they were not ſo credulous. They told him expreſsly, that, without leaving it to him, they intended to reform the government themſelves, ſo as to fear no more his breach of faith; and, therefore, under pretence of the difficulties in this affair, the parliament was prorogued, and the city of Oxford appointed for the place of

1258. the next ſeſſion; but, as he was apprehenſive, that, in the interim, the barons would make preparations, which it was not in his power to prevent, he gave them a poſitive promiſe, that, at their next meeting, he would join with them, in the deſired reformation. He ſigned alſo a charter, by which he conſented, that the articles to be reformed ſhould be drawn up by 24 lords, of whom he would chuſe 12, and promiſed to obſerve whatſoever ſhould be determined by theſe commiſſioners; and, to give the greater authority to this charter, he cauſed prince Edward, his ſon, to ſign it with him, to convince them of his ſincerity. They had been ſo often deceived by the like promiſes, that they could not believe this to be more ſincere than the former; wherefore, without relying on the king's proteſtations, the barons ſummoned all their military tenants, and, on the day appointed, came to Oxford, well attended, and fully reſolved to compel the king to perform his word. The firſt thing was the election of the 24 commiſſioners, who were to draw the articles of the intended reformation; of whom the king choſe 12, and the other 12 were elected by the barons, who conſtituted Simon de Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, preſident of this council; and, the election being over, the 24 drew up ſome articles, the parliament reſerving to themſelves a power of adding to them, from time to time, ſuch others as ſhould be judged neceſſary, for the good of the ſtate. They were, in ſubſtance, as follows:

I. That the king ſhould confirm the great charter, which he had ſo often, tho' to no purpoſe, ſworn to obſerve.

II. That the office of chief juſticiary ſhould be given to a perſon of capacity and integrity, that ſhould adminiſter juſtice, as well to the poor as the rich, with the utmoſt impartiality.

III. That the chancellor, treaſurer, juſtices, and other officers and publick miniſters ſhould be elected by the 24.

IV. That the cuſtody of the king's caſtles ſhould be committed to the care of the 24, who ſhould entruſt them with ſuch as were well affected to the ſtate.

V. That it ſhould be death for any perſon, of what rank or degree ſoever, to oppoſe, directly or indirectly, what ſhould be ordained by the 24.

VI. That the parliament ſhould meet, at leaſt, once every year, to enact ſuch ſtatutes as ſhould be judged neceſſary for the welfare of the kingdom.

1258. It is certain that 12 deputies, or repreſentatives of the commons, ſat in this parliament; but whether it was by permiſſion, or right, that is, whether it was a new regulation, or the commons had their repreſentatives in the former parliaments, is what I will not preſume to determine, ſince the Engliſh themſelves are not agreed, in this point; but as, in a diſpute of this nature, it is difficult to avoid inclining to one ſide of the queſtion, I freely own myſelf of their opinion, who think this to be the firſt time, that the repreſentatives of the commons were admitted to ſit in parliament. Indeed, if the commons had a right to ſit there, at the time we are ſpeaking of, it is very ſtrange, that they ſhould nominate only 12 repreſentatives, for the whole kingdom; and, beſides, we have the conſent of all the hiſtorians, that theſe 12 were not commoners, as now reputed, but all barons, being ſtiled immediate tenants of the crown. Moreover, it is extremely ſurpriſing, if the commons enjoyed this privilege before, that hiſtorians ſhould never diſtinguiſh them from the nobility; and yet, among ſo many writers, who, from the conqueſt to the end of the reign of Henry III, have ſpoken of parliaments, not ſo much as one has mentioned the commons, as conſtituting a diſtinct body, or ſeparate houſe from the barons. In a word, it may be added, as a precedent, not, in the leaſt, favourable to the antiquity of the right of the commons, that, in France, it was not till the reign of Philip the Fair, according to Paſquier, that the third eſtate was admitted into the general aſſembly of the ſtates; but, however that be, as it is from this and another aſſembly, which I ſhall take notice of preſently, that ſome date the original of the privilege of the commons, it was neceſſary to give ſome account of it to the reader. 1258.

The parliament having approved the articles drawn up by the 24, the king was obliged to give his aſſent to them, and iſſue out all the neceſſary orders, for putting them in execution; and prince Edward alſo ſolemnly ſwore to obſerve, and cauſe them to be obſerved, to the utmoſt of his power. Thus, Henry, for his too great neglect of his ſubjects, was reduced, at laſt, to the neceſſity of ſharing with them the government of his kingdom, or rather of reſigning the whole into their hands; but his obſequiouſneſs to the court of Rome was the principal cauſe of his diſgeace. Indeed, in thoſe days, it was extremely difficult to keep a juſt medium, in this particular; and, as king John loſt himſelf, by too vigorous an oppoſition of the pope; ſo Henry paved the way for his ruin, by making himſelf too much his ſlave.

Oppoſition is made to theſe articles.

The foreſaid articles, then ſtiled the ſtatutes or proviſions of Oxford, were, at firſt, oppoſed by ſome; for the earl of Warren refuſed to ſign them; and prince Edward, who ſwore to them, againſt his will, wanted to recede from his oath. Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, openly proteſted, that they were entirely invalid, till the king, his father, then in Germany, conſented to them; but the earl of Leiceſter, without regarding his quality, roundly told the earl, "That, if the king, his father, "refuſed to join with the barons, he ſhould "not enjoy one foot of land, in England." The greateſt oppoſition was made by the foreigners, and particulalry the king's half-brothers, and the queen's relations; eſpecially, William, biſhop elect of Valence, becauſe the whole royal authority, now reſtrained within narrow bounds, by theſe ſtatutes, was properly in his hands. Accordingly, he publickly declared, that he would not ſurrender the caſtles, of which he had the cuſtody; but the earl of Leiceſter 1258. Leiceſter, being naturally impetuous, immediately replied, He ſhould part with the caſtles, or his head. This menace being ſupported by the reſt of the barons, the Poictevins reſolved to ſhut themſelves up in Wincheſter, evidently perceiving, that they were not in a condition to withſtand the torrent; but their flight was no ſooner known, than the barons purſued them, tho' it was not poſſible to overtake them; yet, as, at ſuch a juncture, it was difficult for foreigners, ſo univerſally deteſted, to procure a ſufficient protection, they conſented to depart the kingdom, provided they might have a ſafe-conduct. This condition being, at once, complied with, they were brought to London, till they could be embarqued; and it is affirmed, that, during their ſtay in the city, they invited to an entertainment ſeveral lords, ſome of whom died, preſently after; which gave occaſion to ſuſpect, that they were poiſoned. Poſſibly, the averſion of the Engliſh, to theſe foreigners, was the chief cauſe of this ſuſpicion; but, however that be, a few days after, they embarqued at Dover, and returned into their own country.

The barons, being thus rid of the foreigners, agreed, before their ſeparation, upon an oath of aſſociation, to maintain the proviſions of Oxford, with their lives and fortunes; yet, if we may give credit to an hiſtorian, who has related the particulars of this affair, the 24 ſoon abuſed their power, in filling all the places and offices with their relations and friends; and he likewiſe charges them with holding frequent parliaments, without the conſent of the king, whom they regarded only, as the ſhadow of a ſovereign.

London enters into the aſſociation.

In a parliament aſſembled at Wincheſter, the barons reſolved to ſend commiſſioners to the city of London, to invite them to join in their aſſociation; and the Londoners readily accepted the invitation, having ſtill more reaſon to complain of the king, than all the reſt of the kingdom. This affair being over, the parliament, judging it neceſſary to proceed, in a legal way, againſt the foreigners, who were expelled the kingdom, paſſed an act, for their perpetual baniſhment; but, as Athelmar, biſhop of Wincheſter, was one of the exiles, it was neceſſary to make ſome excuſe to the pope, ſince the biſhops had been long exempted from the civil juriſdiction; and there was occaſion alſo to juſtify to the pope the conduct of the parliament, both with reſpect to the affair of Sicily, and the late alterations in the government of the kingdom. It was reſolved, therefore, that the barons ſhould write to the pope, to inform him of what had been tranſacted; and their letter was to this effect: "That they had been "prevented from yielding to his admonitions, "relating to the conqueſt of Sicily. Firſt, be-"cauſe the king had engaged in that affair, "without their advice, and without conſider-"ing the ſtate of the kingdom, which was in "no condition to bear the expence of ſuch an "expedition. Secondly, becauſe the condi-"tions, on which the king had accepted the "grant of Sicily, for the prince, his ſon, were "too hard and impracticable; yet they de-"clared, that if the pope would ſo ſten them, "they were ready to proſecute that affair, to "the utmoſt of their power. Then, they vin-"dicated the Oxford-proviſions, alledging the "king's incapacity and eaſineſs to give himſelf "up to the direction of ſuch, as had no con-"cern for the good of the kingdom; proving, "at large, by weighty arguments, that it was, "by no means, proper the kingdom ſhould "be governed by foreigners. They obſerved, "that the biſhop of Wincheſter, in particular, "was the principal author of the preſent cala-"mities of England; alledging, that he was "guilty of ſeveral enormous crimes, which in-"duced him to deſire leave to depart the king-"dom, being conſcious that it was impoſſible "for him to render a good account of his ac-"tions. Above all, they accuſed him of ad-"viſing the king to violate his word and oath, "which muſt, of neceſſity, be interpreted, as a "ſettled deſign to diſturb the peace of the "kingdom; and, therefore, they would never "ſuffer him to return into England; though, if "they ſhould, the people were reſolved to op-"poſe it." To give the more weight to their apology, they ſent their letter to the pope, by ſome of their own body, who received orders, to diſplay more fully the outrages of the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the reſt of the royal relations.

The barons letter to the pope. Act. Pub.

The pope continues to preſs the king, on the affair of Sicily.

As for the pope, he was ſtill deſirous of drawing money from the king, under the old pretence of the buſineſs of Sicily; and the late proceedings of the barons laid an inſuperable obſtacle, in the way of his deſigns. However, that he might not incenſe them, he was dilatory in ſending an anſwer; and he contented himſelf, with privately aſſuring the king of his protection; but, at the ſame time, as if Henry had been able to ſupply him with money, he preſſed him to pay the arrears due to the Italian merchants, of which, he pretended, the intereſt alone amounted to a prodigious ſum. However, he was pleaſed to allow him ſome ſhort time; but this was no ſooner expired, than the biſhop of London received a poſitive order, to excommunicate all the debtors of the Italian merchants, of what quality ſoever; but his orders, being no longer countenanced by the government, were not put in execution; and, for the ſame reaſon, the conqueſt of Sicily was, now, eſteemed a chimerical project, that tended to the ruin of England.

In the interim, the unfortunate Henry was forced to aſſent to whatever the government were pleaſed to preſcribe him, and to ſign all the orders preſented to him, for the obſervance of ſtatutes, which deprived him of all his royal prerogatives; and tho' the earl of Leiceſter was his brother-in-law, yet, of all the barons, he conſidered him, as his moſt avowed enemy, and the principal author of his diſgrace. One day, as he was going to the tower, by water, a ſudden ſtorm of thunder and lightning obliging him to land, at the firſt ſtairs, it happened to be at Durham-houſe, where the earl of Leiceſter then lay; where he was received, at his landing, by the earl himſelf, who, to hearten him after his fright, told him, "He need not be afraid, be-"cauſe the ſtorm was over." The king repli-

1260. The king of the Romans declares againſt the Oxford-proviſions. M. Paris.

It was not, without reaſon, that the king ſtood in fear of the earl of Leiceſter; for this lord was the head of the confederates, and took, with the reſt, all poſſible meaſures, to prevent him from freeing himſelf from the ſlavery, to which he was reduced, by his imprudence. Their reſolution, not to part with their authority, evidently appeared, in their anſwer to the king of the Romans; who, having acquainted them, by letter, with his deſign of returning to England, to aſſiſt them in appeaſing the troubles of the kingdom, received this mortifying anſwer: That they would not ſuffer him to enter the kingdom, unleſs he ſwore to obſerve the Oxford-proviſions. Richard repreſented to the deputies, that were ſent on this occaſion, that it was ſtrange, the barons ſhould preſume to alter the government, in his abſence, and without his knowledge; and he proteſted, that he would not take the oath required of him, tho' he was reſolved to return to England. This anſwer being brought to the governors, they ſpeedily fitted out a fleet, and raiſed an army, to hinder his paſſage and landing; but, as this prince was unable to ſurmount ſo many obſtacles, and yet thought his preſence neceſſary in England, he promiſed to ſubmit to the preſent eſtabliſhment. Upon this condition, he was permitted to come over; and, upon his arrival at Dover, he took the oath, in the preſence of the king, and a great number of barons, who came to meet him.

The barons make a diſadvantageous treaty with France. M. Paris.

Since the late revolution in England, thoſe, who were concerned in the adminiſtration of affairs, made it a rule, to keep peace with the neighbouring princes; and they were apprehenſive, above all, that the king of France would take advantage of the preſent poſture of affairs, to puſh his conqueſts in Guienne. They, therefore, reſolved to conclude a firm and laſting peace with France, by ſacrificing all the king's pretenſions to Normandy and Anjou; beſides, they hoped, by this means, to ſecure Lewis's aſſiſtance, ſince it would be his intereſt to ſupport the form of government lately eſtabliſhed; and, indeed, the execution of the intended treaty with him depended, in ſome meaſure, on the continuance of the preſent eſtabliſhment. Purſuant to this reſolution, the earl of Leiceſter undertook to propoſe it, at Paris; and the French, perceiving conſiderable advantages, in the propoſal made by the Engliſh, and, therefore, readily regarding the earl of Leiceſter, as ſufficiently authorized, though they were not ignorant of the ſituation of affairs in England, concluded a treaty with him, which Henry was obliged to ſign; and he was even perſuaded to meet Lewis, at Abbeville, where the ſtates of France were aſſembled, and to renounce, in their preſence, all his pretenſions to Normandy and Anjou. Lewis, in return, gave up le Limoſin, and le Perigord, with all that France poſſeſſed, beyond the Garonne, on condition that he would do him homage, and take his ſeat among the peers of the realm, as duke of Guienne; and, thus, France acquired a right to theſe two provinces, by a treaty, which, before, proceeded only from the ſword; but the kings of England, ſucceſſors to Henry III, did not think themſelves bound by a treaty made, at ſuch a juncture. 1260.

The 24 forbid ſending to foreigners the incomes of their benefices. M. Paris.

Whilſt the king was in France, the 24 governors thought it high time to reform a very great grievance, introduced by the king's exceſſive complaiſance for the court of Rome; namely, the prodigious number of Italian eccleſiaſticks, who poſſeſſed all the richeſt benefices of the kingdom. Theſe men, who never reſided on their benefices, farmed them out to private perſons, or religious houſes, who remitted them the revenues into Italy; and, by this means, the ſcarcity of money, long ſince complained of, daily increaſed. As a remedy for this evil, the governors iſſued out a proclamation, enjoining all farmers of the foreign benefices, to pay the revenues into the hands of certain perſons appointed to receive them, on pain of having their houſes raz'd to the ground; and, by this precaution, England was freed, for a while, from theſe Italian leaches, who ſuck'd the beſt blood of the Engliſh.

The earl of Glouceſter is jealous of the earl of Leiceſter. M. Weſt.

Though the barons, hitherto, ſeemed to be ſtrictly united, a ſecret diſguſt was forming in the minds of ſome, on account of the too great authority aſſumed by the earl of Leiceſter. Whether the earl thought himſelf more capable, and more zealous, than his collegues; or, as his enemies charged him, was puſh'd on, by his ambition, to aſpire to the ſupreme power, it is certain he uſurped all the authority committed to the 24. He could not continue to act, thus, without raiſing the jealouſy of his companions, and particularly the earl of Glouceſter, who attempted, by degrees, to form a party againſt him. He began, firſt, with privately blaming his conduct, and ſpreading a report, that he was in league with prince Edward, to place him on the throne, in his father's life-time; and the king, who was then at St. Omer's, hearing of this pretended project, was ſo terrified, that he could not think of returning to England. He was told, that the prince, his ſon, deſigned to take the government into his hands, and obſtruct his return; or, if he failed in this, to impriſon him, for life; but Edward ſo fully and reſpectfully vindicated himſelf, that he entirely effaced his father's ſuſpicions. He even offer'd to ſubmit to the judgment of the king of the Romans, his uncle, refuſing to acknowledge the juriſdiction of the barons of the realm, who were not his peers; but there was no occaſion to give farther proofs of his innocence, Henry, at his return, being perfectly ſatisfied. The earl of Glouceſter, finding theſe indirect ways did him more hurt than good, directly attacked the earl of Leiceſter, accuſing him of many miſdemeanours committed, as well in Guienne as in England; and he demanded a day to be prefixed, for hearing his accuſation againſt him. However, on the day appointed, as the earl of Leiceſter boldly appeared, to make his defence, he was afraid either of wanting evidence, or, at leaſt, of his adverſary's party proving too ſtrong; and, therefore, pretending that ſome of his witneſſes

1260. neſſes were abſent, he deſired the affair might be farther adjourned. This quarrel might have been attended with fatal conſequences, had not the king of the Romans exerted himſelf, to compoſe it, and appeaſe the prince, his nephew, who was exceedingly incenſed with the earl of Glouceſter. He ſucceeded, at length, to the great ſatisfaction of the Engliſh, who were apprehenſive, that a civil war was going to diſturb the calm they began to enjoy. As ſoon as this affair was over, Richard embarqued for Germany, where he had ſome expectations of being acknowledged for emperor by all the electoral princes; but, quickly perceiving that he could not diſpel the faction that divided the Germans, he dropp'd this project, and returned to England, where he found the king and queen of Scotland, who were come to viſit the king. A few days after, arrived alſo John de Dreux, duke of Bretagne, to eſpouſe Beatrix, the king's ſecond daughter, ſo that the court was very numerous; and, tho' the governors had very little reſpect for the king's perſon, they did honour to his royalty, by a magnificent reception of theſe illuſtrious gueſts; but, as Henry had not the management of his revenues, he had no reaſon to value himſelf, upon the ſplendid reception his ſon-in-law met with, at his own court.

Henry recalls the biſhop of Wincheſter, who dies on the road. T. Wikes.

The king, tho' he was far from having a great ſoul, was not inſenſible of the mortifications he daily received; and he even made ſome attempts, to free himſelf from the yoke he laboured under; but he was in need of prudent advice. In this perplexity, he privately invited Athelmar, his brother, biſhop of Wincheſter, then at Rome, to return to England; hoping that his character, and the pope's protection, would ſcreen him from the perſecutions of the barons. The biſhop, immediately, ſet out for England, where, doubtleſs, he would have cauſed great diſturbances, had he not been prevented by death, at Paris; and the barons were tranſported at the joyful news; for they could not have denied him entrance into the kingdom, as they had reſolved, without breaking entirely with the court of Rome.

The pope abſolves the king from his oath concerning the Oxford-proviſions. M. Weſt. Act. Pub.

However, Henry ſtill perſiſted in his deſign, of ſhaking off the barons yoke; and the unexpected breach, between the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, who were only outwardly reconciled, inſpiring him with hopes of ſucceſs, he deſired the pope to abſolve him from his oath, concerning the Oxford-proviſions. His holineſs, at once, granted him this favour, as it was for his own, as well as the king's advantage, to alter a government ſo prejudicial to him; but, Alexander dying, before the diſpenſation could be ſealed, he was obliged to wait, till the holy ſee was filled by a ſucceſſor. Urban IV, who was promoted to the papal throne, confirming the grant of his predeceſſor, Henry ſoon pulled off the maſque; and, the parliament being aſ-1261. ſembled at London, he ſuddenly repaired thither, without acquainting any one with his intentions, and plainly told them, "That, before "he ſigned the Oxford-proviſions, they had "promiſed to pay his debts, and increaſe his "revenue; and, ſince neither of theſe arti-"cles had been performed, he did not think "himſelf obliged to keep his word." He added, "That he no longer deſigned to make "uſe of the counſellors impoſed upon him, who "treated him rather like a ſlave than a mo-"narch." After this brief declaration, he retired to the tower, having gained the governor, and ſeized upon all the treaſure lodged there; upon which, he turned out, by proclamation, all the officers and magiſtrates choſen by the 24, nominating others, in their room; and, in a word, he ſhewed, by his whole conduct, that he was reſolved to reign, with the ſame liberty, as before the parliament of Oxford. 1261.

Edward returns from Paris.

Prince Edward, then at Paris, returned, with all expedition, to endeavour to avert the impending evils; for he too well knew the temper of the king, his father, not to be afraid, that he had taken improper meaſures; which was ſome foundation for his fears. The barons impatiently waited his arrival, in expectation that, being more knowing than the king, he would vigorouſly exert himſelf, to prevent the miſchiefs, with which the kingdom was threatened; and, to prepare the way for him, they preſented an addreſs to the king, beſeeching him to obſerve his oath, and offering, on their part, to amend ſuch articles as ſhould be found too ſevere upon him, in the Oxford-proviſions. Henry, pretending that nothing could be done, till his ſon's arrival, returned no anſwer to this propoſal; and, he was no leſs impatient, than the barons, to ſee the prince, hoping that he would ſtrengthen his party; but he was extremely ſurpriſed, when the prince, at his return, openly blamed him, for breaking his word. However, this was followed by an event that increaſed his uneaſineſs; for the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, upon whoſe diſſenſion he relied, being ſincerely reconciled, to prevent their common ruin, ſwore, once more, to the Oxford-proviſions. The barons, being conſiderably ſtrengthened, by this union, gave the king to underſtand, that, if he would not voluntarily remove, from about his perſon, all evil counſellors, they would find means to compel him; and this weak prince, having raſhly engaged in a project, which he could not execute, with honour, choſe to return them no anſwer, and, in the interim, continued in the tower, for fear of being delivered into their hands.

An accommodation is ſet on foot. M. Weſt.

Henry, now, ſaw no other remedy, but to treat with the barons; and matters even ſeemed to be in a promiſing way, by the conceſſions of both parties; but the king, by urging the pope's authority, gave occaſion to widen the breach, by unadviſedly ſhewing the bull, which abſolved him from his oath. The diſcovery of this ſecret, which ſhould have been induſtriouſly concealed, at ſuch a juncture, did him an irreparable damage; for the barons, who, till then, entertained hopes of bringing him to reaſon, reſolved to lay aſide all ceremony; evidently perceiving, that no ſtreſs could be laid on an accommodation, to which the moſt ſolemn oath could give no manner of force. Purſuant to this reſolution, they formed a deſign to ſurpriſe the king, in Wincheſter, where he went, in expectation that the preſent negotiation would prove ſucceſsful; but Henry, receiving early intelligence, returned 1261. turned to the tower. He no ſooner found himſelf ſafe, than he diſpatched orders, into all the counties, to turn out the ſheriffs appointed by the 24, which cauſed a general confuſion in the kingdom; for ſome were inclined to obey the ſheriffs nominated by the king, whilſt others diſowned their authority.

The Cinque-ports declare againſt the king. M. Weſt.

In the mean while, the barons prevailed with the governors of the Cinque-ports, to fit out a fleet to guard the coaſt, leſt ſuccours ſhould arrive from ſome foreign prince; for they were obliged, by their charter, to equip 50 men of war, whenever the king's ſervice required ſuch an aid; and the barons of the Cinque-ports, interpreting the king's ſervice by that of the kingdom, pretended to ſerve the king, by employing their forces againſt him. This maxim will not ſeem very ſtrange, when it is conſidered, that, in England, the king and the ſtate have always been accounted but one and the ſame body; and, therefore, it is affirmed, that, when the king ſeparates his intereſts from thoſe of the publick, he loſes his prerogatives, which rather belong to the crown, than to the perſon of the ſovereign.

The king promiſes to confirm the Oxford-proviſions. M. Weſt.

All things, now, manifeſtly conſpired to promote a civil war; and nothing, but the dread each perſon of both parties was under of the conſequences, ſuſpended the effects of their mutual enmity. Whilſt the king and barons were equally deſirous, to avoid the blame of beginning the war, the king of the Romans improved this diſpoſition, to try to procure a ſolid peace; and, his mediation being accepted, he prevailed with the king, his brother, to promiſe, that he would confirm the Oxford-proviſions, and with the barons, to depart from ſuch articles as were moſt diſpleaſing to the king. In all probability, the 24 were then deprived of their authority; which, from the beginning of the troubles, was not generally acknowledged. The earl of Leiceſter, refuſing to conſent to this agreement, retired into France; for he declared, that he durſt not rely on the word of a prince, who would not ſcruple to violate his oath, when he found it for his advantage. Among the barons, who ſigned this agreement, there were ſeveral equally diſſatisfied with it; but, as the majority conſented, they choſe rather to accept it, than be conſidered, as the ſole cauſe of the troubles. By this treaty, England ſeemed to be reſtored to its former tranquillity; tho' the fire, concealed under the cinders, ſoon rekindled, and broke out into new flames.

Henry paſſes into Guienne.

During this calm, the affairs of Guienne obliged Henry to go over to Bourdeaux; where, being ſeized with a quartan ague, he remained, longer than he deſigned. Richard, earl of Glouceſter dying, in the interim, his ſon, Gilbert, immediately repaired to Guienne, to be inveſted with his father's inheritance; but Henry, having an averſion to that lord, was ſollicited, ſome time, before he would do him that juſtice; and he did not, at laſt, comply, without a conſiderable preſent.

The barons unite. M. Weſt.

In the king's abſence, Leiceſter's friends had an opportunity to renew their cabals, and unite the party divided, by the late treaty; and they more eaſily compaſſed their ends, becauſe the king delayed to confirm the Oxford-proviſions. 1262. The earl of Leiceſter, being informed, that his party began to revive, ſpeedily returned into England; where his preſence entirely reſtored the courage of thoſe, who, through fear or weakneſs, had ſigned the late agreement. Upon this, the king came over, in great haſte, tho' it was now too late; for the barons had reſolved to put themſelves in a condition not to fear his inconſtancy. He was no ſooner arrived, than 1263. they preſented an addreſs to him, intreating him to confirm the ſtatutes of Oxford, purſuant to his agreement, and threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to make uſe of more violent methods; for they were in hopes, that fear would oblige him to grant their demand; and they were greatly ſurpriſed, when he called them rebels, and declared that he would puniſh them, with the utmoſt ſeverity. It will, doubtleſs, ſeem aſtoniſhing, that the king, in his preſent circumſtances, ſhould behave ſo haughtily; but he had a ſecret reaſon, unknown to the barons. During his voyage to Guienne, he had gained the king of the Romans and prince Edward; and the latter had raiſed ſome foreign troops, under the pretence of employing them againſt the Welch, tho', in reality, to oppoſe the barons. The war, however, did not, as yet, break out; and there were ſtill ſome negotiations, tho' they ſerved only to widen the breach, and give the barons time, to make preparations. During this interval, Edward carried the war into Wales; where he did nothing conſiderable, for want of money to pay his troops. The prince, not being able to reſolve to disband his army, nor in a condition to maintain them, thought he might uſe ſome extraordinary method, to raiſe the money he wanted; and, therefore, on a ſudden, coming to London, and without communicating his deſign, he led a company of armed men to the new temple, and ſeized 10,000 l. ſterling, that was depoſited, by the citizens, in the treaſury of the templars. This violence occaſioned loud murmurs, among the parties concerned; but their complaints were to no purpoſe; for the prince cauſed the money to be conveighed to Windſor-caſtle, from whence it would be very difficult to take it, by force.

Urban threatens Henry to give Sicily to another.

In the mean while, Urban IV. altered his meaſures, with reſpect to Sicily, without giving any notice to Henry; and, the revolution in England leading him to conſider that kingdom, as an exhauſted fund, he entered into a negotiation with Charles, earl of Anjou, to place that prince on the throne of Sicily. To prepare Henry for this change, he ſent him a long letter, in which, after ſome reproaches for what the holy ſee had done for him, he complained of the non-performance of his promiſes; and, in a word, he repreſented to him, that he was forced to apply to another prince, for ſpeedier and more effectual ſupplies.

The beginning of the barons wars. T. Wikes.

The negotiation, between the king and the barons, was ſtill continued; but it proceeded very ſlowly, both parties having no other intention, than to lay upon each other the blame of the rupture. At length, the earl of Leiceſter, fearing that all theſe delays would only tend to corrupt 1263. corrupt his adherents, convened an aſſembly of the barons, in which it was unanimouſly reſolved to maintain the Oxford-proviſions, by arms; upon which, having choſen the earl of Leiceſter, for their general, each of them drew together the troops, which were already prepared. The foreigners, diſperſed over the kingdom, were the firſt, that felt the fatal effects of this rupture; for the people were ſo exaſperated againſt them, that they perſecuted all alike, whether innocent or guilty, that could not ſpeak good Engliſh, that mark alone being ſufficient to render them odious. On the other hand, the earl of Leiceſter plundered, in a mercileſs manner, the eſtates of the king's favourites and counſellors, and publickly declared, that he would hearken to no propoſals of peace, till they were all entirely deſtroyed; and, as the king had no army, to withſtand the barons, he ſtill remained in the tower of London, whilſt they ſubdued Glouceſter, Hereford, Bridgnorth, Worceſter and other places, near the Severn. Theſe conqueſts were atended with the declaration of the city of London, in their favour; for the Londoners, eagerly embracing this opportunity of being revenged on the king, acquainted him, that they were reſolved to adhere to the Oxford-proviſions, and to ſhut their gates againſt the foreigners, if he ſhould think of bringing any into the city.

The barons preſent an addreſs to the king. T. Wikes.

Though theſe auſpicious beginnings greatly encouraged the barons, they believed, that, to gain the people ſtill more to their intereſt, it was neceſſary to ſhew, that they had taken up arms, with reluctance, and were ready to lay them down, with joy; and, therefore, they preſented to the king a petition drawn up, in very reſpectful language, in which they offered to conſent, that a free parliament ſhould review the Oxford-proviſions, and annul ſuch articles as were found to bear too hard on the royal authority; but, at the ſame time, they deſired, that the king ſhould confirm the reſt, and the kingdom be governed by the natives, according to the practice of all other countries. This petition was altogether ineffectual; for the king, tho' blocked up, as it were, in the tower, expected, every moment, the arrival of the prince, his ſon, to relieve him. The barons, to prevent the deſigns of prince Edward, poſted themſelves, at Thiſtleworth, through which place he muſt neceſſarily paſs, to deliver the king; which precaution obliged the king to alter his reſolution, for deſpairing of relief, he ſent the barons word, that he would confirm the proviſions of Oxford. This was all the barons wanted; ſo that a treaty, containing four principal articles, was eaſily concluded, viz. I. That the king's caſtles ſhould be delivered up to the barons. II. That the Oxford-proviſions ſhould be inviolably obſerved. III. That all foreigners, except thoſe that ſhould be allowed of, by the unanimous conſent of the barons, ſhould be baniſhed the realm. IV. That the adminiſtration of affairs ſhould be entruſted with the king's natural ſubjects, approved of by the barons.

This agreement would have reſtored peace to the kingdom, had the king ſincerely conſented to it; but, as his ſole view was, to free himſelf from his perplexity, it was not long, before he broke it; and the inſolence of ſome Londoners greatly contributed to his taking this reſolution. One day, as the queen went, by water, to Windſor, the mob, juſt as ſhe was going to ſhoot the bridge, hollowed at her, in a manner very mortifying to a queen; for they not only attacked her, by foul reproaches, but ſome were ſo brutiſh as to throw at her both dirt and ſtones. The king was extremely incenſed at this inſult; and, upon it, he reſolved to make a vigorous effort for the recovery of his authority. He began, therefore, to ſtore, with arms and proviſions, the caſtles that were ſtill in his power; which was a ſufficient hint to the barons, to ſtand upon their guard.

The queen is inſulted by the mob. M. Weſt.

In the preſent poſture of affairs, it was difficult to determine, whether the kingdom was in peace, or war; for, tho' hoſtilities were not yet commenced, ſuch was the diſtruſt, on both ſides, that the oppoſite parties conſidered each other, as real enemies, and greedily catched at all advantages, that fell in their way. During this ſtate of uncertainty, prince Edward judged it neceſſary to ſtore with proviſions Briſtol-caſtle, of which the king, his father, had entruſted him with the cuſtody; and, with this view, coming to Briſtol, he would have obliged the citizens to ſupply him with proviſions; but, as people were then diſpoſed, this demand, made, perhaps, ſomewhat too haughtily, raiſed a ſedition among the inhabitants, which forced the prince to retire haſtily into the caſtle. He was no ſooner there, than the inhabitants reſolved to beſiege him, or, at leaſt, to keep him ſo cloſely blocked up, that he ſhould not eſcape, being very ſenſible, that, for want of neceſſaries, he could not make a long reſiſtance; yet Edward extricated himſelf out of this difficulty, by a device, tho' it ſoon plunged him into another, of more dangerous conſequence. He ſent for the biſhop of Worceſter, and intimated to him, that he deſigned to adhere to the barons; but he deſired, firſt, to confer with the king, his father, to perſuade him to give them entire ſatisfaction; and, not being able to execute this deſign, on the account of his being blocked up, he intreated him to be ſecurity for him, and accompany him to London, to be a witneſs of his conduct. The biſhop, convinced of the prince's, ſincerity, aſſured the citizens of Briſtol, that it would be ſerviceable to the common cauſe, if Edward was ſet at liberty; to which they conſented, and the blockade was raiſed. Accordingly, the prince ſet out, together with the biſhop, who did not doubt but this journey would prove ſucceſsful; but, when they approached near Windſor, Edward, clapping ſpurs to his horſe, rode away from the biſhop, without taking leave, and ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle. The biſhop, provoked at this deceit, carried his complaints to the barons, who, immediately, reſolved to lay ſiege to Windſor; and this caſtle was ſo meanly provided with neceſſaries, for a brisk defence, that Edward thought it not in his power to ſtand a ſiege, tho' he could not reſolve to ſurrender the place. As he depended very much upon his addreſs, he imagined, that it would not be 1263. impoſſible to amuſe the barons, by a negotiation, which would leave him in poſſeſſion of the caſtle, upon certain conditions, which he might be able to perform; and, therefore, he went himſelf to the earl of Leiceſter, who was advancing towards Windſor. He met the general, at Kingſton upon Thames, where he held a conference with him; but, juſt as he was preparing to return, without coming to any agreement, he was ſeized, and thereby forced to accept of the terms, that were impoſed on him; namely, to deliver up the caſtle of Windſor to the barons, and to order the garriſon, conſiſting wholly of foreigners, to depart the kingdom.

A truce between the king and barons. T. Wikes. M. Weſt.

The war was, in all appearance, going to rekindle, with greater fury than ever; yet, as the king was unprepared, and it was the intereſt of the barons, that he ſhould begin the hoſtilities, in order to gain the people to their party, ſome peaceable perſons attempted to mediate a truce, which was followed by a peace, on the ſame terms with the former; but, as the king was compelled to enter into this treaty, he ſoon broke it, by endeavouring to ſurpriſe Dover-caſtle, then in the poſſeſſion of the barons. This attempt obliging both parties to take up arms again, every one tried to ſtrengthen his party, by ſeizing ſeveral places; and the Londoners, tho' inclined to the barons, kept a ſort of neutrality, having experienced, how liable they were to be annoyed by the garriſon of the tower, which was ever in the king's hands; and, beſides, Henry had ſtill, in the city, a conſiderable number of adherents, who were a cheque upon the oppoſite party. In the interim, the earl of Leiceſter, conſidering of what importance it would be, to have the metropolis on his ſide, marched towards it, thro' the county of Surry, ſituated ſouth of the Thames; expecting that his friends would be able to open to him the gates of the bridge; but the king, being informed of this deſign, left the tower, and encamped with his troops about Southwark, intending to oppoſe the paſſage of the enemy. The earl of Leiceſter, depending more on the aſſiſtance of the citizens, than on his own forces, vigorouſly attacked the king's troops, in hopes that the Londoners would favour his entrance; but, during the fight, ſome citizens of the king's party, perceiving that the city was in motion to aſſiſt the earl, locked up the gates of the bridge, and threw the keys into the river. On this account, the earl of Leiceſter was, for ſome time, in great diſorder, having brought with him but a handful of ſoldiers, leſt his deſign ſhould be diſcovered; yet, at length, the gates being broke open, and the citizens ſallying out, in ſwarms, to his relief, the king was conſtrained to retire, and the earl entered the city.

1264. The king and barons refer their differences to the king of France. T. Wikes. M. Weſt. Hemingf.

The advantage, gained by the barons, was attended with the uſual effect, viz. The king made them propoſals of an agreement; but, as all the former treaties were ineffectual, becauſe the king complained of being forced to accept of too rigorous terms, it was agreed, by both parties, to refer all their differences to the arbitration of the king of France. Lewis accepting the mediation, Henry, attended by prince Edward, met him at Amiens, where the ſtates-general were aſſembled; and the ſentence, pronounced by Lewis, was favourable to the king of England. He declared the Oxford-proviſions to be null and void; reſtored Henry to his antient power; adjudged that he might nominate all the great officers of the crown; and that foreigners were as capable of offices and dignities, as the Engliſh themſelves. However, he added one clauſe, which deſtroyed the whole, by declaring, "That it was not his intent to "abrogate the privileges granted to the Eng-"liſh, by their kings, before the parliament of "Oxford." The barons interpreted this clauſe, as a palpable contradiction, becauſe they pretended, that the proviſions of Oxford were enacted, purely, to corroborate their privileges; and this gave them a pretence to reject the award, and renew the war. 1264.

The war is renewed. T. Wikes. M. Weſt.

The account given of the two parties, till the famous battle of Lewes, is clogged with ſo many confuſed circumſtances, that it would, of courſe, prove tedious, to ſuch as are ignorant of the ſituation of the places, where the war was waged; and, therefore, it is better to haſten to that remarkable event, which put an end to the quarrel, in favour of the barons. I ſhall only obſerve, that, during the interval, between the renewal of the war and that battle, Henry gained ſeveral advantages over the barons; and, by means of the prince, his ſon, and the king of the Romans, brought ſeveral of them over, who conſiderably ſtrengthened his party; moreover, he became maſter of Oxford, from whence he expelled the ſcholars, for ſhewing too much partiality to the barons. The town of Northampton was taken, by ſtorm, by the king's troops, where 15 barons, and 60 knights, were made priſoners; and the king would have hanged them all, were it not for the advice of his generals, and the fear of repriſals. The taking of Northampton was followed by that of Nottingham; and then the king marched into Kent, where he forced the barons to raiſe the ſiege of Rocheſter, and retire to London.

He approaches London. T. Wikes.

The king, who was equally ſuſceptible of preſumption and fear, according to the poſture of his affairs, being fluſh'd with the ſucceſs of his arms, reſolved to march directly to London; not doubting but the city, diſcouraged by his late advantages, would declare, in his favour. Perhaps, his hopes would not have been groundleſs, if, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, he had treated the citizens, in a more obliging manner; but the remembrance of their uncivil uſage prevented them, from expoſing themſelves, now, to the like danger. The earl of Leiceſter, taking occaſion, from the king's approach, to exaſperate them againſt him, managed, with ſo much dexterity, that he perſuaded them to come out of the city, and offer him battle; but Henry, being ſurpriſed at this, and unwilling to hazard a battle with them, at their own gates, retir'd at a greater diſtance, and encamped at Lewes, in the county of Suſſex.

In the interim, the earl of Leiceſter, with the confederate barons, having received a powerful reinforcement from the Londoners, marched out of 1264. of the city, in purſuit of the king, deſigning to decide the quarrel, by a battle; and, with this view, advancing towards Lewes, they encamped, about ſix miles from the king's army. Before they approached any nearer, they ſent the king word, that they had taken up arms, not with an intent to withdraw their allegiance, but only to reform what was amiſs, in the government; that they humbly beſought him to join with them, in that work, proteſting, that he ſhould find them as faithful as thoſe, who, under the pretence of ſerving him, ſought only his ruin, by endeavouring to prejudice him againſt his moſt dutiful ſubjects, by their infamous calumnies. This letter, how reſpectful ſoever, touched thoſe about the king too ſenſibly, to be received with moderation; the king of the Romans and prince Edward were ſo offended at it, that they anſwered it with the lye, defiance, and menaces, and prevailed with the king to return the like anſwer. If it be true, as it is highly probable, that the barons took this ſtep, only to clear themſelves from the blame of what ſhould follow, upon the king's refuſal, they were glad of ſuch a plauſible occaſion, to puſh things to extremity; and, accordingly, without any farther ceremony, they aſſured the king, that they renounced the fealty they owed him, and would conſider him, henceforward, as an enemy to the ſtate.

The battle of Lewes. M. Weſt. T. Wikes. Hemingf. G. Riſh.

All hopes of an accommodation being over, the earl of Leiceſter, advancing with his army, drew it up, in order of battle, near that of the king, who was preparing to receive him; and the royal army was divided into three bodies, that, on the right, being commanded by prince Edward, that, on the left, by the king of the Romans, whilſt Henry himſelf appeared at the head of the main body. The barons army was divided into four bodies, the firſt being led by Henry de Montfort, ſon to the general; the earl of Glouceſter commanded the ſecond; the third was headed by the earl of Leiceſter; and the fourth, entirely conſiſting of Londoners, was, on the left, commanded by Nicholas Segrave. Prince Edward began the fight, with attacking the Londoners, who, not being able to ſuſtain ſuch a vigorous charge, immediately, made the beſt of their way; but, as the prince was deſirous of revenging the inſult offered to the queen, his mother, by the London-mob, he purſued them above four miles, without giving them any quarter; yet, whilſt he purſued his victory, with more eagerneſs than diſcretion, the earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter gained the ſame advantage over Henry and the king of the Romans. The barons, plainly foreſeeing what their lot would be, if they were vanquiſhed, attacked, with a fury mix'd with deſpair, the royal troops, who had not the ſame reaſon to fight, in ſuch a deſperate manner, and, accordingly, took to flight, after a faint reſiſtance, leaving the two kings in the hands of their enemies. Henry ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Leiceſter, and Richard to the earl of Glouceſter; and they were both, preſently, conducted to the priory of Lewes, ſituated at the foot of the caſtle, which was kept by ſome of the king's troops. The ſoldiers of the royal army fled to this place, in order to retire into the caſtle; but, when they ſaw the town in the power of the barons, the two kings made priſoners, and, in all likelihood, themſelves going to be ſurrounded, on all ſides, they threw down their arms, and ſurrendered, at diſcretion. 1264.

Edward, returning from the purſuit, ſuffers himſelf to de amuſed by Leiceſter. M. Weſt. Hemingf.

In the mean while, prince Edward, returning, in triumph, from the purſuit of the Londoners, was extremely ſurpriſed to ſee the royal army diſperſed, and to hear, that the two kings were made priſoners; and he, at firſt, reſolved to exert himſelf, to ſet them at liberty. If this reſolution could have been immediately, executed, it would have infallibly altered the poſture of affairs; for the conquerors, taken up, in guarding their priſoners, or ſcattered about the field, in purſuit of the flying enemies, would have found it extremely difficult, to withſtand a vigorous attack; but the prince's ſoldiers, diſmayed at the defeat of the reſt of the army, and the captivity of the two kings, were not, in the leaſt, inclined to renew a fight, which, to them, ſeemed to be very unequal. Thus, Edward loſt a fair opportunity, wherein, in all probability, he would have acquired a ſhining reputation; whilſt the earl of Leiceſter drew his army together again, with all poſſible expedition. At firſt, he thought only of defending himſelf, juſtly dreading to be attacked, in his preſent diſorder; but, when he found that he had time to rally his troops, his ſole concern was, to hinder the prince from eſcaping; and, therefore, he ſent him propoſals, to amuſe him, whilſt, by ſeveral detachments, he took care to prevent his retreat.

He can neither fight nor retreat.

Edward's uncertainty, at firſt, what ſteps he ſhould take, the oppoſition of his own troops, the time ſpent in trying to animate them, and the ſeveral meſſages from the earl of Leiceſter, to amuſe him, occaſioned the loſs of many precious hours, which ſhould have been employed, either in fighting, or retreating, in good order; but, having done neither, he was, on a ſudden, ſurrounded, on all ſides, and under a neceſſity of accepting terms, which appeared tolerable, in his preſent condition. This negotiation, which laſted but a few moments, was ended by the following articles: That the ſtatutes of Oxford ſhould be inviolably obſerved; yet ſo, that they might be amended by four biſhops, or barons, choſen by the parliament: And, if theſe four commiſſioners ſhould not agree, they were to ſtand to the arbitration of the earl of Anjou, brother to the king of France, aſſiſted by four of the French nobility. The laſt article was the worſt, for the prince, namely, That himſelf and Henry his couſin, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould remain, as hoſtages, in the cuſtody of the barons, till all things were ſettled by the authority of parliament; but Edward was forced to give his conſent. Theſe articles, termed the Miſe, that is, the agreement of Lewes, were ſigned by Edward, and confirmed by the king, who was not in a condition to reject them.

The earl of Leiceſter, having the king and almoſt all the royal family in his power, embraced all the advantages, that his policy could diſcover to his view; he, who, a little before, refuſed to obey the king's orders, becauſe he was

1264. was directed by evil counſellors, now, on all occaſions, made uſe of that monarch's name; obliging him to iſſue out orders to the governors of his caſtles, to ſurrender them to the barons. He cauſed Henry to ſign commiſſions to the ſheriffs of the ſeveral counties, impowering them to take up arms againſt all that ſhould preſume to diſturb the ſtate, that is, againſt the king's own friends; and, in a word, he, who had given the king ſo much trouble, on purpoſe to reſtrain the exorbitant power he would have aſſumed, when guided wholly by his counſels, was greatly diſpleaſed, that the ſame king was not implicitely obeyed. Thus it is, that men change their principles and maxims, according to their intereſts, and the variation of their circumſtances; but theſe are reflections, that would too frequently occur, ſhould we ſtop to make them, as often as there is occaſion, in the courſe of this hiſtory.

The barons form a new plan of government.

As the barons had no other view, in the agreement of Lewes, than to ſecure the perſon of prince Edward, they were not very forward to perform it; but, on the contrary, they drew up a new plan of government, reſolving to have it confirmed by the parliament, which was to meet, on the 22d of June. The poſture of the affairs of the kingdom rendered the calling of this parliament liable to many difficulties; for, tho' it was done, in the king's name, who could not oppoſe it, the victorious barons were unwilling, that thoſe of the oppoſite party ſhould be ſummoned, under the pretence, that they were ſtill in arms againſt their country; whilſt, on the contrary, a parliament, conſiſting only of a part of thoſe, who had a right to ſit in that aſſembly, ſeemed to want a lawful authority. It might be objected, that it was only an aſſembly of private perſons; and, therefore, the barons were extremely ſollicitous to render it more general, and give it a greater air of authority. With this view, they made the king ſign commiſſions, appointing in each county certain officers or magiſtrates, named conſervators, under the pretence that they were created, with no other deſign than to preſerve the privileges of the people; and theſe officers, entirely depending on the barons, were inveſted with a very extenſive authority; for they were impowered to do whatever they ſhould judge adviſable, to ſecure the rights and liberties of the ſubjects. This ſtep being taken, the king was obliged to ſign new orders to the conſervators, to ſend up four knights of each ſhire, to ſit in the enſuing parliament, as repreſentatives of their reſpective counties; from whence, many affirm, the right of the commons to ſit in parliament dates its original. They alledge, this is the firſt time, that the ſeveral counties undeniably appear to ſend repreſentatives to the parliament; and that all the reaſons advanced to prove, that the commons enjoyed this privilege, before the year 1264, are ſubject to ſo many difficulties, that they cannot be ſaid to amount to a clear proof. It is probable, indeed, that no ſubſtantial reaſon can be produced, why the hiſtorians ſhould unanimouſly take notice, that, on this occaſion, there were, in the parliament, repreſentatives of each county, if the ſame had been cuſtomary, from the beginning of the monarchy, or, at leaſt, from the Norman conqueſt. Why did they omit the ſame remark on ſo many former parliaments, mentioned by them? It is certain, that they, who pretend to prove, from the antient hiſtorians, that the people ſent repreſentatives to parliament, are forced to deduce conſequences, which do not always appear to be juſt and natural. 1264.

The parliament approves of the barons plan.

This new parliament, being entirely at the devotion of the confederate barons, of courſe, approved of the projected form of government, namely, "That the parliament ſhould appoint three wiſe and prudent commiſſioners, "who ſhould have power to chuſe a council of "nine lords, to whom the adminiſtration of "publick affairs ſhould be committed; that "the king, by the advice of the commiſſioners, might change, at his pleaſure, ſome, or "all of the nine counſellors; that, if the three "commiſſioners ſhould diſagree, as to the removal, or choice of, the counſellors, the majority ſhould decide it; that the reſolutions, taken by the nine counſellors, ſhould "be in force, provided they were approved "by any ſix of that number; but, if ſix of "them ſhould not agree, the buſineſs in diſpute, ſhould be referred to the three commiſſioners, who ſhould determine it, as they "thought fit; that the king might change, or "turn out, the three commiſſioners, with the "conſent of the community of the barons; "and, laſtly, that the nomination of all the "publick officers ſhould belong to the nine "counſellors." This ordinance was to take place, till the parliament ſhould unanimouſly agree to annul or alter it; and it is pretended, that the king and prince Edward were compelled to conſent to it, the former, by being threatened with deprivation, and the latter with perpetual impriſonment; whilſt, in the mean while, the barons continued to govern the kingdom, according to this model, imagining their affairs to be ſettled on a ſolid foundation.

The barons refuſe to receive a legate.

The laſt year, Urban IV. appointed, for his legate in England, cardinal Guido, biſhop of St. Sabine; who, upon his arrival in France, received a letter from the earl of Leiceſter, informing him, that it was an improper time for this legateſhip, and that neither the nobles nor the people were diſpoſed to admit him. Though the legate was extremely provoked at this refuſal, he durſt not, however, proceed on his journey; and, indeed, there was no likelihood of his entering the kingdom, againſt the conſent of the governors. Nevertheleſs, he went as far as Boulogne, where he ſummoned all the Engliſh biſhops, to give an account of their conduct; but, the biſhops not thinking it expedient to obey the ſummons, he denounced againſt them the ſentence of excommunication, from which they appealed to the pope. However, at length, the barons judged it neceſſary to give the legate ſome ſatisfaction; and, accordingly, they ſent four prelates, to acquaint him with their reaſons, for 1264. for denying him entrance into the kingdom. These envoys found the legate extremely exasperated against the barons; and, for an answer, they had orders to return into England, publish the sentence of excommunication against the earl of Leicester, and lay the city of London, with all the earl of Gloucester's lands, under an interdict. The bishops, having transmitted an account to England of the orders they had received from the legate, were met, at sea, by people, who, pretending to be pyrates, seized on all their papers, and threw them over-board; but, this proceeding convincing the legate, that it would be difficult to cause his master's authority to be regarded, at such a juncture, he returned to Rome, where, soon after, he was promoted to the papal throne, under the name of Clement IV.

Some English lords revolt against the government of the barons.

In the interim, the earl of Leicester had some cause for uneasiness; for the queen was making great preparations in France, to deliver the king, her husband; whilst, on the other hand, there was an insurrection of some lords, bordering upon Wales. He was apprehensive, that the Welch would interpose in the quarrel, and assist the king's party; and it was dangerous to leave the coasts open to the invasion of the foreigners, who, being then in Flanders, waited only for a fair wind to embarque for England; and it was equally inconvenient to suffer the insurrection, in the Marches of Wales, to grow to a head. To prevent these dangers, he resolved to go, in person, against the rebels; whilst he ordered the militia of the kingdom to assemble in Kent, to oppose the queen's landing. Having brought over to his interest Lewellyn, prince of Wales, who might have given him some trouble, he vanquished the rebels, and compelled them to throw down their arms; but he was no less unfortunate, with respect to the dreaded invasion; for the contrary winds held so long, that the foreign troops were obliged to return home, upon the approach of winter, without the queen's reaping the least advantage, from her vast expences, the king still remaining in the custody of the earl of Leicester, who disposed of him, at his pleasure.

Leicester is suspected of aspiring to the crown.

The barons, who had taken up arms against the king, merely, on account of the exorbitant power he would have assumed, could not avoid being jealous of that of the earl of Leicester, which was absolute; and the earl of Gloucester, above all the rest, was highly displeased, who considered that lord, as a person that aspired to the crown, under the specious pretence of the publick good. He was, therefore, afraid, in promoting his advancement, of furnishing him with arms to his own, as well as to the destruction of others, who were equally jealous of his greatness. The disgrace of Robert de Ferrars, earl of Derby, naturally led him to make these reflections; for this lord was sent to the tower, not so much for a punishment of the crime, of which he was accused, as for an example to such, as should dare to censure, too openly, the conduct of the principal governor. On the other hand, the earl of Gloucester, imagined, he perceived, in the cold and reserved behaviour of Leicester towards him, a secret purpose to destroy him, the first opportunity that offered; for he was not only no longer summoned to the private councils, but had no farther share in the management of affairs, than what could not be denied to one of the greatest peers of the realm. These reasons, and, above all, his envy at Leicester's greatness, induced him to countenance the male-contents, in the Marches of Wales, in order to employ them in opposing the ambitious designs of him, whom he now regarded, as an enemy; and the cabals, he openly made, convincing Leicester, that he ought to do all that was possible, to defeat his designs, he caused an order to be sent to all, that had lately taken up arms, against the establishment, to retire into Ireland; but they, refusing obedience, withdrew upon the lands of the earl of Gloucester, where they met with protection. 1265.

Leicester seems willing to set Edward at liberty.

In the interim, Leicester's enemies published in all places, that his rigorous treatment of the king, and likewise of the king of the Romans and prince Edward, was an undeniable proof of his pernicious designs; upon which, the earl thought it necessary, to efface the impressions, made by these reports, to convince the people, that he was very far from forming the ambitious projects, ascrib'd to him by his enemies. With this view, he called a parliament, declaring, it was to consider of means to restore prince Edward to liberty; designing to shew, that, since he was willing to release the heir to the crown, it was very unlikely, that he should have those pernicious intentions, charged upon him. The calling of this parliament was remarkable; for each county was ordered to send, as their representatives, two knights, and each city and borough, as many citizens and burgesses. The assertors of the antiquity of the house of commons infer, from hence, that, since the historians do not observe, that it was a new institution, it was, therefore, a customary thing; whilst others, on the contrary, alledge, that, if it had been usual, it would have been needless to take notice of this circumstance, after the mention of so many parliaments, without the like remark; but I leave it to the reader's discretion, to chuse, of both these consequences, that which seems to be the most natural, in his judgment.

Edward is delivered to the king.

The parliament being assembled, the earl of Leicester, who disposed, in a great measure, of the votes, caused an order to be pass'd, for the release of prince Edward; but it was clogg'd with a condition, that render'd the favour useless, viz. that he should remain with the king, his father, and obey him in all things. This restriction evidently proved, that it was only intended to dazzle the eyes of the publick; and, indeed, to ordain that Edward should be set at liberty, and yet continue with his father, who was himself a prisoner, was, in fact, no more than changing, or, at most, enlarging his prison. Pursuant to this order, the prince was taken out of Dover-castle, where he had been confin'd, ever since the battle of Lewes, and delivered to the king; whilst, in the 1265. mean time, Henry continued in the cuſtody of Leiceſter, who carried him about with him, and took all imaginable care, to prevent the eſcape of his priſoners.

Glouceſter declares openly againſt Leiceſter.

The late ſcene increaſed the earl of Glouceſter's ſuſpicions, or rather fully convinced him, that Leiceſter was paving his way to the throne; tho' he would not, as yet, have deſerted that lord, if an opportunity had not offered, where it would have been dangerous to diſſemble. The two eldeſt ſons of the earl of Leiceſter proclaiming a tournament, for all the young nobles, the earl of Glouceſter choſe to be abſent; believing that this was only a device, to enſnare him; but, whether his ſuſpicions had any foundation, or his prejudice led him to conſider them, as evident proofs, he openly confederated with the lords of the Marches of Wales, Leiceſter's enemies, and fortified his caſtles, as preparing for war. This proceeding giving his enemies a plauſible pretence to attack him, a proclamation was iſſued out, forthwith, declaring the earl and his adherents traytors and enemies to the ſtate; and Leiceſter, appearing at the head of an army, in order to puniſh theſe pretended enemies of the king, marched towards the Severn, and afterwards proceeded to Hereford, carrying along with him his two royal priſoners.

Prince Edward eſcapes out of Leiceſter's hands. W. Hem. M. Weſt.

Notwithſtanding Leiceſter's care, to ſecure the king and the prince, his ſon, the earl of Glouceſter formed a project for Edward's eſcape; for he perceived, that, as long as his enemy had Henry in his power, he would make great uſe of that advantage; and, therefore, he thought it expedient to get the prince out of his hands, to oppoſe the authority of the lawful heir to the crown, to that of the captive king. Probably, he judged it more difficult to free the king than the prince, or, perhaps, depended more upon the aſſiſtance of the latter than the former; but, however that be, he communicated his deſign to Roger Mortimer, one of the lords Marchers, who ſupplied him with means to put it in execution. Mortimer, having many friends at Hereford, made Edward a preſent, by a third hand, of a very ſwift horſe, and, at the ſame time, acquainted him with the deſign laid, for the recovery of his liberty; and, to ſecond this project, the prince, pretending that he was indiſpoſed, and wanted exerciſe, deſired leave to ride ſome horſes. The earl of Leiceſter granted his requeſt, tho' with great precaution; for, beſides his uſual guard, he ordered ſome gentlemen to have a watchful eye over him, and to keep him continually in their view. Edward, coming into the fields, immediately, breathed two or three horſes; and then he called for that lately preſented him, and walked him gently, at ſome diſtance from his guard, being accompanied by the gentlemen, who kept always near him; but, when he came to a certain place, which he had before carefully remarked, as proper for his deſign, laying the reins on his horſe's neck, and clapping ſpurs to his ſides, he ſo ſurpriſed thoſe that attended him, that he was at a conſiderable diſtance, before they were recovered from their aſtoniſhment; yet they rode after him, till they ſaw a troop of horſe, ſent by the earl of Glouceſter, to favour his eſcape. Edward, being thus freed, join'd the earl of Glouceſter, who received him, with great joy and reſpect; tho' his view, in procuring the prince his liberty, was not to re-eſtabliſh the arbitrary power uſurped by the king. Accordingly, he plainly told the prince, that he could not promiſe his aſſiſtance, unleſs he would oblige himſelf, by oath, to exert his utmoſt endeavours to reſtore the antient laws, and to baniſh all foreigners from about the king's perſon; but Edward promiſed and ſwore it, in the preſence of ſeveral barons, and then took the command of the troops raiſed by the earl of Glouceſter. 1265.

Leiceſter hides his concern.

Tho' the earl of Leiceſter was very ſenſible, how prejudicial the prince's eſcape might be to him, he ſeemed to be unconcerned at it, and continued, as before, to govern in the king's name; for he iſſued out, under the great ſeal, all ſuch orders as he judged expedient, for the good of the ſtate and his own intereſt, theſe two things being generally confounded by thoſe, who ſit at the helm of publick affairs.

He does all he can, to ſupport himſelf. Rot. Pat.

It would be needleſs to relate, here, all Leiceſter's precautions, to ſupport himſelf in his authority, inrich his friends, and advance his creatures; ſince it is ſufficient to ſay, in a word, that he omitted nothing that might turn to his advantage, or defeat the deſigns of his enemies. All this was, for his own ſake; but he did one thing very beneficial to the kingdom, in taking, at length, from the popes, the pretence, ſo long and ſo ſucceſsfully made uſe of by them, to inrich themſelves, at the expence of the Engliſh. As he perceived, that the people had not the ſame eſteem and deference for the pope, as formerly, he ordered a commiſſion to be drawn up, impowering him to renounce, in the king and prince Edmund's name, all pretenſions to the crown of Sicily; by vertue of which, he made an authentick renunciation, taking care to give the pope notice of it, in a letter from the king.

Edward's forces increaſe.

In the interim, the earl cauſed very ſevere orders to be publiſhed, obliging all the king's ſubjects to oppoſe, to the utmoſt of their power, prince Edward, the earl of Glouceſter, and their adherents, who were all ſtiled traytors to the king and the ſtate; but, notwithſtanding this, many barons, officers, and ſoldiers came and offered their ſervice to the prince, who, in a ſhort time, found himſelf at the head of an army, ſuperior to that of the confederates. The earl of Leiceſter, who, a little before, had all the forces of the kingdom at his diſpoſal, could not prevent Edward, from becoming maſter of Glouceſter and ſeveral other places; and he was even compelled to give way to that young prince, who purſued him, from place to place, and to exert all his policy and experience, to avoid an engagement; yet, as he was a very good general, he took timely care to poſt himſelf ſo, as to be able to retreat, whenever he ſhould be preſſed. In the interim, he ſent repeated orders to his ſon, Simon, to quit the ſiege of Pevenſey, which detained him in Kent, to come and reinforce him; and Simon, obeying, marched, with his little army, in order

1265. order to join him; but, as he approached Eveſham, where his father was encamped, Edward, receiving intelligence of his coming, ſuddenly attacked him, with all his forces, and cut in pieces this little body, which was unable to reſiſt him.

Edward marches againſt the earl of Leiceſter. An. Wav.

This victory animating the young prince, with freſh ardor, he directly returned, to attack the father, before he had received the news of his ſon's defeat; and he ſo deceived the watchfulneſs of the old general, that he was very near the enemy, when the earl imagined, that it was his ſon coming to his aſſiſtance. Such was Leiceſter's ſurpriſe, that he could not conceal it; tho' he put every thing in a poſture of defence, perceiving that a retreat would be ſtill more dangerous than a battle. The fight began, about two in the afternoon, and laſted, till night, notwithſtanding the precipitant flight of the Welch, who deſerted the earl, at the very firſt onſet; and he ſuſtained, by his courage and conduct, the efforts of Edward, who fought with an amazing valour, being very ſenſible, that the good or ill fortune of his life depended on the ſucceſs of that day. At length, after a long reſiſtance, on the ſide of the barons, the earl of Leiceſter and his ſon, Henry, being ſlain, on the ſpot, their troops were diſpirited, and the prince obtained a compleat victory; and it was no ſmall addition to his joy, on this occaſion, that, during the heat of the battle, he had the ſatisfaction to deliver the king, his father, from his captivity, ever ſince the battle of Lewes. The earl of Leiceſter, who durſt not truſt his priſoner, out of his ſight, had been ſo cruel, as to expoſe his perſon, in the battle, in which he was wounded, in the ſhoulder; nay, it is ſaid he was in danger of being killed by a ſoldier, who did not know him, if an officer had not run to his aſſiſtance, upon his crying out to the ſoldier, "Don't kill me; I am "Henry of Wincheſter, thy ſovereign." Edward, who was near the place, being informed of his father's peril, poſted thither, immediately; but, leaving him to a ſtrong guard, having juſt asked his bleſſing, he returned to the battle, that he might not loſe ſuch a precious opportunity.

T. Wikes. An. Wav.

This battle was fought, near Eveſham, on the 4th of Auguſt, 1265, 14 months after the battle of Lewes; and, the body of the earl of Leiceſter being found, among the dead, Roger Mortimer mangled it, in a barbarous manner; and, at laſt, cutting off the head, he ſent it to his wife, as a certain token of his being revenged on his enemy. Such was the fate of Leiceſter, who, tho' a foreigner, became the moſt conſiderable peer in the kingdom, and was even ſuſpected of aſpiring to the crown; but there is no certain proof of the laſt, the reports, that were ſpread concerning it, having no other foundation than bare ſuſpicions, and, perhaps, groundleſs calumnies. However, it cannot be denied, that he abuſed his power, and the confidence of his friends and collegues; at leaſt, he diſcovered, by his conduct, that he was not ſuch an enemy to arbitrary power, as he pretended, when placed at the head of the confederates; yet this, after all, does not prove, that he aſpired to the throne. Doubtleſs, this earl was endowed with noble qualities; and, if he reſembled his father, in his valour and bravery, he was far from being like him, in his cruelty. He always expreſſed ſo great a veneration for the monks, that they would have ſainted him, at any rate, after his death, pretending that many miracles were wrought at his tomb. A modern hiſtorian aſſures us, that he ſaw, in an antient manuſcript, ſeveral prayers directed to him, as a martyr; and this opinion prevailed ſo much, among the people, that the pope was forced to exert all his authority, to put a ſtop to that ſuperſtition; but, however this be, as we are uncertain of the motive of the earl's actions, we are equally ſo, whether he was more worthy of blame than of pity. If, in taking up arms againſt Henry, his ſovereign and benefactor, he was entirly ſwayed by ambition, we cannot ſufficiently deteſt his ingratitude to a prince, his brother-in-law, who had loaded him with favours; but, if he appeared at the head of a party, ſolely with a view to the good of the publick, and to free the kingdom from the manifeſt oppreſſion it groaned under, queſtionleſs, ſome people would not want plauſible reaſons, to juſtify his conduct. In the mean time, without examining this motive too cloſely, modern writers, for the moſt part, inveigh bitterly againſt him; and the Engliſh Catiline is one of the beſt names they afford him; but nothing leſs could be expected from the bulk of hiſtorians, who generally dedicate their works to kings, queens, prime-miniſters, and favourites.

The confederate barons are perſecuted, and their eſtates confiſcated.

After the defeat of the confederates, they, who, a little before, were perſecuted, became perſecutors, in their turn; plaguing their enemies, 1000 ways, and expoſing them to many hardſhips. The king, being naturally revengeful and avaricious, was extremely impatient to be revenged on thoſe who had offended him, and to ſeize their ſpoils; and, with this view, he called a parliament, which, as it entirely conſiſted of his creatures, granted him the confiſcation of the eſtates of the rebels. The city of London, the parliament haveing decreed that ſhe deſerved to forfeit all her priviſeges, was left to the king's mercy, who took away her gates, chains, and magiſtrates, and exacted a large ſum of money from the citizens, to reſtore what he had taken from them. The confederate barons, finding themſelves expoſed to a revenge, in all appearance, inſatiable, were in the greater conſternation, as they could perceive no remedy, in this their extremity; and Simon de Montfort, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Leiceſter, not doubting but he ſhould be one of the firſt, that ſhould fall a ſacrifice to the king's reſentment, took care, betimes, to ſecure an intereſt in the friendſhip of Richard, king of the Romans, whom he had in cuſtody, in Kenelworth-caſtle, by releaſing him, without a ranſom; and this example turned to the advantage of ſeveral priſoners of the battle of Lewes, who were alſo ſet at liberty, with the ſame view, by their keepers.

In

1265. In the interim, the king revenged himſelf on thoſe, that had taken up arms againſt him, by ſeizing their eſtates, which he either kept, for his own uſe, or liberally beſtowed on his favourites; for, regardleſs of the conſequences, he entirely gave way to his paſſion, not, in the leaſt, conſidering, that people, reduced to beggary, are on the very brink of deſpair. He would have acted more diſcreetly, had he copied after the earl of Pembroke, his firſt governor, who reſtored to the vanquiſh'd barons their eſtates, leſt he ſhould expoſe the kingdom to freſh troubles. Henry was of a quite different character, who endangered the loſs of the fruits of the prince his ſon's victory over the barons, by refuſing them the leaſt favour. Simon de Montfort, apprehending his caſe to be deſperate, left the caſtle of Kenelworth, with a ſtrong garriſon; and, aſſembling ſome of the remains of his father's army, he threw himſelf into the iſle of Axholme in Lincolnſhire. He ſoon put that place in a condition, to ſerve for a refuge to himſelf and friends; and great numbers daily reſorted to him, who, at length, began to give ſome uneaſineſs to their enemies.

1266. The queen arrives, and is followed by a legate. Whilſt the court was preparing to prevent the conſequences of this new revolt, the queen arrived from France, where ſhe had retired with prince Edmund, her ſon, after the battle of Lewes; and ſhe was quickly followed by a legate, who, a few days after his coming, having convened a ſynod, ſolemnly excommunicated the late earl of Leiceſter and all his adherents, whether dead or alive. Clement IV. finding that the Engliſh were tired with ſupplying money, for the conqueſt of Sicily, judged it expedient to ſave the honour of the holy ſee, which had ſomewhat ſuffered, by prince Edmund's renunciation; and, therefore, he ſent the king notice, by his legate, of a bull of Urban, his predeceſſor, revoking the grant to the prince, his ſon. He had, hitherto, kept this bull private, being deſirous of ſeeing the iſſue of a negotiation with Charles, earl of Anjou, to whom he actually gave, this very year, the inveſtiture of the two Sicily's; yet Henry, who had only quitted his pretenſions, as he was compelled to it by the earl of Leiceſter, during his captivity, could not, without regret, find himſelf obliged to renounce his hopes; but there was, now, no remedy.

Remarks on the affair of Sicily. This was, at laſt, the reſult of the affair of Sicily, which had been, to the popes, a fertile ſource of oppreſſions, upon the people and clergy of England; and, if it had been vaſtly expenſive to the Engliſh, they reaped, at leaſt, this benefit by it, that it viſibly leſſened their former good opinion of every thing that flowed from the court of Rome, and taught them to be more upon their guard, for the future, againſt her uſurpations. The truth of this obſervation will, more particularly, appear, in the ſucceeding reigns; in which we ſhall ſee the Engliſh much leſs tractable, with reſpect to the popes; and it may be farther remarked, that this affair was the principal cauſe of the misfortunes, to which Henry was expoſed, for ſo many years, and, at the ſame time, of the ſolid eſtabliſhment of the great charter, which, henceforward, met with very feeble attacks. Had not Henry been obliged to ſatisfy the avarice of the popes, he would have leſs oppreſſed his ſubjects; and the barons would have wanted the moſt plauſible pretence for their confederacy. It is extremely ſurpriſing, that the pope's grant to prince Edmund ſhould be unknown to the hiſtorians of Naples and Sicily, who do not ſo much as mention it, though the countries, of which they have written, were ſo greatly concerned; for there is only one that juſt ſpeaks of it, and even he is miſtaken, in the name of the Engliſh prince, to whom, he ſays, the pope would have given Sicily. Villani, a noted author, recites the pope's ſpeech to the cardinals, to perſuade them to approve of his deſign to inveſt Charles of Anjou with both Sicily's; and, in this harangue, the pontiff repreſents all the injuries ſuſtained by the church from Manfred, the neceſſity of deſtroying the houſe of Swabia, and the advantages which the church would obtain, if theſe kingdoms were given to a prince, who was able to undertake her defence. This, in all appearance, was a very natural occaſion, to take notice of the endeavours of his predeceſſors, to dethrone the uſurper, by the aſſiſtance of the king of England, in giving the crown of theſe kingdoms to one of his ſons; but he does not ſay a word, about it. What then, can be inferred from the ſilence of the pope, as well as the Neapolitan and Sicilian hiſtorians, but that the court of Rome never really intended to procure this crown, for prince Edmund; and that her ſole view was to drain England of money, under ſuch a frivolous pretence?

1266. Simon de Montfort is forced to ſurrender. As Montfort's retreat to the iſle of Axholme might prove to be of dangerous conſequence, prince Edward was ſent into thoſe parts, with an army; tho' it was difficult to diſlodge the male-contents, from a place ſo ſtrongly fortified, both by art and nature. However, after an obſtinate defence, the beſieged were conſtrained to ſurrender, on condition that their lives and limbs were ſpared; and, as to their eſtates, it was agreed, that they ſhould ſubmit to the judgment of the king of the Romans and prince Edward. This capitulation being ſigned, Montfort was preſented to the king, and found a powerful mediator, in the king of the Romans; for this prince affirmed, that, after the battle of Eveſham, the garriſon of Kenelworth would have murdered him, if Montfort had not hazarded his own life, to prevent it; and then he intreated the king to pardon him, in conſideration of his having generouſly releaſed him, without a ranſom. It is ſaid, Henry, moved with Montfort's good offices to the king, his brother, was inclined to reſtore him entirely to favour, if the earl of Glouceſter had not openly oppoſed it; but, as it was neceſſary to keep fair with Glouceſter, as well as with the king of the Romans, it was reſolved in council, that Montfort ſhould have liberty to depart the kingdom, and that the king ſhould grant him an annual penſion of 500 marks, provided he delivered up Kenelworth-

1266. nelworth-caſtle; but the garriſon refuſed to obey him. All the other rebels, in Axholme, were pardoned, upon their ſwearing, never for the time to come, to carry arms againſt the king, an oath which was, afterwards, very little obſerved; and, this affair being over, the kingdom, immediately, enjoyed ſome tranquillity. Montfort ſeemed pretty well contented with his lot; but, ſoon after, whether out of inconſtancy, or becauſe he wanted a ſubſiſtance, he joined certain pyrates of the Cinque-ports, who gave him the command of their ſhips, with which he plundered, without diſtinction, all the merchant-men that came in his way. As it was manifeſt, that the inhabitants of the Cinque-ports countenanced theſe pyracies, the king ſent prince Edward, to chaſtiſe them; but the prince reduced them to their allegiance, without uſing force, namely, by promiſing them a general pardon, and the confirmation of their privileges, for which they renewed their fealty to the king.

Several inſurrections. T. Wikes.

After all, it could not be ſaid, that peace was fully reſtored to the kingdom, ſince Kenelworth-caſtle was ſtill in the hands of the male-contents; and there was alſo, in the north, a troop of armed men, who obliged the king to ſend, againſt them, Henry, eldeſt ſon of the king of the Romans. This young prince marched, with ſuch expedition, that he ſurpriſed the rebels; and, killing the greateſt part, he diſperſed the reſt. However, the ring-leaders made their eſcape; who, joining with other male-contents, and particularly thoſe of Axholme, became maſters of the iſle of Ely, in Cambridgeſhire; from whence, making continual inroads into the neighbouring counties, they committed great ravages.

A brave and generous action of Edward.

At the ſame time, Adam de Gurdun taking up arms in Hampſhire, Edward had occaſion to give ſenſible proofs of his courage and generoſity; for, in a battle with the rebels, Adam who was ſtrong and valiant, attacking the prince, hand to hand, obliged him to exert his utmoſt dexterity and valour. This ſingle combate was not interrupted, till Adam, being down on the ground, was compelled to yield himſelf priſoner to the prince; but this act of bravery, in Edward, was, immediately, followed by another of generoſity, which redounded as much to his honour. The prince generouſly gave him life and liberty; and Adam deeply affected, as he ought, with this favour, ſerved him, ever after, with the greateſt fidelity.

The king beſieges Kenelworth. An. Wav.

The garriſon of Kenelworth was become ſo formidable, and likewiſe ſo odious, on the account of their outrages, that the king's council reſolved, this caſtle ſhould be, forthwith, inveſted, and the ſiege of Ely deferred to another opportunity. The king was extremely incenſed againſt the governor of Kenelworth, for inſolently cutting off the hand of his herald, ſent to ſummon him to ſurrender; inſomuch that he determined to go, in perſon, to this ſiege, fancying that his preſence would ſtrike the greater terror into the beſieged; but they made ſuch a brave and reſolute defence, that, after a ſix months ſiege, there was not the leaſt proſpect of forcing them to capitulate; and, therefore, the ſiege was turned into a blockade. In the interim, the king continued in the town, of which he was maſter, in expectation that hunger would compel the garriſon to ſurrender. 1266.

1267. A parliament at Kenelworth. An. Wav.

During the blockade, Henry called a parliament, at Kenelworth, to conſider means to reduce the rebels of Ely, either by offering them an eaſy compoſition, or by force, if they rejected the favour propoſed; and, with this view, the parliament drew up certain articles, containing the terms, on which the king was to grant a general pardon. Theſe terms were very favourable, conſidering the preſent circumſtances; for, to have their eſtates reſtored, ſome were to pay five years value, ſome three, and others only one; but, whether the male-contents could not depend upon the king's word, or thought theſe conditions too hard, they refuſed to accept them. They even took occaſion, from thence, to increaſe their outrages; and, having the boldneſs to make an excurſion, as far as Norwich, they carried, from that place, above 20,000 l. ſterling.

The garriſon of Kenelworth. T. Wikes.

The garriſon of Kenelworth, though cloſely blocked up, and forced to eat their horſes, relying on the aſſiſtance promiſed by Simon de Montfort, held out ſo long a ſiege, with an invincible reſolution; but, at length, when they could ſcarce withſtand any longer the hunger, that preſſed them, deſpairing of any ſuccours, they capitulated to ſurrender the caſtle, provided they were not relieved, within 40 days. During that ſpace, they were to be ſupplied with proviſions; but, upon the expiration of it, they came out of the caſtle, ſo pale and meagre, that it could not be conceived, that a garriſon, in ſo wretched a condition, ſhould have the aſſurance to demand ſuch a capitulation.

The earl of Glouceſter takes meaſures againſt the king.

The taking of Kenelworth, and his hopes of ſpeedily reducing the rebels of Ely, led the king to forget his paſt misfortunes, as well as the prince his ſon's engagement for him, with the earl of Glouceſter; and Edward himſelf, notwithſtanding his oath, was more ſollicitous to reduce the male-contents of Ely to the king's obedience, than to perform his promiſes. The earl of Glouceſter obſerved, with extreme regret, that, as the king's affairs proſpered, the father and ſon acted, with leſs moderation, and were more ready to ſtretch the prerogative royal, beyond the limits preſcribed by the laws. What he had done, for the king and prince, was not ſo much to enlarge the regal power, as to prevent the earl of Leiceſter from paving his way to the throne; which very evidently appeared, from the oath he required of prince Edward; but, the conduct of Henry, who was returning to his former courſes, convincing him, that, after the reduction of the male-contents, it would be extremely difficult to confine the authority of the ſovereign, within proper bounds, he judged it neceſſary to oppoſe his progreſs, in time. Thus, reſolved, he retired to his own eſtate, on the borders of 1267. Wales, where he entered into a league with Lewellyn, and ſome neighbouring barons; after which, he ſent word to the male-contents of Ely, that he would endeavour to relieve them.

Tho' his abſence and preparations muſt, of courſe, have given ſome umbrage to the court; yet, as he concealed his deſigns, under the pretence of a quarrel with Mortimer, he left ſome room to doubt of the motives of his armament. In the interim, whilſt, according to the dictates of policy and good ſenſe, the king ſhould have made it his ſtudy, to give ſome ſatisfaction to ſuch a powerful lord, all his thoughts were engroſſed, about means to reduce the rebels of Ely; not ſo much to reſtore the publick tranquillity, as to render himſelf as much, or more, abſolute than ever. He plainly foreſaw, that he could not attain his ends, whilſt a body of armed rebels were in the midſt of his dominions; and, therefore, he convened a parliament, to conſult about effectual meaſures, to reduce them to their allegiance. The earl of Glouceſter refuſing to give his attendance, the king, being uneaſy at it, ſent ſome lords, to admoniſh him to come and take his ſeat, in that aſſembly, who found the earl very intent upon raiſing an army; but, when they expreſſed their ſurpriſe at it, he told them, for their ſatisfaction, that the troops were deſigned againſt Mortimer, his enemy; and he even gave them a writing, under his own ſeal, by which he engaged, that he would never take up arms againſt the king. Thus, he removed all ſuſpicions, that were entertained concerning him; and the king and parliament thought of nothing more than how to beſiege Ely, the only thing that, now, gave them any diſturbance; and the reſolution that was taken, of vigorouſly carrying on this ſiege, furniſhing the king with a plauſible pretence, to demand an aid, the parliament granted him a very conſiderable ſupply. The legate, alſo, tho' he had not the ſame reaſons, preſſed the clergy to grant the ſame aid to the pope; but the prelates not only refuſed to comply, but, being highly exaſperated, committed to writing the reaſons of their denial, which were not much for the honour of the court of Rome.

The king marches to Cambridge W. Riſh. M. Weſt.

No ſooner had the parliament broke up, than the king took the field, at the head of his army; and, having advanced, as far as Cambridge, he halted, to ſend and ſummon the rebels of Ely, to return to their duty; but their anſwer plainly ſhewed, that it was no eaſy matter to frighten them; which, and the ſituation of the iſle of Ely, that had formerly very much embaraſſed William the Conqueror, ſomewhat abating his martial ardor, cauſed him to wait the arrival of the prince, his ſon, who was then at York.

The earl of Glouceſter becomes maſter of London, and of the tower. M. Weſt. An. Wav. T. Wikes.

Whilſt the king was at Cambridge, the earl of Glouceſter headed the army, raiſed on his own lands, and in Wales; who directly marched towards London, and with ſo much expedition, that he entered the city, before they had time to prevent him, and even before they knew, whether he acted for, or againſt the king. Nevertheleſs, it is probable, that the magiſtrates and principal citizens were no ſtrangers to his deſigns; but, however that be, the earl, approached the tower, the cuſtody of which the king had committed to the legate; and he ſummoned him to reſign it, immediately, alledging, that it was not a poſt to be truſted in the hands of a foreigner, much leſs of an eccleſiaſtick. The legate, ſurpriſed at this unexpected ſummons, made a ſhow of defending himſelf; but, as he wanted proviſions, and the earl had ſtrictly prohibited the ſending in any, he was quickly conſtrained to ſurrender. The earl, being now maſter of the tower, was not ſo careful to conceal his deſigns; and, as ſeveral of the male-contents daily joined him, it was viſible, that he did not intend to act, for the king's intereſt. At length, pulling off the maſque, he publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring, that he had taken up arms, to obtain reaſonable terms for the male-contents; and that it was his intention to oblige the king and prince to the more punctual performance of their promiſes. Henry, aſtoniſhed at this freſh revolt, ſent preſſing orders to the prince, his ſon, to come and join him, as ſoon as poſſible, being in continual dread of an attack, though he was not in a condition to come off, with honour, if compelled to a battle. Theſe orders meeting the prince, in his return from the north, where he had finiſh'd his affairs, obliged him to march, with the utmoſt expedition, to the king's relief; and they were no ſooner joined, than they advanced together towards London, and encamped at Stratford, within three miles of the city. The univerſal eſteem the nobility and commons had for Edward, rather than their affection for the king, cauſed, in a very ſhort ſpace, the army to be conſiderably augmented; inſomuch that the earl of Glouceſter durſt not ſtir out of London, for fear of engaging, at a great diſadvantage. He had entertained hopes, that the whole kingdom would eſpouſe his cauſe, and that the king's own troops would deſert him; but now, perceiving that, on the contrary, his friends began to abandon him, he, timely, applied to the king of the Romans, by whoſe interceſſion, he obtained much better terms than he could reaſonably have expected; for he was not only forgiven, upon laying down his arms, but procured the city of London to be included in his pardon, which otherwiſe would, doubtleſs, have been puniſhed in an exemplary manner. He would fain have obtained the ſame favour, for the rebels of Ely; but the king and prince were inexorable, in that particular.

The Ely-rebels ſurrender. M. Weſt. T. Wikes.

This affair being over, Edward approached the iſle of Ely; and the male-contents, having no proſpect of relief, choſe to ſurrender, before they were reduced to extremity. The only condition, allowed them, was the ſaving their lives and limbs; and, by this, were extinguiſhed the troubles, that had, for five years, tormented the kingdom.

A treaty of peace with Wales. M. Weſt. W. Riſh. An. Wav.

Henry, having an army in readineſs, reſolved to correct the inſolence of the prince of Wales, who, during the late troubles, had, all along, aſſiſted the rebels; and he advanced, as far as Montgomery, where Lewellyn ſent ambaſſadors, 1267. dors, to ſue for peace. His offer to pay the king 32,000 marks, and to do him homage, for his principality, was an inducement to hearken to his propoſals; but he was, moreover, obliged to deliver up certain caſtles, convenient for the king.

1268. Edward takes the croſs to go to the Holy-land. W. Riſh.

The peace of the kingdom being, thus, reſtored, the king called a parliament; where Ottobon, the pope's legate, being preſent, informed the aſſembly, that the pope was reſolved to publiſh a Cruſade, in all the chriſtian ſtates; and he exhorted the Engliſh, to contribute their money and perſons towards this expedition, which was ſolely intended, to promote the glory of God and the good of the church. The preſent tranquillity of England cauſed great numbers to engage, in this undertaking; eſpecially, when they ſaw prince Edward and Henry, ſon of the king of the Romans, receive the croſs, at the hands of the legate. The earls of Warwick and Pembroke, and above 120 knights, followed the example of theſe two princes, beſides a vaſt multitude of perſons of inferior quality; and the legate, having no farther buſineſs in England, returned to Rome, whilſt the king of the Romans took his third journey to Germany.

The ſtatutes of Marlborough. W. Riſh.

Whilſt the Croiſes were preparing for their voyage, the king convened a parliament, at Marlborough, where a body of ſtatutes were enacted; which make a conſiderable figure, among the laws of England.

The death of Clement IV. M. Weſt.

Before we proceed to the events of the following year, it will be neceſſary to mention the death of pope Clement IV, upon which, the papal chair was vacant, for three years together; and this year is alſo memorable for the famous battle, near the lake of Celano, that was fought, between Charles of Anjou, the new king of Sicily, and Conradin, ſon of the emperor Conrade; but, Conradin having the misfortune to be vanquiſhed and taken priſoner, Charles was ſo cruel as to order him to be beheaded.

The battle of Celano. M. Weſt. W. Riſh.

Edward engages to accompany the king of France to the Holy-Land Act. Pub. W. Riſh. M. Weſt. T. Wikes.

The Cruſade was not only publiſhed in England, but likewiſe in all the chriſtian ſtates, eſpecially in France; and St. Lewis was to be head of it; the ill ſucceſs of his expedition into Egypt not being able to cool his zeal, he had, inceſſantly, ſince his return, projected means, how to carry war, once more, into the country of the Infidels. Prince Edward's late taking the croſs inſpired Lewis with better hopes of ſucceſs, if he could perſuade that prince to join him; and, therefore, he invited him to come to Paris, where he imparted to him his deſign. Edward was deſirous of nothing more than to join forces, with ſuch a potent prince, and to command under him; but he intimated to him, that he could not be ready, with ſufficient diſpatch, for want of money to ſupport the expence of the voyage. Lewis, glad to find that he made no other objection, lent him 30,000 marks, for which Edward mortgaged to him the revenues of Bourdeaux, for ſeven years; and, upon this agreement, Edward returned into England, where the king, his father, had now aſſembled a parliament, which granted him a 20th part of the moveables of the kingdom, part whereof was to be employed, towards the charges of the prince's expedition.

Before Edward was prepared for his departure, the king of the Romans arrived with a new wife, he had married in Germany, not ſo much for her fortune as her beauty.

The ſecond marriage of the king of the Romans. T. Wikes.

A little before the departure of the Croiſes, Henry cauſed the reliques of Edward the confeſſor, for which he had a peculiar veneration to be removed; and this ceremony, to which all the great men of the kingdom were invited, was performed, in a very pompous manner. The ſhrine of the ſaint, adorned with precious ſtones, was carried on the ſhoulders of the king himſelf, and his brother, the king of the Romans, with the princes, and principal lords, and placed in the new church of Weſtminſter, which was juſt finiſhed, and rendered the moſt ſtately of any, at that time, in Europe.

1270. The king of the Romans reconciles Edward to the earl of Glouceſter T. Wikes.

The calm England enjoyed, for a conſiderable while, was in danger of being diſturbed by the ſuſpicions, the earl of Glouceſter entertained of prince Edward; for that lord, not believing that the prince was thoroughly reconciled to him, kept away from court, and always found ſome excuſe, to be abſent from the parliaments; inſomuch that the king was apprehenſive, that the earl had ſtill a deſign to interrupt the peace of the kingdom; but the king of the Romans freed him from his fears, by procuring a perfect reconciliation between theſe two enemies.

St. Lewis lands in Africa, to beſiege Tunis. T. Wikes. Vignier.

In the mean time, Lewis, inſtead of going directly to the Holy-Land, as he, at firſt, intended, embarqued for Africa, at the inſtance of Charles king of Sicily, his brother, who was at variance with the king of Tunis; for he expected that the African prince ſhould pay him the ſame tribute, his predeceſſors paid to the emperor, with all the arrears. To ſupport theſe pretenſions, Lewis landed his army in Africa, and made preparations to beſiege Tunis; but the Mooriſh king choſe rather to promiſe the payment of what was demanded, than hazard the loſs of his dominions.

Edward goes to join the king of France, and leaves him in Africa. M. Weſt.

Lewis had ſet out for Africa, when Edward departed from Portſmouth, to take up the Princeſs, his ſpouſe, at Bourdeaux; from whence they went together to Aigues Mortes, where their fleet waited for them; and, having embarqued there, they joined the king of France, before Tunis, where he ſtaid, for the performance of the treaty made with the Moors. How preſſingly ſoever Edward ſollicited this monarch, to continue his voyage to Paleſtine, he could not prevail on him to ſtir, before he had received entire ſatisfaction from the king of Tunis; but, as Edward had no concern, in that affair, he reſolved to paſs the winter in Sicily, deſigning to proceed for the Holy-Land, in the ſpring. He had ſcarce left the coaſts of Africa, when the peſtilence breaking out, in the camp of the French, raged ſo furiouſly, that it not only ſwept away the private ſoldiers, but alſo the principal officers; and the king himſelf being, at laſt,

1270. seized with it, resigned his breath, in the arms of his eldest son, Philip, who, soon after this, returned to France.

Henry, son to the king of the Romans, is murdered by Guido de Montfort.

Though Lewis's death deprived Edward of all hopes of making any remarkable progress, in Palestine, he continued his voyage, and arrived there, pursuant to his vow; yet, Philip's return to France giving him some cause to fear, with respect to Guienne, he resolved to send thither his cousin Henry, son of the king of the Romans, to watch the motions of the French. This young prince, posting to Bourdeaux, passed through Viterbo, a city in the pope's dominions, where he was inclined to make some stay, which occasioned the loss of his life; for Guido de Montfort, son to the late earl of Leicester, then at that place, seeing the prince enter into a church, followed him, and murdered him, before the high-altar, in revenge of his father's death, who was slain in the battle of Evesham; but nothing could be more unjust than the murderer's pretence, to vindicate this infamous action, since neither this prince, nor his father, the king of the Romans, were present at that battle, being then both under confinement.

1271. Edward comes to Palestine.

Edward's progress, in the Holy-Land, was not very considerable; yet, with his few troops, he convinced the Saracens what they might expect from him, if he should be reinforced; for his valour, fame, and the reputation of king Richard, his great-uncle, who had performed such wondrous exploits, in the east, so terrified the Infidels, that they sent an assassin, to dispatch him. The villain pretending to settle a correspondence, between Edward and the governor of Joppa, who feigned a desire to turn christian, was often admitted into the prince's presence, and to discourse with him; but, at last, as he was, one day, alone in his chamber, he would have stabbed him, with a dagger, in the belly, if Edward had not warded off the blow, with his arm, where he received a dangerous wound. The assassin, enraged at this disappointment, made an attempt to redouble his blow, with greater violence; but Edward gave him such a kick, on the breast, that he beat him down backward, and, leaping upon him, wrested the dagger out of his hand, and killed him, immediately. The prince's wound was much more dangerous than it seemed to be, because the dagger was poisoned; and, as it began to gangrene, his cure was despaired of; but it fortunately happened, that there was, then, in the army, a skilful chirurgeon, who delivered him from this danger. Some affirm, he was indebted, for his life, to the tender affection of Eleonora, his spouse, who sucked the venom out of the wound; but this circumstance is not mentioned by any author, of that time. This princess was brought to bed, at Acres, of a daughter, named Joan de Acres, from the place of her nativity, according to the custom of those days.

Greg. X. Act. Pub.

Whilst Edward was in Palestine, Theobald, archdeacon of Liege, who attended him thither, receiving the news of his election to the papal throne, set out, immediately, for Rome; where he assumed the name of Gregory X.

1271.

Edward's army daily diminished, either by sickness, or several battles with the Saracens, whilst he had not any prospect of supplies, from France, or elsewhere; wherefore, tho' with great reluctance, he proposed to the sultan a truce, which, after a short negotiation, was concluded, for 10 years, 10 months, and 10 days, both parties being allowed to keep what they possessed; and, having no farther business in Palestine, the prince, with his troops, embarqued for England.

1272. Edward makes a ten years truce with the sultan.

During his absence, the king, his father, enjoyed a perfect tranquillity; which was not, in the least, interrupted, except by the death of the king of the Romans, his brother. It is said, that this prince's grief, for the tragical fate of his son, threw him into a fit of sickness, which laid him in his grave; and Edmund, his other son, succeeded him, as earl of Cornwall, being invested with this title by the king, his uncle.

The death of the king of the Romans.

Presently after, there was a sedition at Norwich, occasioned by a quarrel, between the citizens and monks, in which the cathedral and monastery adjoining were reduced to ashes, by the former; but Henry, resolving not to let this riot pass, with impunity, went, in person, to Norwich, where he caused the offenders to be severely punished. The king, in his return to London, was seized, at St. Edmundsbury, with a languishing distemper, which, not seeming to have dangerous symptoms, did not prevent him from proceeding on his journey; but, his sickness increasing, after his arrival at London, he died, in a few days, aged 66 years, of which he had reigned 56, and 20 days. He gave orders, that his body should be interred, near the shrine of Edward the Confessor, in the abbey-church of Westminster; where his tomb, with his statue in brass, may be seen, at this day.

This prince's character is so visible, in all the circumstances of his life, that it will be entirely needless to draw it, more fully; for his narrow genius, his easiness to be governed by proud and selfish counsellors, his fickle and capricious temper, and the notions of arbitrary power instilled into him, from his youth, were the real causes of all the troubles, in his reign. He was too weak, when there was occasion for steadiness, and too haughty, when it was necessary to give way to the times; so that he never seemed to consult his own advantage. Nothing can be said of his courage, since it does not appear, that he ever gave any evident proofs of it; but he may be justly commended, for his continence, and his utter aversion to cruelty, being always satisfied with punishing the rebels, in their purses, when he might have spilt their blood, on the scaffold. He was extremely avaricious, tho' he squandered away his money so idly, that he continued poor, notwithstanding the immense sums he exacted from his subjects; and, however pressing his necessities were, he could not restrain his boundless liberality to his favourites, without considering 1272. fidering the great difficulties he met with, in procuring aids from his parliament; but this profuſeneſs, and the vaſt ſums, to no purpoſe, employed in the affair of Sicily, were the principal cauſes of all his mortifications and diſgraces, during the whole courſe of his life.

Four things to be remarked, in the reign of Henry III.

Four things, eſpecially, render this reign remarkable. I. The readineſs with which the barons, in league againſt king John, returned to the obedience of their young ſovereign, the very moment they believed their privileges were out of danger. II. The patience of the barons, for above 40 years, notwithſtanding the little regard Henry had for them, and the continual breaches of his oaths. III. The Engliſh are indebted to the troubles, which diſtracted this reign, for the preſervation of the liberties and privileges they enjoy, at this day. If the barons of thoſe times had been more paſſive, it may be very fairly preſumed, that the two charters of king John would have been buried in eternal oblivion; and, if their revolt proved, in the end, fatal to themſelves, it was, at leaſt, beneficial to their poſterity, ſince Henry's ſucceſſors, dreading to expoſe themſelves to the like dangers, never ventured to revoke theſe charters, which are the baſis and foundation of the liberty of the Engliſh. Accordingly, they had time to be ſo ſtrongly eſtabliſhed, by degrees, that there was no annulling them; and let the earl of Leiceſter be exclaimed againſt, in the moſt oppfobrious language, let him be ſtiled impious, for daring to take up arms againſt his ſovereign, after all, it cannot be denied, that his ambition has produced happy effects, for the whole Engliſh nation. IV. The tyranny of the Roman pontiffs, who abuſing their power, treated the clergy of England, with inconceivable rigour. I ſhould add, here, an article of no leſs importance, viz. the origin of the houſe of commons, if it were not liable to ſo many diſputes. 1272.

His iſſue.

Henry III, had nine children by Eleonora of Provence, his wife; but only two ſons and two daughters ſurvived him, the reſt dying in their infancy. Edward, his eldeſt ſon, was his ſucceſſor; and Edmund, his ſecond ſon, after a vain expectation of the crown of the two Sicily's, which the pope had amuſed him with, was earl of Lancaſter, Leiceſter, and Derby, Lord of Monmouth, and high-ſteward of England. Margaret, his eldeſt daughter, was married, at nine years of age, to Alexander III, king of Scotland, to whom ſhe left but one daughter, of her own name, wife of Eric, king of Norway; from which marriage deſcended a princeſs of the ſame name, whom I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of, in the following reign; and Beatrix, Henry's ſecond daughter, was eſpouſed to John de Dreux, duke of Bretagne.

The State of the Church, during the reigns of HENRY II, RICHARD I, JOHN LACKLAND, and HENRY III.

The State of the Church.

DURING the four laſt reigns, the affairs of the church were ſo interwoven with thoſe of the ſtate, that there was a neceſſity of relating them together; and, indeed, the conteſts between Henry II. and Thomas Becket, and between John and Innocent III, and the tyranny exerciſed by the popes, in England, under Henry III, furniſh the chief materials for the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of theſe three reigns, that of Richard I. being the only one, wherein the church had no influence; unleſs we conſider the Cruſade, in which that prince was engaged, as an affair, purely, eccleſiaſtical. Some regard theſe four reigns, as a time of triumph, for the church, becauſe, in their notion of the church, they mean no more than the pope and the clergy; but others are of opinion, that this was a time of oppreſſion and ſlavery, becauſe chriſtians were oppreſſed by the popes, who ſhamefully abuſed their authority.

The bare peruſal of the hiſtory of theſe four reigns is ſufficient to ſhew, that it was not, without reaſon, that I, ſo copiouſly, inſiſted on the prodigious increaſe of the papal power; and, as we have, already, ſeen the pernicious effects of the power aſſumed by the popes, it, now, remains to point out the principles, on which they eſtabliſhed their authority, and the conſequences they drew from thence, to enlarge it; and this is the more worthy of notice, as it is the ſource of all the remarkable events, that fell out in the church of England, for ſeveral centuries.

Principles on which the eccleſiaſtical power was eſtabliſh'd.

The firſt principle was, That Jeſus Chriſt committed the inſtruction of the faithful to the care of the miniſters of his church; from whence it was inferred, Firſt, That the faithful ought to ſubmit to the deciſions of theſe miniſters, in matters of faith; and, Secondly, That laymen had not any right to decide, or even to examine, the difficulties which might ariſe, about theſe matters, but ought implicitly to follow the determinations of the clergy. This plainly ſuppoſes infallibility in the miniſters of the church; but as that ſuppoſition was founded upon the promiſes of Chriſt to his church, in general, and as the conſequence, drawn from thence, for the infallibility of the miniſters, in particular, was not ſufficiently evident, an expedient was invented, to blind the eyes of the world, by confounding the general notion of the church with that of the clergy, in particular; ſo that, by degrees, the eccleſiaſticks alone were called the church, and to them only were applied the promiſes of Chriſt, made to all chriſtians, in general. Accordingly, in ſaying with Chriſt, the gates of hell ſhould not prevail againſt the church, they expreſly meant, that the clergy or councils, entirely conſiſting of the ſeveral members of the clergy, ſhould be infallible, in their deciſions. Thus, the miſinterpretation of the term, Church, was one of the principal cauſes of the blindneſs of chriſtians; but I ſhall not enlarge, on this head; for I deſign only juſt to mention the ſeveral ſteps, by which the eccleſiaſtical power arrived to ſo prodigious a height.

The ſecond principle was, That Jeſus Chriſt not only appointed miniſters in his church, for the inſtruction of the faithful, but alſo to inſpect their life and converſation; from whence it was inferred, that it belonged to the paſtors to declare to their flocks, what was juſt and agreeable to the laws of God, and what not; and, alſo, that they had not only a right to exhort the faithful, and cenſure them, upon the neglect of their duty, but alſo to puniſh them, when in a ſtate of impenitence.

For a third principle it was laid down, That the church of Jeſus Chriſt ought to be pure and holy, without ſpot or wrinkle, and that, therefore, it was neceſſary to uſe all poſſible endeavours, to prevent her being polluted either with ſins, or errors; ſo that, as, by the preceding principles, the clergy had the ſole right of inſtruction and inſpection, it followed, that to them belonged the care of preſerving the purity of the church.

This led to a fourth principle, That, in order to preſerve the purity of the church, it was neceſſary to cut off the rotten branches, from whence it was drawn, as an inference, that, when a chriſtian ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted either by ſin, or error, he was to be excommunicated, that is, cut off from the body of the church; but it is very obvious, that, according to the preceding principles, it was the clergy's buſineſs to pronounce this ſentence; by which means, they acquired a great authority, and a profound reſpect from all chriſtians.

If the governors of the church had all been holy and infallible, theſe ſeveral principles, with their conſequences, would have produced only wholſome effects; and a diſcipline, very profitable to ſalvation, would have been preſerv'd in the church; but, as they were too frequently ſwayed by intereſt, caprice, or the impulſe of a miſguided zeal, it could not but be thought very unlikely, that God ſhould ſubject his church to the paſſions and prejudices of his miniſters. Hence it was natural to conclude, either that theſe principles were falſe, or, at leaſt, the conſequences ſtretched too far; which belief could ſcarce fail to breed a contempt, for unjuſt and raſh excommunications, which had even ſome influence on the moſt regular, ſince every one is very naturally inclined to fancy himſelf unjuſtly condemned; and, from this contempt, proceeded an unconcern, in the perſons excommunicated, to be reconciled to the church, and to give her the ſatisfaction ſhe required.

If, in excommunications, the clergy had ſolely intended to preſerve the church's purity, they would have been contented with cutting off the rotten members, and grieving at the obſtinacy of thoſe, who neglected to be abſolv'd; but it is manifeſt, that ſatisfaction was their chief concern, becauſe moſt of the excommunications were denounced againſt ſuch, as incroached on the lands or immunities of the clergy, to whom alone the word, Church, was, all along, appropriated. It was neceſſary, therefore, for the intereſt of the clergy, to oblige thoſe, who were cut off from the body of the church, to be reconciled to her, and give her ſatisfaction; and, for this reaſon, another principle was eſtabliſhed: "That, ſpiritual penal-"ties being inſufficient to conquer the obſti-"nacy of obdurate ſinners, it was neceſſary, "for the glory of God, to make uſe of tem-"poral puniſhments, to compel them to obe-"dience." Upon this foundation the clergy, who already regulated all matters, relating to religion, decreed, in their councils, "That "excommunicated perſons were not only to "be ſeparated from the aſſemblies of the "church, but alſo from all intercourſe with the "faithful;" and, if this rigorous law had been ſtrictly put in execution, the excommunicated would quickly have expired, for want of the relief, which men naturally give one another, unleſs they had choſen to live among Infidels; but as it was ſcarce poſſible to hinder their relations and friends, from affording them ſome aſſiſtance, tho' the contrary often happened, another expedient was deviſed, to put the perſons, cut off from the church, under a neceſſity of ſubmitting to her orders, that is, to thoſe of the clergy. It was ordained in the councils, "That if, within 40 days after excommunica-"tion, the party excommunicated did not ſue "to be reconciled to the church, the magi-"ſtrate, upon the biſhop's complaint, ſhould "be obliged to impriſon him, and confiſcate "his eſtate;" ſo that a chriſtian, being excommunicated, might expect the loſs of his liberty and property, unleſs he made the church ſuch ſatisfaction, as ſhe herſelf, that is, the clergy, ſhould judge expedient. This decree of the councils would, perhaps, never have been enacted into a law, if ſovereigns had not found their advantage in it, by means of the confiſcations; but they did not imagine, that this ſevere treatment would ever reach them; yet, when once they admitted the principle of the unlimited authority, aſſumed by the church, they ſoon found, that, as chriſtians, they were put on a level with their ſubjects. The popes, whoſe power daily increaſed, extended it, at length, over crown'd heads; for they did not ſcruple to excommunicate princes themſelves, who were often deſerted by their own ſubjects and domeſticks, and to depoſe them and give their kingdoms to others.

The ſame principle, then eſtabliſhed for private perſons, extended to kings and emperors; and there was, at firſt, but one particular, which diſtinguiſhed an excommunicated prince from a private perſon; namely, that his ſubjects were bound to him by an oath, which many could not think of violating, under the pretence that their ſovereign was excommunicated; but the popes found means to remove this ſcruple, by abſolving them from their oath of allegiance, by the plenitude of their apoſtolical power; and this was no more than a conſequence of the maxim, before eſtabliſhed, "That

"That an excommunicated perſon was to be "deprived of his poſſeſſions."

However, all this was inſufficient to compel excommunicated princes, to give the church the ſatisfaction ſhe demanded; for many of their ſubjects were not convinced, that the pope had power to excommunicate ſovereigns; and others believed, that, as long as a king was on the throne, his ſubjects ought not to refuſe him obedience. Some, tho' perſuaded of the pope's authority, thought it unlawful to take up arms againſt the king actually reigning; whilſt others, again, durſt not engage in ſuch an hazardous undertaking, which might prove deſtructive to themſelves and their families. To ſurmount theſe difficulties, the popes took care, in the firſt place, to depoſe excommunicated and obſtinate kings, in a council, or only in a conſiſtory, in order to remove all ſcruples from their ſubjects; and, ſecondly, to commiſſion ſome powerful prince, to execute their ſentence, that, joining with thoſe ſubjects who were only reſtrained by fear, the depoſed prince might be forced to ſubmit to the church; but, of this, without proceeding any farther, we have ſeen a terrible inſtance, in the quarrel between Innocent III. and king John.

Thus, from principles which might be originally good, conſidered abſtractly, ſuch conſequences were deduced, as tended to erect the ſpiritual juriſdiction of the church, into a temporal and abſolute monarchy. Indeed, how was it poſſible for a chriſtian not to regard, as his real maſters, men, who diſpoſed of his eſtate, honour, life, and ſalvation? but it is more ſurpriſing, that chriſtians ſhould be ſo blind, as to admit all theſe principles, with their unlimited conſequences, and ſuffer ſuch a ſyſtem to be founded thereon, as was purely calculated to enſlave them. It was thought, at laſt, tho' too late, neceſſary to reſtrain the abſolute power, aſſumed by the pope and clergy, and extended, by degrees, over all ſorts of things; but there was a vigorous oppoſition, and ſo much the greater, as time had been given them, to eſtabliſh their uſurpations.

This is the chief ſubject of the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England, for ſeveral centuries, and eſpecially, during the four reigns, under our conſideration; which, except a few events, contain nothing elſe but affairs reſulting from the exorbitant power, engroſſed by the pope and the clergy. The ſole view of the councils was to maintain the privileges and immunities of the church, that is, of the clergy; and all the papal projects tended only to extend their authority, as well over the laity, and even the ſovereigns, as over the clergy. If they have not been able to keep the exceſſive power, to which they were arrived, it is entirely owing to their abuſe of it; which cauſed them to loſe, by degrees, the regard paid to every thing flowing from the holy ſee. The bare facts that I have related, concerning the affair of Thomas Becket, the depoſing of king John, and the oppreſſions England endured from Rome, during the long reign of Henry III, are ſufficient to convince all reaſonable and unprejudic'd perſons, that the popes exerted, with the utmoſt rigour, the authority they had been ſuffered to aſſume; and it would be ſtill much more convincing, ſhould we add, to theſe inſtances, what paſſed, on the ſame ſubject, in all the other chriſtian kingdoms; but, to confine myſelf wholly to England, I ſhall only remark, that Becket's affair carried the pope's power in that kingdom, higher than ever, after a prince, ſo haughty as Henry II, was compelled to ſubmit to a ſhameful diſcipline. The homage, king John was obliged to do the pope, raiſed this power to its utmoſt height; and, from that period, the popes conſider'd England, as a conquered country, which they might oppoſe, at their pleaſure; which evidently appears from the whole reign of Henry III.

It muſt be farther obſerved, that, if the rigorous treatment the Engliſh received from the popes, for ſome time, kept the kingdom in ſubjection, it proved, at laſt, the principal cauſe of the decay of their power; for, as they puſh'd it too far, they rendered the Engliſh, naturally jealous of their liberty, deſirous of ſhaking off ſuch an intolerable yoke; and, accordingly, when a favourable juncture offered, they took care to improve it, and the rather, as they found themſelves ſupported by the clergy, who felt, no leſs than the people, the effects of the papal tyranny. This we ſhall ſee, in ſome of the following reigns; but, in the mean while, we are to conſider the days of John and Henry III, as thoſe in which the papal power was at its height, in England, and, if I miſtake not, in moſt other kingdoms of Europe. I might confirm my aſſertion with numberleſs inſtances, if what has been ſaid did not ſeem to be ſufficient. They, who are willing to have a more particular account, of the unjuſt and tyrannical proceedings of the court of Rome, with reſpect to England, during the reigns of John and Henry III, may, for their ſatisfaction, conſult the hiſtory of Matthew Paris, who treats of them, at large; and, tho' endeavours have been uſed to blaſt the credit of this author, the judicious reader will not regard, as an evidence of unfaithfulneſs, bare and groundleſs allegations.

The frequent conteſts, about the elections, of biſhops and abbots, are, alſo, a material article of the affairs of the church; but, as I have often had occaſion to ſpeak of them, I ſhall, at preſent, only point out, in general, the foundation of theſe diſputes. As to the ſee of Canterbury, the monks of St. Auguſtin's alledged, that it was their province to elect the archbiſhops, excluſive of all others; but the ſuffragran biſhops of that ſee claimed an equal right with the monks. On the contrary, the court would not willingly ſuffer any to be promoted to the archiepiſcopal dignity, without their approbation; ſo that, directly or indirectly, they had, all along, a great ſhare in the elections. By reaſon of theſe interfering intereſts, it was ſcarce poſſible, that an archbiſhop ſhould be choſen, without ſome conteſt; ſometimes, becauſe the monks were elected, without conſulting the ſuffragan biſhops, and, at other times, becauſe the biſhops made a different choice from that of the monks; one while, the monks themſelves made a double election; election; and, at another, the prelate, being disagreeable to the king, could not obtain his confirmation. The court of Rome reaped great advantages from these controversies, since to her was referred the decision of them; and, on such occasions, the popes made it a rule, to declare in favour of him, who was most attached to the holy see. They frequently, by the plenitude of their apostolical power, annulled the elections made, with unanimous consent, and caused whom they pleased to be elected; of which several instances occur, in the History of England.

These dissentions reigned almost as much, in the elections of the other bishops and abbots; for the court had always, among those that had a right to vote, a party which generally carried it from the others; or, at least, it was strong enough to hinder the election of such, as were not agreeable to the king. Whatever happened, they raised disputes, which were referred to the court of Rome; and then it was that the king made use of such means with the pope, as were, for the most part, successful.

The immunities very often granted, by the court of Rome, to churches and monasteries, in prejudice of the bishops, were, likewise, a fertile source of disputes. These immunities regarded either the visitations of the religious houses, the elections of the abbots, or the dispensations to some bishops to be absent from the councils; and all these articles produced an infinite number of suits, of which the whole profit accrued to the pope, who, under this pretence commanded the parties to repair to Rome, to defend their respective rights; but, when once they were there, they never saw the end of their suits, unless, by presents, they procured dispatch; and he, that was most liberal, generally carried the point. Of this it would be easy to give several instances; but there is no occasion to prove a fact so notorious and well attested; and it is, now, high time to proceed to the councils, during the four reigns, under our consideration.

COUNCILS, in the reign of HENRY II.

A mixt council.

IN the year 1155, the first of Henry II, a mixt council was held in London, consisting of bishops and barons, in which several affairs were debated, relating to the church and state; which I mention, on purpose to shew that the use of these mixt councils was not, as yet, entirely abolished.

A council against Becket.

In 1166, a synod was convened, which appealed to the pope, from the excommunication denounced by Thomas Becket, against those that observed the constitutions of Clarendon.

The same year, in the opinion of Dr. Hody, but six years sooner, in that of Spelman, and, according to others, four only, Henry II. called a council at Oxford, to examine the tenets of certain hereticks, stiled Publicans; who, in all probability, were disciples of the Waldenses, who began then to appear. When they were asked, in the council, who they were, they answered they were christians, and followers of the doctrine of the apostles; and, being afterwards questioned, upon the articles of the creed, their replies were very orthodox, as to the trinity and incarnation; but, if, we may give credit to William of Newburgh, they rejected baptism, the eucharist, marriage, and the communion of saints. They discover'd a great deal of modesty and meekness, in their whole behaviour; and, when they were threatened with death, in order to deter them to renounce their tenets, they only said, "Blessed are they that suffer for righ-"teousness sake." The council, finding that they were not to be prevailed on, delivered them over to the secular power; and, unfortunately for them, the king, being then at variance with the pope, treated them with greater severity, than he would have done, at any other juncture. After causing them to be branded with a hot iron, he prohibited, under heavy penalties, all persons to afford them any relief; yet they endured this hard treatment very chearfully; and, as they could meet with no assistance, either to stay in the kingdom, or to depart from thence, they all miserably perished. This is all the account that historians have given of these pretended hereticks, without so much as telling us, why they were named Publicans. I observed, that, in all likelihood, they were the disciples of the Waldenses, because of their orthodoxy on the trinity and incarnation of the son of God, their patience, and their answer to the council, that they followed the doctrine of the apostles; for that was precisely the language of the Waldenses. Indeed, we cannot trace the Waldenses, in the tenets ascribed to them concerning baptism, the eucharist, marriage, and the communion of saints; but, possibly, the historians, who mention them, have misrepresented their doctrine. Perhaps, they did not believe transubstantiation, and refused to communicate with such as believed it; and, therefore, it was inferred, that they rejected the eucharist and communion of saints. As for baptism, it may be, with the Waldenses, they would have had it, stript of all the ceremonies tacked to it, since its institution; and, in fine, perhaps, they denied marriage to be a sacrament, and, for no other reason, were accused of rejecting it. However this be, they were not the first, to whom have been ascribed doctrines, very little agreeable to their sentiments, by strained consequences, as it is easy to prove from the history of the Waldenses and Albigenses *; and, tho' what I have been saying is only con-

* The Waldenses published the articles of their faith, which they dedicated to the French king, when they were persecuted by him; and, tho' the monks would have concealed their doctrines, they came, at last, to light, partly by the quarrels of the papists among themselves, and partly by the taking of Montburn, in 1585, by the Mareschal de Lesdiguieres, a protestant; who saved the records of the persecutions, found in that place, when the monks designed to have burnt them, because they not only contained an account of the cruelties against the Waldenses, but proved, that their doctrine was the same with that of the protestants.

jecture, it is ſufficiently plauſible, to make one ſtand aſtoniſhed at the raſhneſs of ſome proteſtant authors, who, upon the credit of William of Newburgh, the monk, and ſome others of the ſame order, have ſo roughly handled theſe pretended hereticks.

Gervaſe, in his Chronicle, ſpeaks of another council convened by Henry II, in which, he affirms, that prince cauſed the biſhops to ſwear to obey his orders, before he had informed them of his intentions; and he adds, that, in conſequence of this oath, he would have obliged them to withdraw their obedience to Alexander III, and own the antipope, were it not that the prelates flatly refuſed it. One would think, that Gervaſe, who was a monk of St. Auguſtin's, and contemporary with Becket, ſhould have a perfect knowledge of all that paſſed, in that prelate's conteſt with the king; but, as he is extremely partial, in favour of Becket, and, beſides, no other hiſtorian takes notice of this council, we can hardly doubt of its being a fiction. The only foundation, for it, is Henry's writing to the archbiſhop of Cologn, as was obſerved, in the hiſtory of his reign; but I ſhall juſt remark here, that certain modern hiſtorians, relying too much on the authority of Gervaſe, who was Becket's creature, have unwarily followed him, in their account of this quarrel; from whence they have been led to favour the archbiſhop, and inſinuate, as if he was unjuſtly perſecuted by the king, which ſhews, how apt hiſtorians are to ſlide inſenſibly into the notions, or prejudices, of thoſe that have writ before them.

A ſynod at Weſtminſter.

In 1175, Richard, archbiſhop of Canterbury, convened in Weſtminſter a national ſynod, in which he cauſed to be read ſome canons, drawn up by himſelf, chiefly relating to eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and the celibacy of the prieſts, which was not yet thoroughly eſtabliſhed; but Roger, archbiſhop of York, not being preſent at this ſynod, ſent agents, who proteſted, in his name, againſt three things, wherein he thought himſelf aggrieved. Firſt, he complained of being denied the privilege of having the croſs carried before him, in the province of Canterbury; ſecondly, that the biſhopricks of Lincoln, Cheſter, Worceſter, and Hereford were unjuſtly taken from the juriſdiction of the ſee of York; and, in the laſt place, on account of an excommunication denounced by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, againſt ſome clergymen of St. Oſwald's, in Glouceſter. Hence it appears, that the old diſputes, between the two metropolitans, were ſtill kept on foot, notwithſtanding the care taken, to put an end to them, in the reign of Henry I.

What was tranſacted, the next year 1176, in a ſynod held by Huguccio, the pope's legate, is a farther proof of this point; for, the archbiſhop of York ſeating himſelf, on the right-hand of the legate, the archbiſhop of Canterbury's domeſticks dragged him thence, and trampled upon him; but this accident cauſed the ſynod to break up, and was followed with a long proceſs, which occaſioned both the metropolitans to carry to the court of Rome ſeveral appeals, from which ſhe reaped great advantages.

An expedient of the clergy, to ſatisfy the pope.

In the year 1183, the pope deſiring Henry II, to procure him a ſubſidy from the clergy, to enable him to carry on the war againſt the emperor, the king aſſembled the prelates, to acquaint them with the pope's demand; and the clergy, not daring to refuſe the aid the pontiff required, and yet dreading that it might be made a precedent, contrary to the liberties of the church of England, intreated the king to give the pope what he judged reaſonable, promiſing to repay him whatever he ſhould advance.

A ſynod at Armagh in Ireland. Gir. Cam.

In this reign, two councils were held in Ireland; in the firſt of which, convened at Armagh, preſently after the conqueſts of the Engliſh, it was decreed, that all the Engliſh ſlaves ſhould be enfranchiſed; for the prelates believed, that the calamities, their iſland began to ſuffer, proceeded from the Iriſh detaining, in ſlavery, men, who were chriſtians, as well as themſelves; and, beſides, they conſidered that encouragement was given to pyrates, by furniſhing them with an opportunity of ſelling their ſlaves in Ireland. The other ſynod was held at Caſhel, to put the church of Ireland upon the ſame foot with that of England; that is, to reduce the Iriſh clergy under the pope's juriſdiction, purſuant to the king's promiſe, when he demanded Adrian's conſent, to make that conqueſt.

The XIth council of Lateran.

Before I conclude what relates to the councils in the reign of Henry II, I ſhall add a word, concerning the XIth council of Lateran, convened at Rome by Alexander III. There were only three Engliſh biſhops in this aſſembly; for, Roger de Hoveden aſſures us, it was one of the privileges of the church of England, not to be obliged to ſend more than four biſhops to councils held at Rome. The Albigenſes were excommunicated, in this council; and all chriſtians were very ſtrictly forbidden, to keep any correſpondence with them.

One of the canons prohibited, on pain of excommunication, to promiſe benefices, before a vacancy; but this prohibition took place only, with regard to patrons; for the popes broke it continually, by means of proviſions, which they often uſed, in ſpite of this canon.

It was farther reſolved, in the ſame council, to eaſe the vaſt expence, churches and religious houſes were liable to, for the entertainment of the viſitors, and their retinue, that, in viſitations, an archbiſhop ſhould have no more than 50 horſe, a biſhop only 30, a legate 25, and an archdeacon ſeven; a wonderful reformation! which evidently ſhews the moderation of the council. The charges, the abbies and churches were at, upon this occaſion, were ſtiled procurations; doubtleſs, becauſe the churches were obliged to procure what was neceſſary, for the entertainment of the viſitors; but, in proceſs of time, this was turned into a certain ſum of money, which ſtill retained the name of procurations, and became a fertile ſource of oppreſſions, laid, by the nuncio's and legates, on the churches, under that pretence. tiltings and tournaments were, alſo, forbidden; but they were not aboliſhed by this prohibition.

COUNCILS, in the reign of RICHARD I.

A ſynod in favour of John's marriage. M. Paris.

IN 1189, Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, interdicting the lands of prince John, becauſe of his marriage with his couſin, Aviſa of Glouceſter, there was an appeal to the pope from this procedure; upon which, his holineſs ſent John de Anagnia, as his legate, into England, who called a ſynod, which annulled the archbiſhop's proceedings, and took off the interdict; and the pope afterwards confirm'd the marriage, by his authority; but, notwithſtanding this deciſive ſentence, the marriage was annulled, ſeveral years after, on the ſame pretence of kindred, and by the ſame authority, every thing being eaſy to thoſe, that are inveſted with abſolute power.

Baldwin, being about to attend Richard to the Holy-Land, called a ſynod; in which he declared, that he left the adminiſtrarion of the affairs of the province of Canterbury to the biſhop of London, and of his particular dioceſe to the biſhop of Rocheſter.

During the abſence of the two archbiſhops, one of whom was in the eaſt, and the other in Normandy, the biſhop of Ely, regent of the kingdom, and the pope's legate, convened two ſynods, one at Glouceſter, and another at Weſtminſter; but nothing of moment was tranſacted, his view, in calling them, being only to make a ſhow of his grandeur.

Baldwin dying at Acres, as ſoon as the news reached England, the biſhop of London ſent an inhibition to the monks of St. Auguſtin's, to proceed to the election of an archbiſhop, without the conſent of the ſuffragan biſhops; and, ſome time after, the ſuffragans being met at Canterbury, the monks came into their aſſembly, and declared, that they had elected the biſhop of Bath, whom, at the ſame inſtant, they placed on the archiepiſcopal throne. The biſhops appealed to the pope; but the death of the prelate elect, which fell out, ſoon after, put an end to the difference.

A ſynod at York. Hoved.

In 1193, Richard ſent, from Paleſtine, a letter to the ſuffragan biſhops of Canterbury, commanding them to proceed to the election of an archbiſhop, jointly with the monks of St. Auguſtin's; purſuant to which order, a ſort of ſynod was held, and Hubert Walters elected, whom the king had ſtrongly recommended.

Two years after, the ſame Hubert, being made legate, held, in the cathedral of York, a national ſynod, which decreed ſeveral canons; but two of them only deſerve to be related. The IIId prohibits prieſts to take money, for ſaying maſs; and the Vth expreſly forbids deacons to adminiſter the ſacraments of baptiſm and the euchariſt, unleſs in caſes of neceſſity.

COUNCILS, in the reign of King JOHN.

A ſynod held, notwithſtanding the king's prohibition. Hoved.

IN the year 1200, archbiſhop Hubert convened a national ſynod at Weſtminſter, notwithſtanding the king's prohibition; which is remarked by hiſtorians, as the firſt uſurpation of this nature; and ſeveral canons were made in it, the principal of which are theſe:

The firſt regulates the pronunciation of divine ſervice, to prevent reading prayers, either too faſt, or too ſlow.

The IId forbids the conſecrating the euchariſt, more than once in a day, without urgent neceſſity.

The XIth declares againſt clandeſtine marriages, and prohibits married perſons to travel, beyond ſea, without publiſhing their mutual conſent.

A ſynod which refuſes money to the pope. M. Paris.

In 1206, the pope deſigning to levy, in England, an extraordinary romeſcot, or peter-pence, the biſhops aſſembled in a ſynod, to debate upon his demand; but, the king ſending them orders to proceed no farther, they broke up, without coming to any reſolution; and, indeed, peter-pence not concerning the clergy, more than the reſt of the nation, they had no right to determine, whether it was to be paid, or not. However, ſhortly after, Florentinus, a legate, called another ſynod at Reading, on the ſame account; and, as if the clergy had occaſioned the king's refuſal, extorted from them an aid, in lieu of the extraordinary romeſcot demanded by the pope.

I paſs over in ſilence ſeveral councils, held, purely, to regulate the reſtitution, the king was to make the eccleſiaſticks, after his reconciliation to the pope, having ſpoken of them, in other places.

The XIIth council of Lateran. M. Paris.

During the reign of king John, pope Innocent III. called the XIIth council of Lateran, at which were preſent 412 biſhops; and 70 canons were paſſed, according to the hiſtorians, not very agreeable to the prelates, by whoſe authority they were made; which led a famous modern to conjecture, that the pope drew up theſe canons himſelf, and that they were read before the council, whoſe ſilence was taken for an approbation. This artifice began to be practiſed, in order to paſs in councils whatever the pope deſired; for the preſident ordered the canons, ready drawn up, to be read, and, the prelates perceiving they were not deſigned to be debated, no one preſumed to be the firſt oppoſer; but, in proceſs of time, this expedient was often uſed, and the council of Vienne, held in 1312, which aboliſhed the order of the knights-templars, will furniſh us with a remarkable inſtance. M. Du Pin.

To return to the council of Lateran; ſince the church of England, as a member of the catholick church, was no leſs concerned than the other churches, in the canons made in it, it will not, perhaps, be foreign to my deſign to be ſomewhat particular; but, to avoid prolixity, it will be ſufficient to take notice of the three following canons.

Canons of the Lateran council.

The Ist expreſly eſtabliſhes the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation.

The IIId imports, that the ſecular powers ſhall be requeſted, ſollicited, and, upon occaſion, compelled, by eccleſiaſtical cenſures, to take an oath, to do all that is poſſible to extirpate all hereticks; and that, for the future, all perſons, without exception, ſhall be obliged to ſwear the ſame oath, upon their being promoted to any dignity ſpiritual or temporal; but, if any temporal lord refuſes to purge his dominions of hereticks, after an admonition, he ſhall be excommunicated by the metropolitan and his ſuffragans; and, if he contemns the cenſures of the church, and refuſes to make ſatisfaction, within a year, the pope ſhall declare his ſubjects and vaſſals abſolved from their oath of allegiance, and invite the catholick princes to ſeize his country, ſaving to the ſovereign of the fee, if there is any, his rights; upon condition that the ſaid ſovereign ſhall do nothing, to obſtruct the execution of the canon.

Remarks on the third canon.

It is not eaſy to read this decree, without being ſurpriſed, that biſhops ſhould aſſume a right to deprive ſovereign princes of their dominions, as if, in fact, Jeſus Chriſt had, in plain and expreſs terms, inveſted them with ſuch a power. They might be allowed to exhort, requeſt, and ſollicit princes, to purge their territories of hereticks, and even to excommunicate theſe princes, under colour of their being, as members of the church, liable to eccleſiaſtical cenſures, as well as their ſubjects; but that biſhops may extend their authority, ſo far as to decree temporal puniſhments, and deprive princes, or even private perſons of their property, is what cannot be granted, without reſigning to them, at the ſame time, the temporal ſovereignty of the whole chriſtian world. To what purpoſe, then, will ſome ſay, is excommunication, if the perſons excommunicated contemn it? I know not; God alone will be judge, in the other life; tho' this did not content the clergy, much leſs the popes, who would be reſpected, feared, and obeyed, in the preſent, that being the ſole end of all their excommunications; and, indeed, temporal puniſhments were abſolutely neceſſary to this purpoſe, ſpiritual ones only producing their effect, in the next world, about which they were little concerned. Thanks be to God, the generality of chriſtians embrace, now, a different theology; and, accordingly, the excommunications of princes are much leſs frequent, becauſe the eyes of the people are opened, who do not think themſelves obliged to renounce their allegiance to their ſovereigns, in complaiſance to the pope. It may be farther obſerved, on this decree, that, tho' it ſeemed to be levelled only againſt the earl of Tholouſe, and the other protectors of the Albigenſes, the conſequences extended to all chriſtian princes, in general; and, indeed, from this principle, naturally flowed the unlimited authority, too frequently exerted by the Roman pontiff.

The laſt canon of the council of Lateran, that I propoſe to conſider, is the XIVth; by by which it is decreed, that the prieſts addicted to debauchery, in countries where marriage is allowed, ſhould be more ſeverely puniſhed than thoſe, who live in places, where they are obliged to celibacy; from whence it may be inferred, that the celibacy of the clergy was not, as yet, univerſally eſtabliſhed.

COUNCILS, in the reign of HENRY III.

I Shall not take notice of all the councils, in the long reign of Henry III, becauſe they were, for the moſt part, called, purely, to ſupply the popes with money, or to countenance their exactions; deſigning only to mention ſuch as, more immediately, related to religion, or wherein ſomething remarkable was tranſacted.

A ſynod at Canterbury, in which 3 perſons were condemned. T. Wikes.

In 1222, cardinal Langton held, in the cathedral of Canterbury, a provincial ſynod; in which three men were condemned, and delivered over to the ſecular arm. The firſt pretended to be Jeſus Chriſt, and ſhewed, on his body, the five wounds of our Saviour; the ſecond was an Hermaphrodite, who accompanied that impoſtor; and the third was a deacon, who, to marry a Jewiſh woman, with whom he was in love, had circumciſed himſelf*.

A ſynod againſt the marriage of prieſts.

In 1225, the ſame prelate convened a ſynod, which made a canon, confirming the prohibition of the marriage of the prieſts; from whence it may be preſumed, that there were ſtill, in England, prieſts, who maintained their ground againſt all former prohibitions.

In 1237, Otho, the pope's legate, called a national council at London, in St. Paul's church; but, as he foreſaw, that oppoſition would be made to the canons he intended to paſs againſt pluralities, he obtained of the king a guard of 200 men; yet no ſooner had the prelates taken their places, than he ordered certain canons to be read, which were brought from Rome, ready prepared, according to the modern method. When the canon againſt pluraliſts came to be read, Walter de Cantilupe, biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſome other prelates, vigorouſly oppoſed it, and even proteſted againſt it; which oppoſition obliged the legate to declare, that the canon ſhould be in force only, during the time of his legateſhip; yet, when it was paſſed, upon that condition, an eccleſiaſtick, in the legate's retinue, read aloud a decretal epiſtle of the pope, which ordained, that this canon ſhould be perpetually binding.

The IId limits the number of ſacraments to ſeven †.

The IIId fixes the eves of Eaſter and Whitſunday, for the adminiſtration of baptiſm; and, as ſome ſcrupled to baptiſe their children, on theſe days, their ſcruples were condemned.

The XXIId enjoins the clergy to live on their benefices, at leaſt, the greateſt part of the year;

* He was tied to a ſtake, and burnt; whereas the impoſtor was condemned to perpetual impriſonment, and to be fed with nothing, except bread and water.

† Baptiſm, confirmation, penance, the euchariſt, extreme unction, matrimony, and orders.

and,

and, indeed, as the pope diſpenſed with the reſidence of the Italians, who poſſeſſed a great number of benefices, in England, if the Engliſh had not been obliged to reſide, the churches would have been quite forſaken.

In 1239, a council was aſſembled at London, which flatly refuſed the legate the money demanded, to defray the expences of his legateſhip.

The following year, the ſame legate aſſembled another ſynod, wherein he demanded, for the pope, the fifth part of the revenues of the clergy; tho' he could not prevail.

All the reſt of the councils, from 1240 to 1264, were only convened, to demand money of the clergy.

Synods at Reading and at Northampton. T. Wikes.

During the barons wars, two councils were held; the firſt at Reading, which confirmed the appeal, brought by the barons, from the proceedings of the legate, then at Boulogne; and in the ſecond at Northampton, in 1266, Othobon, the legate, excommunicated all clergymen engaged in the earl of Leiceſter's party.

A council at St. Pauls.

In 1268, the ſame legate called, at St. Paul's in London, a national council, in which were publiſhed certain conſtitutions brought from Rome; and ſome of them are ſtill part of the canon-law of the Engliſh church. As ſeveral of theſe conſtitutions tended to leſſen the power and juriſdiction of the biſhops, ſtrenuous oppoſition was made againſt them; which obliged the legate to prorogue the aſſembly, till the enſuing day. However, he ſo wiſely improved this ſhort adjournment, that gaining, in this interval, either by promiſes or menaces, ſuch as ſeemed moſt averſe, on the morrow, he met with no farther reſiſtance.

Conſtitutions brought from Rome.

The Iſt of theſe conſtitutions allows laymen to adminiſter baptiſm, in caſes of neceſſity.

The IId prohibits prieſts to take money, for adminiſtring the ſacraments, and preſcribes theſe words to be made uſe of, in giving abſolution: "I abſolve thee from all thy ſins; or, "By the authority committed unto me, I ab"ſolve thee, &c." from whence it may be inferred, that there were ſtill ſome prieſts, who, ſcrupling to pronounce the abſolution, in a direct manner, were contented with a bare declaration.

The IXth enjoins reſidence to clergymen.

The XIIIth confirms the privilege of ſanctuary to churches.

The XIVth ordains the ſolemnizing of marriage, in publick.

The XXth is againſt thoſe that pretend to give a compenſation, in lieu of the penance enjoined them.

The XXIIId provides againſt alienating any part of the tythes from the parochial clergy; which conſtitution particularly concerned the monks, to whom ſuch alienations were daily appropriated.

The XXXth is againſt pluraliſts.

The original of commendams.

The XXXIſt forbids the giving benefices, in commendam, and declares a benefice, held in that manner, vacant; which cuſtom became much in vogue, and owed its original to the perſecutions the church endured, whilſt the northern nations over-run the weſtern empire. When, by the fury of the wars, the prieſts and biſhops themſelves were forced to fly, the principal prelates of the province appointed prieſts, to officiate in the vacant benefices, till the paſtors could reſume the care of their flocks; but this cuſtom was, at length abuſed, in a manner very prejudicial to the church; for, peace being reſtored, ſuch prieſts as were not the true paſtors, and were ſtiled commendatories, ſtill continued in the benefices, to the prejudice of the proper incumbents. Several councils endeavoured to reform this abuſe, by decreeing, that thoſe who held benefices, in commendam, ſhould not receive the profits, or officiate, as paſtors, above ſix months; but the popes, pretending to be above the canons, continued to diſpoſe of benefices, in commendam, for term of life.

The XXXIId canon decrees, that, before the conſecration of a biſhop, ſtrict enquiry ſhould be made, whether he held more livings than one, without a diſpenſation, and whether the diſpenſation was authentick and in form?

The XXXIVth annuls all previous contracts, between patrons and perſons preſented to benefices.

Theſe are the chief councils held in England, from the beginning of the reign of Henry II, to the end of that of Henry III, that is, during the ſpace of 60 years; but, having obſerved the manner of making the canons, it will be neceſſary to ſubjoin another remark, on that ſubject. It happened very frequently, that, in order to procure a canon to be paſſed, that was likely to meet with ſtrong oppoſition, it was inſerted, among many others of great uſe; which was done, that the oppoſers might be accuſed of withſtanding regulations of known uſefulneſs. This artifice was alſo practiſed in parliaments, when, to paſs certain bills, others of abſolute neceſſity were tacked to them; yet it has, from time to time, been ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, that it could never, hitherto, grow into a cuſtom.

What we have remarked, in ſome of theſe councils, concerning the celibacy of the clergy, clearly proves, that it was not yet univerſally eſtabliſhed, though it is pretended that Anſelm accompliſhed it, in the reign of Henry I; and this evidence may be farther ſupported, by facts. Long after Anſelm, Richard, a biſhop of Lichfield, was the ſon of Robert, biſhop of Cheſter; upon which, an hiſtorian obſerves, that, in thoſe days, the being ſon to a prieſt did not hinder promotions in the church; and the ſame author affirms, that, the pope complaining, that the biſhop elect of Ely was not come to Rome, for his confirmation, the Engliſh ambaſſador merrily replied, that the prelate had a very lawful excuſe, taken from the holy ſcriptures, viz. "He had juſt "married a wife." It appears, alſo, from Baronius's Annals, that a legate ſent, by pope Innocent III, into Poland, to eſtabliſh the celibacy of the clergy, did, at laſt, carry his point; tho', attempting to do the ſame thing in Bohemia, he was in danger of his life.

There

There was another article, of as much conſequence to the popes, and which they puſhed as vigorouſly, as that of celibacy; namely, to give to their ordinances or decretals the ſame authority, as to the canons of the councils. In 1150, Gratian publiſhed a collection of decretals, containing all the ordinances made by the popes to that time, deſigning it for a rule, in the adminiſtration of eccleſiaſtical juſtice; and to this collection were afterwards added ſeveral others, in order to compoſe a compleat body of the canon-law. Raymond de Pegnoford, penitentiary to Gregory IX, was ordered to make this collection, intitled, The ſecond Part of the Canon-Law, and publiſhed in 1230; to which he annexed ſome conſtitutions of the councils, and reſolutions of the doctors, ſince the year 1150, where the ſecond part began; and this laſt collection was not only a ſupplement to the old canon-law, but even altered it, in ſeveral articles. For example, it is determined, that baſtards ſhould be incapable of eccleſiaſtical preferments, without the pope's diſpenſation; but, by this additional clauſe, "without the pope's diſpenſation," the court of Rome aſſumed, indirectly, the power of favouring baſtards, when ſhe judged it expedient, contrary to the antient conſtitutions of the councils. That court could never have a fairer opportunity to publiſh the decretals, her power being, now, at the utmoſt height; and, therefore, meeting with very little reſiſtance, they enacted, as a law, whatever they were pleaſed to decree, even though directly contrary to the former laws. For inſtance, the laws of England accounted, as illegitimate, children born before marriage, tho' their parents were afterwards married; but the canon-law decreed the contrary; which occaſioned great conteſts in the parliament of Merton, in 1236.

Religious orders.

The Roman pontiffs were no ſooner become almoſt abſolute monarchs in the church, than a vaſt variety of religious orders ſprang up, that ſerved, as a ſtanding army, to ſupport the grandeur and power of the popes; inſomuch that the council of Lateran endeavoured to prevent this abuſe, by expreſly prohibiting the inſtitution of any new order of monks. However, Dominic de Guzman, a Spaniard, who long preached againſt the Albigenſes, in ſpite of this prohibition, formed the project of a new order, under the name of Predicant friars, of which he petitioned for pope Innocent's confirmation. The pope, by reaſon of the decree of the Lateran council, ſcrupled, at firſt, to conſent to this eſtabliſhment; but, if we may give credit to the hiſtorians of this order, he was told, by a heavenly viſion, that he could do nothing more ſerviceable to the church; yet it was Honorius, his ſucceſſor, confirmed this new order, by the name of Predicant friars, the deſign of their inſtitution being to preach againſt hereticks; and they were alſo ſtiled Dominicans, from their founder, and in France, Jacobins, from their firſt ſettlement in St. James's ſtreet in Paris. The court of the inquiſition was under the direction of the Dominicans, which rendered them famous, for their cruelties, upon the pretended hereticks; and they ſettled in England, ſoon after their inſtitution, in 1317.

The order of Franciſcans, founded by Francis de Aſſiſi, quickly followed that of the Dominicans; for Innocent III. approved of it, in 1215, though he did not authentickly confirm it; but Honorius III. eſtabliſhed it, by a bull, in 1223, and, the next year, it was ſettled in England. The religious of this order, out of modeſty, choſe the name of Minors, or Minorites; and though, in proceſs of time, they were divided into ſeveral ſocieties, they all acknowledged Francis de Aſſiſi, for their head and founder. They were obliged, by their rule, not to preach, or take confeſſions, in any dioceſe, without expreſs leave from the biſhop; but this article was not long obſerved by them. They repreſented to the pope, that chriſtians were aſhamed to confeſs themſelves to their own paſtors; that many made a ſcruple of doing it, becauſe the pariſh-prieſts themſelves were guilty of the ſins confeſſed to them; and, in fine, that they had not the diſcretion to be ſecret. Upon this foundation, they petitioned a diſpenſation, for this part of their rule; which was readily granted.

The Dominicans and Franciſcans acquired ſo great a character, for ſanctity, among the people, that moſt of them had one of theſe friars, for a director; and, conſequently, the alms they received were very conſiderable. Beſides, for a long ſpace, almoſt all the popes were choſen out of one or other of theſe orders; ſo that, by their credit at the court of Rome, they procured very frequently grants of what belonged to other orders, pretending that it was neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence. On the other hand, they heaped up immenſe riches, not only by the voluntary gifts of the living, but by the legacies and grants extorted from the dying, who were taught to believe, that nothing could contribute more to their eternal ſalvation; yet, in the interim, whilſt theſe two orders laboured, with equal ardor, to ingroſs the benefactions of the devout, and ſo became rivals, a jealouſy aroſe between them, which was ſoon followed by a moſt ſcandalous quarrel, that was not eaſily compoſed.

In a council at Rocheſter, in 1244, a new order of friars, named Croſs-bearers, appeared and demanded leave to ſettle in England; who produced a bull from the pope, forbidding all perſons to reproach them, and impowering them to excommunicate thoſe, that ſhould dare to violate this privilege; but, the ſynod rejecting their petition, they were ſent away, under the pretence, that the granting them a licenſe was a direct breach upon the canons of the late council of Lateran.

I ſhall conclude this abſtract of the State of the Church, with ſome remarks on the celebrated eccleſiaſticks of thoſe days.

John of Salisbury.

Johannes Sarisburienſis, a native, and not biſhop, of Salisbury, as ſome have aſſerted, was an ornament to the church of England, for learning, politeneſs, and regularity of life; and he was very intimate with Adrian IV, who uſed to complain to him of the weight of the papal crown; tho' the bull, which Adrian granted to Henry II, on account of the conqueſt of Ireland, ſeems to ſhew, that he was not the moſt ſcrupulous. John de Salisbury, who adhered to Thomas Becket, and followed him into France, was, by his means, promoted to the biſhoprick of Chartres. He wrote the Polycraticon, or de Nugis Curialium; a Collection of Letters; and ſeveral other inconſiderable tracts; and he died in 1181, or 1182.

As for Thomas Becket, or Stephen Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, I have ſufficiently ſpoken of them, elſewhere.

Baldwin of Canterbury.

Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who attended Richard to the Holy-Land, where he died, was reputed to be a good divine; and ſome of his works, ſtill extant, prove that his reputation was not groundleſs. His great conteſt with the monks of St. Auguſtin, who became extremely inſolent, put him upon founding a ſociety of regular canons, near Canterbury, deſigning to transfer to them, by degrees, the privileges of the monaſtery of St. Auguſtin; but the monks, receiving early intelligence of his intent, made ſuch an intereſt at the court of Rome, that the archbiſhop was obliged to deſiſt from his project.

Hugh of Lincoln.

Hugh, biſhop of Lincoln, a native of Grenoble, was one of the moſt illuſtrious prelates of the church of England, in the reigns of Richard I. and king John; and his virtue gained him great reverence from the people of his dioceſe, who exceedingly dreaded being excommunicated by him, becauſe they obſerved, as they imagined, that thoſe, who lay under his cenſures, were, for the moſt part, viſited with ſome worldly calamity. It is related, as an inſtance of his zeal and reſolution, that, by his own authority, he ordered to be removed, out of the church of Godſtow in Oxfordſhire, the tomb of Roſamond, miſtreſs to Henry II; which ſtood in the middle of the choir, hung with black velvet, and wax tapers about it; for, though he was told, that the tomb was placed there, by the king's order, he ſaid it was a ſhameful thing, that the tomb of ſuch a woman ſhould ſtand in that honourable place; and this prelate, dying with the reputation of a ſaint, was canonized by Honorius III, in 1221.

Alexander Cementarius.

In the midſt of king John's conteſt with the pope, Alexander Cementarius, a clergyman, who had been profeſſor of divinity at the univerſity of Paris, publickly preached, that the pope had no power to deprive kings of their crown; but this freedom drew on him the indignation of the court of Rome, who reduced him, at length, to the neceſſity of begging his bread, from door to door. Matthew Paris ſharply inveighs againſt the errors of this doctor, tho' no one ſeemed more convinced, than this hiſtorian, of the pope's abuſe of his power, as he has evidently demonſtrated, in his hiſtory.

Walter of York.

Walter de Gray, archbiſhop of York, was more famous as a ſtateſman, than as a divine; and his ſucceſſors were inriched by his bounty, in purchaſing the manor of Thorp, and annexing it to his ſee. He alſo built, at London, a magnificent palace, called York-Place; tho' it afterwards went by the name of White-Hall; but this houſe, which was, for many years, a palace-royal, was, ſome time ſince, burnt down to the ground.

Edmund of Durham.

Edmund, who, from a canon of Salisbury, was advanced to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury, after the pope had annulled three elections, to make room for him, was highly to be commended, for his moderation and regular life. He would have been glad to ſee the pope's power, then at its utmoſt height, reduced within due bounds; but, as he perceived, that ſuch an attempt muſt have proved unſucceſsful, he choſe rather to give way to the torrent, than withſtand ſo formidable a power, which was alſo ſupported by the king's authority. However, to avoid the blame of a baſe compliance, he retired into France, to the monaſtery of Pontigny, where his auſterities ſhortened his days; and he was canonized by pope Innocent IV, in 1216.

Richard Poor of Durham.

Richard Poor, biſhop of Salisbury, and afterwards of Durham, is remarkable, upon two accounts; for, firſt, whilſt he was biſhop of Sarum, he perſuaded the inhabitants to remove to a more advantageous ſituation, where Saliſbury now ſtands; and there he laid the foundation of a ſtately church, which was not finiſhed, till 30 years after, and remains, to this day. Secondly, this prelate was render'd famous, by his ſynodical conſtitutions, for the uſe of the church of Salisbury, which are, in all, 87; but I ſhall only take notice of the XVth, that forbids the prieſts to take money, for ſaying maſs, and the XXXIVth, which evidently ſhews, that the laity, communicated in both kinds, at that time.

Alexander Hales.

Alexander Hales, born in Glouceſterſhire, a great canoniſt, being ſtiled the irrefragable doctor, was profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Paris; who, among his other works, compoſed ſhort notes on the whole bible, and a commentary, in four books, upon the maſter of the ſentences; wherein, as the learned Du Pin obſerves, he diſcovers more skill in logick and metaphyſicks, than in the antiquities of the church.

Sewald of York.

Sewald, archbiſhop of York, was an able divine, and of an unblameable life; copying after Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, his maſter. He was ſo incenſed at the frequent exactions of the court of Rome, that he wrote a ſharp remonſtrance to pope Alexander IV, upon that ſubject; and, among other things, he repreſented to him, that, when Jeſus Chriſt commiſſioned St. Peter to feed his ſheep, he did not give him authority to flea them. This freedom, with his refuſal to admit ſome Italians, who came with proviſions from the court of Rome, drew on him the diſpleaſure of Alexander, who, at length, excommunicated him; but the archbiſhop, upon his death-bed, complained bitterly of the pope's injuſtice, appealing to Heaven; and Matthew Paris, doubtleſs, did not believe, that this excommunication deprived Sewald of eternal ſalvation, ſince he aſſures us, that this prelate wrought a miracle, in his laſt ſickneſs.

Robert

Kilwarby of Canterbury.

Robert Kilwarby, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was a very learned prelate, for the age he lived in; but, his merit raiſing him to the dignity of a cardinal, he reſigned his archbiſhoprick, to live at Rome.

I ſhall cloſe my account of the moſt noted eccleſiaſticks of thoſe days, with the mention of one of the moſt eminent, viz. Groſteſt, biſhop of Lincoln; but I ſhall ſpeak more fully of him than the reſt, as there are ſeveral curious particulars concerning him.

Groſteſt of Lincoln.

Groſteſt was a prelate of reſolution and courage, neither to be gained by court-favours, nor deterred by the pope's menaces; but, being wholly intent upon following what he apprehended to be juſt and reaſonable, he little regarded the circumſtances of the times, or the quality of perſons, oppoſing equally the king's will, and the pope's pleaſure, as opportunity offered; and, by this invincible ſteadineſs, he acquired a great reputation among the people, long accuſtomed to ſee the biſhops ſtoop to the king, or the pope. It fell out, one day, that he excommunicated the ſheriff, for refuſing to impriſon an excommunicated perſon, who contemned the church's cenſures; but Henry III, very angry with the biſhop, for not applying to him, to compel the ſheriff, to execute the canons, addreſſed the pope, to ſecure his authority; a remedy worſe than the diſeaſe.

This affair obliged Groſteſt to take a journey to Rome, where he was confirmed in his ill opinion of the court of Rome; for he could not ſee, without indignation and concern, the beſt preferments in England beſtowed on Italians, who neither reſided on their benefices, nor underſtood a word of Engliſh. His grief to behold the church's revenues devoured by theſe harpies, cauſing him to refuſe to inſtitute an Italian to one of the beſt livings of his dioceſe, he was, preſently after, ſuſpended; but, regardleſs of this cenſure, he continued his epiſcopal functions, his flock being no more ſcrupulous than himſelf. He even refuſed, at that very juncture, to admit of new proviſions from the pope, in favour of other Italians; declaring, that to entruſt the cure of ſouls, to ſuch paſtors, was to act, in the name of the devil, rather than by the authority of God.

The court of Rome was unwilling, then, to make any noiſe, leſt ſhe ſhould diſguſt the whole body of the Engliſh clergy, from whom ſhe reaped a plentiful harveſt; and, therefore, the pope thought it more adviſable to connive at the diſobedience of this prelate, who was of known reſolution, and in great repute with the people, chuſing rather to try to bring him over, by fair means, in giving him a teſtimony of his eſteem, by a commiſſion to reform certain abuſes crept into the monaſteries. However, Groſteſt, ſoon after, touched the pope, in a very ſenſible manner, by computing the annual ſums, drawn by the beneficed Italians out of England, as was ſaid in another place; but Innocent IV, who then ſat in the papal chair, had been ſo accuſtomed to treat the Engliſh, with haughtineſs, that he could not hear of the biſhop's proceedings, without being extremely incenſed; but, not daring to attack him, on that ſcore, becauſe what he had done was univerſally approved, he fell upon him, for refuſing to admit his proviſions, and ſent him a menacing letter, which would have terrified any but him. Groſteſt, returned the perſon, that was ordered to ſend him the letter, with certain inſtructions, a very bold anſwer; of which the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee the following extract.

"I deſire your prudence to take notice, that I am continually ready to obey the apoſtolical inſtructions, and declare myſelf an enemy to whatever is repugnant to them; for to this I am obliged, by the command of God. To apply this: The apoſtolical inſtructions muſt, of neceſſity, be agreeable to the doctrine of the apoſtles, and of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, who is principally repreſented by the pope; and, ſince Jeſus Chriſt has declared, 'He that is 'not with me is againſt me,' the ſanctity of the apoſtolick ſee is ſuch, that it can never appear in oppoſition to our Lord; from whence it evidently follows, that the letter, in queſtion, is directly oppoſite to an apoſtolical character. Firſt, becauſe of the clauſe, Non-obſtante, ſo frequently made uſe of, now a-days, which is entirely inconſiſtent with natural equity; and, on the contrary, it certainly introduces a deluge of miſchief, as it occaſions a great deal of inconſtancy and breach of faith. It ſhakes the foundations of mutual truſt, and renders language and writings altogether inſignificant; and, in fine, it is impoſſible but that the purity of religion, and peace of ſociety, muſt ſuffer extremely, by ſuch a ſtretch of apoſtolical authority. Secondly, next to the ſins of Lucifer and Antichriſt, there cannot be a greater defection, or which is more directly oppoſite to the doctrine of our Saviour and his apoſtles, than to deſtroy ſouls, by depriving them of the paſtoral office; and yet it is manifeſt, that thoſe are guilty of this ſin, who undertake the ſacerdotal function, and receive the profits, without diſcharging the duty; for, in the ſcripture-account, the paſtor, who neglects his flock, is a downright murderer of the ſheep. Who, then, can conſider, in any other light, than as a moſt flagrant crime, a conduct, which tends ſo ſtrongly to the deſtruction of truth and virtue, and the happineſs of mankind? If, in moral productions, the cauſe of good is better than the effect, of courſe, the ſource and original of vice are worſe than the diſorder, that flows from them; and, conſequently, they, who introduce ſuch unqualified perſons into the church, and ſo deſtroy the hierarchy, are moſt chargeable with guilt, their crime riſing, in proportion to the height of their ſtation. Wherefore, I conclude, that the apoſtolical ſee, which has received ſuch a full authority from our Saviour, 'for edification, and not for deſtruction,' ought not to countenance, much leſs to command, ſo horrid and deſtructive a prevarication; ſince ſuch an attempt would be a notorious abuſe, if not a forfeiture of her authority; for it would be, in effect, to ſtray, at a vaſt diſtance, from the throne of glory, and to repreſent, in a very ill manner, the perſon of our Saviour. Theſe perſons may be rather rather ſaid to be placed in the chair of peſtilence, and on the ſame bench with the devil and antichriſt; nor can any chriſtian, who deſires to continue in the communion of the church, and pays a due regard to the apoſtolick ſee, obey any commands of this ſort, tho' impoſed by an angel from heaven. On the contrary, it is his duty to rebel, if I may uſe that expreſſion, againſt the order, and oppoſe it, to the utmoſt of his power; and, therefore, ſince the foreſaid inſtructions ſo plainly contradict the catholick faith, and the ſanctity of the apoſtolick ſee, my duty obliges me to refuſe them, and not to comply, out of deference to the perſon, by whom they are ſent; neither can your prudence juſtly puniſh my conduct, becauſe, properly ſpeaking, my refuſal ought not to be conſidered, as a contumacy, but rather as an inſtance of filial reſpect. To ſum up all, in a word, the apoſtolical ſee has its commiſſion, only for edification, and not for deſtruction, and the plenitude of its power ought not to extend any farther than what relates to edification; but theſe proviſions, as they are ſtiled, have a manifeſt tendency to deſtruction; and, therefore, the holy ſee can, by no means, allow ſuch a liberty; for to conclude; theſe practices are revealed by "fleſh "and blood, which cannot inherit the king-"dom of heaven," and not by the father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.'

This letter threw Innocent into a furious paſſion. "What! ſays he, has this old do-"tard the confidence to cenſure my conduct? "By St. Peter and St. Paul, I will make ſuch "an example of him, that the world ſhall "ſtand amazed at his puniſhment." However, his rage was, in ſome meaſure, allayed by the cardinals, who repreſented to him the dangerous conſequences of too great ſeverity; that the noiſe he ſhould make, on this occaſion, would be prejudicial to the holy ſee, ſince it would infallibly lead the Engliſh to examine the motives; that, as they ſtood affected to the holy ſee, and to the biſhop of Lincoln, they would think it extremely ſurpriſing, that a prelate, of ſuch an eſtabliſhed reputation, ſhould be treated ſo ſeverely; that, on the contrary, it was neceſſary carefully to avoid giving any occaſion, to enter into the examination of what he alledged, to juſtify his refuſal; and, therefore, that it was moſt adviſable to paſs over, in ſilence, this inſolent letter. Tho' theſe remonſtrances moderated the effects of the pope's fury, they were inſufficient to appeaſe him entirely; for the Annals of Lanercoſt inform us, that the biſhop was excommunicated, a little before his death, who, regardleſs of the cenſure, appealed to the court of heaven; and this is farther confirmed by ſeveral hiſtorians, who ſay, that Innocent moved in the conclave, that the body of Groſteſt ſhould be taken up and buried in the high-way, but that he could not obtain the conſent of the cardinals. However that be, if he was excommunicated, he ſtill continued to diſcharge his functions; and the clergy of his dioceſe, who were not more ſcrupulous than their biſhop, obeyed him, to the day of his death. The biſhops, his brethren, and the monks themſelves, tho' zealous advocates for the pope, were not more apt to believe, that this excommunication had produced any great effect; and ſome, who were preſent at his death, affirmed, that they were entertained with divine muſick in the air, over the houſe where he died. We find alſo that, in the pontificate of Clement V, the dean and chapter of St. Paul petitioned very ſtrenuouſly, for the canonization of Groſteſt, on account of ſeveral miracles wrought by him, after his deceaſe; but, as he was not a ſaint of that kind, with which the court of Rome filled the calendar, their petition was rejected. An inſtance of a biſhop dying under the ſentence of excommunication, and yet paſſing for a ſaint, in the country where he lived, is a difficulty that I ſhall leave to be cleared by thoſe, whom it concerns; contenting myſelf with the relation of one circumſtance more, which, if not true, is, at leaſt, a proof of the great opinion of this prelate's ſanctity. An hiſtorian reports, that Groſteſt, a little after his death, appeared, in his robes, to Innocent IV, and, ſtriking him on the ſide, with his croſier, gave him a ſevere reprimand; and that the pope was ſo terrified at this apparition, that he continued two days, without eating. I have nothing to ſay, as to the truth of this ſtory, but draw this inference from it, that, tho' the biſhop died, excommunicated by the pope, and in ſentiments very oppoſite to thoſe of the court of Rome, the hiſtorian, notwithſtanding, ſhews, by this circumſtance, that he believed him to be a ſaint in heaven.

Groſteſt * was the author of ſeveral tracts; and, among other works, he tranſlated, from the Greek into Latin, the Teſtament of the twelve Patriarchs, a copy of which John de Baſingſtoke, who met with it at Athens, put into his hands; but the date of the original is uncertain. Dr. Cave aſſigns it to the latter end of the ſecond century; Dodwell places it in the firſt; and ſome others believe it was compoſed by ſome Jew, before our Saviour's death †.

* He was born at Stodbrooke in Suffolk; and he died October 8, 1253. M. Paris

† The moſt famous hiſtorians, that lived, in theſe four reigns, are, as follows:

Simeon of Durham, a monk and precentor of the church of Durham, in the year 1164, one of the moſt learned men of his age; who wrote, beſides other things, two books, de Geſtis Regum, which are only a few indigeſted collections, chiefly out of Florence of Worceſter, whoſe very words he frequently copies. He begins where Bede left off, and proceeds as far as the 29th of Henry I, 1129; and he is one of the X Scriptores, publiſhed at London, 1652.

Henry, archdeacon of Huntingdon, flouriſhed, about the ſame time; whoſe eight books, concluding with the reign of king Stephen, were publiſhed by Sir Henry Savil. He is a follower of Bede; and he has borrowed a great number of lyes from Jeoffrey of Monmouth. He writes confuſedly, and reduces the tranſactions of the heptarchy to the ſeveral reigns of the Weſt-Saxon kings, but not ſo diſtinctly, as the nature of the work required.

William of Newburgh, ſo named from a monaſtery in Yorkſhire, to which he belonged, begins his hiſtory, at the conqueſt, and ends, at the year 1197; and he was a violent perſecutor of Jeoffrey of Monmouth. His Latin ſtile is preferred to that of M. Paris, and equalled with thoſe of Eadmer and Malmsbury, by Dr. Wats.

Gervaſe

Gervaſe, a monk of Canterbury, wrote a chronicle of the reigns of Stephen, Henry II, and Richard I, with ſufficient judgment, in the opinion of biſhop Nicholſon; and it was publiſhed among the X Scriptores, London, 1652.

Roger de Hoveden, chaplain ſome time to Henry II, is charged with borrowing from Simeon of Durham, without owning it; but, as biſhop Nicholſon obſerves, if he did, he has improved his ſtory, adding years to many things confuſedly related, in that author. His book contains many letters, ſpeeches, &c. relating to eccleſiaſtical matters; and he was contemporary with Gervaſe, 1201; but his hiſtory was publiſhed by Sir Henry Savil, Francof. 1601.

Ralph de Diceto, dean of London, wrote, about the year 1210; whoſe Abbreviationes Chronicorum contain an abſtract of our hiſtory, down to the conqueſt; and his Imagines Hiſtoriarum give the portraitures of ſome of our kings, more at large, ending with the firſt years of king John's reign. Mr. Selden extols this author and his works, tho' biſhop Nicholſon ſays, he uſually copied, verbatim, out of other writers; he is among the X Scriptores.

Walter, a monk of Coventry, a judicious and faithful hiſtorian, lived in Coventry, in 1217. He has ſome few remarkable things, not to be met with in Jeoffrey of Monmouth, Hoveden, and Huntingdon, in his three books of Chronicles; tho' they are chiefly collections from the ſaid authors.

Matthew Paris, a monk of St. Alban's, one of the moſt renowned Engliſh hiſtorians, in his Hiſtoria Major, gives us the annals, at large, of eight kings, from William the Conqueror to Henry III; which work was firſt publiſhed at London, 1571, and reprinted, with additions of various readings, &c. by Dr. Wats, London, 1640, and ſince in 1685. From the year 1259, wherein Matt. Paris died, to Henry III's death, it was continued by William Riſhanger, a monk of the ſame fraternity; and the whole work diſcovers a great deal of candour and exactneſs in the author, who relates ſo particularly the brave repulſes given by many Engliſh princes to the uſurpations of the Roman ſee, that it is a wonder how ſuch an heretical hiſtory came to ſurvive, to this day. A fair copy of this hiſtory, ſuppoſed to be written by the author's own hand, is in the king's library at St. James's; but he likewiſe wrote an abſtract of his hiſtory, which Lambard ſtiles his Hiſtoria Minor, having in it ſeveral material particulars, omitted in his Hiſtoria Major; tho' it is pretended that Paris begun only at the year 1135, the reſt being done to his hand by one Roger de Windleſhore, or Windſor, (or de Wendover prior de Bealvair, as it is in the MS copy in the Cottonian library) one of his predeceſſors in the ſame monaſtery.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK IX.

The Reigns of EDWARD I. and EDWARD II; containing the ſpace of 35 years.

9. EDWARD I. * ſirnamed Long-Shanks.

1272. Edward I. THE death of Henry III. happening, during the abſence of prince Edward, his ſucceſſor, ſeemed to furniſh the male-contents with a favourable opportunity, to raiſe new troubles; yet it was not attended with any commotions. Leiceſter's party was ſo humbled, that they were no longer able to hold up their heads; and, if ſome turbulent perſons had, on this occaſion, attempted to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, ſuch was the nation's eſteem for Edward, that it would have effectually defeated all their projects. This prince ſhined with great luſtre, during the latter part of his father's reign; and the victory of Eveſham, the reduction of the Ely-rebels, with his clemency to them, when reduced, were ſtill freſh in the memory of the Engliſh, and filled them with the moſt profound reſpect and admiration. They did not doubt but he would exert all his abilities, to reſtore the tranquility of the kingdom, which had received ſuch violent ſhocks, in the two preceding reigns; and they expreſs'd an extreme impatience to ſee their new ſovereign, founding on him alone all the hopes of their future happineſs. Tho' Edward was abroad, and not even heard of, all the barons ſwore fealty to him; and, at the ſame time, they ſent him a very reſpectful and ſubmiſſive letter, inviting him to come, with all expedition, to take poſſeſſion of the throne of his anceſtors. In the interim, they aſſembled at London, to commit the regency of the kingdom to thoſe that ſhould be eſteemed moſt capable of that important truſt; and, having choſen the archbiſhop of York, and the earls of Cornwall and Cheſter, the parliament, which met, preſently after, confirmed all the meaſures taken, for the preſervation of the peace of the kingdom. 1272.

This parliament conſiſted not only of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, but alſo of the knights of the ſhires, and repreſentatives of the principal cities and boroughs, as was practiſed under the government of the earl of Leiceſter, during the late king's captivity; but theſe aſſemblies were not convened by a lawful authority. I ſhall not, here, examine, whether, before this time, the commons had a right to ſend repreſentatives to parliament, ſince it is a point full of difficulties, and not yet thoroughly cleared; and, therefore, I ſhall only obſerve that it cannot be denied, that they enjoyed this privilege, in the reign of Edward I, and, from that time to this day, have preſerved it, without interruption. An. Wav.

Edward, purſuing his voyage, being a ſtranger to what paſſed in England, ſafely arrived in Sicily; where he was received by Charles of Anjou, with all the reſpect due to his rank and merit. At Meſſina, he had the firſt in-

* This was, in reality, the fourth monarch of this name, ſince there were three Edwards, in the time of the Saxons; and, therefore, in ſpeaking of this and the two following Edwards, by the name of Edward I, II, III, it was uſual to add poſt Conqueſtum, after the Conqueſt, tho', by degrees, that addition was omitted. Rapin.

1272. telligence of his father's death, for whom he seemed more concerned than for his eldeſt ſon John, the news of whoſe deceaſe was brought, at the ſame time; and, from Sicily, he went to Rome, where he continued ſome days, to viſit the new pope, his particular friend, who had accompanied him to Paleſtine, in the quality of a legate. After this, taking the road to France, he paſſed through Burgundy; and, as he was reputed to be a prince of great valour and bravery, the earl of Chalon, who valued himſelf for the ſame qualities, invited him to a tournament, in his country, and even ſent him a ſort of a challenge. Though a king of England might honourably decline entering the liſts with an earl of Chalon, Edward accepted his challenge, without the leaſt heſitation, being, doubtleſs, apprehenſive of injuring his reputation, in caſe of a refuſal; nor could the pope's letter, ſent to divert him from his purpoſe, prevail with him. Some hiſtorians pretend, that the Burgundians did not uſe all the fair play requiſite, on ſuch occaſions; who turned the tournament into a real fight, which was called the little battle of Chalon, wherein the Engliſh had the advantage.

1273. Edward is preſent at a tournament at Chalon. M. Weſt.

He viſits the king of France.

Edward, in his paſſage through France, went to Paris, to make a viſit to king Philip, who gave him a very honourable and civil reception, and received his homage for Guienne; and, from thence, he came to Bourdeaux, where the vaſſals of that dutchy did him homage. Some relate, that Gaſton de Moncade, viſcount of Bearn, refuſing to do homage, was taken into cuſtody at Bourdeaux, where he was come to meet the king; but, though it be true that the viſcount promiſed, not to leave the court of Edward, without his conſent, it is no leſs certain, that this difference with the king did not concern the homage of Bearn. The Collection of the Publick Acts evidently ſhews, that the diſpute was about quite another affair; which was decided at Limoges by Accurſius, a famous civilian, then in the ſervice of the king.

1274. He arrives in England, and is crown'd.

No ſooner had Edward ſettled his affairs in Guienne, than he paſſed over into England; where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of reſpect and affection, as having acquired freſh merit, by his late expedition into Paleſtine. A few days after his arrival, he was crowned, with Eleanor his queen, in the preſence of Alexander III, king of Scotland, the duke of Bretagne, and all the peers of the realm; and hiſtorians inform us, that, on occaſion of this ſolemnity, 500 horſes were let looſe about the field, and liberally given to ſuch, as could catch them.

He ſends commiſſioners into ſeveral counties.

Edward's firſt care, after his coronation, was to make ſtrict enquiry into the affairs of the kingdom; and, with this view, he appointed commiſſioners to go through the ſeveral counties, and take exact information concerning the fees held of the crown, and the ſtate they were in; and alſo to examine into, and puniſh the miſdemeanours of the magiſtrates, who, for ſome time, had but too much abuſed their authority, in oppreſſing the ſubjects. This proceeding had a wonderful influence over the people; for they were, now convinced, that the king intended to govern, in a very different manner from his father and grandfather; and every one expected, with aſſurance, the happy fruits of the maxims he was purſuing, to procure himſelf a peaceable reign. It was abſolutely neceſſary for Edward, to gain, at once, the eſteem and fear of his ſubjects, that no inteſtine troubles might obſtruct the grand deſigns he projected; of which the firſt and principal was the chaſtiſing Lewellyn, prince of Wales. This prince had plainly diſcovered, during the late troubles in England, that he was a dangerous neighbour, ſince, on all occaſions, he was ready to countenance the Engliſh male-contents; for neither would the earl of Leiceſter ever have arrived to that height of power, nor the earl of Glouceſter have become ſo formidable, without Lewellyn's aſſiſtance. On this account, Edward then reſolved to put it out of his enemy's power to annoy him; but the circumſtances of the times, and his voyage to the Holy-Land, obliged him to defer the execution of his project. Lewellyn, not inſenſible of it, conſidered Edward, as his greateſt foe; but his precautions, to ſcreen himſelf from his reſentment, only ſerved to furniſh the king with a pretence to attack him.

1275. The reaſon of the war with Wales.

I have, already, obſerved, that old Lewellyn, grandfather to this prince, became vaſſal and tributary to Henry III; and that his ſucceſſor did homage to the ſame king, for all Wales. Though the Welch, afterwards, made ſome attempts to ſhake off this yoke, and even offered to ſubmit to the pope; yet, in ſpite of the commotions in England, during the late reign, the crown continued to reckon, among her vaſſals, the prince of Wales. Immediately after the death of Henry III, and before the return of Edward, Lewellyn was ſummoned to appear and do homage to the abſent king; but he refuſed to obey the ſummons. The new king, preſently after his arrival, ordered him to be ſummoned, a ſecond time, to do him homage, and aſſiſt, as a vaſſal, at his coronation; yet Lewellyn ſtill found reaſons to be excuſed. He pretended, that the Engliſh, had violated the late treaty of peace, by committing, on his frontiers, ſeveral outrages, for which he demanded ſatisfaction; but, to remove that pretence, the king nominated commiſſioners to adjuſt all things, and, at the ſame time, ſummoned him again to appear and do homage, though this third ſummons was no more regarded than the former. In the interim, Lewellyn, being informed, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury was going to excommunicate him, and lay his territories under an interdict, wrote to the pope, in order to divert this blow; and the means he made uſe of, to gain the court of Rome, were ſo effectual, that the pope prohibited the archbiſhop to act againſt him, as long as he offered to do homage, in his own country. Edward, not being ſatisfied with theſe cavils, ſent him a peremptory ſummons, which the Welch prince thought fit to obey; tho' he ſtill inſiſted on the place, pretending that he 1275. he was only obliged to do homage to the king, in perſon, and on the borders of the two kingdoms. Edward readily agreed to this; but, a ſudden illneſs ſeizing him, as he was going to Shrewsbury, he deferred the homage to another opportunity. Lewellyn afterwards repented of the advances he had made; and nothing could prevail on him, to truſt himſelf in the hands of a monarch, whom he apprehended to be his avowed enemy; and, after ſeveral fruitleſs ſummons, the king found, at length, that he muſt have recourſe to compulſive methods. However, as he was willing to ſettle the affairs of the kingdom, before he made war upon his neighbours, he was contented with citing Lewellyn before the parliament, which was to meet, the beginning of the enſuing year; but the Welch prince, refuſing to appear, alledged, in excuſe, that, the king having diſcovered, on ſeveral occaſions, an extreme animoſity againſt him, he could not truſt his perſon with his declared enemy. Nevertheleſs, he proteſted, that he was ready to do him homage, in his own country, if the king would ſend commiſſioners thither, to receive it, or elſe in ſome third place, where he might be in ſafety; and he, moreover, offered to come into the king's territories, provided he would deliver up to him, as hoſtages, the prince his eldeſt ſon, the earl of Glouceſter, and the high-chancellor; but this arrogant anſwer confirmed Edward in his reſolution, againſt the prince of Wales. However, he concealed his intentions, that he might not interrupt the ſeſſions of the parliament, which was employed in affairs of great importance; namely, in enacting excellent laws, for the ſecurity of the peace and liberties of the people, as well as of the immunities of the church, and privileges of the clergy, which were ſtiled the Statutes of Weſtminſter *.

1276. Edward attacks the prince of Wales.

When the parliament broke up, the king ſeriouſly thought of the war, which he was reſolved to carry into Wales, to puniſh the diſobedience of Lewellyn; but, whilſt he was making preparations, ſome Briſtol-men happened to take a veſſel, in which was one of the daughters of the late earl of Leiceſter, who was going to Lewellyn, to whom ſhe was contracted. The prince demanded his wife; but, the king refuſing to ſend her, he perceived he was to expect a war; and, indeed, as ſoon as Edward had taken all his meaſures, he convened the peers of the realm, who paſſed judgment upon Lewellyn, declaring him guilty of felony; upon which, the war was proclaimed. Lewellyn was then ſorry he had puſhed matters to that extremity; wherefore, he humbly ſued for peace, and, at the ſame time, intreated the king to reſtore his wife; yet, both his requeſts were denied, unleſs he would oblige himſelf, to repair all the damages done to the borders of England, during the late wars; a condition, which he would not accept. The war, therefore, was begun, but was not very vigorouſly purſued, the firſt campaign.

1277. Edward preſſes Lewellyn.

In the beginning of the ſpring, Edward, aſſembling a great number of forces, appeared at the head of his army, and marched into the enemy's country; and, by cauſing a very large way to be cut thro' a vaſt foreſt, he opened a paſſage into the very center of Wales. Before he proceeded, he built the caſtles of Flint and Rhudhlan, which ſecured him an entrance, at all times, and a retreat in caſes of neceſſity. As the Welch were not able to withſtand him, advancing farther, he drove them to the mountain of Snowdon, their uſual refuge, when purſued by the Engliſh; and, at the ſame time, his fleet attacked the iſle of Angleſey, which made but a faint reſiſtance.

Who ſubmits to hard terms.

Lewellyn, being unable to oppoſe ſuch a formidable enemy, was forced humbly to ſue for peace, which was granted, but on very hard conditions; for he was obliged to promiſe the payment of 50,000 l. ſterling, for the expences of the war. Moreover, Edward reſtoring to him the iſle of Angleſey, it was agreed, that, for the future, he ſhould hold it of the crown of England, paying annually 1000 marks; and that he ſhould give entire ſatisfaction to his brother David, who had fled for refuge to the king, and hoſtages, for the performance of his word. The haughtineſs of the prince of Wales being tamed, by this mortifying treaty, Edward, contented, for once, with the honour of the victory, generouſly reſtored the hoſtages, and forgave him the ſums he was bound to pay; yet he cauſed a grant of the iſle of Angleſey to be made to him, though he was not to enjoy it, unleſs Lewellyn died, without iſſue. Then he delivered up the betrothed lady, and did him the honour to aſſiſt at his nuptials; and he created David, brother of Lewellyn, earl of Denbigh, to whom alſo he gave in marriage a rich Engliſh heireſs, to attach him to the intereſts of England.

1278. Act. Pub.

1279. The earldom of Ponthieu falls to him.

The happy iſſue of the war with Wales was, immediately, followed by Edward's acquiſition, in France, of the earldom of Ponthieu and Montrevil, fallen to his queen, by the death of her mother, queen of Caſtile, who was in poſſeſſion; but, to procure of the king of France the inveſtiture of that fief, he was obliged to confirm the king his father's treaty, made, whilſt a captive to the earl of Leiceſter, and to renounce, like him, all claim to Anjou and Normandy; yet he reſerved 30 l. per annum, out of the revenues of Normandy, in all appearance, as an acknowledgment that it once belonged to his anceſtors.

The Jews are puniſhed for clipping and coining.

This affair being over, Edward, in good earneſt, ſet about rectifying the coin, which was very much altered and adulterated, during the troubles of the late reign; and, being informed that the Jews were the principal authors of this miſchief, he cauſed all that were in the kingdom to be ſeized, in one day, that the guilty might not eſcape; when, after a ſtrict examination, 280, convicted of clipping and coining, or putting off falſe money, received ſentence of death, and were executed, without mercy.

* This year, about October 6, another parliament was held at Weſtminſter, in which Statutes were made, for reſtraining the exceſſive uſury exacted by the Jews; and it was alſo enacted, that they ſhould wear a badge upon their clothes, in the ſhape of the two tables of the law of Moſes.

An

1279. An affair of a different nature, tho' of no leſs importance to the publick, furniſhed the king with a freſh opportunity to ſhew his reſolution, to reform the abuſes introduced into the kingdom. The prodigious increaſe of the riches of the clergy, and monaſteries, had been long a ſubject of complaint; and yet no effectual remedy had been, hitherto, found out, to redreſs this grievance. The barons, who had exacted from king John the charter, ſo often mentioned, had taken care to inſert a clauſe, expreſly prohibiting all perſons to alienate their lands to the church; but this prohibition, as well as ſeveral others, had not been punctually obſerved. The complaints, upon this head, were renewed, in the beginning of this reign; and it was demonſtrated to the king, that, in proceſs of time, the clergy would be poſſeſſed of all the lands in the kingdom, if people were ſtill allowed to alienate their eſtates to the church; and, indeed, the church never dying, always acquiring and never alienating, it was impoſſible but that her riches ſhould increaſe immenſely, and, at laſt, all the lands of the kingdom would be in her hands. Edward, having maturely conſidered this affair, ſummoned the parliament, and propoſed, that a law ſhould be made, to reform this abuſe; which propoſal being joyfully received, a ſtatute was enacted, whereby all perſons were forbidden to diſpoſe of their eſtates to ſocieties, which never die, without the expreſs conſent of the king. This ſtatute was called the ſtatute of Mortmain, becauſe it was intended to prevent eſtates from falling into dead hands, that is, hands of no ſervice to the king and the publick, without hopes of their ever changing their owners.

The ſtatute of Mortmain. M. Weſt.

1280. The parliament, which met, the following year, deſirous of redreſſing another abuſe, unadviſedly, gave riſe to a greater. During the troubles of the two late reigns, ſeveral perſons appropriated to themſelves lands, to which they had no right; and the crown itſelf ſuffered, by this diſorder. To remedy this evil, the parliament paſſed an act, in itſelf very juſt; importing, that all, who were in poſſeſſion of the conteſted eſtates, ſhould be obliged to ſhew, how they acquired them, and produce their titles before the judges, in order to be examined. This ſtatute, from the Engliſh word, Warrant, was called Quo Warranto, that is, an act ſerving for the foundation or ſecurity of the poſſeſſion; ſo that the Quo Warranto is properly a right to demand of any perſon, by what warrant or title, he holds the eſtate in diſpute. This regulation was juſt and neceſſary; but the king, miſ-led by ill advice, and a deſire of amaſſing money, made uſe of it, contrary to the deſign of the parliament, to oppreſs his ſubjects. As he was ſenſible, that, among the great numbers, who held their lands of the crown, it was impoſſible but that many muſt have loſt their titles, he took advantage of their misfortune, under the pretence of putting the ſtatute of Quo Warranto in execution; and, accordingly, he publiſhed a proclamation, enjoining all perſons, that held lands of the crown, to lay their titles before the judges of the realm. This proclamation was conſidered, as the ſource of a very great grievance; and, indeed, thoſe, that were firſt attacked, and could not produce their original titles, though they proved a long poſſeſſion, were obliged to pay large ſums to the king, to preſerve their eſtates. This grievance would have been carried farther, if it had not been prevented by the courage of the earl of Warren; who, appearing before the judges, when he was required to produce the fundamental title, by vertue of which he held his lands, drawing an old ruſty ſword out of the ſcabbard, replied to the judges, "This is the inſtrument, by which my anceſtors "gained their eſtate; and, by this, I will keep "it, to the day of my death." This daring anſwer ſeemed likely to involve the earl in trouble, tho' it was attended with a quite contrary effect; for the king found, by it, that it would be extremely difficult and dangerous to exact upon the nobility, under ſuch a frivolous pretence. He plainly perceived, that there were ſtill, among the barons, perſons as ready to hazard all, in defence of their rights and properties, as thoſe in the reigns of John and Henry III; and that his pretenſions appeared unjuſt to the people, as, indeed, they were; which conſiderations inducing him to revoke his proclamation, the people expreſſed their joy, in ſuch a manner, as evidently ſhewed, how much they reſented this oppreſſion. On the other hand, the king's moderation turned more to his advantage, than his injuſtice had done to his prejudice; for his ſubjects blamed the miniſtry, for whatever was odious, in his conduct, and aſcribed to him the honour of reforming what was amiſs by his prudence. How great glory ſoever this prince had acquired by his victories, his conqueſt over himſelf, on this occaſion, gained him more honour than all his martial exploits; ſince it is infinitely leſs glorious for a ſovereign to ſubdue provinces and kingdoms, to which he has no equitable claim, than voluntarily to deſiſt from a pretenſion, which he diſcovers to be unjuſt.

The king makes an ill uſe of it.

A bold reply of earl Warren.

1281. These domeſtick employments were interrupted, by the revolt of Lewellyn; who bearing, with extreme impatience, the yoke of the Engliſh, made another attempt to free himſelf from it, tho' it ſerved only to hurle him down into deſtruction. He engaged in this enterprize, chiefly from the three following motives; the firſt of which was the turbulent temper of his brother David; for, in ſpite of Edward's favours to this prince, he inceſſantly preſs'd his brother to take up arms, in order to free himſelf from ſubjection. He thought it his own concern; becauſe, as Lewellyn had no heirs, he was his preſumptive ſucceſſor. The ſecond thing, that inclined Lewellyn to war, was a certain prophecy of the famous Merlin; which, the Welch fancied, foretold, that Lewellyn was deſtined to wear the crown of Brutus, the firſt king, as it was pretended, of the whole iſland of Albion; and they were ſo full of this notion, and even Lewellyn himſelf, that they built upon it, as on a ſure foundation. The third and only reaſon, alledged by Lewellyn, was certain grievances, a liſt of which he Wikes. if theſe grievances, of which an hiſtorian has given us the ſubſtance, were real, this prince had certainly great cauſe, to endeavour to free himſelf from the yoke laid upon him; but Edward refuſed to hearken to his complaints. This convinced Lewellyn, that a vigorous defence was the only means, to deliver him from a ſubjection, which he conſidered, as a real ſlavery. He took up arms, therefore, to ſhake off this galling yoke; and ſurpriſing the lord Clifford, the king's general, on the frontiers, he ſlew ſeveral of his men, and took him priſoner. Then, penetrating farther into the Engliſh territories, he committed great ravages, and defeated the earls of Northumberland and Surrey, who were ſent into thoſe parts, to ſtop his progreſs.

Edward marches, in perſon, againſt the Welch. T. Wikes.

Edward was, to the laſt degree, mortified, that his troops ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be beaten by the Welch; yet, in hopes of being more fortunate himſelf, he drew together a numerous army, to try, once more, to tame the fierceneſs of Lewellyn. Whilſt his troops were on their march, towards the borders of Wales, he paid a viſit to the queen, his mother, who was retired to the nunnery of Ambresbury; who, being prepoſſeſſed in favour of the late king, her husband, ſhewed her ſon a man, who pretended to receive his ſight at the tomb, and by the interceſſion of Henry III. She, doubtleſs, imagined that it would be pleaſing to the king; but ſhe was exceedingly ſurpriſed, when he ſaid, he was ſo fully convinced of his father's juſtice and probity, that he did not queſtion, but, had it been in his power, he would rather have deprived the impoſtor of, than reſtored him to his ſight.

Edward, making but a ſhort ſtay with the queen, his mother, went and headed his army; and he entered Wales, without the leaſt oppoſition, Lewellyn being retir'd to the mountain of Snowdon, which was inacceſſible; yet, notwithſtanding this obſtacle, Edward reſolved to inveſt his enemy, by ſecuring all the avenues, thro' which he might make his eſcape. Nothing could more ſtrongly expreſs his ardent deſire to ſucceed, in his undertaking, than a project of this nature, which none of his predeceſſors had ever attempted; and, accordingly, having fortified all the poſts, he cauſed a bridge of boats to be made over the river Menay, oppoſite to Bangor, in order to ſend ſome troops alſo into the iſle of Angleſey; after which, foreſeeing that the blockade would hold long, he committed it to the management of Roger Mortimer, and waited the iſſue, in the caſtle of Rhudhlan, built during the late war. Lewellyn, in his advantageous poſt, would, doubtleſs, have tired the patience of his enemies, if an unexpected accident had not induced him, to deprive himſelf of that advantage; for ſome of the Engliſh that were in Angleſey, paſſing the bridge above-mentioned, in order to take a view of the country, were attacked by the Welch, and ſo cloſely purſued, that the greateſt part were ſlain, or drowned, in attempting to regain the iſland. Upon this ſmall ſucceſs, Lewellyn fancied that Heaven began to declare in his favour; and that Merlin's prophecy would infallibly be accompliſhed. Being tranſported with this deluſive idea, he deſcends into the the plain, to fight the Engliſh, not conſidering the inequality of his forces; but, in this battle, wherein he raſhly engaged, he was ſlain, on the ſpot, after ſeeing his army entirely routed. In his pocket were found letters in cypher, by which it appeared, that he had great friends in England; but Edward did not think it expedient to make a ſtrict inquiſition. However, to ſtrike a terror into thoſe that were engaged with Lewellyn, he commanded his head, crowned with ivy, to be expoſed to view, on the walls of the tower of London; from which ſpectacle, his ſubjects might learn, what they were to expect, from the king's ſeverity, ſince he treated a ſovereign prince, in that rigorous manner. 1281.

Lewellyn is vanquiſhed and ſlain. M. Weſt.

Such was the fate of Lewellyn, deſcended from Rhoderick the Great, of whom I have ſpoken, elſewhere, and from one of the moſt antient royal families in Europe; and, with him, expired the liberty of his nation. The Welch being intimidated by their prince's death and defeat, and no longer in a condition to reſiſt, Edward eaſily became maſter of their whole country; which he diſtributed, for the moſt part, among his officers and courtiers, reſerving to himſelf only the ſovereignty and fortified places.

Edward becomes maſter of all Wales. T. Wikes.

Some time after, David, brother of Lewellyn, roving ſtill up and down the country, had the misfortune to be taken by the Engliſh, and ſent to Rhudhlan, where the king ſtill remained; who, to no purpoſe, ſollicited for the favour of caſting himſelf at his feet, to implore his mercy; for, as he was the laſt of his family, Edward was willing to ſecure his conqueſt, by his death. Purſuant to this reſolution, he ordered him to be conducted to Shrewsbury; where, by the advice of the parliament, convened, on that occaſion, he was condemned to die the death of a traytor. This rigorous ſentence was executed, with all the circumſtances attending that infamous puniſhment; and his head was fixed near that of the prince, his brother, but his four quarters were ſent to York, Briſtol, Northampton, and Wincheſter.

He puts David, Lewellyn's brother, to death. M. Weſt.

Edward's ſeverity to this prince is related, by all the hiſtorians, without the leaſt cenſure; and yet it is an action, that can hardly be excuſed. Suppoſing that the rigour of the law authoriſed a ſentence of death, was it not very inhuman to execute a prince of a royal family, in a manner, till then unuſual, with reſpect to perſons of diſtinguiſhed birth? How would theſe very hiſtorians have exclaimed, if a king of France, after taking, in a battle, a brother of the king of England, had ordered him to be ignominiouſly hung on a gibbet? Or if, finding the body of the king himſelf ſlain in the fight, he had cauſed his head to be placed on the walls of the Baſtile?

Edward, being maſter of Wales, was extremely ſollicitous to ſecure his conqueſt; and, as the annexing that country to the crown of England ſeemed to be the moſt effectual means to that end, he called a parliament, in which it

Wales is united to England. Knighton.

1281. it was reſolved, that Wales ſhould be inſeparably united to the crown. Thus the Welch, thoſe ſmall remains of the antient Britons, loſt, at length, their liberty, after they had preſerved it, in that little corner of the iſland, above 800 years; who, ſurely, cannot, without injuſtice, be denied the commendations due to the reſolution, with which they had, hitherto, defended their country; for, deſtitute of all ſuccours, without foreign alliances, or a naval power, they maintained their ground againſt the kings of England, Saxons and Normans, who had, almoſt all, attempted to ſubdue them, with forces vaſtly ſuperior. Indeed, they were often obliged to pay tribute to the Engliſh; yet they remained, all along, a diſtinct nation, governed by their own laws. The preſervation of their liberty was not entirely owing to their valour, but alſo to their policy, in dexterouſly fomenting the diſſentions of their neighbours, till, at laſt, the time appointed, for their loſing that invaluable bleſſing, happened, in the reign of Edward I. However, it may be ſaid, that, if amends can be made for ſuch a loſs, they had reaſon to be eaſy, ſince they became one and the ſame nation with their conquerors; and, from that time to this day, they enjoyed the ſame laws and privileges, which render the Engliſh the happieſt nation under the ſun *.

1284. The death of Alphonſus, ſon to the king. Act. Pub.

The ſatisfaction, Edward received from the conqueſt of Wales, was, immediately, followed by a great affliction, cauſed by the death of Alphonſus, his ſon, a prince of great hopes, who, being now 12 years of age, was about to marry the only daughter of Florence, earl of Holland. This was the third ſon Edward loſt, within the ſpace of three years; for John, his eldeſt ſon, died before his return from the Holy-Land. Henry, his ſecond, was contracted to the only daughter of Theobald, king of Navarre.

The birth of prince Edward.

Though the Welch were entirely ſubdued, they, on all occaſions, expreſs'd their extreme regret, at their ſubjection to the Engliſh; and ſome of them had even the boldneſs to tell the king, that he ſhould never peaceably enjoy their country, until they were governed by a prince of their own nation. If we may believe certain hiſtorians, this bold declaration induced the king ſo far to give them ſatisfaction, that he propoſed to give them, for their prince, the ſon whom he hoped his queen, then with child, would ſhortly bring into the world; and that, with this view, he would have her go and lie in at Caernarvon, a town in Wales; where, according to his expectation, ſhe was brought to bed of a prince, called Edward, and ſirnamed of Caernarvon, the place of his nativity. It is farther ſaid, that the queen was no ſooner delivered, than he aſſembled the ſtates of Wales, and declared to them his reſolution, to give them a prince born in their country, and who could not ſpeak a word of Engliſh; upon which, he nominated to them the prince, his ſon, juſt born at Caernarvon; but other writers, leſs credulous, doubtleſs, conſidering this circumſtance, as a puerility, have thought fit to paſs it over in ſilence; and, indeed, it was no more than a mean equivocation, very little capable of ſatisfying the Welch, and not, in the leaſt, agreeable to the character of Edward; beſides, it is certain, that the young prince was not inveſted with the principality of Wales, till the year 1301, being then 17 years of age. 1284.

The conqueſt of Wales, and the univerſal eſteem the king was in among his ſubjects, procuring England an uninterrupted tranquillity, nothing of great importance fell out, in that kingdom; and, therefore, I ſhall ſlightly paſs over the domeſtick affairs, contenting my ſelf with a brief account of ſome of the moſt material particulars.

1285. Fabian's Chron.

In the year 1285, the king took away the charter of London, and, turning out George Brooksby, the mayor, becauſe he ſuffered himſelf to be bribed by the bakers, put in another, by his own authority; but, ſoon after, the city recovered their charter, by making the king a preſent.

This year, Edward called a parliament, which made ſome additions to the antient ſtatutes, by the name of the ſecond Statute of Weſtminſter †.

1286. The king procures from the Jews large ſums T. Wikes.

In the year 1286, Edward ordered all the Jews in England to be ſeized, on the ſame day; and the commons granted him a ſubſidy of the 50th part of their moveables, to expel the kingdom all ſuch foreigners, as were a burden to the nation, which he promiſed; but, having obtained this aid, he put them off with a delay, which was dearly purchaſed.

He goes into France.

About the middle of the ſame year, three important affairs called Edward into France, where he continued above three years; but, as in the mean time, nothing very remarkable paſſed in England, I ſhall only relate the affairs he had to manage in that country. The firſt was his demand of the provinces, taken from the kings John and Henry III; concerning which, there was a long negotiation. The ſecond concerned his homage to Philip the Fair, king of France, who had lately ſucceeded Philip the Hardy, his father. The third was the reconciliation, he undertook to procure, between the houſes of Arragon and Anjou, as to the crown of Sicily.

* King Edward, having taken the croſs, and, by reaſon of the Welch wars, and other affairs, not being able, in his own perſon, to perform a journey to the Holy-Land, deſigned his brother, Edmund, for that ſervice; and, there being ſix years tenths, collected from the clergy, according to the canon of the ſecond council of Lyons, ſecured, in ſeveral monaſteries, and other places, for an aid to the Holy-Land, pope Martin. IV. ſent two Predicant friars into England, for the exportation and return of this money, by his agents, and foreign merchants; upon which, Edward iſſued out, on May 24, 1282, a writ to prevent it; and he, moreover, ſent commiſſioners, the next year, to the places, where it was laid up, to ſee how much there was, and to order it to be kept ſafe, for the uſe to which it was intended. Vid. Brady's Hiſt.

† About this time, foreign merchants were firſt permitted to rent houſes, and to buy and ſell their own commodities, without any interruption from the citizens; for, before this, they hired lodgings, and their landlords were the brokers, who ſold all their goods and merchandizes for them. Fabian's Chron.

The

1286. The king, his kingdom, now, enjoying a profound tranquillity, committed the regency to the earl of Pembroke, and embarqued for France, where he ſpent almoſt a year, in ſolliciting the reſtitution of the provinces, taken from the crown of England, by the predeceſſors of Philip the Fair; but the court of France, being then in flouriſhing circumſtances, and in no danger from England, was deaf to all his propoſals. All the benefit, he reaped from this negotiation, was a penſion of 10,000 l. in lieu of his claim to certain lands, beyond the Charent, which Philip retained, contrary to the tenor of the antient treaties. Upon this foot, the two monarchs ſigned a new treaty; after which, Edward did homage to Philip. The form of the homage, paid only in general terms, and the previous proteſtations, plainly ſhew, that Edward was ſtill diſpoſed to keep up his pretenſions, in order to proſecute them, at a more favourable juncture; for, without ſpecifying, in his homage, any particular country, he affected to include all thoſe provinces, to which he had any claim; but, as this is a matter of moment, and was afterwards attended with remarkable conſequences, it will not be improper to recite the very words of the homage, with the proteſtations, as they occur in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

A new treaty between Edward and Philip the Fair. M. Weſt. T. Wikes.

The homage done by Edward to Philip.

"On Wedneſday in Whitſun-week, in "the 14th year of the reign of Edward, and "in the firſt of Philip, at Paris, in the room "of the royal palace, king Edward did ho-"mage to king Philip, in the following terms, "ſpoken by the biſhop of Bath and Wells.

"Sire, king of France, king Henry, father "of my lord the king of England, here pre-"ſent, made certain demands upon Lewis king "of France, your grandfather, whereon a "treaty of peace was concluded between "them. Purſuant to that treaty, Henry did "homage to your ſaid grandfather, for the "land he actually held, on this ſide the water, "and for ſuch, as the ſaid Lewis had obliged "himſelf to put into his hands, by the above-"mentioned treaty of peace. My lord, king "Edward, here preſent, after the death of his "father, did homage to the king your father, "for theſe lands, and according to the tenor "of the ſaid peace; and though my ſaid lord "might, with juſtice, as ſeveral of his coun-"cil are of opinion, refuſe to do the ſame ho-"mage, becauſe the ſaid peace has not been "obſerved, and becauſe, to his great preju-"dice, ſeveral attempts have been made upon "the lands which he holds; nevertheleſs, he "is unwilling, at preſent, to enter into diſ-"pute, upon that ſcore, provided you will "cauſe the ſaid peace to be kept, and the "damages he has ſuſtained to be repaired.

"I become your man, for the lands I hold "of you, on this ſide the water, according to "the tenor of the peace made with your an-"ceſtors."

It is obvious, that, in this homage, Edward was extremely cautious, as to his expreſſions; for, beſides his proteſtations, by the mouth of the biſhop, he would do homage only, in general terms, reſerving to himſelf the explanation, at another opportunity; yet Philip, who, doubtleſs, imagined, that he had a right to explain the ſame terms to his own advantage, very readily accepted the homage, notwithſtanding this affected obſcurity. He even granthim, a few days after, letters patent, by which he conſented, that the lands, poſſeſſed by Edward in France, ſhould not be liable to forfeiture, either for unjuſt judgment, or denial of juſtice; and he likewiſe promiſed to ſend back the appealants to the ſeneſchal of Guienne, and to allow him three months, to maintain or rectify the judgments; but this conceſſion was to take place only, during Edward's life, after which, things were to revert to their former ſtate.

Theſe two things detained Edward, at the court of France, about a year; but the agreement he undertook to mediate, between the kings of Sicily and Arragon, employed him much longer, and proved a very vexatious affair; for which he had no other reward, than the ſatisfaction of endeavouring to reconcile theſe illuſtrious houſes. Tho' this tranſaction does not immediately relate to the king of England, who acted only, as a mediator; yet as it was his whole buſineſs, for two years, I flatter myſelf it will not diſpleaſe the reader, if I briefly explain the occaſion of thoſe differences, and the principal events they produced.

A difference between the houſes of Anjou and Arragon. M. Weſt.

I have, already, related, in the late reign, that the popes inveſted the houſe of Swabia with the crown of Sicily; and the efforts they afterwards uſed, to wreſt it from that family.

I left Manfred the baſtard in poſſeſſion of both Sicily's, and the pope ſolemnly giving the inveſtiture of theſe two kingdoms to Charles of Anjou, after having long amuſed prince Edmund, king Edward's brother, with the hopes of that crown; but it will be neceſſary to reſume, in a few words, the ſequel of that hiſtory, to the preſent time.

Charles of Anjou was more dextrous, in improving the pope's favour, than Edmund; for, with the aſſiſtance of the king, his brother, he raiſed a numerous army, and came to Rome, where the pope ſolemnly crowned him king of the two Sicily's, on the 28th of June, 1265. In the beginning of the next year, he marched towards the kingdom of Naples, and, on the 26th of February, gained a complete victory over Manfred, who was ſlain, on the ſpot; and, being freed, from all the obſtacles in his way, by this ſingle battle, he took poſſeſſion of the Sicily's, and enjoyed them, ſome time, without a competitor. The Gibelines *, that is,

* The derivation of the names, Guelfs and Gibelines, is altogether uncertain. Some affirm, that, in 1130, there happened a ſchiſm in the church, by means of Innocent II. and Anacletus, the firſt of whom was countenanced by the emperor, and the other by Roger, count of Sicily and Naples, an active and warlike prince, who attached to his party Guelf, duke of Bavaria. The emperor Conrade III. entering Sicily, with a German army, and followed by prince Henry, his ſon, who was educated at a place in Germany, called Gibelin, Guelf, duke of Bavaria, marched to the aſſiſtance of his ally; and it fell out, as both armies were ready to engage, that the Bavarians cried out, in their 1286. is, the party againſt the pope, dejected by the flouriſhing condition of Charles, who ſupported the Guelphs, and was himſelf ſupported by them, did all that was poſſible, to deprive him of the two kingdoms; for they perſuaded Conradin, ſon of the emperor Conrade, that, being the ſole heir of the houſe of Swabia, he ought to aſſert his right to the Sicily's, and ſnatch the prey from Charles of Anjou. Conradin was eaſily prevailed on to engage in this undertaking; for, without a moment's conſideration, he aſſumed the title of king of Sicily, and, in ſpite of the excommunication thunder'd againſt him by the pope, came into Italy, where, at firſt, he made ſome progreſs. This auſpicious beginning inſpiring him with great hopes, he advanced towards Naples, to fight his enemy; upon which, Charles raiſed the ſiege of Nocera, which he had begun, and, marching towards him, met him, near the Lacus Fucinus, now called Celano, and gave him battle. Conradin had the misfortune to loſe the day, and be taken priſoner; and the conqueror was ſo cruel, as to behead the young prince, who was no more than 16 years of age; cauſing him to be tried and condemned by the ſyndicks of the cities of the kingdom, who were ſo baſe, as blindly to obey the directions of that bloody prince.

The extinction of the houſe of Swabia, by the death of Conradin, ſhould, one would have imagined, have utterly diſabled the Gibelines; but, if they were aſtoniſhed by this fatal blow, they were not quite diſpirited. Upon the deceaſe of Conradin, the rights of the houſe of Swabia were devolved to Peter, king of Arragon*, who had married Conſtantia, Manfred's daughter; for, tho' theſe rights came only by a baſe ſon of that houſe, the Gibelines entertained hopes of engaging the king of Arragon in their quarrel, ſince it might be the means of procuring him two kingdoms; and John, lord of Procida, an old ſervant of the houſe of Swabia, undertook to concert, with Peter, the neceſſary meaſures, to accompliſh the deſign of dethroning Charles of Anjou. Firſt of all, he ſecured the concurrence of pope Nicholas III, who was at variance with king Charles; and, then, proceeding to Conſtantinople, he obtained a ſupply of money from the emperor Michael, who was threatened with a war by the king of Sicily. Having made theſe preparations, he went and communicated his project to the king of Arragon; who was, at firſt, ſomewhat unwilling to embarque in an undertaking, which ſeemed to be impracticable; but the pope's approbation, the Grecian emperor's money, and the revolt of the Sicilians, of all which he was aſſured, led him, at length, to determine. Moreover, Procida repreſented to him, that he might, without any danger, be prepared, to improve the good ſucceſſes, or relinquiſh the undertaking, without appearing to be concerned; and, accordingly, he adviſed him to equip a fleet, under the pretence of invading the Moors of Africa, and even to beſiege one of their towns; adding, that if, which was, to the laſt degree, unlikely, the revolt of the Sicilians ſhould fail, he might continue the war upon the Infidels, without diſcovering that he had any other deſign; but, if the Sicilians ſhould perform their promiſes, he would be in a readineſs to improve the events. 1286.

This affair being, thus, adjuſted, John de Procida returned home, to ſet their friends to work, when matters were brought to maturity; and, tho' the king of Arragon's armament ſomewhat alarmed the kings of France and Sicily, he was ſuch a maſter of diſſimulation that he made them eaſy. No ſooner was his fleet ready, than he ſailed for the coaſt of Africa, where he beſieged Andacalle; having with him Roger de Lauria, the beſt ſea-officer then in Europe. In the interim, Procida ſo artfully concerted all his meaſures, that, in one night, the Sicilians cut the throats of above 8000 French, at that time in the iſland. This maſſacre, ſtiled the Sicilian Veſpers †, was acted upon Eaſter-Eve, on the 30th of March, 1282; but Charles of Anjou, receiving intelligence of it at Rome, ſet out, with all poſſible expedition, to prevent the conſequences of this conſpiracy. Having a fleet in readineſs, deſigned againſt the emperor of Conſtantinople, he embarqued, and arrived before Meſſina; and his ſudden coming ſo ſurpriſed the Meſſinians, that, deſpairing of timely relief, they offer'd to ſurrender, provided he would ſpare their lives; but the deſire of revenge ſo entirely poſſeſſed the king of Sicily, that he refuſed them that favour. The inhabitants of Meſſina, a great city, apprehending, by his refuſal, what they might expect, from ſuch a revengeful prince, reſolved to ſell their lives at a dear rate; chuſing rather to die, with ſword in hand, than on gibbets or ſcaffolds. Act. Pub.

In the mean time, the king of Arragon finding, from the proceedings of the Sicilians, that there was no danger from their inconſtancy, came, in a few days, to Palermo, where he was crowned; and then he ſent Charles a letter, commanding him, in an imperious ſtrain, to quit a country, to which he had no farther pretenſion. Charles returned him ſtill a more haughty and offenſive anſwer; yet, fearing that the Spaniſh fleet would cut off the proviſions, that were coming from Naples, he reſolved to raiſe the ſiege, and retire into Calabria. Upon his departure, the king of Arragon, immediately, made his entry into Meſſina; where the inhabitants received him, with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy and thankfulneſs. Act. Pub.

Charles, incenſed, to the laſt degree, carried his complaints to pope Martin IV, ſucceſtheir language, Hier Guelfe; which being anſwered by the troops, commanded by the prince, by Hier Gibelines, the Italians retained the words, to diſtinguiſh the different parties, and made uſe of them to denote the actions. Blondo, Sigonius.

* When Conradin was on the ſcaffold, he threw his glove into the ſquare, deſiring the perſon, that took it up, to carry it to one of his relations, as a mark of the inveſtiture, which he gave him, of the inheritance of the family of Swabia, of which he was the laſt heir-male; and this glove was carried to Peter, king of Arragon.

† Becauſe the bell, which rang to evening-prayers, was made the ſignal.

1286. for to Nicholas; and, in ſpeaking of the king of Arragon, he made uſe of the moſt opprobrious and abuſive terms, offering even to fight him, hand to hand, or 100 againſt 100, to oblige him to own himſelf to be a baſe, cowardly, and perfidious traytor. Theſe words reaching the ears of the king of Arragon, he ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, to juſtify his conduct, and accept the challenge; which propoſal was joyfully received by Charles, his impatience, to be revenged perſonally on his enemy, cauſing him to conſent to a truce, during which, were ſettled the conditions of the future ſingle combate, between the two monarchs. It was agreed, that each of them ſhould appear at Bourdeaux, at the head of 100 horſe, on the 1ſt of June, 1283; and that the king of England ſhould inſtantly be intreated to appoint the liſts in that city; to honour their duel with his preſence, or to ſend ſome perſon, in his ſtead. However, it muſt be obſerved, that it is, in ſo many words, expreſſed in the articles: "That, whatever happened, the two kings "ſhould appear at Bourdeaux, on the day ap- "pointed; but, if Edward was preſent, in per- "ſon, the intended duel ſhould not be fought, "unleſs the parties agreed upon it afterwards." Indeed, all the hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, that Edward appointed the liſts at Bourdeaux; and yet it is very certain, that he refuſed it. His letters, on this occaſion, to the king of Sicily, and the prince of Salerno, his ſon, clearly prove, that he was not, in the leaſt, inclined to grant their requeſt, ſince he poſitively aſſured them, that, were he to gain the kingdoms of Sicily and Arragon, he would not appoint the liſts for ſuch a duel; which letters are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, taken from the records of England.

Act. Pub.

Tho' Edward's refuſal diſengaged the two kings from the obligation to fight, they were, however, obliged, by the articles, to appear at Bourdeaux; and Charles came, on the day appointed, with 100 horſe, and continued there, from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſetting; but, not meeting his adverſary, nor ſo much as hearing of him, he retired. As ſoon as he was gone, Peter, who was, all the while, in Bourdeaux, diſguiſed, like an eſquire, repaired to the ſeneſchal of the city; and, taking a certificate of his appearance, he left him his arms, for a teſtimony; which proceeding led the French hiſtorians to ſpeak diſhonourably of the king of Arragon, as if want of courage was the motive to it, and that he practiſed that fraud, to evade his engagements; but it would not be very difficult to juſtify his conduct, in this particular, if this was a proper place, to enter upon the examination of ſuch an affair *.

Though, as I obſerved, the king of Arragon was freed from the obligation of fighting, ſince Edward did not come to Bourdeaux; yet his proceeding was extremely exaggerated, in France and Italy; for it was inferred, as an evident conſequence, that he himſelf was convinced of his injuſtice to Charles of Anjou, ſince he durſt not decide their difference, by a ſingle combate, which he himſelf had accepted. Pope Martin IV, a Frenchman, and entirely attached to the houſe of Anjou, thundered againſt the king of Arragon a ſentence of excommunication, tho' he produced the inveſtiture of Sicily, privately given him by Nicholas III. He even abſolved his ſubjects from their oath of allegiance, and gave the kingdom of Arragon to Charles, earl of Valois, ſecond ſon of the king of France †; yet Peter ſtill kept poſſeſſion of the Sicily's, and, to inſult the pope, under the pretence of ſubmitting to his authority, order'd himſelf to be ſtiled only, the Chevalier of Arragon. Martin, upon this, reſolved to make that prince know, that he was not to be inſulted, with impunity; for he publiſhed a Cruſade againſt him, under the command of Philip III, king of France; and there were people ſuperſtitious enough to imagine, that they ſhould obtain paradiſe, in eſpouſing the quarrel of the pope, and the houſe of Anjou; tho' few, except Frenchmen, were engaged in this Cruſade, in which their king was particularly concerned, ſince it was intended for placing his ſon on the throne of Arragon.

1286. Act. Pub.

Whilſt Philip was making preparations, Roger Lauria rendered his maſter's arms proſperous, in the Mediterranean; having taken Malta, from Charles of Anjou, after gaining a naval battle, in which the French fleet was entirely deſtroyed. Immediately after this victory, he attacked the coaſts of Naples, deſigning to draw, out of his ports, the prince of Salerno, to whom his father, king Charles, had left the command of his fleet; and this deſign proved ſucceſsful. The prince of Salerno, deſirous of glory, and unable to bear the inſults of Lauria, raſhly engaged in a ſea-fight, wherein he had the misfortune to be vanquiſhed and taken priſoner; who was, forthwith, ſent to Sicily, where he found himſelf in danger of loſing his head, on a ſcaffold, the Sicilians reſolving to make him ſuffer, by way of retaliation, for Conradin; but Conſtantia, queen of Arragon, was ſo generous, as to ſend him to the king, her husband, who was then in Spain. Charles's vexation at the loſs of his fleet, and his ſon's impriſonment, was the greater, as he arrived, three days after, with a powerful ſupply, and had expreſly commanded the prince not to fight, until he was reinforced. This accident, entirely diſconcerting his meaſures, was, probably, the cauſe of his death, on the 6th of June, 1285; who left, for his ſucceſſor, Charles II, his ſon, ſirnamed the Lame, priſoner in Spain, to whom the Arragonians gave only the title of prince of Salerno, during his captivity.

Neither the death of Charles, nor the loſs of the battle of Naples, could divert Philip from his projects; for, in the month of May, that very year, he headed his troops, conſiſting of 80,000 foot, and 20,000 horſe, and, though he heard, in his march, of the death of the king, his brother, entered Rouſſillon, and became

He afterwards advanced into Catalonia, where, after ſeveral conqueſts, he beſieged Gironne; and the king of Arragon, attacking a convoy paſſing from Rozes to the ſiege, was hurt in the ſkirmiſh, and died, three months after, of his wounds. He left Arragon and Catalonia to prince Alphonſo, his eldeſt ſon; and Sicily to James, his ſecond ſon, on condition that, if Alphonſo died, without heirs, James ſhould ſucceed in Arragon, and reſign Sicily to Frederick, his younger brother.

T. Wikes. An. Wav. The king of France's ſucceſſes, in the beginning of the war, did not laſt, to the end of the campaign; for Roger Lauria, falling on the French fleet, deſtroyed all the ſhips, except a few that eſcaped to Rozes; and the ſickneſs in Philip's army retarded his progreſs, by land. In fine, being himſelf ſeized with the contagion, he was carried to Perpignan; where he departed this life, on the 6th of October. Philip IV, his ſon, ſirnamed the Fair, was his ſucceſſor; and, Martin IV. dying, the ſame year, Honorius IV. was elected, in his room.

Edward is mediator between the kings of Arragon and Sicily. Such was the ſtate of the affairs, between the houſes of Arragon and Anjou, when Edward accepted the mediation, offered him by both parties; and the main difficulty of this negotiation conſiſted, in freeing the prince of Salerno out of the hands of the king of Arragon, without which it was impoſſible to procure a peace. Edward had, upon that occaſion, ſeveral interviews with Alphonſo; and Mezerai affirms, he even went to Sicily, to confer with king James; but the hiſtory takes no notice of this voyage. In a word, at a conference between him and Alphonſo, at Oleron in Bearn, they ſettled the terms, on which the prince of Salerno was to be releaſed, and for which, as far as concerned the ranſom, Edward conſented to be ſecurity; and then the articles of agreement were confirmed, by a treaty concluded at Campo Franco, the 4th of October, 1288. Nicholas IV, ſucceſſor to Honorius, vigorouſly oppoſed the execution of the treaty, which he apprehended to be too advantageous for the king of Arragon, and too diſhnoourable for the holy ſee; becauſe the prince of Salerno, without conſulting him, had obliged himſelf to cauſe the earl of Valois to renounce the kingdom of Arragon. However, the difficulties, ariſing from this oppoſition, were, at length, ſurmounted by the prudence and activity of Edward, who acted, as mediator, with great impartiality; and, to facilitate the execution of the treaty, he was willing to give Engliſh hoſtages to the king of Arragon, and to cauſe the principal cities of Guienne to interpoſe, as pledges, Alphonſo performing the ſame, with reſpect to the principal cities of his dominions.

1288. Purſuant to this agreement, the prince of Salerno was releaſed, leaving his ſons, as hoſtages; and now the main obſtacle, in this affair, was removed, by that prince's liberty, who was bound, by the moſt ſolemn oaths; but he entirely neglected his engagements. He not only procured himſelf to be crowned king of the Sicily's by the pope, contrary to the expreſs terms of the treaty; but he did all that was poſſible to confirm the earl of Valois in his reſolution, to proſecute his pretended right to the kingdom of Arragon; and, when he had ſufficiently prepared matters, he feigned a willingneſs to return to impriſonment, as he was obliged, upon his violating the articles of the treaty. Accordingly, he repaired to a certain place, where the king of Arragon was to receive him, and exchange him for the princes, his ſons; but he came ſo well attended, that Alphonſo did not think it expedient to venture upon his ſincerity. This occaſioned mutual complaints, reproaches, and apologies; and each party applied to the king of England, as mediator and guarantee of the treaty. Edward, in all probability, being tired with acting in favour of theſe princes, who ſo ill requited all his pains, left them to decide their differences, as they pleaſed, without concerning himſelf any farther; but, not to leave the reader in ſuſpence, how this diſpute ended, I ſhall add, in two words, that, after long negotiations, intermixed with many hoſtilities, the two princes adjuſted their quarrel, by a treaty. The prince of Salerno, ſtiled Charles the Lame, kept Sicily, on this ſide the Faro, which, from that time, was called the kingdom of Naples; and the houſe of Arragon remained in poſſeſſion of the iſland of Sicily; beſides, the earl of Valois renounced his pretenſions to the kingdom of Arragon.

1289. Edward returns to England. T. Wikes. After ſtaying above three years beyond ſea, Edward returned into England, in Auguſt, 1289; whoſe firſt care was to reform ſeveral abuſes introduced, in his abſence, eſpecially in the adminiſtration of juſtice; for, upon complaints from all hands, that the judges were chargeable with bribery, he ſtrictly examined into their conduct, and ſeverely puniſhed the guilty. Sir Thomas Weyland, the chief juſticiary, or firſt judge, was, on this account, baniſhed the realm, his eſtate being alſo confiſcated*; and theſe miſdemeanours, which were but too frequent, gave the king occaſion to oblige the judges to ſwear, that, for the future, they would take neither money, nor any ſort of preſents, except a breakfaſt, which they might accept, provided there was no exceſs. An hiſtorian affirms, that the king acquired above 100,000 marks, by the confiſcation of the eſtates of thoſe that had been faulty †.

† Sir Ralph de Hengham, chief juſtice of the higher bench, was fined 7000 marks; Sir John Lovetot, juſtice of the lower bench, 3000 marks; Sir William Bramton, juſtice, the like ſum; Sir Solomon Rocheſter, juſtice of aſſizes, 4000 marks; Sir Richard de Boyland, 4000 marks; Sir Thomas Soddington, 2000 marks; Sir Walter Hopton, 2000 marks: The four laſt were juſtices itinerant. Sir William de Saham, 3000 marks; Robert Littlebury, maſter of the rolls, 1000 marks; Roger Leiceſter, 1000 marks; Henry Bray, eſcheater, and judge for the Jews, 1000 marks; and Adam de Stretton, a clerk of the court, no leſs than 32000 marks of new money, beſides jewels and ſilver-plate. 1290. In the beginning of the year 1290, Edward assembled a parliament, wherein the Third Statute of Westminster was enacted; and the banishment * of the Jews was absolutely resolved. The nation had long desired it; but the Jews, hitherto, found means to divert the blow, by presents to the king and his ministers; and they would fain have used the same method, now, but could not prevail, the king being unable to protect them any longer, without disobliging the parliament. Their immoveable goods were confiscated; tho' they were allow'd to carry away the rest with them. It is the general opinion, that they began to settle in the kingdom, in the reign of William the Conqueror; but some believe their settlement to be still more antient. At first, their number was small; yet, by degrees, they increased to 15000. Their money procured them several considerable privileges, confirmed by Edward himself, namely, a synagogue at London, a head of their religion, being a sort of high-priest, and judges of their own nation, to hear and determine their differences; yet they lost all these advantages, because of their insatiable greediness of enriching themselves by unlawful means, as usury, adulteration of the coin, and the like odious practices; but, as for the imputation of crucifying, from time to time, christian children, one may almost be assured, that it was only a calumny invented by their enemies †.

The affairs of Scotland.

We are, now, come to the grand affair of the reign of Edward I, viz. the conquest of Scotland; which it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to treat of, in a satisfactory manner, to the English and Scots; for though the two nations almost agree, as to the facts, and the occasion of this conquest, they widely differ, with respect to the right. The English affirm, that Edward's whole conduct, in this affair, was agreeable to reason and justice; whilst the Scots alledge, that he was prompted, solely, by his ambition, to take advantage of the troubles of Scotland, in order to become master of that kingdom, under frivolous pretences; and, notwithstanding the great distance of time, since this event, historians still retain their national prejudices. The English, to this day, consider Edward I, as a truly glorious prince, who employed his arms in no other than a just and honourable cause; yet the Scots speak of him, as a tyrant, vowing the destruction of their nation, and, contrary to all manner of right, intent upon gratifying his ambition, in uniting all the people of Great-Britain, under his dominion. As I am not attached to either party, by birth, or any other motive, I flatter myself with having impartially examined this affair, and produced, from the Collection of the Publick Acts, such light, as may serve to conveigh a just idea of the thing; and it will be necessary to be somewhat particular, as it is the only possible means to dispel the prejudices, which darken the affair.

Alexander III, king of Scotland, married, as was said, above, Margaret, daughter of Henry III, king of England, and sister of Edward; by whom he had three children, Alexander, David, and Margaret. David died, in his infancy; and Margaret was married to Eric, king of Norway, in 1281. It was agreed, in the marriage-contract, that, if prince Alexander died, without heirs, and the king, his father, left no issue male, Margaret should succeed to the crown of Scotland, and her children enjoy the same right, if she died, before the king, her father. Alexander, soon after, losing his only son of the same name, and the queen of Norway, his daughter, also dying, after she had brought into the world a daughter, called Margaret, that prince resolved to perform the foresaid agreement; and, with this view, he obliged the Scotch barons to swear, that, if he died, without male heirs, they would acknowledge the young princess of Norway, for their queen; but Alexander departed this life, about two years after he had, thus, settled the succession, his death being occasioned by a fall from his horse, in the year 1285.

An account of the disputes about the succession to the crown of Scotland.

Alexander III. dies. T. Wikes.

The Scots, upon the decease of their king, chose six regents to govern the kingdom, till the princess of Norway, who was, at most, but three years of age, arrived to years of maturity. It does not appear, from the histories of England or Scotland, why the Scots were three or four years, before they demanded their queen, or why Eric, her father, neglected to send her over; and yet it was not till 1289, after Edward's return into England, that Eric sent ambassadors, for that purpose. Edward being Margaret's great uncle, Eric thought it advisable to ask his advice and assistance, to place the young princess on the throne of Scotland; and, upon this ambassy, Edward, forthwith, wrote to the regents of Scotland, strenuously recommending the interests of young Margaret, and likewise acquainting them, that he design'd to send ambassadors, to settle certain affairs relating to the welfare and tranquillity of Scotland; but the regents judged it more expedient for themselves to send plenipotentiaries into England, to adjust with the ambassadors of Norway, in Edward's presence, whatever concerned the interests of that kingdom. However, they took care to insert this clause, in the credentials of their envoys, "Saving the honour and liberty of the kingdom;" and the bishops of St. Andrews and Glascow were commissioned to transact this affair.

1290. tentiaries of Edward, Eric, and the Scots, to ſettle together whatever related to the reception of that princeſs. In this aſſembly, it was agreed, that the young queen ſhould be ſent into England, free from any marriage-engagement; and Edward promiſed to take care of her education, till Scotland, being reſtored to perfect tranquillity, ſhould be in a condition to receive her; moreover, he gave his word, not to ſuffer her to be contracted in marriage, provided the Scots would not take any ſtep to that end, without his and the king of Norway's conſent.

Edward propoſes the marriage of his ſon with Margaret. Act. Pub.

Edward had his own reaſons, for cauſing this laſt article to be inſerted in the agreement; for, ever ſince the death of the king of Scotland, he had been forming the project of uniting the two kingdoms of Great-Britain, by his ſon's marriage with Margaret; nay, he had already procured a diſpenſation from the court of Rome, tho' he had not thought fit to diſcover ſo early his intention. However, having taken the forementioned meaſures, he cauſed the marriage to be propoſed to the regents; which propoſal, being examined, in a council of Scotland, was unanimouſly approved; but upon certain terms, which they were to lay before the firſt parliament aſſembled in England. There were, upon this occaſion, ſeveral negotiations; but it is ſufficient to ſay, that the commiſſioners of the two nations, meeting at Bingham, agreed upon ſeveral articles, the principal of which, with reſpect to the ſequel, were, as follows:

The regents conſent to it. Ibid.

The terms of the marriage. Ibid.

I. The plenipotentiaries of Edward promiſed, in his name, that he would inviolably maintain the laws, liberties, and cuſtoms of Scotland, in all things and in all times, throughout the whole realm, with all its marches.

II. That, if either Edward, the ſon, or Margaret, his future ſpouſe, ſhould die, without iſſue, and in all caſes or events, by which the kingdom of Scotland ſhould fall to the next heir, it ſhould be reſtored to the people of Scotland free, independent, and without any ſubjection, ſaving, however, the rights of the king of England to the crown of Scotland, provided it devolved to him, or his heirs, by a lawful ſucceſſion.

III. That the kingdom of Scotland ſhould remain ſeparated, divided, and free in itſelf, without any ſubjection to, or dependence on, England; ſaving to the king of England, and his ſucceſſors, his right to certain lands on the frontiers, or elſewhere, before the time of this agreement, or any right he ſhould lawfully acquire, hereafter.

IV. No perſon, holding lands, in fee, of the king of Scotland, ſhould be obliged to proſecute any ſuit, out of the kingdom, according to the cuſtom, hitherto, obſerved.

V. That all the ſubjects of the crown of Scotland ſhould enjoy the ſame privilege, according to antient cuſtom.

VI. That all records, charters, and privileges, or other memorials, relating to the royal dignity, and the kingdom of Scotland, ſhould be depoſited in a place of ſafety, and not carried out of the realm, under the ſeals of certain lords, till the queen ſhould come into the kingdom, and have children. 1290.

VII. That no ſubjection, alienation, or obligation, of any thing, concerning the kingdom of Scotland, ſhould be made, till the queen ſhould be there, in perſon, and have children alive.

VIII. That no parliament ſhould be held, out of the kingdom.

Theſe precautions demonſtrate, how far the Scots were from believing, in thoſe days, that the kingdom of Scotland was dependent on England.

The marriage is concluded. Act. Pub.

Theſe, and ſeveral other articles, which I forbear to mention, being approved and ratified, the marriage was concluded and reſolved, to the general ſatisfaction of both nations; and Edward began to take, as it were, poſſeſſion of Scotland for the prince, his ſon, by ſending thither the biſhop of Durham, who, jointly with the ſix regents, was intruſted with the adminiſtration of affairs, in the name of young Edward and Margaret. No one queſtioned, but the two kingdoms of Great-Britain would be united, by means of this marriage, when, on a ſudden, all hopes of an union vaniſhed; for Edward received a letter, from the biſhop of St. Andrews, acquainting him with the report of queen Margaret's death; and that ſome Scotch lords *, upon the news, already ſtirred, in the proſecution of their pretended right to the crown. The biſhop intreated him, at the ſame time, to advance towards the frontiers, to prevent, by his preſence, the commotions, which the queen's death, if found true, would excite in the kingdom. The report of her death was but too well grounded; for the princeſs, whom the king, her father, promiſed to ſend into England, before the month of October, having ſailed from Norway, died in a certain iſland†, where ſhe was driven, by ſtreſs of weather.

Margaret's death. Buchanan.

The news of this accident threw the kingdom of Scotland into a more wretched condition, than ever; for the late king, tho' he obliged the great men to ſwear to acknowledge Margaret of Norway, for queen, neglected to ſettle the ſucceſſion, in caſe that princeſs died, without heirs. This rendered the choice of a ſucceſſor very perplexing; and it became more ſo every day, on account of the factions formed, in favour of the pretenders to the crown. Never was union among the great men more neceſſary; but, private intereſt ſtifling the love of their country, every one proceeded, as he was engaged, either by family-ties, or other motives, entirely regardleſs, about the juſtice of the cauſe which he eſpouſed.

John Baliol and Robert Bruce pretend to the crown of Scotland.

Among the pretenders to the crown, John Baliol and Robert Bruce divided almoſt all the ſuffrages of the kingdom; for the firſt held large poſſeſſions in France, in the province of Normandy; the other held a conſiderable

1290. eſtate in England; and both were very potent in Scotland. For the better underſtanding the grounds of their reſpective titles, it will be neceſſary to take a view of the genealogy of the royal family of Scotland; of which I ſhall, therefore, give a brief explanation.

The genealogy of the royal family of Scotland.

David, king of Scotland, had but one ſon, named Henry, who, dying before him, left three ſons, viz. Malcolm IV, who ſucceeded to the crown, after his grandfather, and died, without heirs; William, ſucceſſor to his elder brother; and David, who was earl of Huntingdon in England. The race of William being extinct, by the death of Margaret of Norway, there was a neceſſity of going back to that of David, earl of Huntingdon, third ſon to prince Henry. David, died, without iſſue male; but he left three daughters, Margaret, married to Alan of Galloway, Iſabella, wife of Robert Bruce, and Ada, wife of Henry Haſtings, an Engliſh lord. Margaret, the eldeſt, left only two daughters, Deverguld, whom ſome call Dornagilla, and Marjory. Deverguld married John Baliol, by whom ſhe had a ſon of the ſame name, one of the two candidates for the crown; but Marjory, wife of John Comyn, died, without iſſue. Iſabella, ſecond daughter to David, had, by Robert Brnce, a ſon, named Robert, from his father, the other candidate; and Ida, David's third daughter, left a ſon, called John Haſtings, who was alſo a pretender to the crown. To avoid confuſion, I ſhall confine myſelf, at preſent, to the two chief competitors, namely, John Baliol and Robert Bruce, who alone had properly a right to pretend to the ſucceſſion.

The foundation of the titles of the competitors.

It muſt be obſerved, that, at the time of Margaret of Norway's death, the three daughters of David, earl of Huntingdon, were not alive; but Deverguld, daughter of the eldeſt, was ſtill living, and reſigned her title to John Baliol, her ſon, who, being deſcended from the eldeſt of David's daughters, claimed a right to have the preference to all the other candidates. On the other hand, Robert Bruce, ſon of the younger daughter, alledged, that he was, one degree, nearer than Baliol, ſince he was grandſon to David; whereas his rival was only grandſon to the eldeſt daughter of the ſame prince. It was objected, that, as Deverguld was in the ſame degree with him, he ought to ſucceed, ſince ſhe was daughter to the eldeſt; whereas he was only ſon to a younger daughter of David. To which he replied, that, where the degree is the ſame, the males ought to be preferred to the females, according to the conſtant law and cuſtom of all ſtates; for which he produced ſeveral precedents, from the hiſtories of foreign countries. This was the ſtate of the caſe; which could not be decided, without diſpleaſing one half of the kingdom.

The ſtate of affairs in Scotland, according to the Scotch hiſtorians. Buchanan.

Here it is that we, firſt, diſcover a diſagreement, between the Engliſh and Scotch hiſtorians; for the latter affirm, that, in the preſent poſture of affairs, it was impoſſible to find in Scotland impartial judges; and that, ſuppoſing ſuch could have been found, it would have been extremely difficult to execute their ſentence, by reaſon of the equality of credit and power in the contending parties. Baliol was lord of the county of Galloway, one of the moſt conſiderable of the kingdom; being likewiſe ſupported by the Comyns, a family of great power and intereſt. Robert Bruce held, in England, the earldom of Cleveland, and, in Scotland, thoſe of Anandale and Gariock; and, by means of his ſon, Robert, who had, with his wife, the earldom of Carrick, he was allied to the moſt powerful families of Scotland; inſomuch that, as they add, to avoid a civil war, both parties agreed to refer the deciſion of this important affair to the king of England. All good offices were expected from him, not only becauſe of the good underſtanding which had long ſubſiſted between the two nations, but in return for their ready conſent to the marriage of the prince, his ſon, with their late queen; and, therefore, according to theſe writers, he was intreated to be the umpire of this diſpute, and to aſſiſt the perſon he ſhould think proper to place on the throne. They farther ſay, that Edward, accepting the mediation, came to Norham; where he ſummoned the ſtates of Scotland, proteſting, that he convened them, not as a ſovereign, but as a friend, that deſir'd them to meet the arbitrator choſen by themſelves. However, this fact is denied by the Engliſh, who aſſert, that Edward ſummoned the ſtates of Scotland to Norham, not as a friend and umpire, but by vertue of his right of ſovereignty over Scotland; adding, that the bare conſideration of the ſituation of Norham, a town in England, evidently ſhews, that Edward exerciſed an act of ſovereignty, in aſſembling the ſtates of Scotland, in his own kingdom. The Scots reply, that this proof is entirely deſtroyed, by the letters patent which Edward granted them, on that occaſion; whoſe words are theſe: "That he did not intend, "that the coming of the Scots, on this ſide "the Tweed, ſhould be any prejudice to them, "or that, for the future, upon any account "whatever, they ſhould be obliged to come "and treat with him, on this ſide the river." This expreſs declaration, tho' it ſeems to prove, that Edward did not pretend to the ſovereignty of Scotland, amounts to no more than an evidence of his policy, or diſſimulation; ſince he certainly deſigned, then, to eſtabliſh the right of ſovereignty; and, accordingly, it was no ſooner eſtabliſhed, than he ſtiled his letters patent a mere conceſſion, which might be, and was actually, revoked. In the view this monarch had, of cauſing his ſovereignty to be acknowledged by the ſtates of Scotland, as will be ſeen, hereafter, it would have been very improper to alarm the Scots, by an act of abſolute authority, before the ſtates were aſſembled; it being much more natural and advantageous for him, to convene the ſtates, firſt, and lead them, by degrees, to the acknowledgment he was deſirous of extorting from them; and, probably, when he ſummoned the ſtates to Norham, he made choice of ambiguous and cautious expreſſions, to conceal his real intention, ſince it was not his intereſt, then, to diſcover it, though he deſigned

1290. to uſe this very aſſembly, to ſtrengthen his right.

Buchanan pretends, that, immediately after the young queen's death, Edward formed the project of becoming maſter of Scotland; but, perhaps, he proceeds too far. It is much more likely, that, at firſt, he had no farther view, than to cauſe himſelf to be acknowledged, for ſovereign of that kingdom; whether he imagined it his due, or was inclined to improve the favourable opportunity of firmly eſtabliſhing this pretended right. The more effectually to accompliſh his deſign, according to the ſame hiſtorian, he perſuaded eight other perſons, beſides the two above-mentioned, to claim the crown; intending ſo to perplex the affair, that the two principal candidates might ſee, that he ſhould not want means, to render their titles dubious, if they were not pliant to his will.

After theſe previous remarks, it is high time to come to the deciſion of this famous proceſs; but, firſt, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that this affair contains two things, really diſtinct from each other, viz. the right of ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland, and the right of ſovereignty over the ſame kingdom, claimed by Edward. The former, ſeems, at firſt ſight, to be the moſt important, and the latter appears only to be an incident queſtion ariſing upon the other; but the ſequel will inform us, that it became the main point, by its fatal conſequences. It muſt be farther obſerved, that the particulars, I am about to relate, are taken from a journal, or verbal proceſs, inſerted in the Collection of Publick Acts, made by Mr. John de Cadam, one of Edward's clerks or notaries; which ſhould induce us to read, with ſome caution, what appears to be too much in favour of the king of England, with reſpect to his claim to the ſovereignty of Scotland.

1291. Edward requires the ſtates of Scotland to own him, for ſovereign. Act. Pub.

The ſtates of Scotland being aſſembled at Norham, May 10, 1291, Roger le Brabazon, chief juſticiary of England, by order, and in the name of the king, his maſter, who was preſent, repreſented to them, that the king of England, conſidering the unſettled circumſtances of Scotland, had required the ſtates to meet, in that place, to lay before them certain matters, tending to the preſervation of the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom; that he had no deſign to uſurp the rights of any perſon, ſtop the courſe of juſtice, or to infringe the liberties of the people of Scotland; but, as ſovereign lord of Scotland, he was come to do juſtice to all: And that this might be the more eaſily effected, though what he claimed could not be juſtly diſputed, he demanded, as a ſuperabundant right, the ſtates aſſent to, and recognition of, his ſuperiority and direct dominion; upon which, he would make uſe of their counſels, to do what ſhould ſeem agreeable to juſtice and reaſon. The ſtates, extremely ſurpriſed at this propoſal, required time, to conſult with the abſent biſhops and barons, that they might return an uniform anſwer, in an affair of ſuch importance; and Edward, in his turn, expreſs'd ſome ſurpriſe, that the ſtates ſhould require time to give in their anſwer. He told them, that he had reaſon to believe they were come prepared for this matter, ſeeing they were not ignorant of his intention; and, therefore, he allowed them only the reſt of that day, to conſider of his demand. On the morrow, the ſtates inſiſting on a longer time, the king granted them three weeks, from the 10th of May; during which ſpace, they were to prepare all their objections to his pretenſions, and all the acts and monuments they might think proper, to invalidate his demand. 1291.

The ſtates make no anſwer. June 2.

Though, according to the time prefixed by the king, the next meeting was to be, on the firſt of June; yet the journal, which I take for my guide, mentions only that of the ſecond of the ſame month. The biſhop of Bath and Wells, being ſpokeſman for the king, recited what had been done, in the two former aſſemblies; adding that, as the three weeks, granted to the ſtates, were expired, and they had not produced or alledged any thing, to invalidate his right, he was reſolved to act, by vertue of his acknowledged ſovereignty over Scotland, and, as ſovereign, to do juſtice to the candidates.

Remarks on the ſilence of the ſtates.

Let us ſtop, a moment, to make a ſingle remark, on the preſent occaſion. How great an opinion ſoever a man may entertain of the faithfulneſs of Edward, and the notary, that drew up the foreſaid journal, he cannot avoid perceiving, that there is ſomething defective here. In the two former aſſemblies, Edward produced his pretenſions to the ſovereignty of Scotland; and the ſtates, far from, immediately, owning this ſovereignty, require time to conſult together, about ſo nice a point. The king grants them three weeks; and, upon the expiration of that time, in the firſt meeting, taken notice of in the journal, the chancellor begins with ſaying, that the ſtates had produced or alledged nothing, againſt the king's pretenſions. Ought he not rather to call upon the ſtates, for their anſwer? and the journaliſt ſhould relate either their objections, or aſſent, or, at leaſt, declare, that they had return'd no anſwer. If this had been done, the chancellor's ſpeech would come to the purpoſe; but, on the contrary, he begins with declaring, that, the ſtates having nothing to object againſt the king's pretenſions, Edward was reſolved to make uſe of his right; which renders it ſuſpicious, either that the account of what paſſed, that day, is curtailed, or that, the day before, there was another aſſembly, wherein the ſtates had produced their proofs, but which the author of the journal did not think proper to mention, I, before, obſerved, that, according to the time appointed by the king, there was to be an aſſembly, on the firſt of June, whereas this was not, till the ſecond; but I offer this, as no more than a conjecture; for the grand difficulty lies in that, after a three weeks conſultation, the ſtates of Scotland ſhould have nothing to anſwer or object to Edward's pretenſions. It is certain, that, hitherto, the ſovereignty of the crown of England over Scotland had never been ſo generally acknowledg'd, that the bare publick evidence could ſilence the ſtates;

1291. ſtates; which is ſufficiently evident, from the marriage-articles above-mentioned, wherein the Scots had taken ſo great care to maintain their independence. In the ſecond place, the time they took, to conſult about the king's demand, plainly proves, that they were not fully perſuaded of their ſubjection to the crown of England; and, in a word, Edward's very precaution, in requiring this acknowledgment, teſtifies, that the thing was, at leaſt, doubtful; for it is not cuſtomary to act, thus, when a man has a known and undeniable right. If it be true, then, that the ſtates returned no anſwer to the king's demand, it muſt be thought, either that they were overaw'd; or that the two principal candidates united, and prevailed with the ſtates, by ſecret practices, not to oppoſe the pretenſions of the king of England; and, probably, they were afraid, that this incident would retard the deciſion of the main affair. However, to return to our journal.

Edward is owned, for ſovereign, by all the claimants.

The high-chancellor having ſpoken, as is related in the journal, taking his maſter's right for granted, addreſſed himſelf, firſt, to Robert Bruce, and demanded of him, whether he would own the king of England, for ſovereign of Scotland, and receive juſtice from him, as ſuch? To which, according to the journal, Robert Bruce replied, openly and expreſly, that he acknowledged the king of England, for ſovereign lord of the realm of Scotland, and conſented to acquieſce in the judgment, that prince, as ſuch, ſhould think fit to pronounce. The ſame queſtion being propoſed to Florence, earl of Holland, and the lord John Haſtings, they both made the ſame anſwer; and then Patrick of Dunbar, earl of March, William de Ros, Walter de Huntercumbe, William Veſcy, by proctor, Robert de Pynkeny, and Nicholas de Soules appeared, and required to be admitted, ſeparately, to prove, that the crown of Scotland was devolved to them, by right of ſucceſſion. The ſame queſtion was put to them, as to the three firſt, about Edward's right; to which having returned the ſame anſwer, their petition was received. John Baliol being abſent, his gentleman of horſe ſtood up; and, alledging ſome excuſe, for his maſter's abſence, he demanded, in his name, that he might be heard, the next day, which was accordingly granted.

The proteſtation of Edward. June 3.

On the morrow, after the chancellor's recapitulation of what had paſſed, to that time, Baliol, who was preſent, was asked the ſame queſtion, as the reſt of the competitors, and made the like anſwer; upon which, the chancellor proteſted, aloud, in the king's name, "That, although the king of England acted, "now, as ſovereign lord of Scotland, he did "not deſign, thereby, to depart from the he-"reditary right, he might have to the crown "of that kingdom, or to exclude himſelf, as "to the property; but that he expreſly re-"ſerved to himſelf the liberty to proſecute his "right, as the reſt of the candidates, when "and how he pleaſed." As ſoon as the chancellor had done ſpeaking, the king repeated, verbatim, the ſame proteſtation, with his own mouth; and then John Comyn, lord of Badenoch, riſing up, demanded leave to prove his lawful right to the crown; whoſe requeſt was granted, after recogniſing, like the reſt, the king of England's ſovereignty. Upon this, the candidates drew up a writing, whereby they acknowledged him ſovereign lord of Scotland; which writing was ſigned and ſealed by all, and particularly by Robert Bruce and John Baliol; and, as for the ſilence of the ſtates, on this occaſion, Edward, taking it for an aſſent, became poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty. 1291.

Edward is put in poſſeſſion of Scotland.

This ſtep being made, the king, advancing farther, repreſented to the candidates, that it would be in vain to give ſentence, in favour of one of them, if it was not in his power to put it in execution; wherefore, he demanded the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, that he might be able to deliver it to the perſon, that ſhould be declared king. The competitors, conſenting to this, ſigned an inſtrument, according to his deſire; as if their bare pretenſions to the crown had impowered them to diſpoſe of the kingdom, at their pleaſure; in which writing, they own the king of England, for ſovereign lord of Scotland, and, as ſuch, for judge of the proceſs, concerning the ſucceſſion, promiſing to ſtand to the judgment he ſhould pronounce. They alſo agreed, that he ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of all the caſtles, and the whole kingdom, in order to reſtore it to him, in whoſe favour it ſhould be adjudged; but on this condition, that he ſhould be obliged to reſtore it, within two months after judgment given, in the ſame ſtate he receiv'd it, ſaving to him the homage of the new king. Act. Pub. M. Weſt.

Whatever had been, hitherto, done, in Edward's behalf, was only the acts of private perſons; yet, among them, were Bruce and Baliol, who divided all Scotland between them; and, conſequently, their approbation drew after it that of the whole kingdom. In thoſe days of anarchy, the regents had but little authority, not daring to do any thing diſpleaſing to the king, or the two chief competitors, one of whom was to be their maſter; and, as for the ſtates, Edward, perceiving that they diſliked his pretenſions, conſulted them no more; but, as they were aſſembled, out of Scotland, and in the king's power, they were not at liberty to take ſuch meaſures, as were agreeable to their inclinations. Edward, therefore, met with little oppoſition from the governors of the caſtles, when he came to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom, William de Umfraville, who had the cuſtody of the caſtles of Dundee and Forfar, being the only perſon that made any reſiſtance; who conſidered the foreſaid act, as very irregular, and could not reſolve, upon ſuch a warrant, to ſurrender the places committed to his truſt, neither by the king of England, nor by the candidates; apprehending it to be neceſſary, that the competitors, regents, and king himſelf ſhould oblige themſelves, by an expreſs act, to indemnify him, in caſe he ſhould, hereafter, come to be called to an account. Act. Pub.

Notwithſtanding Edward's pretenſions, it is certain, that the ſovereignty of the crown of England had never been acknowledged, in Scotland;

1291. Scotland; for which reaſon, the Scots, in general, muſt, of courſe, regard the proceedings of the candidates, and the regents themſelves, as a manifeſt prevarication; and yet it was extremely difficult to act otherwiſe, all the great men being brought over, either by Edward's promiſes, or threats; beſides, the troops he had ordered to march to Norham, under the pretence of guarding the ſtates of Scotland, did not a little contribute to inſpire them with terror. However, the regents, to give the people ſome ſatisfaction, demanded of Edward letters patent, declaring that the judgment of the proceſs ſhould be given in Scotland; and Edward, looking upon this ſtep, as a ſort of approbation of his ſovereignty, becauſe the demand was expreſſed, in very humble terms, readily condeſcended to their petition, and ordered the deſired letters to be diſpatched, immediately.

Act. Pub. The affair of the ſovereignty being, thus, concluded, tho' without the intervention of the ſtates, the examination of the titles of the ſeveral candidates for the crown came on, that the king might know the grounds of their reſpective pretenſions; and it was agreed among them, that Baliol and Comyn, as well for themſelves as for all the competitors, ſhould nominate 40 perſons, and Robert Bruce, 40 others, to hear and diſcuſs their reſpective rights; that, to theſe 80, the king ſhould add about 24 more; and that theſe commiſſioners, after a mature examination, ſhould make their report to the king.

June 5. In the aſſembly of the 5th of June, nothing more was done, than giving in the names of the examiners that were choſen.

June 6. The next day, the king ordered the examiners to fix the time and place of meeting, for their examination; who unanimouſly agreed upon Berwick, a town in Scotland, ſituated on the Tweed, for the place; but, not agreeing on the day, the king appointed it to be on the 2d of Auguſt following.

June 11. There was another aſſembly at Norham, where the regents of Scotland reſigned their patents, and the governors of the caſtles their commiſſions, to the king, to be diſpoſed of, at his pleaſure; who received, but reſtored them again, with the neceſſary alterations, to ſhew, that they governed, in his name; and, the ſame day, he made the biſhop of Caithneſs chancellor of Scotland, joining with him Walter de Hamondeſham, an Engliſhman, one of his clerks, as an aſſociate.

June 12. On the 12th of June, Edward iſſued out orders to all, that held any office in Scotland, to come and ſwear fealty to him; which was done, that day, by all that were preſent. The candidates took the ſame oath; and then the aſſembly broke up, till the day appointed for their meeting at Berwick.

Tho' it was ſtill a good while to that day, Edward came, quickly after, and, on the 3d of July, made the following proteſtation: "That, "altho' he had granted, that the affair of the "ſucceſſion ſhould be tried, in Scotland, he "did not think himſelf obliged to the like con-"deſcenſion, if the ſame caſe ſhould happen "again, or on any other occaſion." In all appearance, the aſſembly, before whom he made this declaration, was neither full, nor authoriſed to receive it; ſince the examiners were not to meet at Berwick, till the 3d of Auguſt, that is, a month after. 1290.

On the day appointed, the examining commiſſioners met at Berwick, in the preſence of the king, and received the petitions of the competitors, in the following order; but becauſe theſe petitions, containing the grounds of their pretenſions, were founded on the genealogy of the royal family of Scotland, I ſhall preſent the reader with a view of this genealogy, tho' ſuppoſititious, without which it would be difficult to underſtand their reſpective rights. Auguſt 3. Act. Pub.

Florence, earl of Holland, alledged, that he was deſcended from Ada, daughter to prince Henry, and ſiſter of the kings, Malcolm IV. and William.

Patrick de Dunbar, earl of March, aſſerted, that he was ſprung from Ilda, daughter of king William, and ſiſter of Alexander II.

William de Veſcy founded his claim upon his deſcent from Margaret, daughter of king William.

Robert de Pynkeny pretended, that he was the iſſue of Margaret, daughter of prince Henry, and ſiſter of the kings, Malcolm and William.

Nicholas de Soules affirmed, that, being grandſon to Alexander II, by Marjory, his ſecond daughter, and the race of Margaret, eldeſt ſiſter to his mother, being extinct, he was, of courſe, the next heir to the crown.

Patrick Galythly founded his pretenſions on his being grandſon to king William, by Henry, his ſon; but, probably, Henry, Patrick's father, was a baſtard, ſince, had he been legitimate, his ſon's title could not have been diſputed.

Roger de Mandeville claimed the crown, as the ſon of Alfrica, king William's daughter.

John Haſtings inſiſted, that the kingdom of Scotland, being diviſible, ought to be parted among the deſcendants of the three daughters of David, earl of Huntingdon, the youngeſt of whom was his mother.

Robert de Ros ſaid, that he was a deſcendant from Iſabella, eldeſt daughter to king William, and ſiſter of Alexander II.

John Comyn derived his claim higher, viz. from Donald, formerly king of Scotland.

John Baliol repreſented, that he was ſon to Deverguld, eldeſt daughter of Margaret, the eldeſt of the daughters of David, earl of Huntingdon; and that, the race of king William being extinct, he was the next heir to the late queen. It muſt be remarked, that he took it for granted, that Marjory and Iſabella, eldeſt daughters of Alexander II, died, without iſſue, though Nicholas de Soules alledged, that he was ſon to the former; and that, overlooking Henry, Iſabella, Ilda, Margaret, and Alfrica, children of king William, from whom Galythly, Ros, Dunbar, Veſcy, and Mandeville profeſſed themſelves deſcendants, he proceeded to the family of David, younger brother to king William. His ſilence gives occaſion to preſume, that either theſe 1290. competitors had falſly ſet forth their genealogies, or, that thoſe, from whom they deſcended, were baſtards; otherwiſe their iſſue would have had a better title to the crown, than David's; and, accordingly, the ſequel will ſhew, that their pretenſions were entirely diſregarded. It may be farther obſerved, that this favours what is related by Buchanan, that Edward engaged eight candidates, beſides Baliol and Bruce, to demand the crown, on purpoſe to puzzle the cauſe; and, indeed, it is obvious, that, of all the competitors, Baliol excepted, there was not one that had the leaſt right to the ſucceſſion, ſuppoſing, as is very likely, that they were deſcended from baſtards, and that Nicholas de Soules had not truly ſet forth his genealogy.

Robert Bruce aſſerted, that he was, one degree, nearer than Baliol, being grandſon of David, ; whereas his rival was only grandſon of his daughter; that, indeed, Deverguld was in the ſame degree with himſelf, but could not claim the crown, becauſe it was the cuſtom to prefer the males to the females, in the ſame degree of conſanguinity. To ſtrengthen his title, he added that Alexander II. declared him his heir, provided he died, without iſſue, and offered to prove it, by living witneſſes; and he alſo maintained, that Alexander III. always conſider'd him, as his preſumptive heir, and declared it to ſuch, as were his familiars.

All theſe petitions being read, the king, according to the journal, willing to give the commiſſioners time to examine them, appointed the 2d of June of the following year 1292, for another aſſembly; wherein the candidates might more fully urge their reſpective rights.

I ſhall make uſe of this interval, to examine, as briefly as poſſible, the grounds on which Edward founded his right of ſovereignty over Scotland; which we find, at large, in a memorial drawn, by the order of that prince; and, becauſe this memorial is frequently advanced by the Engliſh hiſtorians, as containing ſufficient proofs of the right of ſovereignty, enjoyed immemorially by England, over Scotland, it will be requiſite to give an abſtract of it, that the reader may be perfectly informed, concerning this matter.

Proofs alledged by EDWARD I, to eſtabliſh the RIGHT of SOVEREIGNTY of the KINGS of ENGLAND over SCOTLAND.

IN the year 901, Edward the Elder, king of England, ſubjected to his dominion the kings of the Scots, Humbrians, and Welch *; as is evident, from the Hiſtories of Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden, and William of Malmsbury.

In 921, the king of Scotland, Reginald king of the Danes, the Engliſh of Northumberland, the king of Wales and his ſubjects, elected Edward the Elder, for their father and lord, and entered into a ſtrict alliance with him. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden. 1291.

In 924, the ſame Edward reigned over all the inhabitants of Great-Britain, Engliſh, Scots, Cumbrians, Danes, and Britons. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

In 926, king Athelſtan, ſon to Edward, vanquiſhed Conſtantine, king of Scotland, with the king of the Wenti, and forced them to fly; and, after the victory, they took an oath to him, and concluded an alliance with him, at Emothe, July the 4th. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

It appears, from the Hiſtories of William of Malmsbury, Henry of Huntingdon, and Ralph de Diceto, that Athelſtan compelled Conſtantine, king of Scotland, to quit his crown; tho' he afterwards gave him leave to reſume it, on condition that he ſhould hold it of the kings of England, ſaying, "It was more glorious to "make kings, than to be one.

In 934, the ſame Athelſtan vanquiſhed Conſtantine, who had revolted, and ravaged Scotland, as far as Dunfred; and Conſtantine gave him his ſon, as an hoſtage, with great preſents, a peace being concluded between them. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden, Henry de Huntingdon, Ralph de Diceto.

In 937, Eugenius king of Cumberland, and Conſtantine, king of Scotland, met Athelſtan, at Dacor, and ſubmitted to his mercy; and Athelſtan, commanding Conſtantine to cauſe his ſon to be baptiſed, ſtood godfather himſelf. William of Malmsbury.

In 940, Edmund ſucceeded Athelſtan, who reigned four years; and the Scots never revolted, during that ſpace.

In 947, Edred, Edmund's brother and ſucceſſor, having vanquiſhed the Northumbrians, carried his arms into Scotland; but the Scots, being terrified, ſubmitted, without reſiſtance, and ſwore the fealty that was due to him; and Edred placed over them a king, named Yric. Marianus Scotus, William of Malmſbury, Henry of Huntingdon.

In 955, Edwy was king of England, after Edred, and reigned four years, without any revolt of the Scots.

In 997, Edgar, king of England, having ſummoned to his court Keneth, king of Scotland, Malcolm of Cumberland, and ſix other kings, made them row in his barge, ſteered by himſelf; who is reported to have ſaid, on that occaſion, that his ſucceſſors might, now, boaſt of being really kings of England, ſince they enjoyed ſo great a prerogative.

The ſame Edgar being informed, that Keneth had reviled him, ſent for him to his court, and, walking with him into the fields, offered him the choice of two ſwords, to fight with him; but Keneth refuſing it, and caſting himſelf at Edgar's feet, implored his pardon, which he obtained. Marianus Scotus, Roger of Hoveden, William of Malmsbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Ralph de Diceto.

* In the original, Stregewallorum, the ſame who are termed in the Saxon Annals, Strædledweallas; the people that inhabited, about Galway in Scotland, and, being continually haraſſed with the incurſions of the Picts and Scots, retired into Flintſhire, about the river Clwyd. Vid. Camden in Flintſhire.

The

1291. The Scots never revolted, during the reigns of Edward the Martyr, Ethelred II, and Edmund Ironſide.

In 1017, Canute the Great, at his return from Rome, in the 15th year of his reign, eaſily ſubdued Scotland, which had revolted; and king Malcolm was ſubject to him. Canute was king of England, Denmark, Norway, and Scotland. Marianus Scotus, William of Malmsbury, Henry of Huntingdon, Ralph de Diceto.

We do not find, that the Scots revolted, during the reigns of Harold II. and Hardicanute.

In the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, Siward, earl of Northumberland, vanquiſhed Mackbeth, king of Scotland, and ſlew him; and then, by the command of king Edward, he ſet Malcolm, ſon of the king of Cumberland, on the throne of Scotland. Ibid.

William of Malmsbury affirms, "King "Edward gave the kingdom of Scotland to "Malcolm, ſon of the king of Cumberland, "to hold it of the crown of England."

There is nothing concerning the Scots, whilſt Harold II. ſat on the throne of England.

William the Baſtard having marched into Scotland, in the ſixth year of his reign, Malcolm met him, at Aberneth, where he did him homage, or became his man. Chron. of St. Albans.

The ſame Chronicle relates, that William returned into England, having received the homage of Malcolm and ſome hoſtages.

In the third year of William Rufus, Malcolm revolting and ravaging Northumberland, William, accompanied by Robert, his brother, led his army into Scotland, and entered into a treaty with Malcolm, on condition that Malcolm ſhould obey him, as he obeyed William, his father. Marianus Scotus, Roger de Hoveden.

Henry of Huntingdon ſays, that Malcolm, ſeized with fear, became king William's man *.

The ſame king dethroned David of Scotland, and placed Edgar, Malcolm's ſon, in his room.

Edgar, king of Scotland, dying, Alexander I, his brother, ſucceeded him, by the conſent of Henry I, king of England. Henry of Huntingdon.

Stephen, king of England, demanded homage of David, king of Scotland; and, upon his refuſing it, becauſe he had taken an oath to Matilda, Henry, his ſon, did homage to king Stephen. Marianus Scotus, Henry of Huntingdon, Roger de Hoveden.

1291. William king of Scotland, David earl of Huntingdon, his brother, with the earls and barons of Scotland, did homage to Henry II, king of England, and ſwore fealty † to him.

In 1174, William, king of Scotland, ravaging England, was taken priſoner and delivered to king Henry II, who releaſed him, on condition that he ſhould do him homage, for the kingdom of Scotland.

'As the treaty, between theſe two kings, 'has been, already, mentioned, it is needleſs 'to repeat it, here; ſince it is ſufficient to ſay, 'in a word, that William, to procure his li'berty, was forced to promiſe to do full ho'mage to Henry II, for the kingdom of Scot'land, and performed his word. This is the 'ſtrongeſt proof, in favour of Edward, and, 'accordingly, he chiefly inſiſts upon it, in the 'memorial; entering into a long detail, which 'amounts to what is, above, related.'

It does not appear, that the Scots revolted, in the reign of Richard; but, on the contrary, William came to Canterbury, to do homage to that prince.

'Edward wiſely overlooks the letters patent 'of Richard I, by which he relinquiſhed the 'ſovereignty of the kingdom of Scotland.'

The ſame William came and did homage to king John, at Lincoln, and ſwore fealty to him, upon the croſs of Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury. Roger de Hoveden.

The ſame king John would have made war upon William, becauſe, without his conſent, he married his daughter to the earl of Boulogne; as is evident, from the Chronicle of the monaſtery of Bridlington. The Chronicle of the abbey of Kyngeſwode likewiſe affirms, that William gave his two daughters, in hoſtage, to king John.

Henry III, in the 35th year of his reign, came to York, to marry his daughter to Alexander, king of Scotland; where the latter did homage to the king of England; and the guardianſhip of the young king, with the regency of the kingdom, was conferred on Robert de Ros and John Baliol, by the advice of the great men of both nations. Chron. of St. Albans.

To corroborate all theſe proofs, Edward heaped together ſome paſſages, extracted from divers charters and ſeveral bulls, and from a book, intitled, The Life of St. John of Beverly.

In a charter of Edgar, king of Scotland, granted to the church of Durham, that prince owns, that he holds the lands of Londoney, and the whole kingdom of Scotland, by the grant of William, king of England, his lord.

In another charter, William, king of Scot-

* i. e. did him homage; the form of which is, in the ſecond ſtatute, 17 Edw. II. When a freeman ſhall do homage, he ſhall hold his hands together, between the hands of his lord, and ſhall ſay, on his knees: "I become "your man, from this day forth, for life, for member, and for worldly honour, and ſhall owe you my faith, "for the land I hold of you, ſaving the faith I owe to our ſovereign lord the king, and to my other lords." The "eccleſiaſticks, inſtead of, "I become your man," ſay, "I do you homage, and to you ſhall be faithful and "loyal."

† Fealty, from the Latin, Fidelitas; the form of it is in anno 14 Edw. I. Stat. 2. When a freeman ſhall do fealty, he ſhall hold his right-hand over the book, and ſay: "Hear you, my lord, that I A. B. ſhall be to you "faithful and true, and ſhall owe my fealty to you, for the land that I hold of you, and truly ſhall do you the "cuſtoms and ſervices that I ought to do you, at the terms aſſigned; ſo help me God, and all the ſaints." He, that holdeth land, by this oath only, holdeth in the freeſt manner that any Engliſh ſubject may hold.

land,

1291. land, grants to John, king of England, his dear lord, the power of marrying Alexander, his ſon, prince of Scotland, to whom he pleaſed; and he alſo promiſes, that, whatever happens, he and prince Alexander, his ſon, will be true to Henry, ſon to John, as their ſovereign lord.

In a brief of Gregory IX, that pope ordered the barons of Scotland, to join with the king of England againſt their own prince, if the latter ſhould violate the treaty made with Henry II.

The ſame pope, in another brief, commanded the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Carliſle, to perſuade the king of Scotland to obſerve the treaty.

In another, directed to the king of Scotland, the ſame pope told him, that, as he was liegeman of the king of England, and had ſworn fealty to him, he ought not to attempt any thing againſt him.

Pope Clement, writing to Henry, king of England, in behalf of the biſhop of St. Andrews, deprived of his ſee by the king of Scotland, requires him, among other things, to warn, exhort, and, if neceſſary, to compel that prince, by the power committed to him, to reſtore the biſhop.

The proof, taken from the Life of St. John of Beverly, the author of which is unknown, is, as follows: King Athelſtan, carrying his arms into Scotland, meets, by the way, certain people, who were juſt cured of blindneſs and lameneſs, by the interceſſion of St. John of Beverly; upon which, he reſolves to go and perform his devotions, in the church where the body of this ſaint lay; and, having ſaid his prayers, he left his dagger on the altar, as a pledge of what he had promiſed the ſaint, if his undertaking proved ſucceſsful. After this, entering Scotland, St. John, appearing to him, aſſures him of his aſſiſtance; upon which, Athelſtan attacks the Scots, and gains a ſignal victory; and he afterwards ſubdued the whole kingdom of Scotland, and remained there, three years. In his return to England, a great rock ſtanding in his way, he beſought God, through the mediation of St. John of Beverly, to give him ſome ſign, by which the ſpectators might know, that the Scots were juſtly ſubdued by the Engliſh, and the conquered kingdom ought, for ever, to pay tribute to his ſucceſſors; and, drawing his ſword, he ſtruck the rock, which yielded like butter, and made a hole in it, an ell deep; an evident ſign, the author adds, that Scotland was ſubjected by the Engliſh.

Edward cited ſome other teſtimonies, but without naming his authors, to ſhew, that the lords of Galloway had done homage to the kings of England.

In 1185, Roland, lord of Galloway, ſubmittted to the king of England, fearing, as it is preſumed, the power of that monarch, who was advancing with a great army, to make war upon him.

Henry II, king of England, having received the homage of Alan of Galloway, and of David, brother of king William, returned into his dominions. 1291.

In the 22d year of Henry II, Gilbert, ſon of Fergus, lord of Galloway, accompanied the king of Scotland into England; where he became liege-man to Henry, the father, and ſwore fealty to him; after which, to gain his good-will, he gave him 1000 marks of ſilver, and his ſon, Duncan, in hoſtage.

Theſe are the proofs alledged by Edward, to juſtify his right of ſovereignty over Scotland; and, as it paſſes for certain, among ſeveral Engliſh hiſtorians, that Edward undeniably proved his right, from antient chronicles, I imagined, that the reader would not be diſpleaſed to be able to judge, for himſelf without being obliged to conſult the writers of both parties; wherefore, I have retrenched none of theſe proofs, though ſome of them are far enough from being evident.

Certainly, it furniſhes matter for admiration, that the Scots ſhould have nothing to object to theſe proofs, the greateſt part of which are very weak, if not entirely trifling; but it muſt be conſidered, that they were, in England, overawed by the king's preſence; and that Bruce and Baliol, who were very powerful, exerted themſelves, to prevent any incidents, that might retard the deciſion of the main affair. However, ſince Edward founded his pretenſions on the proofs produced in the memorial, and the homage, required of the kings of Scotland, was the ſole cauſe of the following war, between the two nations; it will be requiſite, to ſet this matter in a true light, to ſubjoin what the Scots might have objected againſt the proofs, if weighty motives had not induced them to keep ſilence, and even what they actually did object, at a more favourable juncture.

Firſt of all, they might ſay, that it was neceſſary to diſtinguiſh two things, which Edward induſtriouſly confounded, in this memorial; viz. the ſuperiority of the forces of the kings of England, and their frequent advantages over the Scots, from the pretended acknowledgment made by the kings of Scotland, that they held their crown of the kings of England. The latter was the principal point in diſpute; and yet the proofs, advanced in the memorial, chiefly relate to the former.

2. It was not ſufficient to prove, in general, that the kings of Scotland were often compelled to make diſadvantageous treaties, and afterwards ſwear to them; but the acts themſelves ſhould have been alledged, containing an expreſs acknowledgment of the ſovereignty of the kings of England over Scotland. It was farther neceſſary to ſhew the continuation of this acknowledgment, by the homages of the kings of Scotland, upon every new acceſſion to the thrones of both kingdoms, according to the conſtant cuſtom practiſed by vaſſals, for many ages; whereas this was not done by Edward.

3. When Edgar, king of Scotland, owned, in his charter to the church of Durham, that he held his kingdom of William Rufus, that acknowledged

1291. acknowledgment did not impoft a confeſſion, that the crown of Scotland was dependent on that of England; for it was only a declaration, that, by the king of England's aid, he had aſcended the throne of Scotland, ſeized by an uſurper, as appears, in the Hiſtory.

Anderſon's Eſſay. 4. This very charter, one of Edward's chief proofs, is affirmed to be a forgery, by the Scotch writers, and oppoſed with ſuch ſtrong chronological arguments, as ſeem to demand our aſſent.

5. It muſt be confeſs'd, William, king of Scotland, did full homage, for his whole kingdom, to Henry II; but it is no leſs certain, that it was in conſequence of a treaty, wherein that homage was expreſly ſtipulated, for the captive king's liberty; and, therefore, it is manifeſt, that he was not ſubject to it, before, ſince there was need of obliging him to it, by a treaty. Moreover, this homage, which was only the reſult of William's captivity, was not continued by his ſucceſſors; for Richard, ſon to Henry, entirely renounced it, as we have ſeen, in the reign of that prince.

6. As for the reſt of the proofs, which are ſtill weaker, they are taken from Engliſh writers, or ſubjects of England, who, for the moſt part, lived, long after the events they relate; and they are founded on ambiguous expreſſions, which do not neceſſarily bear the ſenſe, contended for by Edward.

7. Could Edward produce no other proofs, but the teſtimonies of ſome partial hiſtorians? Why did he not alledge the homages of the antient kings of Scotland, as he did that of William to Henry II? If his buſineſs had been only to prove the homage, for the earldom of Huntingdon, he would have had no occaſion to rummage the hiſtorians; ſince his own records would have ſupplied him with proofs; and what reaſon can be aſſigned, that it was more difficult to preſerve the homages, for the kingdom of Scotland? If the king of France could have proved his ſovereignty over Guienne, and the earldom of Ponthieu, only by paſſages taken from French authors, in all appearance, Edward would never have ſubmitted to do him homage, for theſe two provinces.

8. The Scots might object, that, when Henry III. demanded the king of Scotland's aſſiſtance, againſt the earl of Leiceſter, he owned, in expreſs terms, that this aid was given him, out of friendſhip, and not out of duty.

9. The ſame Henry required Alexander III, his ſon-in-law, to do homage, for the kingdom of Scotland; but Alexander, refuſing it, would only do it, for the lands he held in England.

10. Edward himſelf being deſirous, that the ſame Alexander III, his brother-in-law, ſhould aſſiſt at his coronation, gave him letters patent; acknowledging, that he aſſiſted at the ſolemnity, purely out of friendſhip, and to do him honour.

11. When the ſame Alexander did homage to Edward, he made an authentick declaration, that he did not intend to do homage, for the kingdom of Scotland, but only for the lands he held in England; and his homage was accepted, with that limitation. 1291.

12. The Scots might farther add, that the homage done, for the lands in England, tho' paid by a Scottiſh king, had not any relation to the kingdom of Scotland; as the kings of England, in doing homage to the kings of France, did not deſign to render the kingdom of England dependent on the crown of France, but only to own the dependency of the lands they held in that kingdom.

13. Laſtly, homage was frequently paid, for penſions; for example, the earls of Flanders did it to the kings of England, on that account; as did the earl of Savoy, for a penſion of 200 marks. To ſhew, therefore, that the kings of Scotland barely did homage to the kings of England, was no proof of the point in diſpute; for it ſhould have been alſo proved, that theſe homages were done, for the kingdom of Scotland, either by letters patent of the kings of Scotland themſelves, or by the inſtruments of the homages well atteſted, according to the uſual cuſtom; but Edward produced no other act, except that of William's forced homage, renounced by king Richard.

As to the extracts from the papal bulls, they could amount to no proof; ſince the Scots acknowledged, that their kings were vaſſals to England, for the earldom of Huntingdon, and other lands, on the frontiers; but they denied them to be ſo, for the kingdom of Scotland, which the bulls did not affirm.

I ſhall ſay nothing to the paſſage taken from the Life of St. John of Beverly; for it may be fairly preſumed, that Edward did not ſeriouſly intend to draw a proof from ſo ill atteſted, or rather ſo ridiculous a miracle, and from a hiſtory, whoſe author is unknown.

Theſe anſwers are not arguments invented by me, for the Scots; but they are, for the moſt part, the ſame that Boniface VIII. uſed, in his letter to Edward, to diſſuade him from any attempt on Scotland, as will be ſeen, hereafter. Let us, now, return to the deciſion of the affair of the ſucceſſion *.

1292. The ſequel of the affair of the ſucceſſion. June 12. Act. Pub. On the day appointed, all the candidates, with the 80 examiners, repaired to Berwick, where Edward was preſent; and, at the firſt meeting, the king of Norway's ambaſſadors, appearing, demanded the crown, for the king their maſter, father of the late queen. Their petition being received, after a recognition of the king of England's direct dominion over Scotland, thoſe of the other competitors were read, each in its turn, and the commiſſioners entered upon the examination of them; but Edward, according to the journal, conſidering that this method would be very tedious, and, conſequently, prejudicial to Scotland, moved, and his motion was approved, that the rights

* Whilſt Edward was in France, in 1287, he made a vow to go to the Holy-Land, and received the croſs, from the hands of the pope's legate, at Bourdeaux; purſuant to which, pope Nicholas IV. granted him, by a bull, dated at Orvieto, March 18, 1291, the tenths of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, for ſix years. 1292. and titles of John Baliol and Robert Bruce ſhould be, firſt, examined, without prejudice to the others, which ſhould be, afterwards, diſcuſſed.

A queſtion is propoſed by Edward, and left undecided.

The firſt queſtion, Edward propoſed, was, By what laws and cuſtoms, judgment was to be given? upon which, he demanded the previous advice of the examining commiſſioners. It was impoſſible for them to agree, in deciding this point; and, after long debates, they told the king, that they could not give him their advice, without farther deliberation, deſiring him to add to their number the 24 Engliſh, according to the agreement. The Engliſh commiſſioners reported to the king, that the Scots were ſo divided, in opinion, about their own laws, that it was very difficult to determine ſo diſputable a point; adding, that they durſt not themſelves, on that account, give him any advice, upon ſo intricate a queſtion. Edward, by reaſon of theſe difficulties, allowed a longer time; appointing the 14th of October following, for the day of the firſt aſſembly *.

He propoſes three queſtions. Octob. 14.

The commiſſioners meeting, at the time prefixed, Edward propoſed three queſtions: 1. By what laws and cuſtoms, judgment was to be given? 2. How he was to proceed, if the cuſtoms of England and Scotland ſhould be oppoſite, or uncertain? 3. Whether judgment was to be given, about the kingdom of Scotland, otherwiſe than concerning earldoms, baronies, and other fees of the crown of England? The examiners, who could not agree, upon the firſt queſtion, in Auguſt, were unanimous, in October; to which they replied, that, if there were any certain laws, or cuſtoms, in the king's dominions, they ought to be the rule of his proceedings. They made anſwer to the ſecond, that if, in his territories, there was no certain law, he might eſtabliſh a new one; and, to the third, that the kingdom of Scotland was to be judged, in the ſame manner as other indiviſible fees. It is obvious, that theſe preliminary queſtions, and their anſwers, tended only to eſtabliſh Edward's right of ſovereignty; a right which he conſtantly ſuppoſed, without allowing it to be contradicted.

The reaſons alledged by Robert Bruce.

Edward, upon theſe deciſions, ordered Bruce and Baliol to be called, and asked, Whether they had any thing to offer, to ſtrengthen the reaſons alledged in their petitions? They replied, that they deſired to add ſomething farther by word of mouth; and Bruce began, firſt, whoſe reaſons were confined to theſe four. 1. That the ſucceſſion of a crown ought to be ſettled, by the natural right of kings, and not by the laws common to ſubjects; and, according to natural right, the neareſt ought to ſucceed. 2. That, though private inheritances were diviſible, and the eldeſt had ſome privilege, by the laws obſerved among ſubjects, it was otherwiſe, with reſpect to a kingdom to which the next heir ought to ſucceed, without any diviſion. 3. He maintained, that, in Scotland, the crown had been adjudged for the collateral branch, in preference to the direct; and the ſucceſſion, in the family of the eldeſt, was not ſo eſtabliſhed, as to be juſtly prejudicial to him, ſince, in that very kingdom, brothers had, ſeveral times, been preferred to ſons. 4. He took it for granted, that, though he was in the ſame degree, as Deverguld, he had a right to ſucceed, becauſe he was the next male heir. 1292.

The reaſons and replies of John Baliol.

John Baliol, anſwering, in his turn, founded his right on the genealogy of the royal family, alledging that he was deſcended from the eldeſt of the daughters of David, earl of Huntingdon; whereas Bruce ſprung only from the ſecond. In anſwer to the reaſons of his competitor, he maintained, that, according to the cuſtom, as well of England as Scotland, the deſcendant of the eldeſt daughter, though more remote, was preferable to the nearer coming from the younger; and that, as to natural right, and the right of kings, the deciſion of it belonged to the king of England, as immemorial ſovereign and direct lord of Scotland. As for the inſtances, produced by Robert, of brothers preferred to ſons, he affirmed, that, whenever it happened, in Scotland, it was done, by way of uſurpation and violence; and the kings of England, as ſovereigns, rectified it, by placing the ſon on the throne; producing, in proof of his aſſertion, the example of Edgar, whom William Ruſus put in poſſeſſion of the crown, uſurped by Donald. Laſtly, he ſaid, that, admitting what Robert advanced to be inconteſtable, it could not be of any advantage to his cauſe; but I ſhould be too tedious, if I recited all the arguments, anſwers, and replies of both parties; and what has been, already, offer'd, will, I hope, ſufficiently ſhew the grounds of their pretenſions.

The queſtion, propoſed to the examiners, Act. Pub.

This affair being, thus, cleared, and the reaſons of the two candidates examined, the king put the queſtion, as follows: "Whether the more remote, by one degree in "ſucceſſion, deſcending from the eldeſt ſiſter, "ought, according to the laws and cuſtoms "of both kingdoms, to exclude the nearer, "by a degree, deſcending from the ſecond "ſiſter?" The commiſſioners unanimouſly replied, that, according to the laws and cuſtoms of both kingdoms, the deſcendants of the eldeſt daughter ought to have the preference. It might be juſtly demanded, to what purpoſe, then, was the diſcuſſion of the preliminary queſtions, ſince the laws of both kingdoms were ſo expreſs, in favour of the principal, if it had not been obſerved, that they were ſubſervient to the private intereſts of Edward? However, notwithſtanding the formal deciſion of the commiſſioners, the king, to demonſtrate that he acted, without paſſion and partiality, cauſed the ſame queſtion to be, again, long debated, in his preſence, and appointed the 6th of November is decided, in favour of Baliol.

* In the original, Parliamento, or parliament. The king promiſed, that he would ſummon ſome of the greateſt and moſt diſcreet perſons of his kingdom to be then preſent; and, that he would, in the interim, diſpatch meſſengers to the moſt learned men abroad, for their advice on this point. Rymer's Fœd.

1292. vember following, to pronounce the final sentence.

Edward gives sentence against Bruce. Nov. 6.

On that day, Edward solemnly pronounced, that Robert Bruce's pretensions were groundless; and that the laws allowed him no right to the crown of Scotland; but, as the exclusion of Bruce did not necessarily imply the admission of Baliol, since there were other candidates, the king ordered the examiners to hear the rest of the parties. Robert Bruce, being excluded by this sentence, declared, that he would justify, in another form, his pretensions to part of the kingdom; and then he presented his petition, which was received.

The demand of John Hastings.

The affair between Baliol and Bruce being decided, John Hastings stood up and asserted, that Scotland, being a fee of England, had no more privileges than other fees, which were all partible; inferring, from thence, that the kingdom of Scotland ought to be divided among the descendants of the daughters of David, earl of Huntingdon, the youngest of whom was his mother. He was, immediately, seconded by Robert Bruce, who said, that he claimed a third part of the kingdom, as son and heir to David's second daughter; upon which, Edward propos'd these two questions: 1. Whether the kingdom of Scotland was a partible fee? 2. Or, whether, not being so, the escheats and acquisitions, made by the kings of Scotland, ought to follow the law of common inheritances? The unanimous advice of the king's council, and the commissioners, was, that the kingdom of Scotland was an indivisible fee; and that the king's acquisitions, in the kingdom itself, ceased to be partible, the moment he entered into the possession of them; and then Edward fixed the 17th of November, to pass sentence.

All the other candidates drop their pretensions. Nov. 17.

The commissioners being met, on the day appointed, the king order'd all the candidates to be asked, What they had to offer, in defence of their rights? The ambassadors of Norway, Florence, earl of Holland, William de Vescy, Patrick de Dunbar, William de Ros, Robert de Pynkeny, Nicholas de Soules, and Patrick Galythly declared, that they dropp'd the prosecution of their claims, and withdrew their petitions; upon which, the king pronounced, that they had no pretensions to the crown of Scotland. John Comyn and Roger de Mandeville, not appearing to maintain their claims, were also rejected; and the king pronounced, that John Hastings and Robert Bruce had no right to the third part claimed by each, because the kingdom of Scotland was an indivisible fee.

None remained, except Baliol, who, being without a competitor, was acknowledged, as the only person that had a right to the crown; and, accordingly, Edward adjudged, that he should be put in possession of the kingdom, saving, however, to himself and successors, the right of prosecuting their pretensions to the same kingdom, whenever they thought it expedient *. Then, addressing himself to the new king, he said, he should take care to govern his people, with equity, in such a manner, that, by reason of injustice, or on any other account, he should not oblige his sovereign to exert his right to redress the grievances; and he appointed him the Thursday following, to swear fealty, and Christmas-day next, to do his homage, at Newcastle. 1292.

Baliol swears fealty to Edward. Nov. 20. Act. Pub. M. West.

The process being over, Edward dispatched all necessary orders to put Baliol in possession of the kingdom; and the new king swore fealty to him, on the 20th of November †. In the oath, he own'd the sovereignty of the king of England over Scotland, in very express and submissive terms, causing an authentick act of the same to be drawn up; and his installation was performed, at Scone, with the usual formalities, all the Scotch lords swearing fealty to him, except Robert Bruce, who was absent; after which, he came to Newcastle upon Tyne, where he did homage to the king, in such expressions, that it was impossible to add any thing, to denote, more fully, his dependence ‡.

Complaints of the Scots against Edward.

Having seen what the journal, made by Edward's order, relates, with respect to this famous process, it is but reasonable to hear the Scots, in their turn. They pretend, that Edward acted very unjustly, in the whole course of this affair, and that his conduct was a continual series of artifice, corruption, and violence; that, indeed, he had, before, some pretension to the sovereignty of Scotland, but it was so weak, that he would never have prosecuted it, if the state of the kingdom had not furnished him with an opportunity; and that, being chosen judge, or rather umpire, of the difference between the two competitors, he abused that trust, to serve his own ends, at the expence of the liberty of the Scots. They agree to the facts related in the journal, but affirm, that, by promises and threats, he privately engaged the commissioners blindly to follow his directions; and that, his principal view being to make the person, who should be declared king of Scotland, a vassal of the crown of England, he intimated to the two candidates, that they had nothing to hope for, unless they would, first, acknowledge him, for sovereign of the kingdom. They add, that, to bring them to this acknowledgment, Edward himself raised up all the other competitors,

1292. tors, who entirely depended upon him, on purpoſe to create difficulties, which might convince Bruce and Baliol, how much they ſtood in need of his favour. It is no wonder, that the candidates ſo readily complied with all his demands; for the two principal were afraid, that their oppoſition would deprive them of the crown, and the reſt put in their claims, purely, in obedience to his orders, or for his pleaſure. It is farther aſſerted, that, before the pretenſions of the parties came to be examined, Edward had reſolved to give the crown to Baliol, who was of an inferior genius to Bruce, and had leſs intereſt in the kingdom; for Buchanan ſays, that Edward, firſt, offered the crown to Bruce, if he would promiſe to do him homage; but that, upon his refuſing it, on that condition, Edward applied to Baliol, who, at once, accepted his propoſal. To the invincible argument, which the Engliſh pretend to infer, from Robert's conſent, and hand, to the acts and declarations made by the competitors, before they preſented their petitions, the Scots reply, It was not impoſſible but Robert might, at firſt, refuſe the crown, on the condition required; tho' afterwards, perceiving how prejudicial his refuſal might be to him, he was induced to comply. Indeed, this did not much promote his cauſe; ſince his refuſal made a deeper impreſſion on Edward, than his compliance could efface. They add, It is evident, from the journal itſelf, made by Edward's order, that this prince favoured the cauſe of Baliol. Firſt of all, the arguments of Robert Bruce are exceedingly abridged, and may be ſaid to be diſadvantageouſly repreſented; and, in the next place, immediately after Robert's excluſion, all the reſt of the candidates, except Baliol, relinquiſhed their pretenſions, even to the ambaſſadors of Norway, who, very probably, had private orders to act, as directed by Edward. It does not appear, why the excluſion of Bruce ſhould ſo affect the other candidates, as to oblige them to withdraw their petitions; but it is eaſy to apprehend, that they were no longer neceſſary to the king's deſigns, after the judgment againſt Bruce. This plainly diſcovers the reaſon, why Edward ordered the examiners to begin, with diſcuſſing the rights of Bruce and Baliol; becauſe, that affair being decided, he had no farther occaſion for the others. The affected abſence of Baliol is alſo remarked, on the day that the other competitors acknowledged the ſovereignty of the king of England, that he might not be afterwards reproached, when on the throne, as the firſt who introduced that innovation, having, by this means, a plauſible excuſe, that he only followed thoſe that went before him. It is affirmed, that Edward was more apprehenſive of Bruce than of Baliol, and, in the whole courſe of this procedure, had continually a view to his own advantage; and that the ſole end of all his proceedings was to eſtabliſh an ill-grounded right, which he could never have ſupported, at any other juncture. If this right had been inconteſtable, wherefore, did he take ſo many precautions, to eſtabliſh it? To what purpoſe, were ſo many acknowledgments and oaths required, 1292. from ſome private perſons, when the ſtates of Scotland, if we may believe the journal, did not alledge the leaſt objection to his pretenſions? Why ſuch a heap of arguments, moſt of which are ſo weak, to cauſe a ſovereignty, according to him, indiſputable, to be acknowledged? If the ſtates of Scotland made no reply to Edward's firſt propoſition, it is manifeſt, that their ſilence muſt have proceeded from a motive of fear; nor could it be inferred, from it, that they owned this ſovereignty, ſince they had never, before, made the like recognition. If, by their ſilence, they deſign'd to give their approbation to Edward's pretenſions, why did he not require from them an authentick declaration, as well as from the candidates? Was it their province to decide ſo important a queſtion, and not rather that of the ſtates, then actually aſſembled? In a word, the ſequel ſufficiently ſhew'd, that the ſentiments of the people of Scotland were not agreeable to the declaration of the competitors, ſince they embraced the firſt opportunity, to ſhake off the yoke impoſed upon them. I ſhall add, here, in behalf of the Scots, that the Collection of the Publick Acts affords a convincing proof, that the kings of Scotland never did homage, for the whole kingdom, if we except that of William to Henry II. We find in the Collection, that, Edward's high chamberlain demanding, of Baliol, the fees due from the vaſſals, when they did homage, there was no precedent to be found; ſo that Edward was obliged to fix them himſelf to 20 l. ſterling, which was double the ſum paid by an earl, on the like occaſion; but, can it be imagined, that the fees ſhould not be ſettled, before, if this homage had been done ſo often, as Edward pretended? Act. Pub.

I have, hitherto, related the ſentiments of the Engliſh and Scots, with reſpect to this famous proceſs, as well concerning the crown itſelf, as the ſovereignty claimed by Edward; but, to ſet this affair in a true light, it will be requiſite to make ſome farther remarks. In the firſt place, Edward's whole conduct demonſtrates, that his intent, at firſt, was not to become maſter of Scotland, as Buchanan charges him, but only to render that kingdom dependent on England; in which he only copied after moſt of his predeceſſors; for, not to mention the Saxon and firſt Norman kings, Henry II. had no ſooner king William in his power, than he took advantage of that prince's misfortune, to compel him to do homage for his kingdom; and Henry III, Edward's father, would fain have extorted the ſame homage from Alexander III, though he could not ſucceed. It cannot, therefore, be inferr'd, from Edward's firſt proceedings, that he had formed the project of becoming maſter of Scotland; ſince he required only the direct dominion, without ever inſiſting on the poſſeſſion, concerning which, he was ſatisfied with making a bare declaration; for, if he had any ſuch intention, he might eaſily have found plauſible pretenſions, to place Engliſh garriſons and governors, in the places that were put into his hands.

1292. hands. He might have alledged, that all the Scots, being attached to ſome one of the candidates, the cuſtody of the caſtles could not be committed to perſons of their nation, without expoſing the kingdom to the danger of a civil war; but, inſtead of thus ſecuring the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, he confirmed all the governors, contenting himſelf with receiving their oath; a precaution which a prince, of his abilities, would, doubtleſs, have thought inſufficient, had he formed the project he is charged with. Beſides, a fair opportunity offered to put it in execution, by dividing the kingdom between the deſcendants of David's three daughters; by which means, he might have weakened the forces of the Scots; whereas he kept them united, in adjudging the crown to a ſingle perſon.

But, on the other hand, it can ſcarce be denied, that he deſigned to take advantage of this favourable juncture, to eſtabliſh his ſovereignty over Scotland; and ſo to accompliſh the project formed, but never fully executed, by his anceſtors. It is difficult to judge, whether Edward himſelf believed, that he had a lawful right; or, conſidering the circumſtances of Scotland, was willing to eſtabliſh a new one. The laſt ſeems to be the moſt probable, tho' men too frequently ſuffer themſelves to be prepoſſeſſed, in favour of what is for their advantage; and, indeed, to produce proofs, from hiſtories compiled by Engliſhmen, to ſhew, that Scotland was dependent on England, evidently demonſtrates, that they were the beſt he could find; but, after all, a homage, of this nature, ought certainly to be evinced by more authentick proofs. Is it not altogether incredible, if the kingdom of Scotland had been, immemorially, dependent on England, without any interruption, as he pretended to prove, that there could be found, in the ſovereign's archives, only one ſingle homage, in form, done by the kings of Scotland? Probably, therefore, without being fully convinced of his right, in order the more effectually to eſtabliſh it, he improved the opportunity which the preſent circumſtances of Scotland furniſhed him with, being very ſenſible, that there could be no oppoſition, ſince the two leading men had ſo much reaſon to cultivate his friendſhip; but I queſtion, whether the acquieſcence of the Scots was ſufficient to acquire him a new right. I ſhall leave the determination of this point to thoſe, who are verſed in ſuch matters; yet, in my opinion, this prince is not to be juſtified, who, by an ill-grounded ambition, kindled, between the two nations of Great-Britain, a war, which cauſed torrents of blood to be ſpilt on both ſides; and, if the event is of any weight, in affairs of this nature, the ſequel will ſhew, that, though God, at firſt, favoured Edward's deſigns, he permitted the projects of the Engliſh to prove, at laſt, abortive. Perhaps, I ſhall incur the cenſure of ſome, fond of this antient ſovereignty of England over Scotland, or of the perfections of Edward I; who will, doubtleſs, fancy, that what I have been ſaying is injurious to the glory of that prince, or the grandeur of England; but they, who are leſs prejudiced, will, I hope, do me more juſtice. It is time, now, to return to the Hiſtory, and relate the fatal effects of Edward's ambition, to both kingdoms. 1292.

1293. Edward's haughty behaviour towards the new king of Scotland.

If the deſire of a crown had cauſed Baliol to act, to the prejudice of Scotland, Edward's eagerneſs, to eſtabliſh the ſovereignty over that kingdom, led him to commit errors, deſtructive of his own real intereſts, as well as of thoſe of England. On the like occaſion, pope Innocent III. took particular care, not to let the Engliſh feel, too ſoon, the weight of his ſovereignty, acquired by king John's reſignation; inuring them to his yoke, by degrees, and inſenſibly, for fear of alarming them; but Edward, on the contrary, was ſcarce poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty over Scotland, before he made his vaſſals feel the whole weight of it; though this rigour, inſtead of conducing to keep that nation in ſubjection, ſerved only to excite their endeavours, to free themſelves from the galling yoke.

Whilſt Edward was at Newcaſtle, an opportunity offered, to exerciſe his new right, which he greedily embraced; for, an inhabitant of Berwick complaining to him of an injury done him, as he pretended, by ſome Engliſh commiſſioners ſent into Scotland, Edward ordered the affair to be tried in England, by his judges; but the council of Scotland, regarding this proceeding, as a violation of the king of England's promiſes, ſent ſome of their members to repreſent to him, that he had engaged, that the pleas of things, done in Scotland, ſhould not be drawn out of that kingdom. Edward, apprehending this remonſtrance to be very unreaſonable, replied, That the affair was of ſuch a nature, that he could not permit it to be tried any where, except in his own courts; ſince it belonged not to vaſſals, to puniſh the miſdemeanours of thoſe, that repreſented the perſon of the ſovereign. If he had ſtopped there, the Scots might have entertain'd hopes, that this particular caſe would not be brought into a precedent; but the king, to prevent the like complaints, for the future, diſpatched to the council of Scotland the following declaration: "That if, during the vacancy of the "throne, he had made the Scots any ſuch "temporary promiſes, he had punctually ob-"ſerved them; yet, as there was, now, a "king in Scotland, he did not deſign to be re-"ſtrained by ſuch engagements, but would "admit and hear all complaints, and all buſi-"neſs relating to that kingdom, where and "when he pleaſed." He repeated this declaration, ſome days after, in his own chamber, before Baliol, and a great number of lords of both nations; adding, "He would call the "king of Scotland himſelf to appear in Eng-"land, at his pleaſure." The warmth, with which he ſpoke, ſtopped the mouth of Baliol, who, being in his power, thought it improper to make any anſwer; but, two days after, he was obliged to renounce, by letters patent, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, all the promiſes, conceſſions, and ratifications made by the king of England, during the vacancy of the throne of Scotland; and to approve all Edward's pro-

This firſt ſtep of Edward was ſufficient to convince the Scots, that he was reſolved to ſtretch his prerogative, to the utmoſt; but he, ſoon after, gave them more ſubſtantial proofs. A merchant of Gaſcoigne preſented a petition to him, ſhewing, that Alexander III, late king of Scotland, was indebted to him in a certain ſum, ſtill due to him, notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations to the new king, for payment; and that, therefore, he applied to him, as ſovereign of the king of Scotland, for juſtice. Edward, immediately, ſummoned the king of Scotland to appear at Weſtminſter, the morrow after Aſcenſion-Day, to anſwer, in perſon, the complaints brought againſt him by the merchant; which firſt ſummons bears date, the 8th of March, about two months after Edward's departure from Newcaſtle.

Eight days after, Edward ſent a ſecond ſummons to Baliol, on the following occaſion. Whilſt he was at Berwick, he had ordered the regents of Scotland to put Macduff, earl of Fife, in poſſeſſion of certain lands claimed by that earl; which orders had been executed, before Baliol's coronation, whilſt Edward was ſtill maſter of Scotland. In the firſt parliament, held by the new king, at Scone, the earl of Fife was accuſed of unjuſtly taking poſſeſſion of theſe lands, the cuſtody of which belonged to the king; and this was properly accuſing him of an affected raſhneſs, in applying to the king of England, and not waiting, till there was a king on the throne of Scotland. Upon this charge, the parliament ordered him to be impriſoned; but, ſome time after, the earl, being releaſed, carried his complaints to Edward; who, upon this, again ſummoned Baliol to appear before him, wherever he ſhould be, the day after Trinity-Sunday.

The 15th of June following, Edward took a freſh occaſion to ſummon the king of Scotland; for, whilſt he was at Newcaſtle, he had ordered Walter de Huntercombe, governor of the iſle of Man, to put Baliol in poſſeſſion of that iſle, which was done accordingly. Shortly after, a lady, named Auſtrica, claiming the iſle, demanded it of the king of Scotland; and, her demand being rejected, ſhe complained to Edward. Upon this, Baliol was again ſummoned to appear, in perſon, 15 days after Michaelmas, in whatever place the king ſhould then be; and Edward ordered the ſheriff of Northumberland, to notify this ſummons to the king of Scotland himſelf, before witneſs.

A few months after, Baliol received another ſummons. David, king of Scotland, had formerly granted to the monaſtery of Reading, in England, a certain priory, held of the biſhoprick of St. Andrews; but this priory was afterwards alienated, by the abbot of Reading, to the biſhop of St. Andrews. The ſucceſſor of this abbot, deſirous of recovering the priory, pretended, that the alienation was made, without the conſent of the majority of the monks, and, thereupon, preſented a petition to the king; but the biſhop, being informed of it, appealed to the pope, and his appeal was admitted by the court of Scotland; yet, upon the abbot's complaint, about admitting the appeal, Edward again ſummoned Baliol to appear, in perſon, 15 days after the feaſt of St. Martin. 1293.

A year after, Edward treated this prince, in the ſame imperious manner, by commanding him to appear before him, to anſwer for himſelf, for denying juſtice to the biſhop of Durham, in an affair relating to his dioceſe. 1294.

So many different ſummons, on ſuch trivial occaſions, and on the bare complaints of private perſons, convinced Baliol, that he was become rather the ſlave than the vaſſal of the king of England; yet, as he had taken no meaſures, to ſhake off the yoke, he durſt not but appear, to anſwer to theſe ſeveral accuſations. Buchanan affirms, it was, merely, by accident, that Baliol was preſent in the parliament of England, when the earl of Fife brought his complaints againſt him; but others ſay, that it was in obedience to the ſummons. However that be, he was accuſed, before the parliament, of denying juſtice to, and impriſoning the earl of Fife; and, tho' he would have anſwered by a proctor, he was obliged to ſtand at the bar, like a private perſon. This was a great mortification, for a crowned head; but Edward was reſolved to humble him, and make the Scots feel the whole weight of their dependence. Baliol, being conſtrained to anſwer, in perſon, alledged, that, as the accuſation entered againſt him concerned his crown, he could not reply to it, without firſt conſulting his ſubjects; but, his excuſe not being admitted, the parliament ordered, that three of his principal caſtles ſhould be put into the king's hands, till he gave full ſatisfaction. The Engliſh hiſtorians relate, that, before this ſentence was pronounced, Baliol preſented a petition, owning the ſovereignty of the king of England over Scotland, and beſeeching Edward to allow him time, to conſult his parliament; and that, upon this condeſcenſion, his demand was granted, and a certain day aſſigned, for his appearance; upon which, he withdrew, incenſed, to the laſt degree, at the affront he had received, and determined to do all that was poſſible, to free himſelf from ſuch an inſupportable yoke. Baliol appears before the parliament of England. Ryley.

The war, which broke out, at the ſame time, between France and England, inſpired Baliol with hopes of a favourable juncture, to put his deſign in execution; and, indeed, it was likely, that he would have leiſure to concert neceſſary meaſures, to compaſs his ends, whilſt Edward was employed, in that war. A private quarrel, between ſome Engliſh and French mariners, was the occaſion of this rupture; which gave the king of France a pretence to ſummon Edward, before the court of peers, and an opportunity to ſeize Guienne, by a ſtratagem, as the ſequel will inform us. 1295. Baliol enters into an alliance with France. Act. Pub.

1295. Before the war was proclaimed, Edward attempted, by way of negotiation, to recover that dutchy from the king of France; but Philip, being no ſtranger to the king of Scotland's deſigns, prolonged matters, till that prince declared his intentions. During the negotiation, Baliol ſent ambaſſadors to France, under the pretence of renewing the antient alliance between the two nations; but, in reality, to enter into a ſtrict union with Philip, by the marriage of his ſon, Edward, with a daughter of the earl of Valois, brother to that monarch. How ſecretly ſoever this negotiation was carried on, Edward received intelligence, that ſome plot was contriving againſt him, at Paris; and, to diſconcert Baliol's meaſures, he demanded of him the caſtles of Berwick, Jedburgh, and Roxborough, promiſing to reſtore them, as ſoon as matters were adjuſted with France; but, without rejecting entirely this demand, Baliol found means to gain time, whilſt he purſued his deſign of ſhaking off the yoke of the Engliſh. His ambaſſadors having concluded with France the propoſed league, he thought it time to declare; being preſſingly ſollicited to it by Philip, who was deſirous of raiſing him domeſtick troubles, that might hinder him from projecting means, to recover Guienne. Baliol had been long in ſuſpence, by reaſon of his oath to the king of England; but, to remove this ſcruple, Philip procured him the pope's diſpenſation; ſo that, being ſecure from the church's cenſures, then very formidable, and having no farther uneaſineſs, on account of his oath, he was reſolved, that nothing ſhould any longer retard him. Edward, ſurpriſed at this reſolution, which quickly reached his ears, determined, that, relinquiſhing his affairs in France, he would employ his preparations againſt Scotland; for, as Baliol's revolt gave him a plauſible pretence, to render himſelf maſter of that kingdom, he conſider'd, that the conqueſt of it would be of much greater importance than Guienne; wherefore, inſtead of embarquing his army for France, he marched directly for Scotland. In the interim, Baliol, depending on the aſſiſtance promiſed by the king of France, diſpatched to the king of England the ſuperior of the Cordeliers of Roxborough, to deliver a letter into his own hand; complaining of the frequent injuries received from him; of the many ſummons iſſued out, on very trivial occaſions, and upon the bare petitions of private perſons; and, finally, declaring, that he would be no longer his vaſſal. This letter, ſtill more, exaſperated Edward, who, continuing his march towards Scotland, his affairs in France being in a very ill ſituation, reſolved to make a conqueſt of that kingdom, as the Engliſh hiſtorians confeſs, on this occaſion; from whence may be dated the beginning of the long war, that created, in the hearts of the Engliſh and Scots, a mutual enmity, which time has not, hitherto, been able to extinguiſh.

1296. Buchanan. Edward, having advanced, as far as Newcaſtle, with a view of beſieging Berwick, which was, as it were, the key of the two kingdoms, and, therefore, of all places, moſt expoſed to the ſieges and ſurpriſes of both nations, ſent a fleet to ſea, with ſtrict orders to prevent any ſuccours, or ſupplies, from approaching that town; but the fleet was ſurpriſed by the Scots, who burnt and ſunk 18 ſhips; and they alſo gained another advantage over ſome Engliſh troops, who, attempting to ſeize a certain poſt, were cut in pieces, with the loſs of above 1000 men; which ſucceſſes, tho' they animated the king of Scotland, ſerved only to inflame Edward's revenge, who exerted himſelf, to ſubdue a people, that ſeemed ſo reſolute, to ſhake off his yoke. There were in Scotland, as was, before, obſerved, two factions; one for Baliol, and the other for Bruce. Edward, being very ſenſible, that the latter had ſubmitted only by force, to the judgment pronounced, in favour of the former, offered him the crown, provided he would declare againſt Baliol; and Bruce, joyfully accepting this propoſal, augmented Edward's party, with a great number of friends, who had only, out of fear, taken the oath to Baliol. 1296.

He beſieges Berwick.

Theſe meaſures being taken, Edward entered Scotland, and laid ſiege to Berwick; but, as this place was very ſtrong and well garriſoned, he was apprehenſive of meeting a reſiſtance, which would give Baliol leiſure to prepare, and the Scots, in general, an opportunity of uniting together, to free themſelves from a common and impending danger. He, therefore, imagined, that nothing could be more to his advantage, than ſpeedily to become maſter of Berwick, in order to advance into the heart of the kingdom, and diſconcert the meaſures of the Scots; and, for the greater diſpatch, he reſolved to make uſe of a ſtratagem; wherefore, after aſſaulting the town, ſeveral days, he ſuddenly raiſed the ſiege. At the ſame time, by means of ſome ſoldiers, who, pretending to be deſerters, threw themſelves into the town, he cauſed a rumour to be ſpread, that the king of Scotland's approach, to their relief, compelled him to retire; which was quickly followed, by the falſe news of Baliol's being within a league of the town, ready to enter it; and, upon this, the ſoldiers and inhabitants ſallied out, in crowds, to meet him, believing, that Edward was, now, at a diſtance. This headleſs multitude falling into an ambuſh, and endeavouring to retreat, with precipitation, were ſo briskly purſued, that the Engliſh entered, pell-mell, into the town, and made a great ſlaughter; and it is ſaid, that above 7000 Scots periſhed, on that occaſion.

Baliol is vanquiſhed.

Edward, being maſter of Berwick, marched to Dunbar, in order to beſiege it; and he was ſcarce arrived, before the town, when he heard of Baliol's approach, at the head of a powerful army. Though he did not expect that the Scots could be in readineſs ſo ſoon, he rejoyced at the news, in hopes of obtaining a victory, that would put him in poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom. Baliol advanced, on his part, with equal ardor, intent upon deciding, by one battle, whether he ſhould be free, or a ſlave; and the two armies, engaging, fought a conſiderable time, with undaunted bravery; but the 1296. the Scots were, at laſt, forced to retreat, having loſt the beſt part of their troops. Their loſs, in this action, is ſaid to amount to above 20,000 men; a loſs ſo great and aſtoniſhing, that they were not in a condition for a long while, to withſtand the power of the conquerors. Upon this ſignal victory, Edward, immediately, returned to Berwick, its gates being opened to receive him; and then, without giving his enemies leiſure to breathe, he marched to Roxborough, which he ſubdued, with the ſame eaſe. Preſently after, he approached Edinburgh, the caſtle whereof was ſurrendered, in eight days; and, from thence, he went and ſeized Sterling, Perth, and all the conſiderable places in the kingdom. In a word, before the end of the campaign, Baliol and the whole nation had no other remedy, but to ſubmit to his mercy; upon which condition, he entered into a treaty with them. The king of Scotland appearing before him, at Kincardin, with a white rod in his hand, reſigned his kingdom to him, to be diſpoſed of, at his pleaſure; which reſignation, being drawn up, in form, was ſigned by Baliol, and the greateſt part of the barons of Scotland, and ſealed with the great ſeal of the kingdom.

The Scots ſwear to Edward. Knighton.

To confirm this new acquiſition, Edward ordered the ſtates of Scotland to aſſemble at Berwick; where all the nobility and officers of the kingdom ſwore fealty to him, and delivered up all the caſtles and places, that were ſtill in their hands. William Dowglas was the only Scotch nobleman, that could never reſolve to ſwear to a prince, who had no right to Scotland, but what was acquired by the ſword; but, upon this refuſal, Edward, commanding him to be conducted to England, kept him in cloſe confinement, to the day of his death; though his misfortunes could never bring him to acknowledge Edward, for his ſovereign. Baliol was alſo ſent into England, and impriſoned, at firſt, in the tower of London; but he was afterwards removed to Oxford, where he founded the college, which bears his name. Other Scotch lords, whom Edward judged it neceſſary to ſecure, were confined in ſeveral priſons in England; and, if he left ſome their liberty, they were obliged to continue in the ſouthern parts, without ever paſſing the Trent, on pain of death. He might, with eaſe, have been crowned king of Scotland; but he deſigned to unite Scotland to England, as he had done Wales, and to conſtitute one kingdom of the whole iſland of Britain. This evidently appeared, from his removing into England the crown and ſcepter of Scotland, with all the reſt of the regalia, and all the enſigns of the liberty, hitherto, enjoyed by the Scots; but it was much more difficult to blot, out of their minds, the remembrance of this invaluable bleſſing. He caused the famous ſtone, on which the inauguration of their kings was performed, to be conveyed from Scone; in which ſtone the people of Scotland had, all along, placed a ſort of fatality, fancying, that, whilſt it remained in the country, their ſtate would be unſhaken, but that, the moment it ſhould be removed, it would occaſion great revolutions. Edward had no other view, in carrying it away, than to create in the Scots a belief, that the time of the diſſolution of their monarchy was come, and to leſſen the hopes of recovering their liberty*; but, how much ſoever they were attached to this fatal ſtone, they ſuſtained a greater loſs, on this occaſion; for the burning of their records, by Edward's order, was, to them and their poſterity, an irretrievable misfortune. Moreover, Edward, to ſecure his conqueſt, placed Engliſh garriſons and governors, in all the caſtles; and, leaving John Warren, earl of Surrey and Suſſex, to command in Scotland; he returned, in triumph, to England. 1296.

Edward's affairs with France. Act. Pub.

Having ſeen the end of the firſt war with Scotland, it will be requiſite to conſider what was tranſacted in France; where Edward's affairs were in a very different ſituation. Ever ſince the treaty between St. Lewis and Henry III, France and England had lived in a good underſtanding, till a quarrel, between two inconſiderable perſons, gave occaſion to the two monarchs to take up arms. A Norman pilot quarrelling with an Engliſh mariner, in a port of Guienne, the former chanced to be killed; and, whether the magiſtrates of the port neglected to bring the murderer to juſtice, or he was not in their power, the Normans finding, that the murder of their countryman was paſſed over, with impunity, reſolved to be revenged. Accordingly, ſurpriſing an Engliſh veſſel, they hung up the pilot at the yard-arm; which repriſals occaſioned others, on both ſides, ſo that the Engliſh and Normans made fierce war upon each other, wherever they met, even to the plundering each other's ſhips, as opportunity offer'd. This was, for ſome time, only a private war, in which the two monarchs had no concern; but ſome Engliſh ſhips, meeting a Norman fleet laden with wine, carried them to England, and, the owners complaining to the king of France, he demanded reſtitution of the ſhips and goods, and immediate ſatisfaction, for the outrage. Edward not returning a ſpeedy anſwer, Philip the Fair, who was extremely haughty, ſummoned him to appear, in perſon, before the court of peers, to anſwer to the complaints exhibited againſt him; which ſummons was iſſued out, in 1294. The French hiſtorians affirm, that, Edward not appearing, but only ſending his brother, Edmund, in his room, Philip diſpatched the conſtable de Neſle into Guienne, where he

* Keneth II, king of the Scots, having made a general ſlaughter of the Picts, near the monaſtery of Scone, placed a ſtone there, which, according to vulgar tradition, was the ſame that ſerved Jacob for a pillow, and incloſed it in a wooden chair, for the inauguration of the kings. It had been brought out of Spain into Ireland by Simon Breccus, and out of Ireland into Argyle; and king Edward cauſed it to be removed to Weſtminſter. On it was engraven this diſtich:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunque locatum — Or fate's deceiv'd, and Heaven decrees in vain;
Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem. — Or, where they find this ſtone, the Scots ſhall reign. Camb. Buch.

Was it poſſible for that general to become maſter of Guienne, without forming a ſiege, or fighting a battle; as if it had been an open country, entirely deſtitute of caſtles and troops? This inclines me to believe, either that the French hiſtorians were ignorant of what was done, on this occaſion, or thought it improper to be related; but what does not appear, in their hiſtories, is thoroughly cleared, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, lately printed in England, and which I have ſo often quoted; and, therefore, I hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed with an account of the particulars.

Philip deceives Edward. Act. Pub.

Edward, being ſummoned before the peers, as we have ſeen, ſent prince Edmund, his brother, to Paris, to anſwer for him; with orders to give the king of France all the ſatisfaction he could reaſonably deſire, to prevent a war. Edmund found the French monarch extremely incenſed; and, after ſeveral inſtances to enter into a treaty, apprehending his endeavours to be fruitleſs, he reſolved to return home; but, juſt as he was in readineſs for his departure, Mary of Brabant, widow of Philip the Hardy, and Joanna of Navarre, wife of the preſent king, intreated him to renew the negotiation with them. The great deſire they expreſſed of procuring a firm peace, between the two kings, and Edmund's inſtructions from the king, his brother, eaſily induced him to conſent to the propoſal; and the two queens repreſented to him, that Philip was greatly offended, at the affronts received from Edward's ſubjects, and eſpecially from certain perſons of Guienne; wherefore, it was impoſſible to come to a good agreement, without a reaſonable ſatisfaction. They added, that, as the king's honour was concerned in this affair, the only way, to appeaſe him, was to make him a publick reparation, to demonſtrate to the world, that Edward diſclaimed the proceedings of his ſubjects; and they propoſed, that Xaintes, Talmond, Turenne, Puymirol, Penne, and Monflauguin, together with the perſons complained of, ſhould be delivered up to Philip; but they, at the ſame time, intimated to Edmund, that it was only for form ſake, and that Philip would engage to reſtore the towns and perſons, upon their own requeſt; promiſing alſo, that, as ſoon as the king's honour was rendered ſafe, by this reparation, he ſhould revoke the ſummons, and give Edward a ſafe-conduct to come to him at Amiens, where he would receive his homage. Edmund conſented to all theſe propoſals; which the two queens ſign'd, in writing, and engaged, with an oath, that the particulars, agreed upon, ſhould be punctually performed. This treaty, ſign'd by the two queens, and, for the king of France's honour, to be kept ſecret, was ſent to Edward; who ſeemed to be pleaſed with it. He was chiefly intent upon the affairs of Scotland, and, in all probability, his many ſummons to Baliol, on trifling conditions, were, purely, deſigned to cauſe him to rebel, in order to have an opportunity to chaſtiſe him; and, during Edmund's negotiation, at Paris, he made himſelf maſter of Scotland; ſo that, as a war with France, at ſuch a juncture, muſt, of courſe, greatly embarraſs him, he was very glad to give Philip a ſeeming reparation, which, in the main, was not detrimental to himſelf; and, he reſolved to give it him more amply than was even deſired, in order to procure a peace with France, ſo neceſſary for him. Accordingly, he impower'd Edmund to ſurrender to the king of France all Guienne, with its metropolis; and he ſent poſitive orders to the ſeneſchal, to obey the prince's command, without any exception. Edmund, acquainting Philip with his orders, declared he was ready to put them in execution; but on condition that, before creditable witneſſes, the king would promiſe, with his own mouth, to perform the articles ſigned by the two queens. Philip, accordingly, going into a certain room, attended by the duke of Burgundy, paſſed his royal word, in the preſence of the duke, the two queens, Blanche of Navarre, wife of Edmund, and the Engliſh ambaſſadors, to perform that treaty; and he likewiſe revoked, with his own mouth, Edward's ſummons, and ordered the revocation to be publiſhed, in the open hall, by the biſhop of Orleans. Edmund, upon this, ordered the ſeneſchal of Guienne to deliver up the dukedom to the king of France; and Ralph de Neſle, conſtable of France, was commiſſioned to take poſſeſſion of Guienne, in Philip's name. The ſeneſchal ſcrupled to reſign the province, except on the terms of the treaty, of which Edmund had informed him; but the conſtable would not be tied to any conditions, alledging, that he was ignorant of the treaties between the two kings, and was ordered only to take poſſeſſion of Guienne, in his maſter's name; after which, he demanded the perſons agreed upon, and ſent them to Paris.

Philip refuſes to execute the treaty.

All the articles being more than performed, on the part of England, Edmund demanded the reſtitution of Guienne, with the perſons, ſtipulated in the ſecret treaty; to which it was replied, that his demand ſhould be examined, in the king's council. Philip likewiſe ſent him word, not to be ſurpriſed, if he gave him a harſh anſwer, before the council, on account of ſome members, who were not in the ſecret; but that, upon their departure, he would give him entire ſatisfaction. Edmund, relying upon his promiſe, appeared before the council, where Philip was preſent, and demanded the reſtitution of Guienne; to which that monarch roughly replied, He would not reſtore it. This anſwer not ſurpriſing the prince, who expected it, he withdrew into the next room, waiting for the performance of the king's word, and was left there, ſome time, without any other anſwer; but, at length, the biſhops of Orleans and Tournay came and told him, that it was in vain to wait any longer, ſince the king would be deaf to all his ſollicitations. Some days after, Philip came to the parliament, without giving Edmund notice, and ordered the king of England to be publickly cited, to appear and anſwer to the articles exhibited in, 1296. the ſummons; but, Edmund not being then in the palace, Hugh de Vere and John de Lacy, Edward's, ambaſſadors entering, ſaid, that they expected this affair would have been decided, according to the treaty, eſpecially as the ſummons was revoked. However, they were diſmiſſed; and, though they deſired only, till the next day, to conſult with the king's brother, they could not obtain that delay; but the court decreed the confiſcation of Guienne to the king of France.

This is the ſubſtance of a memorial, in the Collection of the Publick Acts; wherein prince Edward himſelf gives a full account of this affair, from the beginning of his negotiation. It may, indeed, be objected, that it comes from one of the parties; but, beſides the ſimplicity and plainneſs of the memorial, the conqueſt of Guienne, without ſieges and battles, renders this relation extremely probable. Moreover, we find, in the foreſaid Collection, ſeveral of Edward's letters, complaining of being deceived by the king of France. There is one in particular, directed to the prelates and barons of Guienne; wherein he excuſes himſelf from making a treaty with France, without their advice, and aſſures them, that he is deceived as much, or more, than themſelves. This is farther evident, from his diſclaiming the homage he had done to Philip, in the following terms:

The recantation of Edward's homage to Philip. Act. Pub.

"Our ambaſſadors ſhall ſay to the king of "France theſe words,

"Sire, our lord the king of England, lord "of Ireland, and duke of Aquitain, did you "homage, conditionally; namely, according "to the form of the peace made, between "your anceſtors and his, which you have not "kept. Moreover, that all differences, be"tween your ſubjects and his, might be end"ed, a ſecret treaty was made between you "and my lord Edmund, his brother, as you "may remember, containing certain articles "which you have not performed, though he "has done more than was promiſed, on his "part. After that, he required you twice by "his ſaid brother, and a third time by the "peers of France, and other great men of "your kingdom, to reſtore him his land of "Guienne, and to deliver thoſe of his ſubjects, "whom you detain in priſon, which you have "refuſed; and, therefore, it ſeems to him, that "you no longer count him your vaſſal; and ac"cordingly, he refuſes to be ſo, for the future."

The war of Guienne is of no importance. Act. Pub.

How much ſoever Edward was mortified, to find himſelf, thus, cheated by Philip, he choſe rather to leave that prince in the poſſeſſion of Guienne, than relinquiſh the war with Scotland, which he apprehended to be of greater importance. Beſides, he was ſenſible, that, before he engaged in a war with France, it would be neceſſary to prevent the diverſion, the Scots might make, on the frontiers of the north; and, therefore, he was ſatisfied with ſending his brother, Edmund, into Guienne, with a few troops, his ſole view being to keep Philip employed, in thoſe parts, to prevent his aſſiſting the Scots. As Edward did not intend a vigorous proſecution of the war in Guienne, where he had only Bayonne and ſome neighbouring places, it may be fairly preſumed, that nothing very remarkable paſſed there; and yet the French boaſt of gaining two battles, one under the earl of Valois, and the other under the earl of Artois; but theſe actions could not be very conſiderable, on account of the ſmall number of Edmund's forces. The truth is, France was obliged to keep there a numerous army, not only to oppoſe the Engliſh, but the revolts of the natives, who were extremely uneaſy under their new maſter. The ſuperiority of the earl of Valois's forces conſtrained Edmund to ſhut himſelf up in Bayonne, where he died, in 1296; and the earl of Lincoln, who took the command of the Engliſh troops, beſieging Dacs, was compelled to make a haſty retreat, upon the approach of the earl of Artois, who was advancing, to raiſe the ſiege. Perhaps, he received, on this occaſion, ſome inconſiderable loſs, which the French call a battle; but I ſhall not inſiſt any longer, on the war of Guienne, ſince it producedno material event. 1296.

Edward gains the earl of Flanders to his ſide.

It was not in Gaſcoigne that Edward deſigned to exert his utmoſt ſtrength, againſt France; for he perceived it to be very difficult to recover a province, ſo remote from England, and where he had not any place, except Bayonne; but his intention was to attack Philip in Flanders, where the ſituation of affairs ſeemed to promiſe him better ſucceſs. The earl of Flanders's circumſtances laid him under a neceſſity of ſeeking for protection, againſt France; and he could find none ſo near, or ſo ready, as that of the king of England, who was ardently deſirous of being revenged. The occaſion of the earl's quarrel with Philip was this:

The affairs of Flanders.

In 1284, Guy, earl of Flanders, quarrelled with the inhabitants of Ghent, on account of the government of their city, in which, they pretended, he had no concern. In the reign of Philip the Hardy, this affair was brought before the parliament of Paris, who paſſed a ſentence, in favour of the earl, and fined the magiſtrates; upon which, Guy became as troubleſome, as poſſible, to the citizens of that large city, which they highly reſented. When Philip the Fair aſcended the throne, things had a different aſpect; for that monarch, perceiving that he could make an advantage of the diſcord, between the earl of Flanders and the people of Ghent, privately ſent word to the magiſtrates, that, if they would renew their proceſs againſt the earl, he would do them juſtice; which was ſufficient to engage the city of Ghent, to revive the quarrel. The affair being, once more, laid before the parliament of Paris, the authority of the 39 magiſtrates or governors, aboliſhed by the former decree, was re-eſtabliſhed in Ghent; but the earl was extremely incenſed, that Philip ſhould make it his buſineſs to plague him, by reſtoring to the city a power, which he ſo greatly deteſted. However, he durſt not diſcover his reſentment; yet, ſome time after, he employed Robert de Bethun, his ſon, who, by ſecret inſinuations, perſuaded the cities of Flanders 1296. ders to fortify certain places, contrary to the tenor of the treaties with France; aſſuring them, that they would meet with no oppoſition from the earl, his father. Guy's deſign was to ſet the cities at variance with France, leſt Philip ſhould excite them againſt him; but Philip received intelligence of the ſhare the earl had, in this affair; tho' he did not judge it adviſable, immediately, to ſhew his reſentment, either againſt the cities which had violated the treaties, or againſt their adviſer. In the interim, the earl, from his very ſilence, perceived, that he had reaſon to expect an attack, at ſome other time; and, for ſeveral years, Philip diſſembled his anger, whilſt Guy continually projected means, to prevent its effects.

Act. Pub. During theſe tranſactions, the rupture broke out, between France and England; and, tho' Edward uſed all means, to avoid a war, the negotiation, at Paris, induced him to believe, that, whatever fell out, he ought to ſecure the aſſiſtance of the earl of Flanders; wherefore, he demanded his eldeſt daughter in marriage, for prince Edward, his ſon, taking it to be an infallible way, to attach him to his intereſts. This negotiation, though ſecret, reaching the ears of Philip, gave him great uneaſineſs; but he concealed it, leſt, by diſcovering it, he ſhould put it out of his power, to prevent an alliance ſo prejudicial to France. Accordingly, he pretended ignorance, and, under ſome pretence, drawing Guy and his counteſs to Paris, detained them, as priſoners; and it was even a favour that he gave them their liberty, on condition that they delivered their daughter, in hoſtage, and promiſed to break their alliance with Edward, on pain of excommunication. However, Guy was no ſooner in his dominions, than he did all that was poſſible, to recover his daughter from Philip, tho' to no purpoſe; for that prince was too apprehenſive of the earl's union with England, voluntarily to reſign the pledge he had in his hands.

1297. Edward forms a league againſt France. In the mean while, the affairs of Scotland allowed Edward neither leiſure nor opportunity, to proſecute his projected war againſt Philip; but, as ſoon as a proper juncture offered, he applied all his thoughts to revenge. Philip's fraudulent proceeding was an injury not to be eaſily buried in oblivion; yet, as his adverſary was a mighty prince, it was neceſſary to have a powerful army, which England alone could not ſupply; and, therefore, he endeavoured to form, beyond ſea, a ſtrong league againſt France; and, though it ſeemed to be a difficult task, his endeavours proved ſucceſsful. Beſides the earl of Flanders, whom he gained, without trouble, Adolphus of Naſſau, lately elected emperor, Albert, duke of Auſtria, the archbiſhop of Cologn, and ſeveral other German princes, the duke of Brabant, the earls of Holland, Juliers, and Luxemburgh were engaged in the league, by the promiſes of great ſums, which Edward made them; and all theſe princes, proud of their number and ſtrength, ſent cartels of defiance to Philip, who was offended with none of them ſo much, as the earl of Flanders; becauſe, tho' he was his vaſſal, he boldly told him, that he would no longer own him, for a ſovereign.

Whilſt Philip was preparing, to repulſe this attack, Edward exerted himſelf, to raiſe the money he wanted extremely, on account of his engagements with the confederate princes; and, with this view, he aſſembled the parliament, at St. Edmundsbury, and obtained a ſubſidy of the eighth part of the moveables of the cities and boroughs, and a twelfth of the reſt of the laity. This example could not influence the clergy; who pretended that they were exempted from giving aids to the king, by vertue of a bull ſent, the laſt year, by Boniface VIII, to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, which he had not, hitherto, publiſhed; and, by this bull, all eccleſiaſticks were expreſly prohibited to pay any tax to ſecular princes, without the conſent of the holy ſee. The clergy's refuſal extremely provoked the king; yet, before he proceeded to violent methods, he cauſed it to be repreſented to the principal members, that, ſeeing they poſſeſſed fees in the kingdom, and enjoyed the protection of the laws, as well as the reſt of his ſubjects, they ought, in equity, to contribute to the publick expences; but, when he found, that theſe remonſtrances were ineffectual, he commanded all the lay-fees poſſeſſed by the clergy to be ſeized, and their whole body to be thrown out of the protection of the laws, expreſly forbidding his judges to do them juſtice, in any caſe whatſoever; which bold ſtep aſtoniſhed the clergy, who, ſince the beginning of the monarchy, had never experienced the like reſolution, in any king of England. If Edward had been like his father, or grandfather, perhaps, that potent body would have been able, by means of the people's diſcontent, to make the king repent of his boldneſs; but, as they plainly perceived, that it would be difficult to ſtir up the people, ſome of them ſpeedily compounded with the king, for the fifth part of their goods, and the reſt copied after their example; but, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was treated, with greater ſeverity, as he was not only the firſt adviſer of the clergy's refuſal, but perſiſted in it more obſtinately than the others. The king ordered all his eſtates to be ſeized, with the revenues of the monaſteries of his dioceſe, and entruſted the management of them to officers, who left the monks no more, than was abſolutely neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence. In all probability, this was to puniſh them, for too warmly adhering to their archbiſhop; and the king's reſolution, at length, obliged that prelate to ſtoop, who, to recover his ſovereign's favour, gave him a fourth part of his goods. Thus, the clergy, when they meet with vigorous princes, are as ſubmiſſive, as they are haughty, when they are concerned with thoſe that are weak and ſcrupulous.

Edward cheques the pride of the clergy.

Shortly after, on a like occaſion, the lay-lords diſcovered more ſteadineſs than the prelates though againſt the ſame monarch; who, to execute his grand projects, aſſembled the nobility, at Salisbury, on purpoſe to ſee exactly, 1297. actly, what troops each baron could furniſh him with. He intended to make a powerful diverſion, in Guienne, whilſt he preſſed the enemy, on the ſide of Flanders; but it was no eaſy matter to find lords that would ſerve, unleſs he commanded, in perſon; for every one deſired to be excuſed ſerving, in Guienne, though they were willing to ſupply the troops. Edward, diſſatisfied with their excuſes, threatened to give their lands to ſuch as would be more obedient; which menaces raiſed great commotions among the nobles, who did not, in the leaſt, imagine their lands were at the king's diſpoſal. Humphrey Bohun, high-conſtable, and Hugh Bigod, earl of Norfolk, and marſhal of England, bolder than the reſt, in ſo many words, told the king, that they were ready to follow him, where he commanded, in perſon, and not otherwiſe; adding, that he was willing to lead the van-guard, under the king, as his office obliged him, but would not ſerve, under any other, to which none had a right to compel him. The king, being in a furious paſſion, replied, that he would make him go; to which the other replied, that he ſhould not. The king, to the laſt degree, incenſed, ſaid, "By the eternal God you ſhall "march, or be hanged." The earl anſwered, "By the eternal God, I will neither march, "nor be hanged;" upon which, he withdrew, without returning to court any more.

The boldneſs of two earls. Knighton.

The king durſt not chaſtiſe them. M. Weſt.

Edward had obſerved, in the king his father's reign, frequent and fatal inſtances of the inſolence of the barons; and he was too ſenſible of their ſtrict union, in the defence of their privileges, to hazard his reputation and quiet, in a war againſt them. Such a quarrel muſt have been extremely prejudicial to him, as well as to the whole kingdom; and the leaſt inconvenience, that could happen, was loſing the opportunity of being revenged on the king of France. It was ſcarce to be doubted, but all the barons would have joined againſt him, if he had openly chaſtiſed the inſolence of thoſe that withſtood him, to his face; and he had ſtill farther reaſon to be confirmed in this belief, when, dreading his reſentment, they began to raiſe troops, in their defence, if he ſhould reſolve to attack them; ſo that it was manifeſt, that they were ſupported. Theſe conſiderations led the king to conceal his reſentment, for the preſent; and, beſides, he was unwilling to loſe the opportunity of going into Flanders, where the wants of the earl, his ally, inceſſantly called him. However, it was not long, before he found a favourable juncture, to correct the boldneſs of the two earls, by turning them out of their poſts, becauſe they refuſed to do ſomething belonging to their offices, to prevent their falling into his hands; and he was very near repenting what he had done; for, juſt as he was upon the point of embarquing, he received, fromthe biſhops, earls, barons, and commons of the realm, a long remonſtrance, containing a liſt of the grievances of the nation, and ſeveral violations of the great charter. This proceeding convinced him, that he ought to act, with deliberation, leſt he ſhould provoke a nation, which ſeemed ready to take fire, on the firſt occaſion; and, therefore, he returned a very gracious anſwer to the remonſtrance, and promiſed, upon his honour, to redreſs, at his return, all the abuſes complained of. He deſired the nobles to be quiet, during his abſence, aſſuring them, that he would give them entire ſatisfaction; and, to appeaſe the people, exaſperated by the ſecret practices of the two earls, he publiſhed a proclamation, to ſhew his reaſons, for turning out theſe two great officers. Among other things, he ſaid, in this proclamation, that he was informed his people were made to believe, that he refuſed to receive remonſtrances, tending to the good of the publick, which he affirmed to be falſe; and he alſo declared, that he was extremely ſorry, for having put his ſubjects to vaſt expences, for the ſupport of his wars. He intreated them to excuſe what neceſſity had conſtrained him to do; and he engaged to obſerve the great charter punctually, for the future, which, he, ſoon after, performed. The prince, his ſon, whom he left regent, having aſſembled the parliament, and obtained a large ſubſidy, ratified king John's two charters, by an authentick act, ſigned in Flanders by the king himſelf, and ſealed with the great ſeal which he had carried with him *. Several inſtances, parallel to this, occur in the Hiſtory of England; I mean, that the kings, who have treated their ſubjects gently, and anſwered their complaints, with moderation, have ſeldom failed to appeaſe them, unleſs, like Henry III, they affected continually to deceive them and break their word; whilſt, on the contrary, ſuch, as have acted too imperiouſly, have generally involved themſelves into great trouble; of which we have ſeen very remarkable examples, in ſome of the preceding reigns.

He turns them out of their offices.

Philip prepares for his defence.

Whilſt Edward was employed, at home, in making preparations, to maintain the league formed againſt Francc. Philip was equally ſollicitous to provide againſt the impending aſſault; who entered into an alliance with the kings of Caſtile and Arragon, and raiſed a powerful army, whilſt Joan, queen of Navarre, his wife, muſtered together her own forces, to aſſiſt him. Champagne, belonging to that princeſs, was firſt attacked, by the earl of Bar, one of Edward's allies, who ravaged that province, from one end to the other; but, upon the queen's approach, the earl, ſeized with fear, and unable to fight, or retreat, was forced to ſurren-

He corrupts Edward's allies. Walſing.

In the interim, the confederate princes delayed to ſend their troops into Flanders; for Adolphus of Naſſau, detained by troubles, which Philip had raiſed him, in Germany, or, as ſome affirm, by preſents, could not, or would not perform his engagements. The duke of Auſtria was bribed, by the ſame means; and the dukes of Brabant and Luxemburgh, the earl of Guelders and Beaumont, followed their example. Philip, improving this advantage, entered Flanders, at the head of 60,000 men, and, immediately, ſat down before Liſle; whilſt Guy, who impatiently waited for the Engliſh ſupplies, was not able to withſtand him, not having half the forces he was made to expect; ſo that he could do nothing more, than try to diſconcert Philip's meaſures, by a diverſion under the conduct of the duke of Juliers. When the king of France heard, that this general had taken the field, he detached the earl of Artois, who, meeting him, near Furnes, gave him battle, and routed his army. The duke of Juliers was ſlain, in the engagement; and the earl of Artois loſt his eldeſt ſon. After this defeat, Guy durſt not ſtir from Ghent and Bruges, where he expected Edward; and, beſides, he was greatly perplexed, on account of the diviſions in his country; for there were two parties in Flanders, one named Porte-lys, in the intereſt of France, and the other for the earl.

Edward arrives in Flanders. T. Wikes.

Edward arrived, at laſt, but with forces very unequal to the great undertaking; becauſe he depended upon the allies, who had broken their word. At his entry into Bruges, he found the whole city in confuſion, by reaſon of the animoſity of the two foreſaid factions; and it was, with difficulty, that he, at length, appeaſed the commotions of the city, by granting the inhabitants certain privileges, relating to their commerce with England. After that, he came to Ghent, which was diſtracted with the ſame diviſions; ſo that, as, on his part, he did not bring with him all the forces he had promiſed, he himſelf was mortified to ſee, how unable the earl of Flanders was, to ſupply the troops he had been made to expect. The Flemings were divided, about the war; for, tho' ſome approved of it, others maintained it to be deſtructive to their country, and undertaken by their prince, for his own, or the king of England's, advantage. Whilſt Edward was intent upon compoſing theſe differences, ſo prejudicial to his affairs, Philip, after a three months ſiege, became maſter of Liſle; and, being poſſeſſed of this place, he eaſily reduced Douay, Courtray, and ſome other towns in the neighbourhood; then he marched to Bruges, which ſurrendered, without any reſiſtance; and he deſigned to burn the Engliſh fleet, which lay at anchor, at Dam; but the earl of Valois, who had undertaken this expedition, not being ſecret enough in his preparations, found that the Engliſh ſhips were ſailed from that harbour.

A truce between the two kings.

Edward perceived, that his principal allies had deſerted him, tho' they had taken his money; and the ſupplies, he could expect from the earl of Flanders, were uncertain and inconſiderable, on account of the Porte-lys faction, which oppoſed all reſolves, in the leaſt, detrimental to France. His own troops were inſufficient to withſtand his enemy's forces; and freſh commotions, in Scotland, rendered his preſence neceſſary, in England, where too he was apprehenſive, that his abſence might occaſion ſome troubles. All theſe conſiderations, together, induced him to ſeek ſome expedient to get off, without being obliged to abandon the earl of Flanders, whom he had engaged in his quarrel; and the beſt, he could find, was to deſire a truce, which was granted him, ſolely, in reſpect to the king of Sicily and the earl of Savoy, who uſed their intereſt for him. Philip, by this truce, which was to laſt no longer than till the Epiphany, for Guienne, and till St. Andrew's day, for Flanders, continued in poſſeſſion of the places he had taken; and, probably, this condition was a means of prolonging the truce, for two years, Philip being very well pleaſed peaceably to enjoy his conqueſts. How deſirous ſoever Edward might be, to ſettle matters in Scotland, he ſpent the reſt of the winter, at Ghent, to try to unite the inhabitants of that powerful city, expecting great aſſiſtance, from thence, when the truce was expired; but, during his ſtay, he was in danger of his life, by a ſedition of the citizens, who were reſolved to murder all the Engliſh. It is ſaid, that he owed the preſervation of it to the generoſity of a Flemiſh knight, of the Porte-lys faction, who, by his pains and intreaties, allayed the fury of the mutinous people; yet, after this, dreading ſome freſh inſult, he relinquiſhed his undertaking and returned to his dominions. Act. Pub.

Such was the ſucceſs of Edward's expedition into Flanders; and the powerful league, which ſeemed ready to ſwallow up France, ſerved only to drain the treaſure of the projector, and convince him, how difficult it would be to recover, by force, the country loſt, by his imprudence. That his projects ſhould miſcarry was not much; for the greateſt men are liable to that misfortune; but, what was ſtill more unfortunate, he could not extricate himſelf out of the difficulties, into which he was plunged, but at the expence of his honour. However, in ſpite of his promiſe to protect the earl of Flanders, to the laſt, he deſerted him, as will be ſeen, hereafter; but it is, now, time to return to Scotland, which is to be the principal ſubject of the ſequel of this reign.

The affairs of Scotland.

Though Edward had conquered Scotland, he had not ſubdued the hearts of the Scots, who were extremely impatient under the yoke he had impoſed on them; and, during his abſence in Flanders, they roſe up in arms, under the conduct of William Wallace, a man of a mean family, and of a ſtill meaner fortune, but of a very great and exalted genius. This generous Scot, though he had little authority, among his countrymen, undertook to raiſe his country out of the gulph of miſery, wherein it was plunged; whilſt the perſons of the higheſt rank, divided by factions, or adhering to the 1297. conqueror, ſtrove, who ſhould moſt perpetuate its ſlavery; and the Scotch writers give this glorious man a character, which equals him to the greateſt heroes, and are at a loſs for words ſublime enough, to expreſs his merit. Wallace, then, tho' ſcarce known in Scotland, reſolving to recover the liberty of his country, aſſembled a ſmall number of troops, for that purpoſe; but, with this body, how inconſiderable ſoever, he made ſuch an amazing progreſs, that one does not know, which to admire moſt, either the boldneſs, or the firſt ſucceſs, of his enterprize. All, that longed for liberty, finding that there was a man that had the reſolution to be their commander, liſted, in crowds, under his banner, and quickly formed a conſiderable army; and, with this aid, Wallace attacked the places poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, whoſe garriſons were weak, becauſe Edward had occaſion for his troops, in Flanders. By his ſeverity to thoſe that fell into his hands, he ſo terrified the reſt, that ſcarce any place held out to extremity, in order to avoid the ſame treatment; and, thus, he regained, in a very ſhort ſpace, all the towns taken by the Engliſh, leaving them only the ſingle town of Berwick; which ſignal ſucceſſes created, in his army, ſuch an admiration, for his bravery, that, without ſtanding upon the uſual formalities, he was declared regent of the kingdom. Edward, then in Flanders, hearing of Wallace's progreſs, haſtened the concluſion of the foreſaid treaty, and returned into England; being reſolved to puniſh, with ſeverity, the revolt of the Scots.

Philip and Edward chuſe the pope, for umpire. Act. Pub.

Before he entered upon this expedition, it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſettle two affairs of equal importance; firſt, to find out ſome method, to bring about a peace with France, leſt Philip ſhould aſſiſt the Scots; and, ſecondly, to give the ſatisfaction to the people, he had promiſed, after his return. The beſt expedient, he could deviſe, to accompliſh his firſt deſign, was to procure Philip's conſent to refer their difference to Boniface VIII, who was not yet at variance with that prince, as he was afterwards; and, Philip accepting this propoſal, the two monarchs left their conteſts to the pope's arbitration, not as head of the church, but as a private perſon, under the name of Benedict Cajetan.

Edward confirms the great charter. M. Weſt.

Edward, in order to gain the affection of his ſubjects, convened a parliament; wherein, of his own accord, he confirmed the great charter. Indeed, he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on having this clauſe inſerted in his confirmation, "Saving the prerogatives of the crown"; but, the parliament oppoſing it, with great warmth, he choſe to deſiſt, which had a very good effect upon the people.

1298. He marches into Scotland, Walſing.

Edward, having diſpatch'd both theſe affairs, in a ſatisfactory manner, appeared at the head of a numerous army; and, advancing into the middle of Scotland, he met his enemies, at Falkirk. The two armies were encamped ſo near together, that the Engliſh, hearing a great ſhout in the enemy's camp, ran to their arms, in the utmoſt hurry, expecting an attack; and the king alſo would mount his horſe; but, as he was putting his foot in the ſtirrup, the horſe, frighted by the noiſe that was made, threw him on the ground, and, with a kick, broke two of his ribs; yet this unhappy accident did not prevent him from being in the battle, which quickly enſued, and, commanding, with his uſual preſence of mind, the battle proved bloody, and, at the ſame time, very fatal to the Scots; who, according to ſome authors, loſt 60,000 men; but this account is ſcarce credible. Others, who reduce the number to 10,000, are, perhaps, as wide of the truth; yet, however that be, the loſs of the Scots was ſo great, that, for a long ſpace, they were unable to hold up their heads. Wallace, with the remains of his army, retired, behind the northern fens, where it was impoſſible to follow him; and, in the interim, Edward, improving his victory, retook all the fortified places, with the ſame eaſe he had loſt them, ſo that he may be ſaid, on this occaſion, to conquer Scotland, a ſecond time; but having given neceſſary orders, for the preſervation of the kingdom, he returned to England, where he was called by important affairs. 1298.

and defeats the Scots, at Falkirk. M. Weſt.

The Scotch lords are jealous of Wallace. Buchanan.

Wallace was not, then, in a condition to take advantage of Edward's abſence; for he had not only loſt his army, but likewiſe evidently perceiv'd, that the jealouſy of the Scotch lords was one of the principal cauſes of his defeat. His virtues, inſtead of inſpiring them with emulation, made them apprehenſive of his aſpiring to the crown; and, in this belief, they choſe rather, that their country ſhould groan under perpetual bondage, than that they ſhould be reduced to do homage to one of ſo mean extraction. Theſe ſuſpicions muſt, doubtleſs, have been ſpread, among the nobility; ſince Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, ſon of the candidate to the crown, upbraided Wallace, on that account. This earl, who ſerved in Edward's army, being, on the day of the battle of Falkirk, in purſuit of Wallace, who was retreating, and ſtopped by a little river, which the Scots had juſt paſſed, ſent to deſire him to come and ſpeak with him, on the oppoſite bank. Wallace conſenting to it, Robert repreſented to him, "That he would ruin himſelf, by his ambition; that he could not have any proſpect of withſtanding the forces of the king of England; and that, though he might flatter himſelf with ſuch hopes, the great men of the kingdom would never be brought to own him, for their ſovereign." Wallace replied, "That, in taking up arms, he was not, in the leaſt, ſwayed by ambition; that he acknowledged himſelf too unworthy of the throne, to dare to aſpire to it; but that his only view was to deliver his country, which the great men of the realm ſuffered to periſh, by their cowardice." It is ſaid, that this reply made ſuch an impreſſion on Bruce, that he burſt out into tears; and that he reſolved, from that very moment, to exert his utmoſt ſtrength, to free Scotland from the ſlavery ſhe groaned under.

In the mean while, Wallace, being ſenſible that the jealouſy of the Scotch nobility, with reſpect to him, was prejudicial to the intereſts of

Edward puſhes the negotiation of peace with France.

Upon Edward's return into England, he laboured to promote the negotiation, now in the hands of the pope, for the reſtitution of Guienne; for, ever ſince he deſpaired of regaining that province, by arms, the alliance of the earl of Flanders was a burden to him, being a perpetual obſtacle to the concluſion of the peace. He reſolved, therefore, to abandon his ally; and the unfortunate earl, deſerted by the king of England, and, on the other hand, preſſed by the earl of Valois, who commanded the French army in Flanders, was in the greateſt perplexity; but, in this wretched ſituation, he was perſuaded, at length, to ſurrender himſelf to that prince, who promiſed to conduct him to Paris, that he might treat, in perſon, with the king, and that, if he could not, within a year, obtain a peace, he ſhould be at liberty to return into his dominions; but Philip, not thinking himſelf obliged, by his brother's word, detained the earl priſoner.

1299. The truce is prolonged. Act. Pub.

The two years truce, between France and England, being about to expire, the ambaſſadors of the two kings met, at Montreuil, upon the ſea; where the pope ſent them his ſentence of arbitration. The ſubſtance of it was, that Edward ſhould, again, take poſſeſſion of Guienne, and, to reſtore union between the two monarchs, ſhould marry Margaret, ſiſter to Philip; that Iſabella, daughter of the ſame Philip, ſhould be given to the prince of Wales, Edward's ſon; and that John Baliol, formerly king of Scotland, ſhould be delivered to the pope's nuncio, to be ſecured, where he ſhould judge it convenient. The plenipotentiaries of the two crowns ſigned this ſentence; but, as ſeveral things were to be adjuſted, in order to put it in execution, they agreed upon a truce, which was often prolonged, before the treaty of peace was concluded; and, in the interim, Baliol was delivered to the biſhop of Vicenza, the pope's nuncio, who committed him to the cuſtody of ſome French biſhops.

A truce is granted to Scotland. Buchanan.

When the new regent of Scotland heard, that a treaty was negotiating, at Montreuil, between France and England, he ſent deputies to Philip, to intreat him to procure Scotland to be included; and, as Edward deſpaired of the recovery of Guienne, by any other way than a treaty, it was not unlikely, that he would grant Scotland tolerable terms, if the king of France would ſeriouſly endeavour to obtain them. At firſt, indeed, Philip attempted to perſuade Edward to leave Scotland in quiet; but he no ſooner propoſed it, than he found it impoſſible to procure any thing, except ſome little advantages, which too they could not purchaſe, without a formal acknowledgment of the power that enſlaved them. Edward was in poſſeſſion of Scotland, where he, now, ſcarce met with any oppoſition; ſo that to propoſe his granting a peace to that kingdom was, in effect, to deſire him to relinquiſh his conqueſt; and, beſides, he could not grant a ſeparate peace to the regent and his adherents, without leaving in Scotland a power independent on his own. All, therefore, that Philip could obtain was a ſeven months truce, for ſuch as were uneaſy under his yoke; and, if we may believe the Scotch hiſtorians, this truce was violated by England; but, poſſibly, this is only to juſtify Comyn's reſolution to break it. However that be, the regent aſſembled the lords, whom he knew to be well affected to their country, and repreſented to them its preſent wretched condition; aſſuring them, that, if they gave Edward time, to ſecure his conqueſt, he would put it out of their power, for the future, to recover their liberty; but that, as ſoon as the few remains of the Scots, which ſtill reſiſted, were ſubdued, he would entirely reduce the miſerable kingdom to a perfect ſlavery. He farther told them, that this deſign would, now, have been executed, had it not been retarded by the truces procured them by France; and that it was, therefore, neceſſary ſpeedily to reſolve to make a generous effort, to regain their freedom, or to leave their country in perpetual ſlavery. Then he ſhewed them, with what eaſe, they might deliver themſelves from the yoke, whilſt Edward depended on their weakneſs; and that the winter ſeaſon offered them advantages, which they could never more expect, when once it was over. Upon theſe remonſtrances, the lords, impatient of their ſervitude, unanimouſly reſolved to riſe in arms, and laboured to inſpire the people with the ſame reſolution; which was not a very difficult task, ſince the meaner ſort were ſtill more exaſperated againſt the Engliſh than the nobles, becauſe they were worſe treated; and, in a ſhort time, the whole kingdom riſing, it was impoſſible for the Engliſh garriſons to put a ſtop to ſo general a revolt. All the inhabitants of the town, as well as of the country, taking arms, the ſame day and hour, all the garriſons were attacked, at once, both within and without, with ſuch vigour and fury, that they were reduced to the neceſſity of deſiring leave to depart the kingdom, to prevent their being cut in pieces.

All Scotland riſes, and drives the Engliſh out of the kingdom. Buchanan.

1300. Edward's third expedition into Scotland.

Edward, to the laſt degree, incenſed at theſe proceedings, raiſed an army, with all expedition; and, as ſoon as the ſeaſon permitted, entered, a third time, ſword in hand, that unfortunate kingdom; and the Scotch army, conſiſting only of an ill-armed and undiſciplined militia, being unable to withſtand Edward, would have retired, upon his approach; but he purſued them ſo briskly, that, being, at length, overtaken, and forced to engage, they were entirely routed. Hiſtorians affirm, that the fate of Scotland would have been determined, that day, if the Engliſh could have followed 1300. followed their enemies thro' the fens; but, tho' known to the natives, they were inacceſſible to the conquerors.

The Scots, upon this defeat, deſpairing of making any farther reſiſtance, humbly intreated the king to permit them to redeem their lands, with money, and to reſtore their king, on what conditions he pleaſed; but he refuſed their requeſts. This cruelty induced them to put themſelves under the pope's protection, to whom they ſent ambaſſadors, with an offer of the ſovereignty of Scotland; and Boniface VIII, whoſe ambition is notorious, immediately, accepted this propoſal. He had been accuſtomed to treat chriſtian princes, in a very haughty manner, fancying that they ought implicitly to ſubmit to his will; and that his authority extended to temporal as well as ſpiritual affairs. In this belief, he thought, that his bare brief was ſufficient to cauſe Edward to quit all his pretenſions to Scotland; and, in the beginning of it, which was, as follows, he took for granted a thing, that had never been heard of, before.

The pope's bull to Edward. Act. Pub.

"BONIFACE, Servant of Servants, &c.
"To our beloved ſon, Edward, illuſtrious
"king of England, greeting and apoſtolical
"benediction.

"WE know, dear ſon, and experience has often convinced us, how great your devout "affection is for the church of Rome, who "upholds you in the bowels of love. We "know, I ſay, your ardent zeal and reve-"rence for her, and your readineſs to obey her "orders. This gives us a firm hope and en-"tire confidence, that your royal highneſs will "receive our words in good part, diligently "liſten to them, and effectually put them in "execution. Your royal highneſs may have "heard, and we doubt not but you remember, "that, of old, the kingdom of Scotland did, "and does ſtill, belong to the church of Rome, "as all the world knows; and, as we have "been informed, was never held, either of "yourſelf, or predeceſſors, &c.

The reſt of the brief, which is too long to be inſerted, here, contains moſt of the abovementioned objections, againſt the pretenſions of the kings of England to the ſovereignty of Scotland; and, as, in all probability, the pope had received inſtructions from the Scotch ambaſſadors, it is to be preſumed, that, if, during the aſſembly at Norham, the ſtates of Scotland returned no anſwer to Edward's allegations, it was not, for want of proofs. The pope likewiſe upbraided Edward, for all the outrages committed in the Scotch war, and, particularly, for the impriſonment of ſeveral biſhops; and, in a word, he made himſelf judge of the controverſy, between the Engliſh and Scots, ordering the king to ſend ambaſſadors to Rome, within ſix months, at fartheſt, after which, he would pronounce a final ſentence.

Edward threatens to deſtroy Scotland. Walſing.

This imperious proceeding was, by no means, proper to cauſe Edward to lay down his arms; who was ſo exaſperated at it, that, inſtead of regarding the pope's pretenſions, he ſwore, if he heard any more of them, he would deſtroy Scotland, from ſea to ſea. The deputies of the Scots, being preſent, could not hear theſe menaces, without emotion; and they told him, that he had ſtill many things to do, before matters could be brought to that extremity, ſince there was not a Scotchman but would ſpill the laſt drop of his blood, in the defence of his country; but, notwithſtanding Edward's reſolution, not to leave Scotland, before it was entirely reduced, he durſt not refuſe the king of France a truce, which he demanded, in behalf of the Scots. 1300.

Edward creates his ſon prince of Wales. M. Weſt.

During this, Edward inveſted his eldeſt ſon, now 17 years of age, with the principality of Wales, and the earldom of Cheſter; which was an occaſion of rejoycing to the Welch, who conſidered it, as a mark of the king's favour, becauſe the young prince was born in their country.

1301. The anſwer to the pope's bull.

In the beginning of the next year, the king called a parliament, at Lincoln, to conſult with them, about the pope's pretenſions to Scotland, and what anſwer ſhould be returned to his brief; and, the parliament being no leſs provoked at the haughtineſs of the court of Rome, than the king himſelf, it was reſolved, that a letter ſhould be ſent to the pope, ſigned by all the barons of the realm. In this letter, they plainly contradict what he had aſſerted, in his brief; affirming, that the crown of England had, immemorially, enjoyed the right of ſovereignty over Scotland, and that it was publickly known, that Scotland, as to temporals, never belonged to the church of Rome; that, therefore, the parliament would never ſuffer the king's prerogative to be diſputed, or ambaſſadors to be ſent to Rome, on that account, though the king himſelf ſhould be willing to be ſo condeſcending to the holy ſee; and, finally, they deſired the pope to leave the king and people of England, in the enjoyment of their rights, without giving them any diſturbance. This letter was followed, ſome months after, by another from Edward himſelf, with a memorial, like that drawn up, during the aſſembly at Norham, to prove, that the kingdom of Scotland had been always dependent on the crown of England; but, whereas, in the firſt, he carries his claim no higher than Edward the Elder, in this, he derives it from Brutus, firſt fabulous king of the iſle of Albion, tracing it thro' all the reigns of the fictitious kings mentioned in the hiſtory, or rather the romance of Geoffrey of Monmouth; which he did not venture to do, in the memorial drawn up for the Scots. However, it anſwered his purpoſe, with the pope and Italians, who were not ſufficiently verſed in the Engliſh hiſtory, to diſcern truth from falſhood; and, beſides, the king's letter to his holineſs was very reſpectful; but this moderation, when he was highly incenſed at the pope's pretenſions, muſt be aſcribed to the need he had of his aſſiſtance, with reſpect to the reſtitution of Guienne. Act. Pub.

Edward returns into Scotland and prolongs the truce.

The truce with Scotland was no ſooner expired, than Edward returned, and ſpent the whole winter, in that kingdom; but, when he was preparing to renew the war, he was ſo ſtrongly

1301. ſtrongly ſollicited by the king of France, that he conſented to prolong the truce with the Scots, till November. One might wonder, that he ſhould have ſo much complaiſance for Philip, if what ſome relate be true; that he had made a peace with France, at Montreuil, and taken poſſeſſion of Guienne; but it is certain, that the peace, between the two crowns, was not fully concluded, till 1303; for the treaty of Montreuil was properly only the pope's arbitration, containing ſeveral articles, the performance of which might meet with great difficulties, tho', in general, the two monarchs were well enough pleaſed with it. This renders Edward's deference for Philip not ſo ſurpriſing; ſince, by a refuſal, he might have retarded the concluſion of a peace, by which Guienne was to be reſtored.

He ſends Segrave into Scotland.

The truce with Scotland being about to expire, Edward ſent Segrave into that kingdom, to renew the war; whoſe intent, in marching thither, was not ſo much to fight the Scots, whom he thought unable to reſiſt him, as to deſtroy the country. With this view, he divided his army into three bodies, which marched, at ſome diſtance from one another, in order to take up the more ground; and, fancying that there was no danger, he marched, in a careleſs manner, without ſo much as informing himſelf of the poſture of his enemies; but he, unexpectedly, met them, near Roſlin, five miles from Edinburgh. As he was too far advanced with the body he commanded, to receive any benefit from the others, the Scotch army, under Comyn and Frazer, attacked him, without loſs of time, and put him to the rout; but the neareſt of the two other bodies, hearing that the general was attacked, haſted to his relief; yet, not being able to come ſoon enough, they were alſo defeated. Tho' the Scots were victorious, in both theſe engagements, their wounded being many, and their troops exceedingly harraſſed, they were willing to take ſome reſpite, when the third body of the Engliſh army advanced, to attack them; which put them into ſuch diſorder, that they would have, forthwith, retreated, if the exhortations of their generals had not revived their courage. This laſt battle was the ſharpeſt of the three; wherein the Engliſh, animated with a deſire of revenge, and the Scots, encouraged by their two victories, fought, for ſome time, with equal animoſity; but the Scots, at laſt, routed their enemies. The Engliſh hiſtorians take very little notice of theſe three battles, whilſt the Scots highly extol this triple victory; but, perhaps, neither of theſe accounts is exactly true. However that be, it cannot be denied, that Edward apprehended this loſs to be very conſiderable, ſince it made him reſolve to enter Scotland, once more, with a more formidable army than ever; tho' it was not in his power to execute his deſign, before the next year, becauſe he could not avoid including the Scots in a truce made with France, till June.

Three victories are gained by the Scots, in one day. Buchanan.

Before the expiration of the truce, the peace, between the two monarchs, was concluded, at Paris, on the 20th of May, 1303. Philip reſtored Guienne to Edward, who promiſed, on his part, to do him full homage, and without limitation, in the city of Amiens; but the allies of the two kings were not ſo much as mentioned in the treaty. On the contrary, each monarch obliged himſelf, by oath, not to aſſiſt the other's enemies; ſo that the Scots and the earl of Flanders were equally abandoned. This is one of the many remarkable inſtances, how little petty princes can rely upon their alliances with more powerful ſovereigns; for though the firſt article always runs, that neither peace nor truce ſhall be made, without the conſent of all parties, it is uſually the firſt that is violated. Indeed, Philip perſuaded the Scots, that he would procure them a ſeparate peace, at a future conference with Edward; but this was fartheſt from his thoughts; for he had left the Scots to the mercy of the king of England, only to engage him to abandon the Flemings, who, having taken up arms againſt him, had, now, gained great advantages. Baliol, who was, by this treaty, deprived of all hopes of being ever reſtored, lived upon his eſtate in Normandy; where he ſpent the remainder of his days, as a private perſon.

1303. A treaty of peace, between France and England. Act. Pub.

The unexpected conteſts, between pope Boniface and Philip the Fair, had long delayed the concluſion of this peace; for the pope, who had projected to turn the arms of the Chriſtians againſt the Infidels, pretended arbitrarily to command all the princes of Europe, to end their quarrels, according to his caprice, and prepare to ſend, or lead, in perſon, their forces to the Holy-Land, and the haughtineſs, with which he would have treated the king of France, occaſion'd ſuch diſputes between them, as grew, at length, to an open rupture. Philip, therefore, conſidering the pope, as his enemy, rejected his arbitration, and concluded a peace with Edward, without his intervention *.

The peace was made without the pope.

Edward, having entered into an alliance with France, carried his arms, a fourth time, into Scotland, with ſo numerous an army, that penetrated even to the utmoſt bounds of the iſland, ravaging all parts of the country; for the Scots were unable to withſtand ſuch a formidable power. Wallace alone kept cloſe to him, with ſome troops, in order to revenge the Scots on the Engliſh ſoldiers, that ventur'd to ſtir from the body of the army; but, notwithſtanding Edward's extraordinary ſucceſs, he was not ſo ſevere to thoſe who voluntarily ſubmitted, as he was, in his former expedition; for he found, that, by driving them to deſpair, he had himſelf induced them to revolt; wherefore, he treated favourably ſuch as ſurrendered, permitting them to redeem their lands; which he had, before, refuſed; and all the great men of the kingdom, perceiving no other remedy, were willing to embrace it.

Edward's fourth expedition into Scotland. Buchanan.

* This year, the ſaid pope died, on October 12, after he had been charged by the king of France with hereſy, ſimony, and murder, impriſoned, and plundered of all his goods. Walſing.

1303. Edward, before he left Scotland, ordered Sterling-caſtle to be aſſaulted, which held out, the whole winter; and the vigorous defence of the 1304. beſieged obliged the king to be there, in perſon, as ſoon as the weather permitted. However, it was July, before he brought them to capitulate; and, according to Buchanan, contrary to the articles of the capitulation, he impriſoned the governor and officers of the garriſon.

The taking of Sterling compleated Edward's fourth expedition and third conqueſt; but, tho' Scotland may juſtly be ſaid to be conquer'd, on this occaſion, there were ſtill in the country, out of the reach of the Engliſh arms, certain impenetrable places, which ſerved for a retreat and ſanctuary to thoſe that could not live in ſlavery, and who greatly promoted the reſtoration of the whole kingdom to its antient liberty. This Edward himſelf dreaded, in the midſt of his ſucceſſes; and the rigorous treatment of the brave Wallace, who was baſely betray'd into his hands, evidently proves, that he did not think the Scots ſubdued, though he was maſter of Scotland. To deter them, by the puniſhment of this glorious man, whom he regarded, as the ſole author of their revolt, he cauſed him to be tried, condemned, and executed, as guilty of high-treaſon, and ordered his four quarters to be hung up, in four of the principal towns in the kingdom; which ſentence was pronounced by Engliſh judges, tho' Wallace was a Scotchman, and had never owned the juriſdiction of Edward. To excuſe, in ſome meaſure, this extraordinary ſeverity, ſome hiſtorians charge Wallace with having committed exceſſive cruelties; but neither theſe accuſations, nor the manner of his death, have been able to hinder poſterity from doing him the juſtice he deſerved; for unprejudiced people ſtill account him a heroe worthy of a better fate.

1305. Edward's ſeverity towards Segrave. M. Weſt.

Edward, having finiſhed his buſineſs in Scotland, returned into England; where he, immediately, applied himſelf to cauſe his authority to be reſpected, for which ſome among the barons ſhewed but little regard; and Segrave was, firſt of all, attacked, for an example to the reſt. This lord being accuſed of ſome miſdemeanour, to vindicate his innocence, challenged his accuſer to a duel, according to the cuſtom of thoſe days; but the king, judging it improper to conſent to it, Segrave embarqued, in order to fight, out of the kingdom. Though his diſobedience was, in ſome meaſure, ſoftened, by forbearing to fight, in Edward's dominions; yet he apprehended it to be of too great conſequence, to be paſſed over, with impunity; and no ſooner did Segrave return, than he was taken into cuſtody, and brought to his trial. The judges were at a loſs, what ſentence they ſhould pronounce, upon this affair, concerning which there was apparently no law to direct them; but, after three days conſultation, they declared him worthy of death, adding, in their ſentence, that it ſhould be in the king's power to pardon him. Edward, being extremely provoked at the boldneſs of the judges, who ſeemed to preſcribe bounds to his prerogative, as if he could not exerciſe his clemency, without their permiſſion, gave them a ſevere reprimand; yet he pardoned Segrave, upon the interceſſion of certain lords, who offered to become ſureties, for his good behaviour *.

The commiſſion of Trail-Baton. Act. Pub.

But this was not the only inſtance of Edward's ſeverity, after his return. He was informed, that juſtice was adminiſtered, in all parts of the kingdom, with great negligence and partiality; that the magiſtrates were bribed with preſents, and the rich ſcreened from the rigour of the laws, whilſt the poor lay expoſed to the oppreſſion and tyranny of the great; and, ſuch a diſorder calling for a ſpeedy and effectual redreſs, he gave an extraordinary commiſſion to judges, nominated by himſelf, to go into all the counties and ſtrictly enquire concerning all malefactors, of what rank ſoever, impowering them to execute their ſentences, upon the ſpot. This commiſſion was ſtiled Trail-Baton †, a word whoſe derivation is unknown, about which there are ſeveral conjectures too long to be inſerted; but it is ſufficient to obſerve, in order to give a notion of this extraordinary court, that it was much the ſame with that in France, called Grands Jours. This ſeverity was a cheque to thoſe, that expected to ſcreen themſelves from juſtice, by their credit and riches; and, at the ſame time, it filled the king's coffers, with the mulcts and fines of the guilty.

The prince of Wales is publickly impriſon'd Fabian.

To theſe two inſtances of ſeverity, he added a third, very fit to demonſtrate his intention, that the laws ſhould be obſerved, without reſpect to birth, or dignity; for, prince Edward, his ſon, being perſuaded by Piers Gaveſton, one of his favourites, to commit ſome outrage againſt the biſhop of Cheſter, he ordered him to be publickly impriſoned, and would not ſuffer his rank to exempt him from juſtice.

This proceeding would, doubtleſs, have been more agreeable to the Engliſh, if what he did,

* Thirty of his peers, girt with ſwords, who offered to be bound, body and goods, that he ſhould be forthcoming, whenſoever the king ſhould require it. M. Weſt.

† This old French word ſignifies to draw a ſtaff; and Mr. Tyrrel gives the following account of it, from the Eveſham-Chronicle, which derives it from a certain inſtrument, antiently uſed by ſhoemakers, to beat their apprentices, called a Trayle-baſton. The king, in his return out of Scotland, was told this ſtory, of thoſe who then made it a trade to take money, to beat other men: A certain wicked perſon, having hired ſome of theſe ruffians, to beat another man, whom he durſt not meddle with himſelf, they cudgelled him very ſeverely; but, chancing to know one of them, he found out who it was that had employed them; upon which, intreating them to ſpare him, he promiſed them, if they would give as many blows to him that hired them, he would reward them doubly, to which they conſented. Accordingly, in their return, they met with the man that firſt ſet them to work, who asked them, whether they had done, as he had ordered them? They anſwered, yes; and that they were to receive as much more, for the like buſineſs; ſo one of them, being a ſhoemaker, crying out Trayle-baſton, they all fell upon him, and cudgelled him twice as much as they did the other. The king, though, at firſt, he ſmiled at this ſtory, to ſecure his people, for the future, from ſuch malefactors, iſſued out the foreſaid commiſſion; which may be ſeen, at large, in Rymer's Fœd.

1305. ſoon after, had ſhewn the ſame moderation and regard for his ſubjects. Clement V, a native of Bourdeaux, ſucceeding Boniface VIII, Edward improved his intereſt with the new pope, to obtain a diſpenſation from the oath he had taken, to maintain the two charters of liberties; and his holineſs did not ſcruple to grant him that favour. He ſuppoſed, as he affirms, in his bull, that the king was compelled to take that oath; and that ſuppoſition, though falſe, appeared to him a ſufficient reaſon, to abſolve him from the ſame; and it is pretended, that Edward purchaſed this diſpenſation, by a preſent of gold plate to the pope. The alarm, this ſtep occaſioned in the kingdom, was not groundleſs; for it was ſoon perceived, that the king aſſumed a greater authority, than was conſiſtent with the laws and cuſtoms of the realm; and he even affected to diſcover his deſign, in a very manifeſt and publick manner. Clement V. granted him a tenth upon the clergy, for three years, reſerving one half to himſelf, for the occaſions of the holy ſee; but the parliament, who could not bear this ſhameful trade, which tended to impoveriſh the clergy, without any neceſſity, and to drain the kingdom of money, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and prohibited the collectors to levy the tenth. However, Edward removed this prohibition, by his own authority, and permitted the collectors to proceed; which arbitrary act, immediately, ſucceeding the foreſaid diſpenſation, led the Engliſh to apprehend, that he intended to deprive them of their liberties; and, in all appearance, they had but too much reaſon to entertain theſe apprehenſions; but, if Edward had any ſuch intent, the troubles, which ſuddenly broke out a-freſh in Scotland, prevented the execution, and rendered the pope's favour ineffectual.

1306. The affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. The Scots, though ſo often vanquiſhed, and conſtrained to ſwear fealty to Edward, could not inure themſelves to his yoke; and Robert Bruce, earl of Carric, was one of thoſe that thought they had they had the greateſt cauſe to complain; for Edward had not only excluded Robert, his father, from the crown, but, though he had promiſed to place him on the throne, in the room of Baliol, made not the leaſt ſtep towards the performance of his promiſe. Nevertheleſs, Robert, all along, ſerved him, with fidelity, both before and after his father's death; but, his diſcourſe with Wallace, on the day of the battle of Falkirk, and the king's whole conduct, convincing him, that Edward had ſolely conſulted his own intereſt, he entertained the generous deſign of exerting himſelf, to free his country from the ſervitude to which it was reduced; and he likewiſe thought of procuring the crown of Scotland, to which he pretended to have a lawful title, notwithſtanding the ſentence given againſt the earl, his father. John Comyn, ſirnamed the Red, another Scotch lord of great diſtinction in Scotland, though of leſs credit than Bruce, had, or ſeemed to have, the ſame concern, for the liberty of his country; and this conformity cauſed theſe two lords to communicate their ſentiments to each other, after long ſounding one another, without daring to ſpeak their minds; and, at length, both growing bolder, they had ſeveral interviews, wherein they agreed upon means, to accompliſh their projects. Theſe conferences ended in an agreement, containing the two following articles. I. That they ſhould act, in conjunction, to promote Robert Bruce to the crown of Scotland. II. That, in conſideration of Comyn's ſervices, Bruce ſhould conſign to him all his private patrimony, and appoint him his lieutenant-general. Upon this, Robert came to Edward's court, where it was neceſſary to gain certain Scotch lords, who were attached to that prince. 1306.

Comyn betrays Bruce. Walſing. In the interim, whether Comyn repented of what he had done, or, as ſome affirm, had contrived this plot, on purpoſe to enſnare Robert, he diſcovered the whole affair to the king; and he even ſent him the original agreement, under both their hands and ſeals. Edward, at firſt, reſolved to apprehend Robert, immediately; but, leſt he ſhould, thereby, miſs of his accomplices, he was contented with narrowly watching him; hoping to make ſome freſh diſcoveries, by means of Comyn, to whom Robert communicated, by letters, all his proceedings at court. The king's deſign could not be ſo ſecret, but it was perceived by the earl of Gomer, an old friend of the family of Bruce, then at London; who being ſenſible, that Robert was narrowly watched, and not daring, by word of mouth, to inform him of it, ſent him a pair of ſpurs, with ſome pieces of gold, as if he had borrowed them of him; but Robert, who was a prince of great penetration, preſently diſcerned, that there was ſome myſtery in this pretended reſtitution of his friend; and, concluding that he meant, by it, to adviſe him to make his eſcape, he, at once, came to a reſolution, which he executed, with ſuch addreſs and diligence, that it was impoſſible to prevent him, and much more to overtake him. As he had communicated his thoughts only to Comyn, he did not queſtion but he was betrayed, by that treacherous friend; and, accordingly, as ſoon as he arrived in Scotland, he repaired to Dumfries, where Comyn then was, and, meeting him in the church of the Cordeliers, who little expected his coming, ſtabbed him, with his own hand. This bold ſtroke, added to the plot he had projected, expoſing him to the king's reſentment, he openly declared himſelf, well knowing that there was no ſafety for him but in the ſucceſs of his deſigns; and ſuch numbers flocked to him, that he was ſoon in a condition to go well attended to Scone, where he was ſolemnly crowned; after which, all the people, in general, eſpouſed his cauſe.

Bruce eſcapes to Scotland, and kills Comyn.

He is crowned king of Scotland.

Edward was extremely mortified, to find that he was miſtaken, in imagining that he had entirely ſecured the poſſeſſion of that kingdom; wherefore, he reſolved to reduce it to ſuch a ſtate, that there ſhould be no more danger of a revolt. With this view, he ſent Audemar of Valence, earl of Pembroke, with an army to prepare the way, whilſt he aſſembled all his forces, at Carliſle; and, to render his expedition

Bruce is defeated, and forced to abſcond. Buchanan.

In the mean while, Robert made a great progreſs in Scotland; and he would have enlarged his conqueſts, if the earl of Pembroke had not ſtopped his career. This lord, entering Scotland, marched directly to Robert, who, thinking it improper to retreat, advanced, in order to meet him; and, the two armies coming to an engagement, that of Robert was put to the rout; but, as his loſs was not great, he was willing to hazard a ſecond battle, wherein he had no better ſucceſs. Theſe two defeats, upon one another, obliging him to quit the country, he withdrew to one of the Hebrides, where he lay concealed, at a relation's houſe, in expectation of a more favourable juncture; and, ſhortly after, Edward, arriving with a powerful army, found the Scots in conſternation, and their troops diſperſed; ſo that, having no enemies to encounter, he ſent out detachments, on all ſides, to ſeize Bruce's adherents. Great numbers were taken, who all felt that prince's ſeverity; three of Robert's brothers loſt their heads, on a ſcaffold; and his queen, being conducted into England, was kept in cloſe confinement. Edward's age and vexation, to be ſo often obliged to begin afreſh, rendered him ſo inexorable, that he ſcarce pardoned any one perſon; and the biſhops of Glaſcow and St. Andrews, who were taken, with their coats of mail over their habits, would have fallen a ſacrifice to his vengeance, had he not been afraid of the pope's reſentment; however, they were ſent into England, and thrown into priſon. The earl of Athol, though allied to Edward, and the royal family of Scotland, was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt, only by the heighth of the gallows on which he was executed; the counteſs of Buquhan, who aſſiſted at Robert's coronation *, being put into a wooden cage, was placed, as a ridiculous ſpectacle to the people, on the walls of Berwick-caſtle; and Mary, her ſiſter, was expoſed, in the ſame manner, at Roxborough.

Edward, having thus taken vengeance on Robert's adherents, who were ſo unhappy as to fall into his hands, ſpent the winter, at Carliſle, where he convened the laſt parliament of his reign; and the firſt buſineſs of that aſſembly was, about means to ſecure the poſſeſſion of Scotland, by uniting it to England. Edward was reſolved to keep the Scots in obedience, and even to uſe, for that purpoſe, the moſt rigorous methods; but the face of affairs was much altered, in that country, before he could put his deſign in execution.

This parliament alſo very induſtriouſly endeavoured, to prevent the extortions of the court of Rome, which were ſtill continued, as before, in ſpite of the means made uſe of to ſuppreſs them; nay, ſtatutes were enacted, which might have redreſſed this grievance, had they been punctually obſerved. 1307.

Piers Gaveſton is baniſhed the kingdom. Act. Pub.

At this very time, the biſhop of Litchfield, high-treaſurer, cauſing the king to perceive the aſcendant, Piers Gaveſton, a young man, of a very debauched life, had over the prince, his ſon, and the dangerous conſequences of ſo great a familiarity, Edward, with the advice of the parliament ſtill aſſembled, baniſhed Gaveſton the realm, as a corrupter of the prince; and he, moreover, obliged his ſon to promiſe, with an oath, never to recall him. He likewiſe made Gaveſton ſwear, that he would never return into England; and, on that condition, he allowed him a penſion of 100 marks, to be paid out of the revenues of Guienne.

Bruce's great ſucceſs. Buchanan.

Notwithſtanding Edward's reſolution, to the contrary, the time of that kingdom's deliverance was at hand; for God, who was pleaſed to chaſtiſe the Scots, had not decreed the utter deſtruction of that nation, though it was reduced to the laſt extremity. Upon Edward's leaving Scotland, Robert Bruce ſallied out of his retreat, and effectually improved the king's abſence, and the ſharpneſs of the winter, which hindered the Engliſh troops from acting; for he aſſembled the remains of his diſperſed army, and reinforced them with freſh ſupplies, which the Scotch lords, incenſed at Edward's ſeverity, brought him from all quarters. With theſe troops, he attacked the earl of Pembroke, the Engliſh general, and gained a ſignal victory, wherein the earl was taken priſoner; and then he marched againſt the earl of Glouceſter, who commanded another body, and forced him to retreat to the caſtle of Aire, which he beſieged, though without ſucceſs. As he was maſter of the field, and had none to reſiſt him, he eaſily took ſeveral places, which he cauſed to be diſmantled; as well not to be obliged to leave garriſons, as to prevent the Engliſh from fortifying them, hereafter.

Edward reſolves utterly to deſtroy Scotland. M. Weſt.

Edward, aſtoniſhed at this unexpected revolution, and implacably exaſperated againſt the Scots, ſummoned all the vaſſals of the crown to meet him, at Carliſle, about the middle of the ſummer, on pain of forfeiting their fees; reſolving to march into the heart of Scotland, and deſtroy that kingdom, from ſea to ſea, as he had often threatened; but God did not permit him to execute this barbarous purpoſe; for he was ſcarce arrived, at Carliſle, where he had drawn together the fineſt army England had ever ſeen, when he was ſeized by a diſtemper, which put an end to his days, and all his projects. He no ſooner found that he was ill, than he knew he ſhould die; and, whilſt his mind was ſound, he ſent for prince Edward, his eldeſt ſon, and earneſtly recommended to him three things: Firſt of all, vigorouſly to proſecute the war with Scotland, till he had entirely ſubdued the Scots; adviſing him, to carry along with him his bones, at the head of

The ſecond thing was to ſend his heart to the Holy-Land, with 32000 l. ſterling, which he had provided, for the ſupport of the holy ſepulchre; and he, in the third place, ordered him never to recal Gaveſton. After theſe his laſt orders to his ſon, he cauſed himſelf to be carried, by eaſy journies, into Scotland, being deſirous to die in a country, he had, thrice conquered; and, in this manner, he advanced, as far as the little town of Burgh *, where, a dyſentery increaſing his ſickneſs, he departed this life, on the 7th of July, 1307, in the 68th year of his age, after a reign of 34 years, 7 months, and 20 days. His corpſe was removed to Waltham, and from thence to Weſtminſter-abbey; where, being done over with wax, it was laid by Henry, his father †.

Edward's encomium and character.

Thus, lived and died Edward I. This prince was, doubtleſs, endowed with very noble qualities, and particularly great valour and prudence; and, having the art of maſtering his paſſions, he could return to the right way, when he had deviated from it; a quality never to be ſufficiently commended, in a ſovereign. If we compare him with his father, his grandfather, and his own ſon, his ſucceſſor, we ſhall find that he vaſtly ſurpaſſed them all; and this compariſon, which one can ſcarce avoid making, has been ſo much to his advantage, that the Engliſh hiſtorians have given him the higheſt encomiums, repreſenting him to be the greateſt prince of his age. A famous author has even affirmed, "That God had pitched his "tabernacle, in the breaſt of that monarch;" but his whole conduct, with reſpect to Scotland, does not conveigh ſuch an advantageous idea of that monarch. However, without examining too ſtrictly the expreſſions uſed by the hiſtorians, in his praiſe, it cannot be denied, that he was a great king, and that England received conſiderable advantages, from his adminiſtration; for the kingdom, weakened by the ill management of the two preceding kings, was reſtored to its former ſplendor, by the abilities of Edward, who knew how to render himſelf beloved and reſpected by his ſubjects, as well as dreaded by his neighbours. The conqueſt of Wales, to no purpoſe, attempted by his predeceſſors, added a great luſtre to his reign, and was very beneficial to England; and that of Scotland would, doubtleſs, have gained him more honour, had it been entirely compleated, ſince the Scotch hiſtorians would have ſpoken of him, in different terms, if, at the time of their writing, they had been Engliſh. 1307.

Camden.

He was very perſonable, and taller than the generality of men, by the head; his hair was black, and curled naturally, and his eyes, of the ſame colour, ſparkled with uncommon vivacity. He would have been perfectly well ſhaped, if his legs, which were ſomewhat too long, from whence, he was ſirnamed Long-ſhanks, had been proportionable to the reſt of his body. He joined to his bodily perfections a ſolid judgment, an uncommon penetration, and a prudent conduct, which very rarely ſuffered him to make a falſe ſtep; and he had alſo principles of juſtice, honour, and honeſty, which reſtrained him from conniving at vice, not only in his moſt intimate courtiers, but even in his own ſon; beſides, he was of an exemplary chaſtity, a virtue very ſeldom found in ſovereign princes. All theſe noble qualities procured him the love and eſteem of his ſubjects; which did not a little contribute to the rendering his reign peaceable, at home, whilſt his arms were employed, abroad; but, as for the affair of Scotland, it gained more honour than real advantages to England, ſince, after torrents of blood ſpilt, in that quarrel, the Engliſh were conſtrained, at laſt, to relinquiſh their project.

Edward had, by Eleanor of Caſtile, his firſt wife, four ſons and nine daughters *; but Edward II, his ſucceſſor, was the only ſon that ſurvived him. * Queen Eleanor died, the 28th of November, 1291, at Richard de Weſton's houſe at Hardeby, in Lincolnſhire; and, at the places where her body reſted, were erected to her memory goodly croſſes, viz. at Lincoln, Grantham, Stanford, Geddington, Northampton, Stony-Stratford, Dunſtable, St. Alban's, Waltham, and Charing. Her bowels were buried in the cathedral at Lincoln, where the king erected a Cenatoph for her, on which is placed her figure of gilt copper, with an inſcription; but her body lies in Weſtminſter-abbey, at the feet of Henry III, under a tomb of grey marble, having, on the north ſide, the arms of England and Leon and Ponthieu, with her figure as large as the life. It is remarkable, that queen Eleanor bore, quarterly, Gules, a Caſtle Or; and, Argent, a Lion rampant purple, which were the arms of Ferdinand III, king of Caſtile and Leon, her father, and quartered by him, being the firſt two coats that were borne, quarterly, in one ſhield, which king Edward III. next imitated, when he quartered France and England. Theſe arms, with thoſe of Ponthieu, viz. Or, three Bentlets Azure, within a border, Gules, are carved in ſtone, in ſeveral places, on the croſs erected to her memory, near Northampton. Edward's iſſue, by his ſecond wife.

Edward had two ſons and one daughter, by Margaret of France, his ſecond wife, whom he married, in the 60th year of his age, tho' ſhe was no more than 18 years old; and Thomas de Brotherton, the eldeſt, was earl of Norfolk and marſhal of England. Edmund bore the title of earl of Kent; and Eleanor, the daughter, would have been married to Otho, earl of Burgundy, had ſhe not died, in her childhood.

A ſeries of parliaments ſince his reign. Stat. de Tallagio non conce.

We have an uninterrupted ſeries of all the parliaments held in England, from the 22d year of this reign; and the conſtitution of theſe aſſemblies, as it is, at this day, was ſo firmly ſettled, in it, that there was an additional law made to the Great Charter, that no tax ſhould be levied upon the people, without the conſent of the commons.

The title of baron is limited.

It may be farther remarked, that, in Edward's reign, the title of baron, which was common to all that held lands of the crown, was confined to thoſe, whom the king ſummoned to parliament.

10. EDWARD II. ſirnamed of Caernarvon.

1307. The ſtate of England.

THE reign of Edward I. had been glorious and triumphant for England. The principality of Wales was united to the crown; Scotland, thrice, ſubdued, was upon the point of being conquered, a fourth time, the Engliſh army having entered the frontiers; and there were no more factions in the kingdom, a good underſtanding being happily eſtabliſhed between the ſovereign and the people. All this ſeemed amply to repair the loſſes ſuſtained by the crown, beyond ſea, in the reigns of John and Henry III, not ſo much through the weakneſs of the Engliſh, as the puſillanimity of thoſe two princes; and Edward of Caernarvon's age, who, when he aſcended the throne, was in his 23d year, his noble ſtature, comely mien, majeſtick preſence, joined to the advantage of deſcending from a father ſo univerſally eſteemed, inſpired the Engliſh with raiſed hopes. As no prince ever came to the crown, in more favourable circumſtances, ſo never was prince received, with a more general joy and greater applauſe; inſomuch that the extraordinary ſatisfaction expreſſed by the people, on this occaſion, ſeemed to be ſomewhat injurious to the glory of the deceaſed king.

Edward recalls Gaveſton, and loads him with favours. Act. Pub.

However, the very firſt ſtep of this prince blaſted all theſe agreeable hopes; for he had not diſcharged the laſt offices to the late king, his father, when, forgetting his oath concerning Gaveſton, he recalled that favourite, and, without ſo much as ſtaying for his return, made him, in an inſtant, the richeſt man in the kingdom; for he created him earl of Cornwall, and gave him the lands fallen to the crown, by the death of the late earl, ſon to Richard, king of the Romans. His impatience to load with favours a man, who had been juſt baniſhed from him, as the corrupter of his youth, evidently diſcovered the height of his paſſion, and its dangerous conſequences; for he not only recalled his favourite, who was deſpiſed by all the world, and, immediately after his return, preſented him with the iſle of Man, but, which, moſt of all, diſguſted the Engliſh lords, ſolely entruſted him with the adminiſtration of the affairs of the kingdom; and all publick offices and employments were diſpoſed of, at Gaveſton's pleaſure. The king, wholly intent upon pleaſing him, as a lover his miſtreſs, daily deviſed new ways, to procure him ſatisfaction; and, in a word, giving himſelf up entirely to his direction, he permitted him to act, as king, whilſt he gloried in being his ſubject, or ſlave. A more exceſſive paſſion is not to be met with in hiſtory; and, accordingly, people did not ſcruple to ſay, publickly, that the king was bewitched.

A deſcription and character of Gaveſton. J. Trokelow.

If a woman had been, thus, enamoured of Gaveſton, it could not have been thought very ſurpriſing, ſince he had all the qualifications proper to attract the love of the fair ſex; for he had a beautiful face, without the leaſt defect, a fine and eaſy ſhape, a noble and grand air; and, in all the exerciſes of the body, he was diſtinguiſhed, for his extraordinary addreſs. One could not avoid admiring his wit, and thoſe ſharp and quick repartees, peculiar to the Gaſcoigns, among whom he was born; and to all this ſome add an uncommon valour. If he had been leſs beloved by the king, he would have made a more laſting, though not ſo vaſt, a fortune; but the affection of his prince inſpired him with a pride, which occaſioned his deſtruction. He governed the ſtate, with an abſolute ſway, and would not ſhare his

† He was a ſervant to her former husband; and, the marriage being performed, in 1296, unknown to her father, Ralph was impriſoned, and all the lands and caſtles, formerly made over to earl Gilbert and counteſs Joanna, were ſeized into the king's hands; but Anthony Bec, biſhop of Durham, procured a reconciliation between the king and his daughter, and her new husband and his lands were reſtored. Ralph, ſoon after, was ſummoned to parliament, by the title of earl of Glouceſter and Hereford, which he enjoyed, till his ſon-in-law, Gilbert de Clare, came of age; but, afterwards, in all parliaments, he was ſummoned, as lord Monthermer. He had, by the ſaid Joanna, two ſons, Thomas and Edward; and Sir Thomas de Monthermer had an only daughter, Margaret, wife to John Montague, by whom, ſhe had John Montague, earl of Salisbury, from whom the preſent duke of Montague, the earls of Mancheſter and Sandwich, and the baron of Halifax derive their original. power

1307. power with any; hardly vouchſafing ſo much as to uſe the name of the king. His external accompliſhments rendered him ſo haughty and inſolent, that he thought himſelf ſuperior to all the great men; though, by his vices and debaucheries, he degraded himſelf below the very meaneſt. The principal means, he made uſe of, to gain Edward's affection, was a blind condeſcenſion to his deſires; and, having, at length, an abſolute influence over him, his only care was to indulge him in his pleaſures, to which that prince was too much inclined. What, then, could be expected from the ſtrict friendſhip of two ſuch perſons, but a ſcandalous licentiouſneſs, at court, and an entire decay of publick affairs? An unexperienced and mean-ſpirited miniſter, who regarded nothing but trifles, diverſions, balls, banquest, and ſome ſtill leſs innocent pleaſures, was very incapable of governing ſo large a kingdom; and the nation ſoon felt the fatal effects of ſuch an imprudent choice.

The biſhop of Litchfield is impriſon'd. Act. Pub.

Gaveſton's return was, immediately, followed by the diſgrace of Langton, biſhop of Litchfield and high-treaſurer; for Edward mortally hated that prelate, becauſe he was the chief promoter of Gaveſton's baniſhment. He no ſooner aſcended the throne, than he confined him in Wallingford-caſtle, and would not ſuffer any perſon to ſpeak, in his favour; and it was not without the preſſing inſtances, or rather menaces of the pope, that he releaſed him, after a long confinement; and, to this violence, he added the removal of all his father's officers and domeſticks, without ſo much as conſulting the advice of his council.

1308. The king's marriage. Act. Pub.

The beginnings of this reign being ſo very unpromiſing, the principal lords, betimes, projected means to reſtrain the impetuoſity of their prince, and curb his capricious temper; but they were interrupted, by the celebration of his nuptials. The king, his father, had contracted him to Iſabella of France, daughter to Philip the Fair, and had ſtrictly charged him, a little before his death, to conſummate the marriage, with all poſſible expedition; and this was the only inſtance wherein he made haſte to obey him; for, neglecting the war with Scotland, tho' it was no leſs neceſſary, he repaired to Boulogne, where the king of France waited for him, to deliver his daughter into his hands. No wedding was ever more magnificent; for four kings and four queens were preſent at it, beſides a great number of princes and princeſſes, lords and ladies, who formed the moſt numerous aſſembly of nobles that had been ſeen for many years.

Gaveſton is made guardian, in the king's abſence. Walſing.

Though Edward's voyage was very ſhort, it did not fail to produce ill effects; for he was ſo weak as to leave his favourite guardian of the realm, impowering him to diſpoſe of all vacant places and benefices, wardſhips, of young nobles, and, in a word, to act, in all things, with an unlimited authority. The barons were ſo incenſed, to ſee Gaveſton, thus, loaded with favours and honours, that they combined together, to prevent the king's coronation, tho' the day was appointed; but, Edward not being in a condition to diſſolve ſuch a powerful league, in which almoſt all the lords of the realm were engaged, paſſed his royal word to the barons, that, in the next parliament, he would grant whatever they could reaſonably deſire; and this promiſe gave them ſatisfaction; but they were extremely uneaſy at Gaveſton's being commiſſioned to carry the crown of St. Edward, with which the king was to be crowned; an honour that, by antient cuſtom, belonged to the princes of the blood. This preference, to the laſt degree, exaſperated the lords againſt the favourite, and, at the ſame time, filled them with indignation againſt the king, who ſeemed to glory, in his fondneſs for a man whom the whole nation deteſted. However, the coronation was ſolemnized, without oppoſition; and the biſhop of Wincheſter performed this ceremony, by order of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was out of the kingdom. The form of the coronation-oath was, as follows: 1308. Act. Pub.

The coronation-oath.

Biſhop of Wincheſter. "Sir, Will you "keep and confirm, by your oath to the people of England, the laws eſtabliſhed by the "pious kings, your predeceſſors, and particularly the laws, cuſtoms, and liberties, "granted to the clergy and people by the "glorious St. Edward, your predeceſſor?

King. "I will and promiſe it.

Biſhop. "Sir, Will you preſerve to God, "to his holy church, to the clergy and people, "the peace of God, fully, and to the utmoſt "of your power?

King. "I will.

Biſhop. "Sir, Will you cauſe to be obſerved, in all your judgments, right and "juſtice, with diſcretion, in mercy, and in "truth, as far as you are able?

King. "I will.

Biſhop. "Sir, Will you promiſe to keep "and cauſe to be kept the laws and ſtatutes, "that the community of your kingdom ſhall "judge fit to enact, and will you defend and "protect them, to the utmoſt of your power?

King. "I do promiſe it."

As this is the firſt perfect copy of a coronation-oath, that occurs in the Engliſh Hiſtory, it will not be improper to remark the advantage gained by the people, upon the royal prerogative, ſince the eſtabliſhment of Magna Charta; for this oath evidently ſhews, that, far from ſuppoſing the Great Charter to be the original title of the privileges, granted, by king John, to the people of England, it was conſider'd only, as a confirmation of the antient liberties of the nation. Upon this ſuppoſition, Edward II. was made to ſwear, that he would obſerve the laws of St. Edward, which were the ſame with thoſe of the Anglo-Saxons; leſt, by cauſing him to ſwear to keep the Great Charter, they might give occaſion to imagine, that the privileges of the people were founded on the conceſſions of their kings; but, whether Edward I. took the ſame oath, or it was firſt introduced, at the coronation of Edward II, I am not able to determine.

This ſolemnity was no ſooner over, than Edward forgot his promiſe to the lords; for he left him, 1308. him, as before, abſolute maſter of his own and the kingdom's affairs. As for Gaveſton, far from endeavouring to avert the impending ſtorm, he affected to govern with an arbitrary power; and he abuſed his influence over his maſter, to divert him from proſecuting the war with Scotland, which the king, his father, had ſo preſſingly recommended to him, and whereof his ſubjects impatiently waited the iſſue, in order to be eaſed of the burden. Inſtead of inſpiring the king with the love of glory and virtue, he filled the court with libertines, buffoons, and paraſites, and the like pernicious inſtruments, proper to corrupt his inclinations, though they had been naturally as good as they were vicious; and beſides, he had the ridiculous vanity to wear the king's jewels, and the crown itſelf, which Edward freely permitted. Such, at length, was the king's paſſionate fondneſs for him, that he was heard to ſay, if his power was equal to his affection, he would ſet the crown on Gaveſton's head; but, as that was impracticable, he would, at leaſt, raiſe him, as near the throne as poſſible, by giving him Margaret, his niece, ſiſter to the earl of Glouceſter, in marriage.

The hatred of the lords againſt Gaveſton.

Every freſh favour, conferred upon Gaveſton by the king, increaſed the hatred of the lords; and, indeed, an Engliſhman, exalted to ſo high a ſtation, would ſcarce have been endured, much leſs a private Gaſcoign gentleman, in whom they diſcovered no other merit, than a handſome ſet of features, an eaſy ſhape, and a ſparkling wit, very agreeable in converſation, but altogether unfit to govern a ſtate. They plainly perceived, that the king would never conſent to part with this favourite, unleſs he was forced; and, therefore, they laboured to draw into their league the members of the parliament, which was to meet, and accordingly did meet, in May, 1308. By the management of the lords, Gaveſton's baniſhment became the principal, or rather the ſole buſineſs of the ſeſſion; and the two houſes, being united in the ſame deſign, demanded of the king, in ſo ſtrong and poſitive a manner, that Gaveſton ſhould be baniſhed, that he durſt not oppoſe their demand. He was apprehenſive, that his refuſal would deprive him of the ſubſidies he expected, for the continuation of the war with Scotland, and, perhaps, dreaded ſomething worſe; and, therefore, without any fruitleſs diſputes, he ordered letters patent to be drawn up, promiſing to cauſe Gaveſton to depart the realm, before St. John Baptiſt's day next enſuing; though, in the interim, he daily heaped new favours upon him. Fifteen days after his engagement, he made him a grant of 3000 marks, per annum, in land; and, this proceeding evidently ſhewing, that he was, by no means, reſolved to part with his favourite, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had entered into the barons league, though he lay under great obligations to the king, excommunicated Gaveſton, provided he did not leave the realm, by the time preſcribed. Edward, diſregarding this cenſure, only intreated the pope to annul it; and, at the ſame time, he wrote to the king of France, his brother-in-law, to deſire him to negotiate an agreement between him and the barons, and ſo to manage, that he might keep his favourite. 1308.

Theſe meaſures were both unjuſt and unſeaſonable; for the lords, finding that the time appointed, for Gaveſton's departure, drew nigh, ſo ſtrenuouſly preſſed the king to keep his word, that he durſt not deny their requeſt; yet, in performing his promiſe, he gave his favourite a freſh mark of his affection, by making him governor of Ireland, with a very extenſive authority. However, this removal, in ſome meaſure, ſatisfied the lords, who hoped to take advantage of his abſence, to ruin him; but, as to Gaveſton himſelf, he was greatly diſpleaſed; for he not only perceived, that this change of England, for Ireland, was very diſadvantageous, but likewiſe, that his abſence from court would infallibly pave the way for his ruin. As he was abſolute maſter of the king, he ſcarce had arrived in Ireland, before he procured himſelf to be recalled, under the pretence of aſſiſting at a tournament, to be held at Wallingford; and the magnificence, with which he appeared, on this occaſion, with the great number of foreigners in his retinue, that ſerved him for guards, exceedingly increaſed the jealouſy of the lords, who found themſelves, thus, inſulted; and, beſides, he was ſo imprudent as to paſs ſatyrical jeſts on the earls of Lancaſter, Warwick, Warren, and Hereford, which would have provoked them, even though they had no other cauſe for complaint. He called the earl of Lancaſter, ſtage-player; the earl of Pembroke, Joſeph the Jew; the earl of Warwick, the wild boar of Ardenne; and he nicknamed all his private enemies, to render them ridiculous, or diſcover their faults. The lords, being braved by the favourite, and deceived by the king, aſſembled, to conſult about means to oblige Edward to keep his word; and, ſoon after, they preſented a petition to him, repreſenting that the ſtate and his own houſhold were ſo indiſcreetly managed, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to prevent the conſequences of this diſorder; and that the only proper method, in their judgment, was, for the king to commit to certain lords, nominated by the parliament, the care of regulating the government of the kingdom and his own domeſtick affairs. Edward had already given convincing proofs of his weakneſs, in his compliance with their former demands; and, therefore, they concluded, that, if, for the future, they ſhewed any reſolution, he would not have the courage to reſiſt them; and they were not miſtaken, in their conjectures. This prince, as timorous, on ſome occaſions, as he was haughty and imperious, on others, being incapable of diſcerning, when he ſhould give way, and when maintain his ground, inſtead of complying with the barons, when they firſt petitioned, for Gaveſton's removal, obſtinately perſiſted in retaining him, in direct contradiction to all the rules of policy; and, afterwards, far from vigorouſly oppoſing the motion of placing the government in other hands than his own, he, at once, yielded to their importunity; for, regardleſs of the conſequence of a condeſcenſion

The new regulation of the government. Act. Pub.

Purſuant to this, the lords, having finiſhed the regulation, preſented the plan to the king, who approved it, and impowered them, to cauſe it to be obſerved, for one year; which contained only ſix articles, whereof the two principal were: "That the king ſhould not "diſpoſe of any part of his revenues; which "ſhould, henceforward, be expended, in diſ-"charging his debts, and ſupporting his houſ-"hold, that he might live on his own income, "without taking any thing from others: That "the Great Charter ſhould be punctually ob-"ſerved; and, if any article ſhould be ob-"ſcure or doubtful, it ſhould belong to the "lords elected, who were ſtiled ordainers, to "explain it." There was nothing inſerted, concerning Gaveſton's baniſhment; and, probably, becauſe the barons apprehended no danger, from that favourite, ſo long as the government continued in their hands; yet, when they afterwards ſaw, that the king ſtill heaped favours upon him, and, without asking 1311. their advice, had made him governor of Nottingham, and warden of the foreſts, on this ſide of the Trent, they drew up 41 new articles, to which the king was forced to aſſent; and, by one of theſe articles, Gaveſton was expreſly ſentenced to perpetual baniſhment.

Gaveſton is baniſh'd. Act. Pub.

Edward, being, thus, bound with fetters, which he could not ſhake off, reſolved, tho' with extreme regret, to part with Gaveſton; yet, to take off the ſhame of his baniſhment, he gave him an imaginary commiſſion to levy troops, in Guienne, for the aſſiſtance of the earl of Foix, who had been at variance with the court of France, tho' the quarrel was, now, compoſed.

1312. The king recalls him. Act. Pub.

However, Edward, who could not live, without Gaveſton, diſregarding the articles he had lately ſigned, recalled him, without acquainting the ordainers; and, ſhortly after, he ſent circular letters to the ſheriffs, to notify this affair, and to juſtify his proceeding. He told them, that, being obliged by his coronation-oath, to ſee the laws of the realm put in execution, there was no authority that could diſſolve his obligation; that, as Gaveſton was baniſhed, by a notorious violence, and without a legal ſentence, he could not deprive him of the benefit of the law, to which all his ſubjects were intitled; that, therefore, he had cauſed him to return into England, not with a deſign to ſcreen him from juſtice, but that he might be tried, according to the uſual form; and that, in the interim, he conſidered him, as a loyal ſubject, ordering them to publiſh this declaration, in their reſpective juriſdictions.

The barons ſtir up the people againſt the king. Walſing.

The lords were not diſpleaſed, that the king, by this ſtep, had furniſhed them with a pretence, to compleat the ruin of a favourite, who could not be torn from him, without compulſive methods; and, to compaſs their end, they laboured to gain the people, by exclaiming againſt the king's conduct. They openly ſaid, that no ſtreſs could be laid upon what was enacted by the parliament, ſince the king diſregarded it; and that it was obvious, he aimed at an arbitrary power, which the whole nation was equally concerned to oppoſe, as it tended to render the ſubjects ſo many ſlaves. Theſe diſcourſes, being ſupported by their emiſſaries among the people, occaſioned an univerſal diſcontent; but the king imagined, that he ſhould be able to prevent the conſequences of it, by publiſhing a proclamation, proteſting that it was his intention to obſerve the 41 articles; yet, as he had violated one of the principal, in recalling his favourite, his proteſtation proved altogether ineffectual. 1312.

The inſolent behaviour of Gaveſton, particularly to the queen. Walſing.

In the mean while, Gaveſton ſtill more indiſcreet than his maſter, daily grew more haughty and arrogant, as if he was in no danger, or was ignorant of the barons deſigns; and he had even the preſumption to ſpeak inſolently to the queen; who, finding that ſhe could not obtain any ſatisfaction, complained bitterly to the king, her father. She told him, that Gaveſton was the ſole cauſe of her misfortunes; and that the king her husband's fondneſs, for that unworthy favourite, alienating his affections from her, made him an entire ſtranger to her bed. This complaint has induced ſome to ſuſpect, that the familiarity, between the king and Gaveſton, was of a very criminal nature; but, perhaps, their ſuſpicions are carried too far.

The earl of Lincoln's advice to the earl of Lancaſter. Walſing.

In the interim, the barons were ſtill intent upon their firſt deſign; for they knew, how dangerous it is, on ſuch occaſions, to act, by halves; and that, if enterpriſes of that ſort are not brought to an iſſue, they ſeldom fail to ruin the projectors. The earl of Lincoln was one of the moſt conſiderable of the party, as well for his high birth and ſtation, as for his age and experience; but, being confined to his bed by a fit of ſickneſs, which, in all probability, would lay him in his grave, and apprehenſive, that, after his death, the confederates would give way, to prevent that accident, which would have been fatal to them, having ſent for his ſon-in-law, the earl of Lancaſter, grandſon to Henry III, "He con-"jured him, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt pathe-"tical terms, not to abandon the church and "people of England to the mercy of the popes "and kings. He repreſented to him, that "his birth obliged him to endeavour to free "the kingdom from the oppreſſions it labour-"ed under; and he charged him to have con-"tinually a tender regard for the king; but, "at the ſame time, he added that it was his "duty to do all that was poſſible, to remove "from his perſon the foreign miniſters, and "favourites; that honour, conſcience, and the "publick good called upon him, to procure "the obſervance of the Great Charter, the "only foundation of the welfare and tranquil-"lity of the kingdom; and, in concluſion, he "adviſed him to join heartily with the earl of "Warwick, who, of all the confederate lords, "was beſt qualified to carry on the impor-"tant undertaking." It was not long before the effects of this advice were viſible; for, the 1312. earl of Lancaſter entering into a ſtrict league with the earls of Warwick, Pembroke, Arundel, Hereford, Warren, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſeveral other prelates and barons, they unanimouſly reſolved to up take arms, under the uſual pretence of defending the rights of the church and ſtate.

They chuſe the earl of Lancaſter general. Walſing.

The earl of Lancaſter was choſen general of the intended army; an honour that could not be refuſed to his merit, if no regard had been had to his quality. Immediately after this reſolution, all the confederate barons, diſperſing themſelves into the ſeveral counties, publickly levied troops; and with ſuch expedition, that, in a ſhort time, their forces were aſſembled, at the appointed rendezvous. It Act. Pub. was impoſſible for Edward to be ignorant of theſe preparations; and yet, inſtead of projecting means, to appeaſe the incenſed barons, or defend himſelf againſt their inſults, he minded nothing but his diverſions, at York, where he was then with Gaveſton, His ſole care being to heap new favours on his minion, he remained in an amazing indolence, whilſt he ſaw the whole kingdom ready to riſe againſt him; and, indeed, he ſeemed to affect to act, on all occaſions, contrary to his real intereſts, and to neglect to take ſuch meaſures, as a perſon of an ordinary underſtanding might have pointed out to him. At the very juncture when the barons were in arms, to compel him to obſerve the 41 articles, he wilfully violated one of the principal, in making the biſhop of Litchfield high-treaſurer, without the conſent of the ordainers; and, as if he had been in a condition to give laws to the barons, he would have even reformed the regulation, pretending that he had reſerved to himſelf the power of correcting, with the advice of the ordainers, ſome articles prejudicial to his prerogative; and, tho' it was eaſy to apprehend, that this was an improper ſeaſon for that work, he nominated, on his part, commiſſioners to ſet about the alterations.

The barons riſe, and the king retires to Scarborough, with Gaveſton.

The barons, having drawn all their forces together, marched directly for York, deſigning to ſurpriſe the king; but, upon the firſt news of their approach, he retired to Newcaſtle, where they, immediately, followed him; and, that town not ſeeming to him to be a place of ſufficient ſtrength, he left it and ſhut himſelf up in Scarborough-caſtle, which he took Act. Pub. to be his beſt fortreſs, in the north. He then, when it was too late, began to be ſenſible of his error, in deferring ſo long to prepare, for his defence; and, in ſpite of the improbability of ſucceſs, he reſolved to go into Warwickſhire, vainly expecting that the people would flock, in crowds, to liſt under his banner; but, as he was more concerned for Gaveſton than himſelf, he left him behind, at Scarborough, recommending him to the care of the governor, as a precious truſt, and a certain pledge of the confidence he repoſed in him.

The barons ſeize the king's and Gaveſton's equipage, at Newcaſtle.

Whilſt Edward was employed about his too late meaſures, the barons, who entered Newcaſtle, the very day of his departure, ſeized whatever was left there by the king and his favourite, their haſte not permitting them to carry any thing away; and, in Gaveſton's baggage, were found many jewels, belonging to the crown, of which an exact inventory was taken, that an account might be given of them, hereafter. The earl of Lancaſter was Act. Pub. no ſooner informed of the king's quitting Scarborough, and his leaving Gaveſton there, than he ſent the earls of Pembroke and Warren, to beſiege that caſtle; whilſt he marched himſelf, with the reſt of the army, towards the center of the kingdom, in order to have it more in his power to oppoſe the deſigns of the king. The two detached earls, advancing towards Scarborough, without any reſiſtance, formed the ſiege, and proſecuted it, with great vigour; but, tho' the place was one of the ſtrongeſt in the kingdom, it was ſo meanly provided with neceſſaries, for its defence, that, in a few days, Gaveſton was conſtrained to deliver himſelf into the hands of his enemies; however, he obtained a ſort of capitulation, by which it was promiſed, that he ſhould ſpeak with the king, and be tried by his peers, according to the uſual form.

The earl of Pembroke undertakes to conduct Gaveſton to the king. Walſing.

Edward, upon the firſt notice of his favourite's being, thus, taken, preſſingly ſollicited his liberty, or that, at leaſt, he might ſpeak with him, according to promiſe; and, above all, he conjured the confederate lords to ſpare the priſoner's life, aſſuring them, that, on that condition, he would give them entire ſatisfaction, as to their grievances. Moſt of the barons were againſt Gaveſton's being conducted to the king, evidently perceiving, that his requeſt tended only to get him out of their hands; but they conſented, at laſt, on the earl of Pembroke's repreſenting, that, having paſſed his word, in the name of all the confederates, they were obliged to perform it; and that, if they would commit him to his cuſtody, he would undertake to conveigh him to the king, and to reſtore him to them, at a day and place appointed.

Pembroke intended to conduct his priſoner to Wallingford-caſtle, where the king was to come, to have an interview with him; and, accordingly, taking the road to Oxfordſhire, he arrived at Deddington, where he left Gaveſton under a guard, whilſt he himſelf went and lodged in a neighbouring caſtle. He did not judge it neceſſary to uſe greater precaution, in a place where the king had no troops; but the earl of Warwick, who violently oppoſed this conference of the king and Gaveſton, hearing how they quartered, came, that night, to the houſe where Gaveſton lay, and carried him away, by force, to Warwick. On the morrow, the ſame lord, with ſome others the moſt violent of the party, after a ſhort trial, ordered him to be beheaded; a mad action, if ever there was any, which, in violating a capitulation, trampled upon the laws of the land, and the reſpect due, at all times, from ſubjects to their ſovereign. How would theſe very lords have exclaimed, if the king, or Gaveſton, had acted, in the ſame outrageous manner?

The barons march againſt the king.

Though Edward was extremely exaſperated, at the boldneſs of theſe lords, it was not in 1312. in his power to be revenged; and the barons, instead of giving him any satisfaction, for this outrage, demanded, more imperiously than ever, the performance of the 40 articles, and a speedy redress of the grievances of the state. At the same time, they marched to London, where the king had retired, being intent upon obtaining, by force, what they plainly saw he would never voluntarily grant them; but, in the interim, the king, not daring to trust the Londoners, was gone to Canterbury, where he was not much safer; and, in this extremity, he had recourse to the mediation of the pope's nuncio, of Lewis, earl of Evreux, the queen's uncle, then in England, and of the earl of Gloucester, his nephew, who had stood neuter. These three mediators laboured so heartily, in the affair, that certain articles were agreed upon, which seemed to give entire satisfaction to both the parties; for the lords promised to restore whatever was taken, at Newcastle, publickly to ask the king's pardon, and to declare that, without any design against his person, their sole view was to redress what was amiss in the government; and the king promised, on his part, to grant a general pardon to them and all their adherents, reserving a power to pardon those that favoured Gaveston's return.

Act. Pub.

1313. The barons punctually performed their engagement, in restoring whatever was seized, at Newcastle; but Edward deferred the publication of the general pardon, above a year, and, during that space, used all means, to draw the earl of Lancaster to court; tho', notwithstanding the safe conducts he offered him, he could not persuade the earl to put himself in his power, before the pardon was proclaimed. At length, the barons, weary of the king's evasions, began to rise again, when the king of France dispatched the earl of Evreux, his brother, accompanied with Enguerrand de Marigny, to negotiate an accommodation; and the queen likewise did all that was possible for her; but it was extremely difficult to accomplish it, because, the king delaying to publish the promised pardon, the barons believed, that they had still reason to fear he never designed it. In the interim, the king went and conferred with his father-in-law, leaving orders, that the parliament should meet, in his absence; and the earl of Lancaster, with the barons of his party, did not scruple to be present, in that assembly; but, hearing that he was landed, at Sandwich, they, immediately, withdrew, not venturing to trust to the safe-conducts he sent them, from that place; and, their retreat obliging the parliament to break up, the mediators so strenuously press'd the king to give the barons satisfaction, that he ordered the two general pardons to be drawn up, which were confirmed, soon after, by the parliament; but, as a general pardon did not fully satisfy the parties concerned, it was also necessary to grant a particular pardon to 468 persons, whose names are recited, in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

1313. The king delays to publish it. Act. Pub.

The pardon is published. Act. Pub.

The birth of prince Edward. Act. Pub.

During this negotiation, in the beginning of October, 1313, the queen was delivered of a prince, named Edward.

The publication of the general pardons, as well for the confederate barons, as for Gaveston's friends, having, at length, restored tranquillity to the kingdom, the parliament allow'd the king a considerable subsidy, towards a vigorous prosecution of the war with Scotland; and, before that assembly broke up, the barons publickly begged the king's pardon, in Westminster-hall, in the presence of all the people. This was done, in a very solemn manner; for the barons, addressing the king, made use of the most humble and submissive terms, as if the pardon, they had received, was, purely, the effect of his clemency; and then they returned to their habitations, satisfied, in appearance, though they still continued to distrust the king. They had too highly offended him, to entertain hopes, that he would ever forget it, and the death of the earl of Warwick, which fell out, soon after, increased their diffidence, it being generally believed, that he was poisoned.

The affairs of Scotland.

Whilst England sustained violent shocks, by the weakness and little genius of the governor, Scotland daily grew stronger, by the prudent conduct of a valiant and active king, who wisely improved the respite, occasioned by the death of Edward I. Robert Bruce, who may justly be stiled the restorer of the Scotch monarchy, politickly suppressing the factions which divided his subjects, united them all in the design of shaking off the English yoke; and, by this means, he was in a condition not only to recover the best part of his country, but also to carry his arms into England; but I shall, now, enter upon the particulars of the Scotch war, which I could not, without confusion, intermix with the relation of the domestick troubles in England.

The war with Scotland.

Edward I. had resolved upon the utter destruction of Scotland, and, probably, would have succeeded in his design, if, very opportunely for the Scots, death had not snatched him out of the world; but, whilst Robert Bruce was preparing, to take advantage of this accident, a great fit of sickness prevented him from acting; and the Scots, being, as yet, ignorant of the character of Edward II, were in great perplexity, their king being very dangerously ill, and their forces much inferior to those of their enemies. However, Edward II's sudden resolution to return into England, after he had advanced, as far as Dumfries, and struck terror into the whole kingdom, inspired them with better hopes; for his impatience to meet Gaveston, to marry the princess designed for him, and to be crowned, expelled all thoughts of war, to which he had not the least inclination; so that, leaving his army under the conduct of John Comyn, a Scotch lord, he returned into England. His abrupt departure occasioned great murmurs, in the army and kingdom; for people were, to the last degree, astonished, that he should relinquish the conquest of Scotland, at a time when the number and ardor of his troops, and king Robert's indisposition, seemed to warrant him a glorious campaign. His choice of Comyn, to command the army, was no less disliked; for this general was a Scot,

Act. Pub.

1313. Scot, and, tho' of Edward's party, and Robert's particular enemy, his being a foreigner was, alone, ſufficient to diſguſt the Engliſh. It, preſently after, appeared, that their complaints were not groundleſs, when Comyn, willing to make the beſt uſe of Robert's illneſs, advanced, in order to attack the Scots; but, tho' Robert was extremely weak, leſt a retreat, at ſuch a juncture, might have diſheartened his ſubjects, and occaſioned the loſs of his whole kingdom, having mounted his horſe, ſupported by two eſquires, he drew up his army, and expected the enemy, with a ſteadineſs that was crowned with an amazing ſucceſs. The Engliſh fancied, that this little army would never dare to withſtand them; but, when they found themſelves diſappointed, their courage ſo exceedingly abated, that they could ſcarce be brought to begin the fight; and, this feeble attack, ſo ill ſeconded, animating the Scots, they fell, with great fury, upon their enemies, and put them entirely to the rout. This defeat was the more diſhonourable to the Engliſh, as, beſides their being ſuperior, in number, they were the very ſame troops that had ſo often vanquiſhed the Scots, tho' they, now, ſuffered themſelves to be beaten by an army levied, in haſte, and conſiſting of undiſciplin'd ſoldiers. Comyn retiring into England, after the battle, Robert entered the county of Argyle, that ſtill belonged to the Engliſh, and ravaged it, from one end to the other; and, quickly after, Edward Bruce, his brother, gained another victory over the Engliſh, in the county of Galloway; which ſucceſſes gave the Scots ſuch a ſuperiority, that, thenceforward, forgetting their paſt loſſes, they deſpiſed the Engliſh.

Edward marches againſt Scotland, Buchanan.

Notwithſtanding Edward's averſion to war, he could not avoid endeavouring to ſtop the progreſs of the king of Scotland; and, in 1308, that is, in the ſecond year of his reign, he led, in perſon, a numerous army into that kingdom; but, as he had taken no care for proviſions, he was obliged to march back his army into England, for want of ſubſiſtence. Robert, more provident than he, had carried away, or deſtroyed, before-hand, whatever might ſerve to maintain the enemy's troops; and, upon Edward's retreat, the king of Scotland ſubdued ſeveral places poſſeſs'd by the Engliſh, making, that year, a very proſperous campaign. The troubles, which afterwards happened, in England, by reaſon of Gaveſton, enabled that prince to make a ſtill greater progreſs; in 1310 and 1311, he entered England, twice, and carried off a great booty; in 1312, he recovered Perthe, Laneric, Dumfries, Roxborough, and, laſtly, Edinburgh-caſtle, which was taken, by ſtorm, by the earl of Murray, his general; and, the ſame year, the little Iſle of Man voluntarily ſubmitted to his authority.

and returns, without doing any thing.

Whilſt Robert enlarged his conqueſts, Edward, wholly employed in projecting means to be revenged on the barons, for putting Gaveſton to death, was ſurpriſingly remiſs, with reſpect to Scotland; for, inſtead of haſtening an agreement with the lords, in order to unite all his forces, he prolonged the negotiation, by a policy extremely pernicious to the affairs of the ſtate. In the interim, Robert took advantage of the negligence of the Engliſh; and, having made himſelf maſter of all the places Edward I. poſſeſſed in Scotland, except Sterling, he ſent, in 1313, his brother, Edward, to beſiege that town, the ſtrongeſt then in the kingdom. The ſiege was carried on very vigorouſly; but the beſieged made as brave a defence. However, Philip Mowbray, the governor of the place, when he found that Edward made no preparations, to relieve him, thought to do him good ſervice, in ſigning a capitulation, by which he promiſed to ſurrender the town, in a year, if it ſhould not be relieved, by that time. 1313.

1314. Edward levies an army of 100,000 men. Walſing.

Edward, having ſufficient leiſure to prepare, and deſiring, at all adventures, to prevent the loſs of this important place, ſummoned all his vaſſals to meet him, with their troops; and the Engliſh, Gaſcoigns, and Welch ſo readily obeyed him, that, by June, 1314, he appeared at the head of 100,000 men. The ſoldiers already devoured, in their imagination, whatever the former ravages of Edward I. had left, in Scotland; but the earls of Lancaſter, Arundel, Hereford, and the new earl of Warwick refuſed, on this occaſion, to ſerve the king, not daring to truſt themſelves in his power.

The battle of Banockbourn. Buchanan.

This powerful army, entering Scotland, advanced, within view of Sterling; and Robert expected them, at the head of 30,000 men, inured to the fatigues of war, and who had frequently vanquiſhed the Engliſh. He drew up his army, on an advantageous ground, where he could not be ſurrounded; for a mountain, full of inacceſſible rocks, covered one of his flanks, whilſt the other was ſecured by a deep moraſs; and, notwithſtanding the inequality of the two armies, the Scots, being determined to conquer, or die, received their enemies, with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that they ſoon put this formidable army of the enemy into diſorder and confuſion. The Engliſh horſe, being preſſed, at firſt, with an irreſiſtible fury, occaſioned, by their flight, the defeat of the whole army; a defeat the moſt terrible England had ever endured, ſince the beginning of the monarchy. The Scotch writers affirm, that the loſs of the enemy amounted to 50,000 men; pretending that the number of the priſoners taken, on this occaſion, exceeded that of the conquerors. The earl of Glouceſter, nephew to Edward II, with many other lords of diſtinction, and above 700 knights, lay dead on the field of battle; but the Engliſh reduce the number of the ſlain to 10,000; tho' the conſequences of this action ſhew, that their loſs was much greater, ſince, from that time, they ventured no more to take the field.

The Engliſh are routed.

Hec. Boet. Buchanan.

Walſing.

Act. Pub.

Edward, with the remains of his army, retreated, with precipitation, not thinking himſelf out of danger, till he arrived at York; where the diſperſed fugitives reſorted to him; and, having formed a very conſiderable body, he expreſſed a deſire to re-enter Scotland, and hazard another battle; but he could not prevail on his diſpirited troops to make an attempt, to retrieve their honour. This battle, ſtiled the battle of Banockbourn, procured the 1314. the Scots, beſides an ineſtimable booty, a peace which laſted, ſeveral years; and they acquired ſo great a ſuperiority over the Engliſh, that the latter, inſtead of being able to recover what they had loſt, in Scotland, were long forced to ſee their borders ravaged, without the leaſt reſiſtance; nay, one of their hiſtorians aſſures us, that three Scotch ſoldiers were ſufficient to put a 100 Engliſhmen to flight, ſo exceedingly were they intimidated by this terrible defeat. Walſing.

An impoſtor pretends to be Edward, and is hanged. Higden. Walſing.

Whilſt fortune ſtrove, on all occaſions, to humble Edward, an impoſtor, John Deydras, a tanner's ſon of Exeter, attempted to deprive him of his crown, by maintaining that he was himſelf Edward, and changed, at nurſe; but this extraordinary and ill-formed project ſerved only to bring the impoſtor to the gallows. Doubtleſs, this pretender to the crown founded his hopes on the little eſteem the Engliſh had for their king, having, probably, imagined it would not be difficult, to perſuade them that he was not the ſon of Edward I, who had none but noble and generous inclinations; but this was not the vile inſtrument, which Providence was pleaſed to uſe, to ruin this unhappy prince, though, in ſome meaſure, this event may be conſidered, as a ſort of preſage of what afterwards happened.

1315. A great famine.

The loſs ſuſtained by the Engliſh, in Scotland, was followed by a dreadful famine, which laſted, three years, and deſtroyed an infinite number of people; and the parliament, to no purpoſe, endeavoured to help it, by ſettling the price of proviſions; for they were forced, the next year, to revoke the act that had been paſſed, on that account However, neither war, famine, nor the murmurs of the people could reſtrain the king from expending a large ſum, in celebrating the funeral of his favourite, whoſe body was removed to King's-Langley, in Hertfordſhire; and he honoured the funeral pomp, with his preſence, attended by the archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſome other prelates; but the barons poſitively refuſed to aſſiſt, at the obſequies of a man, whom they conſidered, as unworthy of the reſpect paid to his memory. Walſing.

1316. The famine increaſes. Walſing.

In the mean while, the famine raged ſo furiouſly, that the account, given of it by hiſtorians, is almoſt incredible; for they not only relate, that the moſt loathed animals were uſed, for food, but that people were conſtrained to hide their children, with all poſſible care, to prevent their being ſtolen and eaten by thieves. They aſſure us, that men themſelves took precautions, to hinder their being murdered, in private places, ſince there were too many inſtances, that ſome had been treated, in that inhuman manner, to feed ſuch as could find no other ſubſiſtence; and we are alſo informed, that the priſoners, in the goals, barbarouſly devoured one another, the extreme ſcarcity of proviſions not permitting their being allowed neceſſary food. The bloody flux, cauſed by groſs feeding, compleated the miſery of the Engliſh; and ſuch multitudes died, every day, that the living were ſcarce ſufficient to bury the dead; whilſt the only remedy, that could be found againſt the famine, tho' even it was incapable of bringing all the neceſſary relief, was to prohibit, on pain of death, the brewing any ſort of beer, with a view that the corn, uſually applied to that uſe, might ſerve to make bread. 1316.

1317. An injury is done to the earl of Lancaſter.

Tho' one would have thought, that theſe calamities ſhould have turned their thoughts to religion and repentance, the mutual enmity, which the king and barons had long harboured in their breaſts, daily increaſed; and it was next to impoſſible but this violent averſion ſhould, at laſt, produce very fatal effects. Edward, ſtill mindful of the injuries he had received, was reſolved to gratify his ſtrong deſire of revenge; but his reſentment chiefly lay againſt the earl of Lancaſter, whom he apprehended to be the ſole author of his diſgraces, and his moſt avowed enemy. Had the earl's life been in his power, he, probably, would not have ſpared it; but, finding that he could not reach his perſon, he attempted to deprive him of his eſtate and honour, by creating him a trouble, which the moſt immoderate diffidence could not have prevented.

His wife is taken away, and given to another. Walſing.

During the earl's abſence from court, a certain knight, named Sir Richard St. Martin, a man of a mean aſpect and dwarfiſh ſtature, preſented to the judges a petition, claiming the wife of the earl of Lancaſter, heireſs of the families of Lincoln and Salisbury; and he repreſented, in his petition, that he had carnally known her, and that ſhe had made him a promiſe of marriage, before ſhe was contracted to the earl. The counteſs, who was diſſatisfied with her husband, having, to her eternal ſhame, confeſſed the fact, was adjudged, with all her eſtate, to the unworthy claimant; and this affair, which required a long examination, was ſo ſpeedily decided, that it was obvious the judges were gained, before-hand, and that the king himſelf had been a promoter of the proceſs. An injury, of this nature, offered to a prince of the royal blood, who was the darling of the people, raiſed an extreme indignation againſt the king; for nothing was any where heard, but murmurs againſt his government. As he had, then, no favourite to bear the blame, it was all fixed on himſelf; and people openly ſaid, that the throne of England was never filled by a prince ſo unworthy to rule a free nation; and ſome even upbraided him, to his face, for his ill conduct. Upon a certain holiday, dining in publick, in Weſtminſter-hall, a woman, who was maſqued, came, on horſeback, and delivered him a letter; and the king, fancying that it contained ſomething proper to divert him, ordered it to be read aloud; but he was exceedingly ſurpriſed to hear only outrageous reproaches, for his cowardice, tyranny, and all the grievances introduced, in his reign. The woman, being apprehended, confeſſed, that ſhe was bribed by a certain knight to act this part; and the knight boldly maintained, that, believing the king would peruſe the letter, in private, he thought it the moſt expedient way, to communicate to him the complaints of his ſubjects.

1318. Whilſt England was reduced to extreme deſolation, Edward, regardleſs of the ravages the Scots continued to make, on the borders, made it his whole ſtudy to humble the barons; who began to form new projects, the conſequences whereof he had reaſon to dread. They had lately preſented to him a petition, containing a long liſt of the people's grievances, of which they demanded a ſpeedy redreſs; and, though nothing was farther from his thoughts than to reform abuſes, not daring openly to diſcover his intentions, he had referred the matter to the parliament which was to meet, at Lincoln; but a Scottiſh invaſion afforded him an excuſe to prorogue the parliament, ſeveral times, and, at length, to diſſolve it. This proceeding ſo exaſperated the barons, that they unanimouſly reſolved to take up arms, to procure, by force, the ſatisfaction they required; and they would, doubtleſs, have extremely diſtreſſed this weak prince, incapable of governing himſelf, at ſo critical a juncture, if ſome lords, of greater moderation, had not joined with the pope's legate, to negotiate a reconciliation. Theſe mediators obtained of the king, that, to ſatisfy the confederate barons, he ſhould admit a certain number of them into his council, and promiſe to do nothing, without their advice; and the earl of Lancaſter was to be one; but, as he durſt not truſt the king, it was agreed, that he ſhould nominate a baron, or knight, to ſupply his place. Moreover, Edward engaged to grant an abſolute pardon to the earl of Lancaſter, for all his paſt offences; and this agreement was made and ſigned, at Leek, on the 9th of Auguſt, 1318, and confirmed, three days after, by the parliament, which was aſſembled, upon the preſſing inſtances of the mediators. This affair being over, the king and earl of Lancaſter, meeting on a plain, near Leiceſter, embraced and kiſſed each other, in token of their being perfectly reconciled; but let us, now, return to the war with Scotland, which ſtill continued, during the troubles in England.

The barons complain of ſeveral grievances.

Act. Pub.

After Robert's obtaining, near Sterling, that remarkable victory, which proved ſo fatal to the Engliſh, he purſued the vanquiſhed into England, where he committed prodigious ravages, whilſt Edward durſt not ſtir from York, to oppoſe his enemy; and the king of Scotland, not contented with this advantage, projected the conqueſt of Ireland upon the crown of England. This iſland had long been governed by Engliſh officers, who were more ſollicitous to enrich themſelves, than to promote the publick good; and the Iriſh were ſo extremely uneaſy, under their arbitrary government, that they wanted only a favourable opportunity to revolt. The defeat of the Engliſh army, before Sterling, inducing them to believe, that the preſent juncture was very proper, to execute their deſign, they ſent word to the king of Scotland, that they were ready to ſhake off the Engliſh yoke, provided he would give them aſſiſtance; and Robert took care not to loſe ſo fair an occaſion, to become maſter of the iſland, or, at leaſt, to make a powerful diverſion; for he ſent thither ſome troops, under the command of his brother, Edward, who, heading the rebels, ſubdued the beſt part of Ireland, and was even owned, for king; and, whilſt he carried on his conqueſt, Robert amuſed the king of England with propoſals of peace, with ſeeming ſincerity and earneſtneſs, tho' he artfully, from time to time, ſtarted difficulties, which hinder'd matters from being brought to a concluſion. This proceeding laſted, till 1317, before Edward perceived the artifices of his enemy; and his ſhallow penetration would even have made him entirely loſe Ireland, had he not been alarmed by the murmurs of the people. The prejudice England might receive, by the loſs of that iſland, was ſo manifeſt, and the conſequences were ſo plainly repreſented to him, that, at length, he reſolved to ſend thither a powerful aid, under the conduct of Mortimer; and the Engliſh, that were in Ireland, finding that, by means of this ſupply, they were in a condition to take the field, marched, to attack the Scotch prince. In the interim, the king of Scotland, being informed how much his brother ſtood in need of ſpeedy relief, went himſelf into Ireland; but, upon his arrival, hearing that his brother was defeated and ſlain in a battle, wherein he had raſhly engaged, as his loſs, on that occaſion, diſabled him from continuing the war, in that country, he thought it more adviſable to return and improve the advantages, lately gained by his arms, in Scotland; for Dowglas, one of his generals, defeated the army ſent by the king of England into that kingdom, in order to take advantage of Robert's abſence, in Ireland.

This freſh victory, which put it out of the power of the Engliſh, to withſtand the Scots, encouraged Robert to improve it, by laying ſiege to Berwick, which was ſtill in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh; and, tho' he could not make his preparations, without Edward's knowledge, that monarch wanted both money and troops, to prevent his deſigns. The king of England's ſubjects were ſo averſe to him, that he could not expect to procure either a ſeaſonable or powerful aid; and, ſuppoſing he could have expected it, he evidently perceived, that the parliament would oblige him to pay dear for the ſubſidy they ſhould grant; wherefore, in this extremity, he applied to the pope, earneſtly intreating him to interpoſe his authority, in order to procure him a peace, or, at leaſt, a truce with Scotland. John XXII, who had lately ſucceeded Clement V, at once, complied with Edward's requeſt; for he conceived this to be a very favourable opportunity, to extend his power over crowned heads. Accordingly, he undertook to bring about a peace, between Edward and Robert, not as a mediator, but as ſovereign arbiter, and by vertue of his apoſtolical authority; and, with this view, he ſent two legates into England, with a power, which ſhewed that he thought himſelf inveſted with ſupreme authority over all kings, even in temporal affairs. Their commiſſion impowered them to make peace, between the two contending nations, in what manner they pleaſed, and even to compel

The legates publiſh a truce.

The legates, furniſhed with ſuch an extenſive and extraordinary power, came into England, and, immediately, cauſed the truce to be proclaimed; and Edward paid an implicit obedience to it, tho' he, thereby, ſacrificed to the court of Rome the moſt authentick prerogatives of the crown; but the caſe was otherwiſe, with reſpect to Robert, who, under the pretence, that the pope and his legates did not give him the title of king, would never permit the laſt to enter Scotland, much leſs to proclaim the truce, in that kingdom. He even treated very roughly the ſuperior of the Cordeliers of Berwick, ſent to him by the legates, who, had the boldneſs to publiſh, in ſome meaſure, the truce, in the preſence of ſeveral Scots; and, inſtead of obeying the pope, he beſieged and took Berwick, by the treachery of the governor, if we may believe the Engliſh hiſtorians. This contempt, for the papal orders, occaſioned the legates to excommunicate him, and lay his kingdom under an interdict; but, deſpiſing this unjuſt and partial cenſure, he continued his progreſs, and committed great ravages, on the borders of England, without the leaſt oppoſition.

Edward beſieges Berwick.

Edward, now, found, that the ſpiritual weapons of the pope did him but little ſervice; and, therefore, on a ſudden, altering his meaſures, he found means to raiſe an army, with which he reſolved to attempt the recovery of Berwick; but, whilſt he was employed in the ſiege, the earl of Murray, the king of Scotland's general, made a diverſion in England, which proved very fatal to the borderers. In his return from ravaging ſeveral counties, he met a body of Engliſh militia, to the number of 10,000, with the archbiſhop of York at their head; and, though his forces were not near ſo numerous, as thoſe of his enemies, he bravely charged them, and gained over theſe undiſciplined troops, a victory, that deſtroyed above half; which action the Scots called, the white battle, becauſe ſome Engliſh prieſts, with their ſurplices on, were ſlain, in the fight. This accident obliged Edward to raiſe the ſiege of Berwick, and, ſoon after, with much ſollicitation, he obtained a truce, for two years; upon which, he left the north, and returned to London, where he had no better ſucceſs.

The promotion of the Spencers.

The truce did not reſtore to England the expected tranquillity; for it was ſcarce proclaimed, before the kingdom was involved in freſh troubles, much more violent than thoſe cauſed by Gaveſton. The enmity, between the king and the barons, was ſtill kept alive, like fire under cinders; and an occaſion was but too ready to rekindle the ſame. The lords, ever jealous of thoſe about the king's perſon, had introduced into court a young gentleman, Hugh Spencer, whom they believed to be entirely devoted to their intereſts; and they had procured him the office of king's chamberlain, deſigning to make uſe of him, as a ſpy, in order to be informed of the tranſactions at court, where they ſeldom appeared; but their project proved deſtructive to themſelves. Spencer had a father, who was alſo named Hugh, a perſon of courage and good ſenſe, who intimated to him, that he might, with greater eaſe, make his fortune, by labouring directly for himſelf, than by ſerving the barons; and that, with a little patience and obſequiouſneſs, he might render himſelf ſuperior to thoſe, whom he conſidered, as his protectors. Spencer, the ſon, being inclined to follow this advice, at firſt, met with almoſt inſuperable difficulties, the king being extremely jealous of a domeſtick, who had already diſcovered too great an inclination for his enemies; yet, by the prudent counſels of his father, Spencer removed, by degrees, all his maſter's prejudices againſt him. As he intended to govern the king entirely, he did not ſcruple to become, for ſome time, his ſlave; and, by a general compliance to whatever was agreeable to him, from his ſpy, he became his confident, and, at length, ſupplied, in his heart, the place formerly poſſeſſed by Gaveſton; but, he no ſooner found himſelf in the ſame degree of favour, than he abuſed it, like his predeceſſor, and, by his exceſſive pride and inſatiable avarice, made it ſoon wiſhed, that Gaveſton had never been oppreſſed. Hugh, his father, whom he had procured to be created earl of Wincheſter, had been, hitherto, of a quite contrary character; nothing could be laid to his charge unworthy a man of honour and honeſty; and, in all the poſts he had been promoted to, by this and the late king, he had always behaved, with great moderation, prudence, and impartiality; but a blind fondneſs for his ſon, and ambition, which ſeized him, in his old age, plunged him into thoſe exceſſes, which rendered both him and his ſon odious to the nation, and particularly to the nobility. It was not long, before an univerſal diſcontent viſibly appeared; and the earl of Lancaſter, who was extremely beloved by the people, and an avowed enemy to the king, notwithſtanding their outward reconciliation, had improved theſe junctures, to form a party capable of ruining the two new favourites. He had demonſtrated to his friends, "That their deſtruction and his own were unavoidable, if the Spencers were not removed "from court; that the king, who harboured "a ſecret deſire of revenge, was, indeed, incapable of managing a deſign; but that every thing was to be feared from that prince, "aſſiſted by his two new miniſters, of much "greater abilities than Gaveſton. He added, "that they were no leſs guilty, than the other, "of divers incroachments on the privileges of "the people; and that all their former endeavours, to reduce the royal authority, within "due bounds, would be fruitleſs, if the king "was permitted to return to his former courſes, and trample upon the liberties of his "ſubjects." 1320. and zealous aſſerter of the publick good, together with the envy raiſed, by the advancement of the Spencers, cauſed ſuch a ſudden effect, that the old aſſociation was renewed; and the confederate barons, without loſs of time, which was ſo precious, preſented to the king petitions, as they had done, concerning Gaveſton; but, as this conduct would only have given their enemies leiſure to prepare, they reſolved to levy troops, with all poſſible ſecreſy and expedition, and to ſurpriſe the king and his favourites, before they had time, to take any meaſures. This deſign was ſo ſpeedily put in execution, that, in a very ſhort ſpace, they drew together 11000 men, with whom they ventured to take the field; and their firſt exploit was to plunder the lands of the Spencers, which was committed to the care of Roger Mortimer, the younger, ſo called, to diſtinguiſh him from his uncle of the ſame name; who had ſo little regard for the favourites, that he did them, in a few days, 60,000 l. damage. Upon this, the barons ſent ſome of their body, to preſent a petition to the king, requeſting the removal of the Spencers; and Edward, being in no condition to curb their boldneſs, referred that affair to the parliament, not doubting but he ſhould have intereſt enough with the commons, to protect the two miniſters; yet the barons reſolution, to continue in arms, diſconcerted all his meaſures. Several members of parliament being attached to the lords, others overawed by the army, and all, in general, having too little value for the Spencers, to run any riſque, on their account, the two favourites were baniſhed the realm; nor was it in the king's power to ſcreen them. This parliament was ſtiled, the parliament of the white bands, by reaſon of certain white marks, by which the adherents of the barons were to know one another; and Edward, in ſpite of all his endeavours, to oppoſe theſe violent proceedings, was forced to give way to this irreſiſtible torrent. Spencer, the father, was, then, abroad, upon the king's affairs; but the ſon was ignominiouſly conducted to Dover, where he was ſhipped off, with very ſevere menaces, if he ever preſumed to return into England.

The Spencers are baniſhed. Act. Pub.

1321. Edward, highly reſenting this affront, ſwore to be revenged; but, perhaps, he might have been appeaſed, if the queen, who had uſually acted, as a mediatrix, between the king and the barons, had been pleaſed to interpoſe, on the preſent occaſion; but, inſtead of aſſwaging the king's indignation, ſhe excited him to vengeance, being incenſed at an inſult, ſhe lately received from a baron, of which ſhe charged the blame upon the whole party. The cauſe of her reſentment was, as follows:

An affront is offered to the queen. De la M.

Iſabella, intending to go in pilgrimage to Canterbury, ſent ſome of her domeſticks, before, to provide lodgings in the caſtle of Leeds, belonging to Bartholomew de Badleſmere, one of the confederate barons; but, as the whole party, at that time, entertained an extreme diſtruſt of the king, the officer, who commanded in the caſtle, denied the queen's ſervants admittance. There was even one of them killed; and Badleſmere, far from diſclaiming what was done, upon complaint made to him, had the boldneſs to write to the queen a very inſolent letter, expreſly approving what had paſſed; but it was difficult for that princeſs, who was naturally proud and revengeful, not to reſent ſuch a daring affront; and, as ſhe plainly perceived, that the union of the barons ſolely occaſioned Badleſmere's inſolence, ſhe was reſolved to do all that was poſſible, to diſſolve it. The king waited patiently, for a proper opportunity to exerciſe his vengeance; but a woman's revenge can admit of no delay. The queen perſuaded Edward, that the preſent juncture was very favourable, to free himſelf from the power of the barons; that, by immediately puniſhing the governor of Leeds, as he deſerved, he would ſo terrify the barons, that they would not even ſtand upon their defence, when they ſhould ſee them, ſword in hand, and able to compel them to return to their allegiance. Edward, approving this advice, gave orders for levying troops; but, to prevent any obſtacle, and in order to remove the people's apprehenſions, who began to be alarmed at theſe levies, he iſſued out a proclamation, proteſting that he did not take up arms, to make war on his ſubjects, but only to puniſh the inſolence of a private perſon. This proclamation producing a good effect, among the people, and the barons not thinking it adviſable to engage the kingdom in a civil war, for the ſake of a ſingle officer, the king raiſed an army, without oppoſition; and no ſooner were his troops in readineſs, than he went and beſieged the caſtle of Leeds, and, taking it, ordered the governor, with ſome other inferior officers, to be hanged; but, this ſucceſs inducing him to forget his proteſtation, he employed his arms, to take vengeance on his enemies. Accordingly, he laid ſiege to ſome other caſtles belonging to the barons, and particularly Warwick, which he ſubdued, with the ſame eaſe; and, when he thought himſelf ſufficiently formidable, he recalled Spencer, the ſon, who, ſince his exile, had turned pyrate, particularly, againſt the Engliſh.

Edward, continuing his progreſs, after the return of his favourite, put the aſſociated barons into the utmoſt conſternation, being entirely unprepared, for their defence; and they could have wiſh'd, for the queen's aſſiſtance, in their preſent deplorable circumſtances; but, ſhe was, now, their implacable enemy. In the interim, the king, by his ſole authority, revoked the ſentence of baniſhment againſt the Spencers, and recalled the father, as he had already done the ſon; his army was in the center of the kingdom; and the people, as it generally happens, on ſuch occaſions, joined with the ſtrongeſt, leſt they ſhould be oppreſſed, before the barons were able to protect them. In this terrible extremity, moſt of the confederate barons, wiſely choſe to ſubmit to the king's mercy; and, as for thoſe who refuſed to follow their example, many were apprehended and executed, ſome fled for refuge, beyond ſea, and others were confined in ſeveral priſons. 1322. Lancaſter goes towards Scotland. The earl of Lancaſter's faction being exceedingly weakened, by the defection, flight, impriſonment, or death of his adherents, the earl, with the few troops he could aſſemble, was conſtrained to retire into the north; having nothing to depend upon but the protection of the Scots, who promiſed him ſuccours; but it was neceſſary for him to come and join them. The rout he took, and ſome intercepted letters, diſcovered his intention to the king; who ordered Sir Andrew Harcla, governor of Carliſle, with what forces he could draw together, to march againſt the earl, to cut off the paſſes, or, at leaſt, to keep him at a bay, whilſt he purſued him, in perſon, with his army. However expeditious the earl of Lancaſter was, and how careful ſoever to retard the king's march, by deſtroying the country behind him, he was obliged, after paſſing the Trent, over Burton-bridge, to halt, in order to oppoſe the paſſage of the king's army; but, Edward retiring, to paſs at another place, the earl reſolved to maintain his ground. Nevertheleſs, whether through ſcruple, or fear of the king's ſuperior forces, he ſuddenly altered his reſolution; and, in hopes of extricating himſelf out of theſe ſtreights, he advanced to Burrow-bridge, where ran another river, which afforded no paſſage, except over a bridge defended by Harcla. In this extremity, he was obliged either to fight the king, who cloſely purſued him, or to force this paſs, before the approach of the royal army; but, chuſing the latter, without loſs of time, he ordered the bridge to be attacked; yet the vigorous reſiſtance of the enemy, the death of the earl of Hereford, ſlain in the beginning of the fight, and the dread of being ſurpriſed by the king, who was advancing, ſo diſpirited Lancaſter's troops, that, inſtead of continuing the attack, they retreated, and diſperſed themſelves over the country. Harcla, perceiving this diſorder,

He is taken priſoner, ſpeedily paſſed the bridge, and purſued them, of whom he took great numbers priſoners; and the earl of Lancaſter, who ſtaid too long, in expectation of rallying his men, was alſo taken himſelf, with 95 barons and knights, and conducted to the caſtle of Pontefract. This unhappy prince had the misfortune to be expoſed to the inſults of the ſoldiers, who, in deriſion, called him king Arthur, from his uſing that name, in ſome of the intercepted letters;

Act. Pub. and, a few days after, the king, being come to Pontefract, ordered him to be arraigned, in the hall of the caſtle, before a ſmall number of peers that attended him, among whom were the two Spencers; who condemned the earl to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, as a traytor; and beheaded. but, out of reſpect to his birth, the king gave orders, that he ſhould only be beheaded. Nine other lords of his party were ſentenced to the ſame puniſhment, and executed, at York; and the lord Badleſmere, the firſt cauſe of the war, with four other barons, ſuffered the like death, at London, Windſor, Canterbury, and Glouceſter, for a terror to the kingdom. Never ſince the Norman conqueſt, had the ſcaffolds been drenched with ſo much Engliſh blood, as on the preſent occaſion; and theſe inhuman proceedings were aſcribed to the Spencers, who, thereby, rendered themſelves extremely odious to all the world, and created, in the hearts of the nobility, a deſire of revenge, which was but too fully ſatiated, in the end. 1322.

1323. Edward's expedition into Scotland. Buchanan. Edward imagined, that, after this ſucceſs againſt his ſubjects, he ſhould, of courſe, prove very formidable to the Scots; and, therefore, he reſolved to march towards Scotland, fluſhed with the hopes of ſurpriſing Robert, and repairing all his former loſſes, by this ſingle expedition. Whilſt he was in his own territories, he had plenty of proviſions, every one ſtriving to ſupply his army, more out of fear than affection; but, prepoſterouſly fancying that he ſhould find the ſame conveniences, in the enemy's country, he was, on a ſudden, diſtreſs'd with a terrible want; ſo that, inſtead of advancing any farther, he was forced to return, as he had done, once before, without being the wiſer by that experience; and, which reflected a ſtill greater diſhonour on this ill-concerted project, Robert cloſely purſued him, even into England, and, overtaking him, at Black-more, eaſed him of his baggage, and had like to have taken him priſoner. Upon this, the Engliſh army being all diſperſed, Robert continued his march, ravaging the country, with fire and ſword, to the very walls of York; and, at laſt, having burnt the monaſtery of Rippon and ranſacked the abbey of Beverly, he returned home, loaded with booty. Whatever reaſon that prince had to expect great advantages, from the continuation of the war, he entered into a negotiation, for a truce, which, at length, was concluded, on the 13th of May, 1324, for 13 years; and, indeed, he was forced to give ſome reſpite to his ſubjects exhauſted, by ſo long a war; moreover, he had a proſpect of being reconciled to the pope, by means of this truce, having received intimation, that his abſolution and the removal of the interdict depended upon his compliance.

Robert ravages England. Act. Pub.

The ſubmiſſion of the Engliſh, and the long truce with Scotland, placed Edward, in a ſituation exactly agreeable to his temper; for he had nothing to divert him from his pleaſures, enjoyed a peaceable kingdom, and could leave the government to his favourites, without any danger of being controuled by his ſubjects. This was a happineſs he could never attain, till the preſent year, which was the 16th of his reign; tho' his ſatisfaction was ſtill, ſometimes, interrupted, by the remembrance of paſt events; and the death of the earl of Lancaſter, of which he began to repent, ſince his tranquillity, now and then, ſtung him with bitter remorſe. This evidently appears, from his anſwer to certain lords, who petitioned him to pardon a condemned criminal: "Is "it poſſible, he cried, that ſuch a wretch, as "this, ſhould find ſo many friends, to inter-"cede for him, when not ſo much as one "would ſpeak, in behalf of my couſin of Lan-"caſter, who, if he had lived, might have

The uncertainty about the earl of Lancaſter's character.

The character of Thomas, earl of Lancaſter, was almoſt as ambiguous, as that of the earl of Leiceſter, in the reign of Henry III. The king's and the Spencer's adherents called him villain and traytor; one that, having taken up arms againſt his ſovereign, was juſtly condemned; but the people, in general, conſidered him, as a real martyr for liberty. Immediately after his deceaſe, vaſt multitudes reſorted to his tomb, where many miracles were pretended to be wrought *; ſo that the king was obliged ſtrictly to command the biſhop of London, to put a ſtop to the ſuperſtition of the people of his dioceſe, who came and ſaid their prayers to the earl's picture, hung up in St. Paul's church; and, probably, the uncertainty, as to the real character of this prince, would have laſted much longer, if two occurrences had not determined people, in his favour. The firſt was the puniſhment of Harcla, who, being made earl of Carliſle, for taking Lancaſter priſoner, incurred the diſpleaſure of the Spencers, and, upon a ſuggeſtion of a correſpondence with Scotland, was beheaded †; and the ſecond was the canonization of Lancaſter, in 1389 ‡. After that, there was no room to queſtion the ſincerity of his intentions; at leaſt, it was no longer permitted openly to defame his memory.

The great power of the Spencers.

The death of this prince, and of ſeveral other lords of his party, placed the Spencers at the top of the wheel; and theſe two miniſters, now, did, in the king's name, whatever they pleaſed, without regarding a faction entirely reduced. Had they been ſo wiſe as to moderate their paſſion, and deny themſelves the pleaſure of revenge, they would have, doubtleſs, ſupported themſelves in their exalted ſtation, and cauſed their maſter to paſs an eaſy and quiet life; but where are men of ſuch moderation to be found? The Spencers, to compleat their vengeance, plunged the kingdom into greater and more fatal troubles, than thoſe that were lately appeaſed; for, not ſatisfied with putting to death the heads of the oppoſite party, confiſcating the eſtates of others, and condemning great numbers to perpetual baniſhment, they were ſtill impatiently deſirous of being rid of three perſons, with whom they were extremely incenſed; viz. the biſhops of Lincoln and Hereford, and Roger Mortimer, junior; but the laſt of theſe was in their power, being actually confined, in the tower.

They attack the biſhop of Hereford, but are oppoſed. Act. Pub.

Adam Orleton, biſhop of Hereford, was promoted to that ſee, by the intereſt of pope John XXII, in ſpite of all the king's efforts, to the contrary; and, having ſhewn but little regard for the court, on that occaſion, he rightly judged, that the king would not fail, when an opportunity offered, to be revenged on him; wherefore, he joined with the earl of Lancaſter, to ſcreen himſelf from the effects of his reſentment; yet, being greatly diſappointed, in his expectation, and the king remaining implacable againſt him, his ruin was determined. Accordingly, he was ſummoned to anſwer, in the king's court, to a charge of high-treaſon entered againſt him; but, though he appeared, he refuſed to plead in any, except the eccleſiaſtical court, inſiſting upon the privilege of his order. This refuſal would have been unavailable to him, had he not been ſupported by the archbiſhops of Canterbury and Dublin; who, conſidering the ſentence, which the king's court was about to pronounce, as a direct violation of the church's immunities, went, accompanied by ſeveral other prelates, and prohibited the king's judges to take cognizance of the caſe, threatening them with excommunication, if they dared to proceed; and, how deſirous ſoever the king and his miniſters were to be rid of this biſhop, the oppoſition of the clergy hindered the judges from paſſing ſentence, and the affair was referred to the parliament; nevertheleſs, till this proceſs was over, the king ordered the temporalities of the party accuſed to be ſeized.

The two biſhops join together.

The biſhop of Lincoln, who was in the ſame caſe, evidently foreſaw his own fate, if the biſhop of Hereford was condemned; and, common intereſt forming a very ſtrict underſtanding between theſe two prelates, they exerted themſelves, to raiſe troubles, which ſhould ſhelter them from the king's vengeance; but, unfortunately for that prince, their endeavours proved only too ſucceſsful.

Mortimer is condemned twice, and pardoned.

Roger Mortimer, the younger, was not, or, at leaſt, did not ſeem to be, in very favourable circumſtances; for he was a priſoner, and deſtitute of a character, to ſecure him from the malice of the favourites, his inveterate enemies; ſo that he could expect nothing leſs, than the loſs of his head; and, indeed, he was condemned to die; yet, by means of a powerful interceſſion, the king, notwithſtanding the ſollicitations of his favourites, changed his ſentence to perpetual impriſonment. It was no ſmall matter, for Mortimer, to eſcape death; and his preſent condition ſeemed to require his patience, till time ſhould bring about ſome revolution, in his favour; but, after all, this ſlow and uncertain means was incapable of making him eaſy; and, whether he was apprehenſive, that the king would, one time or other, be gained by his enemies, or relied upon the ſame protection that had already ſaved his life, tho' impriſoned, he made an attempt to become maſter of the tower, and likewiſe of Walling- Walſing.

* He was buried in the church of the priory of Pontefract; and the prior, and monks reporting, that miracles were wrought at his tomb, it gained ſo much ground, that the king was forced to order the church to be ſhut up. The king's letter to the biſhop of London, on account of the earl's picture, which was ſet up, in St. Paul's cathedral, and worſhipped by the people, is in Rymer's Fœd.

Remarks on his being, thus, pardoned.

When a man reflects on the great credit of the Spencers, their revengeful temper, and the provocation they had perſonally to hate Mortimer, he muſt be convinced, that the protection, which ſcreened him from their vengeance, was very powerful; and, on the other hand, if all the circumſtances of this reign be conſidered, it will not appear probable, that any other perſon, except the queen, could procure ſuch a favour from the king, againſt the intereſt and ſollicitations of the miniſters. This conjecture is confirmed by the ſcandalous manner, in which that princeſs afterwards lived with Mortimer, from whence it may be inferred, that their familiarity commenced, long before it was publickly known; and, beſides, all the hiſtorians unanimouſly relate, that the queen inceſſantly complained of the ſeverities exerciſed upon the friends of the late earl of Lancaſter; which gives occaſion to preſume, that Mortimer was the principal ſubject of her complaints. Moreover, at this very juncture, the Spencers began to perſecute queen Iſabella, inſomuch that they forced her to complain to the king of France, her brother, that ſhe was regarded, only as a ſervant, in the palace of the king, her husband; and yet we cannot find, that the favourites had any other reaſon to mortify her, than the protection ſhe granted to Mortimer, their enemy. All theſe conſiderations incline me to believe, that there was, at this time, a criminal correſpondence, between Iſabella and Mortimer; and that the protection, ſhe publickly honoured him with, drew upon her the malice of the favourites. The vexation, they gave her, induced her to project means to be revenged, in her turn; and this is, in reality, the ſource of the following events, which are very obſcurely related by the hiſtorians. Let us add, here, that we may not return to Mortimer, till there ſhall be occaſion, that, ſoon after, he eſcaped out of the tower, and lay concealed, ſome time, in England, notwithſtanding the diligent ſearch that was made, to apprehend him; and, though hue and cry was raiſed after him, which generally proves ſucceſsful, he was not diſcovered, but had the good fortune to retire into France. In all appearance, he was hid in ſome place, where they durſt not look for him; but let us, now, proceed to the fatal effects of the love, ambition, and revenge, which, at that time, filled the minds of the principal perſons at court.

Edward's affairs with France.

Edward I.'s treaty with France, ſtill ſubſiſted, notwithſtanding certain diſputes between the two crowns, in the reigns of Lewis Hutin and Philip le Long, ſons and ſucceſſors to Philip the Fair; but, upon Charles the Fair's acceſſion to the throne of France, after the death of his brothers, theſe differences were greatly increaſed, by reaſon of the juriſdiction claimed by that prince over Guienne, as ſovereign lord of the dutchy. It is alſo probable, that Charles, diſſatisfied at the ill treatment of his ſiſter, queen Iſabella, in England, only wanted an opportunity, to give Edward proofs of his reſentment; and, improving an unexpected accident, in Guienne, he made himſelf ſatisfaction; from whence flowed all the misfortunes, which, afterwards, befel the king of England. 1323.

The king of France takes occaſion to ſeize Guienne. Act. Pub.

At St. Sardos, a town in Agenois, held of the caſtle of Montpezat, ſome outrage was committed, which Edward's officers, in Guienne, neglected to redreſs; upon which, the parties concerned carried their complaints to the king of France, as ſovereign. Charles embraced this opportunity, to aſſert his right over Guienne, cauſing the court of peers to ſentence the lord of Montpezat, and other Gaſcoign gentlemen, to baniſhment, and confiſcate their caſtles to the crown of France; and, by vertue of this ſentence, given without ſummoning the king of England, or his officers, Charles would have taken poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Montpezat, had he not been prevented by the Engliſh, who placed a ſtrong garriſon there. Upon this, by another ſentence, the garriſon were declared guilty of felony, for oppoſing the execution of the firſt; and, in the interim, the king of France ordered troops to be raiſed in Perigord, and the neighbouring provinces, in order to beſiege the caſtle. To give the better gloſs to this armament, he complained, that Edward had not done him homage, for Guienne and the earldom of Ponthieu, thereby, having a pretence ready, to confiſcate theſe provinces, if his arms met with the expected ſucceſs; and, indeed, it was viſible, that his intent was not to take a caſtle only, ſince he ſent a formidable army into Guienne, under the command of Charles de Valois, his uncle, who ſubdued ſeveral places. As for Edward, it is certain, that he was not, in the leaſt, inclined to enter into a war with France, though he took no meaſures to prevent it; but, inſtead of giving the king, his brother-in-law, ſome ſatisfaction, by doing juſtice to the parties concerned, in the affair of St. Sardos, and by offering the homage due to him, he ſtill acted up to his character of neglecting important matters, for the ſake of trifles. Indeed, he ſent commiſſioners into Guienne, with publick orders, to inquire into the buſineſs of St. Sardos; but they received private inſtructions, to do their utmoſt to oblige the plaintiffs, to deſiſt from their appeal. As for the homage, though he did not diſpute it, he excuſed himſelf from doing it, alledging that he had never been ſummoned, in form; and, in the mean while, he ſent his brother, the earl of Kent, to command, in Guienne, but with ſo few troops, that the earl, not daring to keep the field, ſhut himſelf up in Reole, where he was beſieged, and, at laſt, forced to ſubmit to a capitulation.

1324. Charles de Valois makes a great progreſs, in Guienne.

A negotiation at Paris. Act. Pub.

Before the earl of Kent went over to Guienne, he was ſent to Paris, to accommodate the difference, between the two crowns; and he had even agreed with the court of France, upon a treaty, which the king, his brother, refuſed to ratify; but this was the ſubject of a long negotiation, 1324. negotiation, which only afforded the earl of Valois leiſure, to purſue his conqueſts, in Guienne. At length, Edward made ſome preparations, which occaſioned the court of France to equip a fleet, to oppoſe that of the Engliſh; and the Spencers, who greedily embraced every opportunity, for vexing Iſabella, made uſe of this, to deprive her of the earldom of Cornwall, aſſigned her, for her private expences. They repreſented to the king, that it was dangerous to leave that country in the hands of the queen, when he was in war with the king, her brother; and that, probably, the French fleet was intended for an invaſion, from that quarter. This was ſufficient to prevail on Edward to re-aſſume that earldom, in a very diſobliging manner to the queen, without diſſembling that he thought her capable of holding a criminal correſpondence with the enemies of the ſtate; but this indignity, added to ſo many other reaſons of diſguſt againſt the Spencers and the king, in all probability, haſtened the project, the particulars whereof I am about to relate.

1325. The pope tries to accommodate matters. Act. Pub.

Notwithſtanding Edward's preparations for war, it was not, by the force of his arms, that he expected the reſtitution of Guienne; but his chief dependence was on the pope, who was choſen mediator, between the two crowns; and his holineſs, to promote this agreement, ſent two nuncio's to Paris, where ambaſſadors from England alſo repaired; but the negotiation went on ſo ſlowly, that the Engliſh could not conceal their impatience. As they ſeemed inclined to return home, a perſon of great note, in the court of France, took occaſion to inſinuate to the nuncio's, that, if the king of England would ſend his queen to Paris, ſhe would, doubtleſs, obtain from the king, her brother, much better terms than the ambaſſadors; and, the nuncio's having communicated this propoſal to the Engliſh plenipotentiaries, it was reſolved that one of them, the biſhop of Wincheſter, ſhould take a journey to London, to perſuade their maſter to follow the method propoſed to them. Theſe particulars may be ſeen, in a letter from Edward to the pope, on this occaſion, inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts; ſo that it was not a contrivance invented by the Spencers, to be rid of the queen, as ſome affirmed, ſince it was firſt projected, in France; but it is far more likely, that the queen herſelf was the author of it, in order to have an opportunity of going to Paris, to put in execution her plot againſt the king, her husband, and his favourites. However, that be, the propoſal being debated, in the council, any expedient was judged preferable to a war, in the preſent poſture of affairs; and Iſabella was, therefore, deſired to go to France; to which ſhe ſeemed to conſent, ſolely with a view to make peace, between the two kings.

The articles of Iſſabella's treaty with her brother.

Immediately after her arrival, at Paris, ſhe procured a ſhort truce, during which, ſhe concluded a treaty with the king, her brother, on theſe terms, that the dutchy of Guienne ſhould be wholly reſigned to the king of France; that afterwards both the kings ſhould meet, at Beauvais, where Charles, at the inſtance of the queen, his ſiſter, ſhould reſtore Guienne to Edward, upon his doing homage for it; that the country of Agenois, lately conquered by France, ſhould not be included in this reſtitution; but that the king of England ſhould be allowed to ſue for it, in the court of peers, where juſtice ſhould be done him; and, if the court decreed, that Edward ſhould have poſſeſſion again, he ſhould be obliged to pay the king of France a certain ſum, towards the charges of the war, but nothing, if he loſt his cauſe. The day after ſigning this treaty, the commiſſioners of France, for reaſons they did not think fit to explain, deferred, 15 days longer, the interview of the two monarchs, tho' it had been fixed to the Aſſumption of the Virgin. 1325.

Edward prepares to go and do homage

How diſadvantageous ſoever this treaty ſeemed to Edward, being willing, at any rate, to avoid a war, he took care to ratify it and prepare to do his homage; but the Spencers were extremely uneaſy at theſe preparations, knowing that there were, in the kingdom, great numbers of male-contents, who might take advantage of the king's abſence, to excite freſh commotions. However, an expedient found out, in this interval, either in France or England, diſpelled their perplexing apprehenſions; for it was inſinuated to Edward, that, if he would reſign to prince Edward, his ſon, aged 13 years, the dutchy of Guienne and the earldom of Ponthieu, the king of France would receive the homage of the young prince, and deliver up to him the places he had promiſed to reſtore by the treaty. In all appearance, this overture came from the court of France, as well as the propoſal of the queen's going to Paris; but it was only hinted to the king, like the former, to induce him to demand that favour himſelf. Nevertheleſs, Edward fondly imagined, that, out of reſpect to him, Charles had made this overture, to excuſe him from performing what was very diſagreeable to him, or that the queen had obtained this favour, by her ſollicitations; nor did the Spencers diſcern the poiſon that lurked under this ſeemingly very beneficial propoſal. They did not, in the leaſt, queſtion, but the management of Guienne would ſtill remain in their hands, in the name of the young prince, at leaſt, during his minority; nor did they apprehend, that the propoſed change could redound to the advantage of France; whereas, for that very reaſon, they ſhould have ſuſpected it, ſince it ſeldom happens, that any thing advantageous is offered to another, without the propoſer's receiving ſome benefit, though, at firſt, it does not appear. However, Edward accepted, without heſitation, the offer, which excuſed him from a journey he was extremely unwilling to make; tho' he, thereby, threw himſelf, headlong, into the ſnare laid for him, the queen's ſole deſign, in the whole contrivance, being to get the prince, her ſon, with her, to employ him, as her inſtrument, to ruin the king, her husband.

Remarks on the giving up Guienne.

It will appear, to the laſt degree, probable, that Charles the Fair was very deeply concerned in this plot, when it is conſidered, that he 1325. he was the author of the firſt propoſal of ſending Iſabella to Paris; and, therefore, in all likelihood, of the ſecond too, which tended to draw prince Edward there alſo; and, indeed, if he had not ſome private view, what could he reaſonably expect from the propoſed change? Act. Pub. Was it not more honourable to ſee the king of England at his feet, than his ſon? And yet, inſtead of making any objection, on this account, the Collection of the Publick Acts ſhews, that he very readily came into it, by the great haſte with which this agreement was made. The 21ſt of Auguſt, Edward had ſtill thoughts of going to France; the 24th of the ſame month, in a letter to Charles, he deſired to be excuſed, upon a pretended fit of ſickneſs, from meeting him, at Beauvais, on the day appointed; the 2d of September, he abſolutely reſigned to the prince, his ſon, the earldom of Ponthieu; the 4th of the ſame month, Charles ſigned letters-patent, conſenting to the ſubſtitution of the ſon, in his father's room, provided Edward would reſign to his ſon whatever he held, in France; but this condition was already performed, in England, two days before, with reſpect to the earldom of Ponthieu, from whence it is evident, that this negotiation was begun and compleated, between the 24th of Auguſt and the 4th of September; which, doubtleſs, cannot be thought a ſufficient time, without ſuppoſing, that the court of France was already determined to grant what, ſhe well knew, was about to be demanded. If the ſon's ſubſtitution, in the father's place, had been attended with no conſequence, there would have been no occaſion to take much notice of it; but it was neceſſary to relate the circumſtances, in order to demonſtrate, that it was a plot contrived, long before, by the queen, and a ſnare laid by her for the king, her husband; and that ſhe, all the while, acted in concert with the king of France, her brother; for it is ſcarce credible, that this princeſs was ſo politick as to engage Charles in her project, and yet that neither he nor his council ſhould perceive it. It is, therefore, very probable, before Iſabella left England, ſhe had intimated to the king, her brother, that ſhe was deſirous of ſhaking off her dependence on the Spencers, to free herſelf from the ill treatment ſhe received from her husband, by their inſtigation; ſo that it may be very fairly preſumed, that Charles cauſed to be made, indirectly, the propoſal of ſending her to Paris, in order to ſerve the queen, his ſiſter; and that, with the ſame view, he ſo readily came into the treaty he concluded with her, when he might reaſonably expect to become maſter of Guienne. In fine, that, in purſuit of the ſame deſign, he conſented to receive the ſon's, inſtead of the father's homage; and the prolonging of the term of the homage, without aſſigning the reaſons, was a conſequence of the ſame project; for it was, doubtleſs, believed, that it would require more time to prevail on Edward to ſend his ſon to Paris, to which it was imagined, he would raiſe ſome objections. To all theſe reaſons it may be farther added, that afterwards Charles permitted the queen, his ſiſter, to ſtay in France, in ſpite of the repeated inſtances of her husband, to the contrary; and that the French hiſtorians own themſelves, that he had promiſed to aſſiſt her. Mezerai. Moreover, Iſabella's hatred of Spencer, the younger, and her paſſion for Mortimer, which ſhe no longer concealed, when ſhe had the prince, her ſon, in her power, as well as the readineſs, with which all the Engliſh lords declared for her, when it was time, as we ſhall ſee, preſently, are farther proofs of this point; for, from the connexion of all theſe circumſtances, it is demonſtrable, that Iſabella's plot was formed, before her departure from England, and that the king, her brother, was privy to it; but I have inſiſted more copiouſly on theſe particulars, becauſe the hiſtorians, in my opinion, ſpeak very obſcurely of the cauſes of the revolution, I am about to relate.

Prince Edward comes to Paris. Act. Pub.

The kings having agreed upon the expedient propoſed, prince Edward departed for Paris, on the 12th of September, 1325, after he had received, from his father, the abſolute grant of the dutchy of Guienne and earldom of Ponthieu; and, in a few days after his arrival, he did homage to the king, his uncle, who actually delivered up Guienne to him, tho' he kept Agenois, of which Edward, the father, greatly complained; alledging, that, by the late agreement, Charles was obliged to reſtore all Guienne to his ſon. Charles, on the contrary, maintained, that the promiſed reſtitution had relation to the late treaty, by which he reſerved Agenois for himſelf. This conteſt was not diſagreeable to the queen, who wanted a pretence to continue at Paris; and, Walſing. after the arrival of the prince, her ſon, all the Engliſh, who had fled for refuge into France, or been baniſh'd their country, reſorted to her. Roger Mortimer was of this number, who became her chief counſellor; and, from that time, Edward's ambaſſadors had very little acceſs to the queen, and were no longer conſulted, about the reſtitution of Agenois. On the contrary, ſhe held frequent councils, unto which none were admitted, except the profeſs'd enemies of the king, her husband, and of the Spencers; nay, ſhe had ſecret interviews with Mortimer, which occaſioned many ſuſpicions; and, in fine, ſhe uſed, at length ſo little diſcretion, in her familiarities with him, that Edward's ſervants, at Paris, were extremely offended at her conduct; whilſt, on the other hand, her return to England was deferr'd, from day to day, on various pretences, notwithſtanding the repeated orders of the king, her husband, to bring home his ſon. All the hiſtorians unanimouſly relate, that ſhe was enamoured of Mortimer; and ſome affirm, that her paſſion commenced, at Paris; though, as was obſerved, much more probably, it began, in England; but, however that be, the queen's ſecret conferences with a fugitive, whom ſhe ought to have baniſh'd her preſence, as an enemy to the king, opened, at length, the eyes of the biſhop of Exeter, one of Edward's ambaſſadors. This prelate, being fully convinced, that his maſter was betrayed, privately withdrew from the court of France,

The queen's plot againſt the king, her husband. Her paſſion for Mortimer.

1325. to give him an account of the proceedings, at Paris; and he not only informed him of the queen's ſcandalous behaviour, with reſpect to Mortimer, but likewiſe aſſured him, that they were contriving ſome plot againſt him; very juſtly founding his ſuſpicions on their frequent councils with the exiles, without ſuffering the Engliſh ambaſſadors to be preſent. Edward, Act. Pub. before this, greatly wondered, that, as the homage was paid, his wife and ſon ſhould ſtay ſo long, in France, and he had often wrote, to recall them; but the biſhop of Exeter, having, now, entirely opened his eyes, he plainly perceived his great error, in ſending his ſon to Paris. He, therefore, more urgently than ever, repeated his inſtances for their return, and even poſitively commanded the queen to bring the young prince with her, without delaying a minute, for the reaſons ſhe had, hitherto, alledged; and his orders were ſo preſſing, that Iſabella cauſed the king, her brother, to ſend him word, that ſhe durſt not venture to return into England, unleſs ſhe was, firſt, ſecured againſt the ill treatment ſhe was apprehenſive of receiving from Spencer, the younger; but Edward, in his anſwer, juſtified Spencer's behaviour to the queen, by her own letters to that miniſter, full of friendſhip and confidence, ſince her being in France, and, at the ſame time, aſſured the king, his brother-in-law, that he would never ſuffer Spencer, or any other perſon, to fail in the reſpect due to his queen. He farther repreſented to him, that, if he had not entirely relied on his ſincerity, he ſhould never have ſent his ſon into France, and intreated him to remember his promiſe, and ſend him back, with all expedition; and, to the ſame purpoſe, he wrote to the queen and prince; but all his letters were ineffectual. Iſabella was reſolved to purſue her project; and, whilſt ſhe was taking meaſures, to accompliſh her deſign, her friends, in England, were very active and zealous, in her ſervice. The heads of her party were Henry of Lancaſter, brother of him that was beheaded, at Pontefract, and the biſhops of Lincoln and Hereford; who eaſily formed a powerful faction, againſt the king, ſuch was the diſſaffection of the barons, ſince the late cruel executions.

1326. Iſabella treats with the earl of Hainault. Charles the Fair, as the French hiſtorians are forced to acknowledge, had promiſed the queen, his ſiſter, ſome aſſiſtance, tho' he was unwilling it ſhould appear, that he was concerned in her plots; wherefore, it was neceſſary, for Iſabella, to find a protector, who would openly ſupport her intereſts. With this view, ſhe applied to the earl of Hainault, from whom ſhe expected to procure ſome troops, to ſtrengthen her party, upon her arrival in England; and, the more effectually to gain him, ſhe concluded with him a marriage, between her ſon, Edward, and his daughter, Philippa, as if it had been in her power to diſpoſe of the young prince. Several pieces, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, evidently prove, that this match was in hand, whilſt the king was yet at Paris; and, among others, there is a letter of king Edward to his ſon, expreſly forbidding him, to enter into any marriage-engagement, without his knowledge.

In the interim, the king of France ſtill permitted Iſabella to remain, at Paris, and read, without any emotion, or anſwer, Edward's letters, upbraiding him with breach of faith; and the information, Edward received from the biſhop of Exeter, the queen's frivolous excuſes, to defer her return, and king Charles's connivance gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs. He plainly apprehended, that ſome plot was contriving againſt him, at Paris, tho' he could not learn the particulars of it; yet he was but too ſenſible of its dangerous conſequences, ſo long as the prince, his ſon, was in the hands of his enemies. Moſt of the hiſtorians affirm, that the contempt ſhewn, by the mother and ſon, for his orders, induced him, at length, to baniſh them the kingdom; but a letter, he Act. Pub. ſent the pope, on that ſubject, demonſtrates, that it was no more than a falſe rumour ſpread, in France, on purpoſe to juſtify the queen's ſtay; for, in this letter, Edward told the pope, "That he had never entertained ſuch an unnatural thought; that the tender age of his ſon freed him from any imputation of diſobedience, of which the queen alone was guilty; and that he had too great an affection for both, to treat them, in that inhuman manner." Having tried, in vain, all the means he could deviſe, to oblige them to return to England, he turned his whole fury upon the ambaſſadors, who aſſiſted the queen, in the negotiation of the fatal treaty, and reſolved to make them reſponſible, for the iſſue; and he particularly accuſed the biſhop of Norwich and earl of Richmond, of prevaricating, in the execution of their orders, in which he committed two moſt egregious errors. Firſt, he increaſed, thereby, the number of his enemies, who were, already, too numerous; and, ſecondly, he diſcovered his incapacity to govern his kingdom, ſince, as if he had been a minor king, he caſt on his miniſters the blame of his own conduct, in ratifying the treaty. This ſtep could not fail to give his enemies a great advantage; whoſe principal deſign was to perſuade the people, that he was very unfit to govern; and his next proceeding was no leſs impolitick, in declaring war againſt France, He declares war with France. tho' he was not in a condition to maintain it, and it furniſhed Charles with a plauſible pretence openly to eſpouſe his ſiſter's cauſe.

As Iſabella's project, to dethrone the king, Charles aſſiſts his ſiſter. her husband, has a very deteſtable aſpect, the French hiſtorians would fain inſinuate, that Charles the Fair, her brother, was not, in the leaſt, concerned in it; and that, when it came to his knowledge, he expelled her his dominions, and prohibited his knights to give her any aſſiſtance. They would have ſpoken the whole truth, if they had ſaid, that he did not do this, till Iſabella had concerted all her meaſures with the earl of Hainault, and was upon the point of putting her project in execution; and Mezerai could not avoid diſcovering his ſentiments, when he tells us, that the Spencers were ſo liberal of their money, at the court of France,

Walſing. Knighton. Iſabella, having left the court of France, ſpent ſome days, at Abbeville, from whence ſhe proceeded to Valenciennes; where ſhe ratified the treaty concluded between her and the earl of Hainault, and contracted her ſon, Edward, to the princeſs, Philippa. A few days after, repairing to Dort, ſhe embarqued the troops ſupplied by the earl of Hainault, who were all in readineſs there, with ſhips to tranſport them, John de Hainault, the earl's brother, was their general; and the queen, as a ſingular favour, allowed him to ſtile himſelf her knight. Some relate, that theſe troops conſiſted only of 3000 men; whilſt others affirm, that they were far more numerous; but ſhe did not rely ſo much upon theſe forces, as upon the many adherents procured her, by her friends, in England. She landed, on the 22d of September, at Orewell, in Suffolk, where ſhe was joined by Henry of Lancaſter and ſeveral other lords; and her army ſoon became ſo powerful, that ſhe ſtruck terror into thoſe that were deſirous of ſerving the king. That unfortunate prince, who had received early intelligence, that a plot was in agitation againſt him, at Paris, had, according to cuſtom, applied ineffectual remedies to the impending evils; for, inſtead of raiſing an army, and equipping a fleet, which might have defeated the deſigns of his enemies, he only wrote, to the pope and the king of France letters, to no purpoſe. Wherefore, upon the arrival of the foreign troops, he was abandoned by all; and, though he publiſhed a proclamation, commanding his ſubjects to attack the foreigners, and ſet a price upon Mortimer's head, none of them regarded his orders. The earl of Kent, his own brother, went over to the queen; and, in this extremity, he reſolved to retire into the weſt, with the two Spencers, the earl of Arundel, chancellor Baldoc, Simon de Reading, and a few other adherents.

The queen publiſhes a manifeſto. Act. Pub. Walſing. In the mean while, the queen, whoſe army daily increaſed by the troops brought her, from all parts, iſſued out a manifeſto in her own, as well as in the names of Edward, her ſon, and the earl of Kent, ſetting forth the reaſons of their taking up arms. They pretended, that their ſole view was to free the church and ſtate, from the oppreſſions to which they were expoſed, by the male-adminiſtration of the king and the tyranny of the Spencers; adding, that theſe unworthy favourites, and their abettors, ought to be accounted enemies of the ſtate, ſince, by their pernicious advice and abuſe of the royal authority, they unjuſtly deprived ſome of their lives, and others of their eſtates and liberty, without the leaſt regard to the laws of the land, or the privileges of the people. This manifeſto was publiſhed, at Wallingford, October the 15th; whilſt the queen proceeded on her march, in purſuit of the king. 1326.

The king leaves Spencer, the father, at Briſtol, and thinks of retiring to Ireland. Walſing. Edward was, then, in no condition to withſtand his enemies; for not a man would expoſe himſelf to the queen's reſentment, or hazard his life and fortune for an unfortunate prince, whoſe circumſtances were, now, looked upon, as deſperate; and, therefore, he reſolved to retire into Ireland, and leave Spencer, the father, in Briſtol. He fancied, that the ſiege of that place would ſo long employ the queen, that he ſhould have leiſure to take ſome meaſures; and, accordingly, he embarqued, in a ſmall veſſel, for Ireland; but he was driven, by contrary winds, on the coaſt of Wales, where he was forced to land, and lie concealed in the abbey of Neath, till the wind became fair, or he could form ſome other deſign. Whilſt this unhappy prince could ſcarce find, in his own kingdom, a ſafe retreat, the queen over-ran the counties, with an amazing rapidity; and every one was eager to ſupply her army with neceſſaries. At length, ſhe came before Briſtol, where Spencer made but a faint reſiſtance; and, the city ſurrendering, after a few days ſiege, the old gentleman, 90 years of age, was, immediately, hung up, in his armour, without any formality.

He is driven on the coaſt of Wales, where he hides himſelf.

The queen takes Briſtol, and hangs Spencer, the father.

London declares for the queen. In the interim, the city of London, copying after the reſt of the kingdom, declared for the queen; and, in vain, did Walter de Stapleton, biſhop of Exeter, whom the king had left guardian of that city, endeavour to keep it for his maſter. His efforts only excited, againſt him, the fury of the populace, who, treating him with great indignity, at length, cut off his head; and the citizens, being likewiſe enraged againſt the king, became maſters of the tower, and releaſed all the priſoners confined by the Spencers.

The biſhop of Exeter is beheaded. Walſing.

Prince Edward is choſen regent. Act. Pub. The queen, during her ſtay, at Briſtol, received information, that the king had ſet ſail for Ireland; and, as he had not committed the government to any perſon, the lords, who attended the queen, made uſe of that pretence, to nominate, for guardian or regent of the kingdom, prince Edward, who, forthwith, entered upon the adminiſtration. After this, the queen went to Glouceſter, where the gates were opened to her; and here ſhe publiſhed a proclamation, inviting the king to come and re-aſſume the government; whereas ſhe not only was very far from having any thoughts of reinſtating the king, but very well knew, that he never would venture to place any confidence in her, by whom he had been ſo cruelly treated.

The queen, by a proclamation, invites the king to return.

The king is taken, and carried to Monmouth. Whilſt the queen was, at Glouceſter, a report being ſpread, that the king lay concealed, ſomewhere, in Wales, Henry of Lancaſter was detached in queſt of him; and his diligence, together 1326. together with a reward of 2000l. promiſed by the queen, to any one that ſhould apprehend Spencer, the younger, ſoon gained him intelligence of the place, where the king expected to remain, undiſcovered. He had with him only Spencer, chancellor Baldoc, Simon de Reading, and a few domeſticks, all the reſt having deſerted him, in his misfortunes; but, as the abbey of Neath was an improper place, to ſecure the priſoners, Henry of Lancaſter carried them to Monmouth-caſtle, till farther orders. The queen, hearing that the king, her husband, and her principal enemies were taken, held a council, to know how ſhe ſhould act, at this juncture; in which it was reſolved, that the biſhop of Hereford ſhould be ſent, to demand the great ſeal of the king, as well to put it out of his power to uſe it, againſt the queen, as to enable her to call a parliament, without which nothing could be done, in a legal manner. If what had, hitherto, paſſed diſcovered to the king the deſigns of his enemies, this laſt circumſtance fully convinced him, that he ſhould be no longer regarded, ſince, by reſigning the great ſeal, he ſhould, at once, be deprived of the exerciſe of the royal authority; yet he delivered it, without the leaſt ſigns of reluctance, and impowered the queen and the prince, his ſon, to uſe it, at their pleaſure, even in matters of mere grace; but this was the laſt act of authority performed by this prince, who, ſoon after, was removed to Kenelworth-caſtle.

A parliament is called, in the king's name.

As for the queen, having, now, the great ſeal in her poſſeſſion, ſhe uſed it to her own advantage, as well to order the payment of her debts, as to call a parliament, in the name of the captive king; but ſhe could not ſtay, till the meeting of the parliament, ſo great was her impatience to be revenged upon Spencer and the reſt of her enemies. The earl of Arundel * had already loſt his head, by her orders, at Hereford, where ſhe intended to ſacrifice the others to her vengeance; and, marching to that city, ſhe ordered the priſoners to be conducted, in a moſt ignominious manner, to expoſe them, all the way, to the inſults and curſes of the people. Upon her arrival, ſhe directly cauſed Spencer and Simon de Reading to be brought to their trials; the firſt of whom was hanged on a gibbet 50 foot high, and the other 10 foot lower. As for chancellor Baldoc, ſeeing he was in holy orders, and it was not ſafe to proceed againſt him, in the ſame manner, he was committed to the cuſtody of the biſhop of Hereford, who carried him to London; but, as he entered the city, the mob fell upon him, and, having terribly abuſed him, threw him into Newgate, where he died of the blows he had received.

1327. The parliament meets. Walſing.

The favourites and miniſters being, thus, puniſhed, according to their deſerts, for their pride and cruelty, the queen came to London, to take new meaſures, concerning the parliament which was to meet; and her entrance into the city was triumphant, amidſt the acclamations of the people, who called her their deliverer, and expreſſed their thankfulneſs, for the pretended ſervice ſhe had done the ſtate. The parliament meeting, in January, 1327, the firſt thing, recommended to their conſideration, was the depoſing of the king, for which each of the members was, by this time, ſo prepared, that it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the king ſhould be depoſed, and his ſon, Edward, placed on the throne, in his room. The heads of the charge, exhibited againſt him, were digeſted into ſeveral articles, of which ſome were highly aggravated, and others only bare repetitions, in order to ſwell the number; which, at large, are, as follows: 1327.

Edward is depoſed, and his ſon choſen, in his room.

'I. That the perſon of the king was unequal to the government; ſince he was continually led and governed by others, who gave him ill counſel, to the diſhonour of himſelf, and deſtruction of the holy church, and all his people; not conſidering, or knowing, whether it was good, or evil; nor would he redreſs theſe abuſes, when he was requeſted by the great and wiſe men of his realm, or ſuffer them to be amended.

'II. In all his time, he would not apply himſelf to good counſel, nor take it, nor to the good government of his kingdom; but he always gave himſelf to inconvenient works and employments, neglecting the buſineſs of his realm.

'III. By means of his imprudent adminiſtration, he loſt the kingdom of Scotland, with other lands and dominions in Gaſcoigne and Ireland, which his father left him, in peace and amity with the king of France, and many other great perſons.

'IV. By his pride and cruelty, he deſtroyed the holy church, and the eccleſiaſticks, impriſoning ſome, and diſtreſſing others; and he alſo put to an ignominious death, confined, baniſhed, and diſinherited many great and noble men of the land.

'V. Whereas he was obliged, by his oath, to do juſtice to all, he would not perform it, by reaſon of the covetouſneſs of him and his evil counſellors which were with him; neither did he duly regard the other points of the oath, which he made, at his coronation.

'VI. He abandoned his realm, and did, as much as was poſſible for him, to deſtroy it and his people; and, what is worſe, by his cruelty, and the default of his perſon, he is found altogether incorrigible. All which things are ſo notorious, that they cannot be contradicted.'

This act paſſing, Nemine Contradicente, young Edward was proclaimed king, in Weſtminſter-hall, by the name of Edward III; and then the archbiſhop of Canterbury preached a ſermon, on theſe words, "The voice of the "people, the voice of God;" in which he attempted to vindicate the proceedings of the parliament, and exhorted the people to pray

* Edmund Fitz-Alan, deſcended from a daughter of the family of the Albini, earls of Arundel, who was mortally hated by Mortimer; and it was laid to his charge, that, having married his ſon and heir to the daughter of Hugh le Deſpenſer, he had been privy to his counſels, and, among other things, had procured the death of Thomas, late earl of Lancaſter, with that of Gondomar de Valence, earl of Pembroke. 1327. to the king of kings, in behalf of their new sovereign.

The pretended sorrow of the queen. Walsing.

When the news of this rigorous sentence was brought to the queen, she seemed to be extremely concerned, insomuch that she even burst out into tears; but her outward sorrow was far from being consistent with all the steps she had taken, to dethrone her husband; much less with her passion for Mortimer, of which she gave such publick proofs, that it was impossible to be mistaken. The prince, her son, whose youth rendered him less suspicious, was, perhaps, the only person that was affected with her counterfeit tears; who, prompted by his generous inclinations, solemnly vowed not to accept the crown, during the king his father's life, without his express consent. This vow, in some degree, disconcerted the measures of the parliament; for they were afraid, that Edward, the father, would persist in retaining the title of king, though deprived of all his authority; and, in this perplexity, it was judged absolutely necessary, to oblige him to resign his crown to the prince, his son. Accordingly, the bishops of Lincoln and Hereford were sent, to prepare him; and then the parliament nominated 12 commissioners, viz. three bishops, three earls, two barons, two abbots, and two judges; to whom was added judge Trussel, as the nation's particular procurator, to declare to him, that his subjects were no longer bound, by their oath of allegiance, and to receive his resignation. They shewed their resentment against the unhappy king, in nothing so much as in their choice of the two first prelates, whom he had, all along, regarded, as his enemies, and who, indeed, on this occasion, instead of giving him consolation, insulted over his misfortunes, in endeavouring to persuade him, that he was deposed, for his own good, and to ease him of the heavy weight of the government, that he might live more happily than he had, hitherto, done; but, as their malicious discourse made no great impression upon him, they roundly told him, that, unless he complied with the parliament, he would only render his condition still more unfortunate, and that his obstinacy would prove extremely prejudicial to his family; since, if he refused to resign the crown to his son, the nation was resolved to elect a king, that was not of the royal family. Upon this, they withdrew, in order to give him leisure to consider of his answer to the commissioners, who were coming to receive his resignation.

The parliament obliges the king to resign his crown. Knighton.

The state of Edward.

At the arrival of the commissioners, the unhappy king came out from his bed-chamber, in a mourning-gown, his countenance demonstrating his inward trouble; and, upon the very sight of that formidable power, which had just despoiled him of royalty, he fell into a swoon, from whence he could hardly recover; but he no sooner came to himself, than the commissioners told him their message, and represented to him the dangerous consequences of his refusal. Then, the wretched prince, with a sadness that could not be seen, without pity, answered, "That he submitted to "whatever was required of him, with the "greater resignation, as he could not but "own, that his sins were the sole cause of his "misfortunes;" adding, at the same time, "That he could not behold, without extreme "grief, the aversion of his subjects; but, if "his sorrow could admit of any comfort, it "was from the consideration of their good-"ness to his son, for which he returned them "his thanks."

1327.

He resigns the ensigns of royalty.

After this he proceeded to the ceremony of his resignation, by delivering to them the crown, sceptre, and the other ensigns of royalty; and then Sir William Trussel, addressing himself to the king, spoke, in this manner, making use of a form of his own, in a case where there was no precedent: "I William "Trussel, procurator of the prelates, earls, "barons, and people, in my procuracy named, "having, for this, full and sufficient power, "do surrender unto you, Edward, late king of "England, the homage and fealty of the per-"sons aforesaid, and do acquit the same, in "the best manner the law and custom can give "it, and do make this protestation, in the "name of all those that will not be in your "fealty or allegiance, for the future, nor claim "nor hold any thing of you, as king, but ac-"count you, as a private person, without any "manner of royal dignity." These words being pronounced, Sir Thomas Blunt, high-steward, broke his staff, and declared all the king's officers discharged from his service; and, thus, ended the reign of Edward II, in the 43d year of his age, having lasted 19 years, 6 months, and 15 days.

The character of Edward II.

This prince had so mean a genius, that he could not distinguish what was for his advantage, from that which was hurtful to him; and he followed his humour, regardless of the consequences, whilst he was altogether incapable of remedying the misfortunes, into which he thereby plunged himself. Though he had many failings, it may be said, that he was more weak than wicked; and, to sum up his character, in a few words, he exceedingly resembled his grandfather, Henry III. Edward, his father, a much wiser prince, and taught by the troubles of the two kings, his immediate predecessors, ever avoided, as a most dangerous rock, all occasions of quarrel with the nobility; chusing rather to give way a little, than hazard his quiet, to gratify his resentment; but the son wanted a sufficient capacity, to imitate so good an example, or to improve by his instructions. He surrendered himself entirely to his favourites, and chose rather to forfeit the affection of his subjects, than deny himself the satisfaction of heaping favours on those he loved; and his weakness drew on him the contempt of his subjects, which was soon changed into a downright aversion, when it appeared, that he sacrificed all to his passions; besides, he had the misfortune to have a beautiful and amorous wife, who, by indulging an infamous passion, compleated his ruin, for fear of being herself prevented. Doubtless, he was treated too severely by his subjects, whose insolence increased, in proportion 1327. to the decreaſe of their ſovereign's power; and one cannot obſerve, without admiration, that there was not a ſingle perſon willing to draw his ſword, in his defence. I will not preſume to determine, how far, in thoſe days, the rights of the people, with reſpect to the king, might extend; but I ſhall only remark, that this is the firſt inſtance, in the Engliſh Hiſtory, of a king depoſed by his ſubjects, at leaſt, ſince the conqueſt. Edward II. is charged with being given to drink; and ſome repreſent his fondneſs for Gaveſton, as a very criminal paſſion. Others, on the contrary, commend him for his continency; and, indeed, we do not find, that he had any miſtreſſes, or baſtards, like ſome of his predeceſſors. He founded Oriel-college and St. Mary-hall, in Oxford; and he alſo built a monaſtery, for friars, on his eſtate at Langley.

Edward II's iſſue.

He had, by Iſabella of France, two ſons and two daughters; and the eldeſt of his ſons was Edward III, his ſucceſſor; but the youngeſt, named John of Eltham, the place of his birth, died, in the flower of his age, in his brother's reign, without iſſue. Joanna, the eldeſt daughter, was married to David, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, the ſecond, was eſpouſed to Reynald, duke of Guelder.

An earthquake.

I ſhall conclude the hiſtory of this reign with two events, which I had no occaſion to mention, elſewhere; and the firſt was an earthquake, the moſt terrible that had ever happened, in Great-Britain. The ſecond was the ſuppreſſion of the order of the Knights-templars, both in England and all other chriſtian ſtates; which was firſt inſtituted, at Jeruſalem, in the reign of Baldwin IV, for the defence of the holy ſepulchre, and protection of the pilgrims that reſorted thither from all parts of Chriſtendom, Hugo de Paganis and Geoffrey de St. Ademar being the founders. The knights of this order were, at firſt, ſtiled, the Poor of the Holy City; and, afterwards, they received the name of Templars, becauſe their firſt houſe was near the Temple, and all their houſes were called Temples. This order was confirmed, in the council of Trent, 1127; and its rule was compoſed by St. Bernard.

The ſuppreſſion of the Templars.

After the deſtruction of the kingdom of Jeruſalem, about 1186, this order was diſperſed over all Europe, and increaſed prodigiouſly, by the liberality of the chriſtians; but riches ſoon corrupted the manners of the knights; and, in proceſs of time, their ſcandalous lives, together with an inſupportable pride, rendered them as odious, as they were eſteemed, in the beginning of their inſtitution. Philip the Fair, king of France, being diſobliged by thoſe of his kingdom, and not ſatisfied with puniſhing the offenders, attempted the ruin of the whole order, by means of Clement V, whom he had artfully gained; for, having ordered all the Templars in France to be ſeized, as well as the grand maſter of the order, who reſided in the iſland of Cyprus, and, by the pope's order, was come to Paris, on a charge exhibited againſt them, that, at their admiſſion into the order, they denied Jeſus Chriſt, and ſpit upon a crucifix, he cauſed 57 to be burnt, among whom was the grand maſter. To this were added accuſations of hereſy, ſodomy, and other numberleſs crimes; and, in complaiſance to the king of France, Clement V. urgently preſſed Edward II, to follow Philip's example. After much ſollicitation, he, at length, obtained, that all the Templars, in England, ſhould be ſeized, as they were, in France, in one day; and Edward, being prevailed with, in expectation of their eſtates, held a national ſynod, at London, in which they were condemned. However, they were not treated with ſo much rigour, as in France; for they were only diſperſed in the monaſteries, to do penance, and had a moderate penſion, out of the revenues of the order. The ſeverities, which they ſuffered, in France and England, would, doubtleſs, have been ſufficient, if the deſign had been only to chaſtiſe them; but their deſtruction was determined; for Clement V. cauſed ſtrict inquiry to be made, and many witneſſes to be heard, who accuſed not only ſome particular knights, but the whole order, of the moſt heinous enormities. Had theſe depoſitions been well atteſted, one could ſcarce have imagined it poſſible, that there ſhould be ſuch a deteſtable ſociety, among chriſtians; but every body was not equally convinced of the truth of theſe allegations, particularly, as to what concerned the order, in general. Theſe preparations being made, the pope convened, at Vienne in Dauphine, a general council, wherein he preſided, in perſon; and Philip was likewiſe pleaſed to be preſent, to promote the condemnation of the order; but the biſhops could not think of condemning men that were not convicted, or even ſummoned before the council, to anſwer for themſelves; ſo that the pope was obliged to uſe the plenitude of his apoſtolical power, in ſuſpending this order for ever, by a bull read, in the ſecond ſeſſion. As the council was not prepared for it, no one ventured to oppoſe the bull; and their ſilence, according to cuſtom, was taken, for an approbation. By the ſame bull, Clement reſerved to the holy ſee the diſpoſal of the eſtates of the Templars; and, ſoon after, he aſſigned them to the Hoſpitallers, or knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, called, at this day, knights of Maltha. Edward II, who had ſeized the eſtates of the condemned order, to no purpoſe, oppoſed the pope's grant to the Hoſpitallers, tho' he inſiſted on the prerogatives of his crown, by which all confiſcations were adjudged to him; and the troubles, in England, during his reign, would not permit him to keep poſſeſſion. Thus, the whole order of the Templars were made to ſuffer the puniſhment that was, doubtleſs, due to ſome of their members, but which, probably, was not deſerved by all, in general.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK X.

The Reigns of EDWARD III. and RICHARD II; containing the ſpace of 73 years: With a Diſſertation on the Salick Law, and the State of the Church, from 1272 to 1399.

11. EDWARD III. ſirnamed of Windſor.

1327. THE depoſing of Edward II. did not procure to the Engliſh all the happineſs they were made to expect; for, if it freed them from the troubles of the late reign, it involved them in others that were no leſs perplexing. The government of a weak and imprudent king was not more dangerous than that of a minor prince, under the direction of a paſſionate mother, and a young unexperienced miniſter, who was more preſumptuous, tho' not ſo able, as the Spencers; and, accordingly, the people ſoon found, that they had not gained much, by the change; but, fortunately for them, Edward's minority was of a ſhort continuance. As ſoon as the young prince took the reins of government into his own hands, he converted the misfortunes of the late reign into bleſſings, and the injuries, received from France and Scotland, into glory and triumphs; a remarkable inſtance, which ſhews, that the proſperity of a ſtate does not ſo much depend on its own ſtrength, as on the prudence of him that ſits at the helm; for the preſent reign is juſtly ranked among the moſt illuſtrious, in the Hiſtory of England.

Edward III. is proclaimed and crowned. Walſing.

The commiſſioners, ſent to Kenelworth, being returned, with Edward II's reſignation, the prince, his ſon, was again proclaimed, under the name of Edward III, and crowned, a few days after; when the queen and Mortimer, whoſe intereſt it was to render the whole nation accomplices of their violent proceedings, affected to cauſe a coronation-medal to be ſtruck, importing the univerſal conſent of the people to the preſent revolution. On one ſide, was the young king crowned, laying his ſcepter on a heap of hearts, with this motto, POPULO DAT JURA VOLENTI; and on the reverſe, a hand held forth, as it were ſaving a crown falling, from on high, with theſe words, NON RAPIT SED RECIPIT. 1327. J. Barnes.

Though Edward was only in his 15th year, he had already a mature judgment, and, conſidering his age, a very uncommon penetration; yet, in compliance to the laws of the land, the king muſt have governors, and the ſtate regents. The parliament choſe 12, out of the biſhops, earls, and barons, of whom Henry of Lancaſter was declared the chief; and the queen did not oppoſe this nomination; but, having the power in her own hands, ſhe ſeized the government, and ſhared it with none, except her creatures. Roger Mortimer, who had as great a ſway over her, as Spencer, the ſon, had over the late king, acted, as prime miniſter, and managed the affairs of the kingdom, at his pleaſure; and, the parliament being at the queen's devotion, ſhe procured the grant of a dowry, exceeding two thirds of the revenues of the crown. At the ſame time, The parliament names the regents.

1327. 100 marks, a month, were assigned, for the maintenance of the deposed king; a sum more than sufficient, for that purpose, that unhappy prince being treated, under his confinement, in a very unbecoming manner.

The parliament annuls the sentences passed, in the late reign. Act. Pub.

The animosity, the parliament shewed, in their proceedings against Edward II, encouraged such as were sufferers, whilst the Spencers were at the helm, to petition to be restored to their estates and honours; and their petitions met with a gracious reception. The parliament, willing to justify their late conduct, reversed all the judgments passed, in the preceding reign, as well against the late earl of Lancaster and his adherents, as against those that countenanced the designs of the queen; pretending, that they were illegal, and manifestly extorted, by the credit of the favourites. Perhaps, this induced some historians to affirm, that Edward III. was pleased to begin his reign, with a general pardon; but if, by this general pardon, be meant the reversing the foresaid judgments, the honour of it is not to be ascribed to the king, who did nothing, of himself; and it is certain, that, herein, the sole motive was, to disparage the late government, in favour of the queen's party. With the same view, the king was persuaded strenuously to sollicit the court of Rome, for the canonization of the earl of Lancaster, beheaded, at Pontefract; and he was made to say, in his letter to the pope, that the miracles, wrought at his tomb, evidently proved, that his death was a real martyrdom. In a word, all the steps, now, taken by the queen and parliament, tended solely to justify their usage of the late king; which, doubtless, would have been accounted highly criminal, if it had not been crowned with success.

The king of Scotland breaks the truce. Act. Pub.

The tranquillity England expected to enjoy, under the new king, who was in peace, or truce, with all his neighbours, was interrupted by an incursion of the Scots on the borders; for Robert, though in an ill state of health, and of a very advanced age, believed he ought not to suffer the minority of the king of England to pass, without reaping some advantage; and he was likewise afraid, that too long a repose might enervate his subjects, being, at the same time, sensible, that he was concerned with formidable enemies, who, in making a truce with him, had not departed from their pretensions. These are the most probable reasons of this rupture, which Buchanan vindicates, only by saying, that it is to be supposed Robert was determined by weighty motives; but, however that be, having put the earl of Murray and Sir James Douglas, at the head of 20,000 men, he ordered them to ravage the borders of England. Edward could not hear the news of this irruption, without an ardent desire of signalizing himself, in the defence of his kingdom; and, though they, who had the management of publick affairs, were not much inclined to war, they could not think of tamely suffering such daring insults; since their authority might have been shaken, if they had discovered any signs of weakness or cowardice, on the present occasion.

The opinion of the council concurring with the king's desires, an army of 60,000 men was raised, including the troops brought by John de Hainault into England; and, the whole army arriving, at York, Edward was just going to head them, when a sudden quarrel arose, between the English and Hainaulters, in which many were slain. As the English were the aggressors, justice could not be done to the foreigners, without disgusting the army; so that the court was obliged to stay longer, at York, than was, at first, intended, in order to compose this difference, before they took the field; which delay afforded the Scots leisure to pass the Tine, between Carlisle and Newcastle, and to ravage, in a barbarous manner, the country on this side of the river. They had 4000 men at arms; and the rest of the troops were mounted on little swift horses, that they might, the more easily, make incursions and retreat; but the news of this hastened the king's departure. Though he did not know exactly the situation of the enemy, he marched, in quest of them, guided only by the fire and smoke of the houses, still burning, in the road; yet, notwithstanding his expedition, he could not possibly overtake them; for, as they had no infantry, and were not encumbered with much baggage, they made such extraordinary marches, that they were at so great a distance from the English army, that they could not even be traced; insomuch that the king, despairing of meeting them, called a council of war; and, upon some confused advices, that the Scots had not yet repassed the Tine, it was resolved to expect them, beyond the river, near the place where it was thought they would pass, in their return to Scotland. This resolve was put in execution; but the English army had no sooner passed the Tine, than they were forced to return, for want of provisions.

The Scots ravage the borders.

Boeth. Buchanan.

During these marches and counter-marches, Edward, having never received certain intelligence of the enemy, was extremely uneasy; wherefore, he gave orders for it to be proclaimed in the army, that he, who should bring him the first certain account of the Scots, should be made a knight, with a pension of 100l. sterling. The prospect of this reward engaged so many people, in a diligent search after the enemy, that it was not long, before he obtained the desired information; though it was not without some confusion, that he heard they were not above two leagues distant. He advanced, immediately, towards them, in hopes of fighting, that very day; but he soon lost the pleasure of that expectation; for the Scotch generals, who were not ignorant of his approach, had encamped, over-against Stanhope-park, on a hill, at the foot of which run the river Ware, shallow, indeed, but full of rocks, which rendered the passage extremely difficult; and, how desirous soever Edward was of an engagement, he perceived, that he could not attack them, without exposing his army to manifest danger. It was no small mortification to a young prince, greedy of glory, to see the enemy so near, without being able to give them battle; yet he did not entirely despair of success.

Edward overtakes, but could not fight them.

J. Barnes's history of Edward III. Walsing.

1327. ceſs. As he judged of their courage, by his own, he ſent them word, that, if they would croſs the river, he would retire, at a convenient diſtance, and allow them time to paſs, and to chuſe their ground; or elſe that, on the ſame terms, he would come over to them; but the Scotch generals replied, that, the Engliſh army being thrice ſtronger than theirs, it would be great raſhneſs to accept either of the propoſals; that they were reſolved to keep their poſt; and that it was the king's buſineſs to diſlodge them, if he thought fit to attempt it. However, being apprehenſive, that Edward, amuſing them with his offers, deſigned to paſs the river, at ſome other place, they retired, in the night, and encamped, in a ſtill more advantageous ſituation; for they not only ſtill had the Were, in their front, but their flanks were defended by inacceſſible mountains and bogs, which diſpelled their apprehenſions of being attacked, even tho' the Engliſh had paſſed the river, elſewhere. Edward, being informed of their motion, followed them, with the Were between him and the enemy; and, having found them ſo commodiouſly poſted, he made them the ſame offer, as before, to which they returned the ſame anſwer.

A bold action of Douglaſs. Froiſſart. Buchanan. Knighton.

Whilſt the two armies lay, in view of each other, the lord Douglaſs, one of the Scotch generals, paſſing the river, at ſome diſtance from the two camps; with only 200 horſe, ſtole into the Engliſh camp, and he penetrated even to the royal tent, where he gave a terrible alarm. Probably, his intent was to carry off the king; but, being diſappointed, he retired, without much loſs. At length, after both armies had kept their poſts, a fortnight, the Scots decamped, in the night, and, by ſpeedy marches, which prevented the Engliſh from purſuing them, retreated into Scotland; and ſeveral aſcribed to Mortimer the ill ſucceſs of this campaign, ſuſpecting him of holding intelligence with the enemy, to facilitate their retreat, without fighting. Edward, being out of danger from the Scots, returned to York, extremely mortified, becauſe it was not in his power to revenge himſelf; where he disbanded his army, and, having made John de Hainault magnificent preſents, he ſent him back to his own country.

The tragical death of Edward II.

Whilſt the young king was employed, in this expedition, his father, ſtill cloſely confined in Kenelworth-caſtle, led a melancholy life, not being permitted to take the leaſt diverſion; and, though he wrote, from time to time, to his queen, intreating her to leſſen the hardſhips of his impriſonment, nothing was capable of moving that inexorable princeſs, in favour of a husband, whom ſhe herſelf had reduced to this miſerable condition, without deſerving, at leaſt, from her hands, ſuch barbarous uſage. If ſhe might have followed her own inclinations, ſhe would not have anſwered any of his letters; but, as it was her intereſt to deceive the publick, by this correſpondence, ſhe was very glad to continue it; and ſhe ſent him, now and then, ſome linnen, cloaths, and other inconſiderable preſents, to perſuade the credulous people, that ſhe ſacrificed her tenderneſs to the good of the ſtate. However, ſhe could not ſo eaſily deceive Edward himſelf, who was ſufficiently convinced, that ſhe was the ſole cauſe of his misfortunes; and, accordingly, ſhe never had the front to appear in his preſence; nor would ſhe ſo much as ſuffer the king, her ſon, to pay his duty to his unhappy father, leſt he ſhould learn what ſhe deſired he might be ignorant of, to the day of his death; ſo that, though the impriſoned king impatiently wiſhed to ſee them both, and often enquired, why they were ſo unkind, as to deny him that comfort, he could never obtain it.

De la Moore.

In the interim, the rigorous treatment of that unfortunate prince excited compaſſion in the breaſts of the Engliſh, who are naturally generous; and Henry of Lancaſter himſelf, who had the cuſtody of him, relented daily, to ſuch a degree, that he gave him ſome hopes of recovering his liberty; but the earl was ſwayed by another motive, beſides that of generoſity, viz. the irregular conduct of the queen, and the great credit of Mortimer, whoſe arrogance rendered him odious to all. As he took no care to conceal his ſentiments, the queen and Mortimer ſuſpected him of a deſign, to reſtore the old king; and this ſuſpicion, whether well or ill grounded, produced a fatal effect; for, to prevent the imagined danger, they reſolved to remove the captive king out of the hands of his preſent keeper, and entruſt him with ſuch as were firmly attached to them. Sir John Maltravers and Sir Thomas Gurney, who were, both of them, of a brutiſh diſpoſition, received orders, to remove Edward from Kenelworth to Berkley-caſtle; and it was ſcaree poſſible for the captive prince to fall into worſe hands. At firſt, they carried him to Corfe, then, to Briſtol, and, at length, to Berkley-caſtle; and, on the road, they expoſed him to 1000 indignities, cauſing him even to be ſhaved, in the open field, with cold water taken from a ſtinking ditch. How patient ſoever he had, hitherto, been, he could not, on this occaſion, forbear lamenting his misfortune; and, amidſt his complaints and reproaches againſt thoſe, who treated him ſo inhumanly, he ſaid, that, in ſpite of them, he would be ſhaved, with warm water; and, at the ſame time, he ſhed a torrent of tears. His enemies hoped, that the vexation and fatigue, he was made to endure, would put an end to his days; but, tho' his mercileſs guards uſed the moſt cruel, as well as inſolent means, for that purpoſe, the goodneſs of his conſtitution defeated their barbarous deſign. Theſe miſcreants, upon this diſappointment, ſent for freſh inſtructions; and they ſoon received poſitive orders to put that prince to death, who, though overwhelmed with miſery, gave continual uneaſineſs to the authors of his calamity. It is related, that Adam Orleton, biſhop of Hereford, one of the queen's miniſters, ſent, with theſe orders, a Latin letter, wherein, by a ſhameful equivocation, he, at once, adviſed them to murder Edward, and to refrain from the commiſſion of ſuch a crime; and, indeed, the words, aſcribed to him, will

The two keepers, immediately, upon the receipt of theſe orders, entered Edward's room, to put them in execution; and, finding him in his bed, they laid a pillow on his face, to prevent his being heard; after which, with an unparallelled cruelty, they thruſt a horn pipe up his body, through which they ran a red-hot iron, and burnt his bowels. In this horrible manner, did that unfortunare prince expire, with ſuch exquiſite torture, that, in ſpite of the precaution of his murderers, his cries were heard, at a diſtance; but, to conceal this execrable fact, the two executioners ſent for ſome of the inhabitants of Briſtol and Glouceſter; who, examining the body, and diſcovering no ſigns of violence, concluded, that he died a natural death; and this account, which was carefully atteſted by witneſſes, was, forthwith, diſperſed over the whole kingdom, to render it notorious.

The misfortunes of the late king, whom his enemies ſo cruelly perſecuted, began to raiſe the pity of the Engliſh, when he was no longer formidable to them; but this pity was unactive, whereas their hatred was reſtleſs and impatient, till they accompliſhed his utter deſtruction. Indeed, it would be difficult to vindicate his whole conduct; but they cannot be charged with being partial, in his favour, who aſſure us, that his faults bore no proportion to his puniſhment. He ſuffered, in his own perſon, for not having the reſolution to puniſh his favourites; a neceſſary leſſon for all princes, though few are ſo wiſe as to learn it. The compaſſion, for his ſufferings, which could not always be concealed, roſe to that height, that, after his deceaſe, he was reverenced, as a ſaint; ſo eaſily do the people run, from one extream to another. His body was, immediately, interred, without any funeral pomp, in Glouceſter-abbey; but, ſome time after, the king, his ſon, ordered a ſtately tomb to be erected for him, in the ſaid church; and ſo far were his murderers from receiving, for their parricide, the reward they expected, that they were forced to fly, beyond ſea, to avoid puniſhment. The very perſons, that employed them, cauſed diligent ſearch to be made after them, to cover the ſhare they had in the crime; and, three years after, Gurney being ſeized at Burgos, and, by order of the king of Caſtile, carried to Bayonne, Edward commanded him to be conveighed to England; but, by ſome practices, not fully cleared in hiſtory, he was beheaded, at ſea. Maltravers ſpent his days, in exile, in Germany where he had retired; but divine vengeance did not ſtop here; for the queen, Mortimer, and their accomplices alſo felt its effects; and, perhaps, we are likewiſe to conſider, as conſequences of the ſame vengeance, the violent or untimely deaths of almoſt all the deſcendants of Edward III, as well as the civil wars which infeſted England, in the reigns of that prince's poſterity, as the ſequel will inform us.

The death of Edward II. ſuppreſſed all the motions, which began to be obſerved in the kingdom; and the king, his ſon, who believed, that it was natural, having no longer any ſcruples, upon his father's account, embraced this opportunity, to ſolemnize, with Philippa of Hainault, his marriage, concluded by the queen, his mother, at Valenciennes; which ceremony was performed, at York, where the king came, in his return from his campaign; and, ſoon after, the new queen was crowned, with the uſual ſolemnities. 1328.

The marriage of Edward III. Walſing. Act. Pub.

The rejoycings, for the king's marriage and the queen's coronation, being over, Edward called a parliament, at Northampton, to conſult about two very important affairs; the firſt of which concerned the regency of France, which he claimed, upon the deceaſe of Charles the Fair, his uncle, who died, in the beginning of the preſent year; but I ſhall treat, on this point, in another place. The ſecond was the peace with Scotland, propoſed by king Robert; for queen Iſabella and Mortimer, who held the reins of the government, were extremely averſe to a war. On the other hand, the king of Scotland, being no longer able to ſuſtain the hardſhips of a war, was deſirous to ſpend, in tranquillity, the remainder of his days; and, beſides, his age and infirmities warning him of his approaching death, he was very glad to prevent, by a treaty with the Engliſh, the accidents which a war might occaſion, during the minority of his ſon, David, who was only ſeven years old. The parliament, being entirely in the queen's intereſt, readily conſented to enter upon a treaty, that was equally deſired by both the parties; and, the queen-mother and Mortimer, in the behalf of the Engliſh, and Douglaſs, for the Scots, negotiating this affair, a peace was ſoon concluded and confirmed by the marriage of David, prince of Scotland, with Joanna, Edward's ſiſter, though they were both children.

A peace between England and Scotland. Act. Pub.

The Engliſh, in general, were highly diſſatisfied to ſee a treaty begun, which, in all probability, could not redound to their advantage; though their uneaſineſs would have been removed, by the proſpect of the repoſe it was to procure them, if, to haſten the concluſion, Iſabella and Mortimer had not reſigned to Robert ſuch advantages, as he could not have expected, even after the gaining of many victories. Purſuant to their advice, Edward renounced all his pretenſions to Scotland, as well with reſpect to the ſovereignty, as the property; and, at the ſame time, he reſtored to the king of Scotland all the charters and inſtruments, which might prove the ſovereignty of the kings of England over that kingdom. Among theſe, was the famous act, called Ragman's Roll, ſigned by John Baliol and all the Scottiſh barons; which contained the rights of the crown of England; and this was followed by the reſtitution of the crown, ſcepter, and jewels, which Edward I. had carried away from Edinburgh, and, in a word, of every thing elſe,

Had all this proceeded from a motive of juſtice and equity, to repair, in ſome meaſure, the injuries done by Edward I. to the Scots, inſtead of being thought ſurpriſing, ſuch a chriſtian conduct ſhould have been highly commended; but, as people were fully convinced, that the queen and Mortimer did not act, upon ſuch principles, but, on the contrary, were prepoſſeſſed, in favour of the ſovereignty eſtabliſh'd by Edward I, every one was extremely diſpleaſed with this reſtitution. They ſaid, "That a "peace, neither honourable nor neceſſary, "was, by this means, dearly purchaſed; that, "by this ignominious treaty, all the money "expended, and all the blood ſpilt, in the "conqueſt of Scotland, were rendered entire-"ly fruitleſs; that the queen, who under the "pretence of the king her husband's incapa-"city, had depoſed him, evidently diſcover-"ed, how unfit ſhe was herſelf to govern the "ſtate; and that the faults of Edward II, "during his whole reign, were nothing, in "compariſon of thoſe ſhe had committed, in "the very firſt year of her adminiſtration."

Act. Pub. However, in ſpite of all theſe murmurs, the queen and Mortimer had credit enough, with the parliament, to cauſe the treaty to be confirmed, and the ſum of 30,000 marks, which Robert promiſed to pay, within three years, to be conſidered, as a ſufficient equivalent for whatever was reſtored to Scotland; and, thus, it often happens, that the very perſons, who pretend to reform the government, by extraordinary methods, afterwards demonſtrate, that they had nothing leſs in view than the good of the publick.

The nuptials of the princeſs Joanna. Walſing. Purſuant to the treaty, the nuptials of Joanna, Edward's ſiſter, were ſolemnized, at Berwick; and, quickly after, Mortimer, as a reward for his late pretended ſervice to his maſter, was, in full parliament, made earl of Marche; John of Eltham, the king's brother, was created earl of Cornwall, and James Butler, earl of Ormond.

The diſcontents of ſome lords. Walſing. Henry of Lancaſter and ſome other lords did not come to this parliament; being diſguſted, becauſe Iſabella and Mortimer uſurped all authority, contrary to the intent of the parliament, that nominated 12 barons, to manage the publick affairs. The tragical death of Edward II, and the late treaty with Scotland, furniſhing them with a plauſible pretence to complain, they, now, held private conferences, and projected a reformation of the government; but, as it was no eaſy matter to keep a confederacy ſecret, wherein they intended to engage a great number of perſons, it ſoon reached the ears of the queen and Mortimer. The Henry of Lancaſter is attacked by the queen. earl of Lancaſter, whom they look'd upon, as author of the plot, and head of the male-contents, was the firſt victim they reſolved to ſacrifice to their ſafety; and an opportunity ſoon offered, which they thought it adviſable to embrace, to bring about their deſign. The earl had a private quarrel with the lord Holland, whom he regarded, as a mortal enemy to his family, and one of the chief authors of the death of earl Thomas, his brother; and 1328. ſome menaces, which he dropp'd againſt him, induced Sir Thomas Wythers, one of his domeſticks, to revenge his maſter; for, preſently after the breaking up of the parliament, Wythers killed the lord Holland, and took ſanctuary in the earl's palace, at Lancaſter, from whence repeated orders from court were unable to force him. The queen and earl of Marche, rejoicing that their enemy furniſhed them with ſo fair an occaſion, to exaſperate the king againſt him, repreſented to the young prince, that it was of the laſt importance, not to ſuffer a ſubject, of what quality ſoever, to protect criminals, and ſtop the courſe of juſtice; that this was, in reality, to act the ſovereign, and it was to be feared, that thoſe, who aſſumed ſuch a power, deſigned to enlarge it, at the expence of the royal authority, and to diſturb the peace of the kingdom; by which means, they perſuaded the young king to reſolve upon the chaſtiſement of this diſobedience.

He prepares for defence. The earl, being informed of theſe proceedings, prepared, for his defence, and formed an aſſociation, with Edmund, earl of Kent, and Thomas, earl of Norfolk, the king's uncles, the lord Beaumont, judge Truſſel, and ſome other lords; who were all reſolutely determined to defend themſelves, provided they were attacked; and, at the ſame time, they publiſhed a manifeſto, containing the motives of J. Barnes. their armament, which were all drawn from the publick good and grievances of the kingdom. They declared, that they had taken up arms, I. To oblige Iſabella to refund, into the treaſury, the revenues ſhe had procured to be aſſigned her, far exceeding the uſual dowry of the queens. II. To reſtrain the exactions and incroachments of thoſe that governed, in the name of the king. III. To bring to condign puniſhment the betrayers of their country, in the late war with Scotland. IV. To inquire, wherefore, the ordinance of parliament, eſtabliſhing 12 barons, to govern the ſtate, during the king's minority, was not put in execution. V. To cauſe ſtrict inquiry to be made, about the death of the late king, after he was, by private orders, removed from the cuſtody of thoſe, to whom he was committed by the parliament. VI. To call thoſe to an account, who had ſeized that prince's treaſures. VII. To find out, for the ſatisfaction of the publick, by whoſe advice, the king, during his minority, had renounced all his pretenſions to Scotland, and delivered up all the charters and inſtruments, relating to that kingdom. VIII. And laſtly, To bring thoſe to an account, who adviſed the king to marry the princeſs, his ſiſter, to David Bruce, an inveterate foe to the Engliſh nation.

Theſe articles, copies of which were induſtriouſly diſperſed, all over the kingdom, ſenſibly affected the queen and the earl of Marche, who were very plainly ſtruck at; but, inſtead, of juſtifying their conduct, which, indeed, was no eaſy task, they intimated to the king, that they, who had taken up arms, intended to deprive him of the crown; maliciouſly inſinuating, that his two uncles, with Henry of Lancaſter, 1328. caſter, grandſon to Henry III, had projected the excluſion of the iſſue of Edward II. from the throne, of which that prince was declared unworthy, as if the faults of the father ought, in reaſon, to reflect on the children. The young king, who did not, in the leaſt, ſuſpect the queen, his mother, reſolved, by force of arms, to reduce thoſe perſons to his allegiance, whom he, now, conſidered, as rebels; and he even began his preparations. In all appearance, this affair would have been attended with fatal conſequences, if the archbiſhop of Canterbury, zealouſly interpoſing, had not artfully hinted to the queen, that the manifeſto of the male-contents was ſo plauſible, that there was apparent danger of its inducing the whole nation, to eſpouſe their cauſe. The queen, at once, apprehending the archbiſhop's hints, was prevailed with to accommodate the difference, by an agreement, which was not very diſagreeable to the oppoſite party; for, as they were not yet in a condition, to carry things to the point they deſired, their intent, in publiſhing the manifeſto, was only to convince the queen of the great riſque ſhe run, in attempting to cruſh them; ſo that, without inſiſting any farther on their grievances, they accepted the pardon procured them by the archbiſhop for certain fines, and the baniſhment of Beaumont, Truſſel, and the murderer of the lord Holland, who were excepted in it; and, on this occaſion, the earl of Marche pretended to be a friend to the princes, tho' he was ſtill, in reality, their implacable enemy, and the earl of Kent, ſoon after, fell a ſacrifice to his reſentment.

1329. Robert, king of Scotland, dies, and is ſucceeded by David, his ſon. Walſing.

Robert, the valiant king of Scotland, who did not long enjoy the fruits of his late glorious peace with England, died, ſedate and eaſy, with the ſatisfaction of having freed Scotland from the dominion of the Engliſh, and of ſeeing his own ſon ſettled on the throne; and the Scots very juſtly rank him, among their moſt illuſtrious kings, as the reſtorer of their monarchy. This prince, on his deathbed, recommended three things, eſpecially, to thoſe he had appointed regents, during the minority of his ſon, David, then only eight years old; firſt, never to hazard a battle, in the kingdom; ſecondly, to make no long truces with the Engliſh, if the two nations ſhould come to a rupture; and, in the laſt place, to have always an eye over what paſſed, in England, to prevent their being ſurpriſed, unprepared.

The earl of Marche becomes more and more odious.

The earl of Marche, being ſtill ſupported by the queen-mother, acted more like a ſovereign than a miniſter; for he diſpoſed of all the offices, as well as of the publick revenues, with an authority, joined to an arrogance very common to court-favourites. The extraordinary credit of this lord rouſed the jealouſy of the Engliſh, who had as little eſteem for him, as they had formerly for Gaveſton, or Spencer; and Edmund, earl of Kent, the king's uncle, was the principal perſon, among thoſe that moſt freely diſcovered their ſentiments; for this prince, tho' he was naturally ſincere and generous, had, as well as Edward II, his brother, no great genius for publick affairs. However, 1329. being impoſed upon by Iſabella's artifices, he had joined with her, againſt his own brother, not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting ſhe would have puſh'd things to ſuch an extremity; but the government was changed, before he had time to reflect on the conſequences of the queen's undertaking. The ſcandalous behaviour of that princeſs, the arrogance of the favourite, the ſudden death of the king, and the ill management of the publick affairs, at length, opening his eyes, he perceived, with grief, the injuſtice of the plot he had unhappily engaged in; and a generous man cannot, without pain, conceal his ſentiments. The earl, who was no politician, not being careful enough to hide his uneaſineſs at paſt tranſactions, and daily occurrences, had aſſociated with Henry of Lancaſter, during the late commotions; and this was ſufficient to induce Iſabella and the earl of Marche to haſten his ruin; but, with that view, they laid for him the moſt extraordinary ſnare imaginable, in which it is amazing, that he ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be taken. As his conduct was unblameable, it was neceſſary ſo to manage, that he ſhould render himſelf criminal, that his deſtruction might be thought the leſs ſurpriſing; and, therefore, his two adverſaries, by ſome who feigned to be his friends, inſinuated to him, that Edward II, his brother, was ſtill alive, and reported to be dead, only to prevent the troubles his adherents might raiſe; that he was ſtrictly guarded in Corfe-caſtle, and permitted to be ſeen by none but his domeſticks, who were confined with him. This pretended ſecret was ſupported with a variety of circumſtances, and confirmed by the teſtimony of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction; among whom were two prelates, that were deceived, as well as Edmund, or employed to deceive him. He had himſelf aſſiſted at the funeral of the late king; but the account he had now received, together with a like report ſpread, at court, by the artifices of his enemies, and his deſire that the thing might be true, eaſily prevailed on him to believe, that he might, poſſibly, have been impoſed upon, by counterfeit obſequies. In this belief, he reſolved to exert himſelf, to free the pretended priſoner from his captivity; and though, at firſt, he was in ſuſpence, on account of his oath to the king, his nephew, he ſoon found means to remove that ſcruple. It is ſaid, that, being commiſſioned to go to Rome, and demand the canonization of the late earl of Leiceſter, he took occaſion to conſult John XXII, about this affair; and it is added, but how truly I am not able to determine, that the pope not only approved of his project, but ordered him to put it in execution, under pain of excommunication. Edmund, being ſupported by the papal authority, without farther conſideration, departed from Avignon, intent upon uſing his utmoſt endeavours to free the king, his brother, whom he imagined to be ſtill in priſon; yet, as this imagination was founded only upon a report, the certainty of which was not well atteſted, he ſent a truſty friar to Corfe, to be aſſured of the truth. care condemned, and executed, March 19. Walſing.

1329. care to have it whiſpered about, in the country, that Edward was ſtill a priſoner; ſo that the monk, upon his coming into thoſe parts, for private information, being prepoſſeſs'd by theſe groundleſs rumours, pretending buſineſs with the governor of Corfe, asked him, whether there was really any foundation for what was reported of Edward? The governor, having, beforehand, received his inſtructions, returned ſuch an anſwer, as confirmed the friar in his opinion; and it is even affirmed, that he ſhewed him, at a little diſtance, a perſon ſitting at a table, who was ſerved with great reſpect, by which means he fully convinced him, that he was not deceived. Edmund, upon the friar's report, no longer doubting the truth of this relation, came himſelf to Corfe, and demanded to be conducted to his brother's apartment; and the perfidious governor, ſeeming to be ſurpriſed at his knowing the ſecret, did not deny, that Edward was in the caſtle; though, at the ſame time, he told him, that he had poſitive orders to admit no perſon into his preſence. This confeſſion induced Edmund to repeat his inſtances; but, the governor being inflexible, he gave him a letter for the priſoner, wherein he aſſured him, that he would do all that was poſſible, to procure his liberty. This letter was directly carried to the queen, who ſhewed it to the king, her ſon, magnifying his danger, from his uncle's practices; and ſhe eaſily obtained leave to ſecure the prince's perſon; for he did not, in the leaſt, ſuſpect his mother to be herſelf the author of this conſpiracy. The king, having conſented to this propoſal, meaſures were, immediately, taken to apprehend Edmund, at Wincheſter, where the parliament was aſſembled; and, his impeachment being brought before the peers, his own letter was produced, which he could not diſown; nay, he confeſſed, that ſeveral lords, and particularly the archbiſhop of York and biſhop of London, were concerned in the plot, or, at leaſt, had adviſed him to haſten the execution. Upon this confeſſion, which proved a ſettled deſign to change the government, he was condemned to be beheaded; which ſentence was, ſoon after, executed; and, all that day, the king was ſo beſet by the queen, his mother, and the earl of Marche, that none could have acceſs, to ſue for the pardon of a prince ſo nearly related to him. It is even ſaid, that he was entirely ignorant of the ſentence paſſed upon his uncle, or of his execution, till it was too late; but, however that be, Edmund was brought upon the ſcaffold, to ſuffer the puniſhment to which he was condemned; tho', the executioner ſtealing away, from noon till evening, no one could be found to perform his office, when, at laſt, a perſon, out of the marſhalſea, ſevered his head from his body. This was the fate of the earl of Kent, in the 28th year of his age; who left two ſons, that died young, and two daughters, the youngeſt of whom was the greateſt beauty of her time; and her ſecond husband was the famous prince of Wales, her couſin, eldeſt ſon to Edward III. Edmund was the only perſon proſecuted, for the imaginary crime that occaſioned his death; though, according to his depoſitions, ſeveral others deſerved the ſame puniſhment; but the contrivers of the plot, having made that prince a ſacrifice, ſtudiouſly avoided too ſtrict an examination of matters, leſt they ſhould, thereby, diſcover what it highly concerned them to conceal; and it is even extremely probable, that ſeveral of theſe, impeached by Edmund, were tools employed by his enemies, to hurry him into deſtruction. 1329.

Before I proceed, it will be requiſite to ſpeak of Edward's affairs with France, during his minority; for not only the order of time requires it, but it is very proper previouſly to clear the the origin of an affair, which is to be the principal ſubject of this prince's majority; wherefore, I muſt reſume the account of the diſputes, between the two crowns, where I left off, in the reign of Edward II.

The affairs of Edward with France.

The late treaty made, at Paris, by the mediation of Iſabella, did not fully end all the differences, between Edward II. and Charles the Fair; for the queen, whoſe ſole view was the ruin of the king, her husband, did not judge it adviſable to diſcuſs all the articles of theſe conteſts, leſt it ſhould obſtruct her main deſign; and, on the other hand, Charles being poſſeſſed of Agenois, did not think it expedient to urge, himſelf, the diſcuſſion of matters; ſo that the ſentence paſſed, at Paris, in the buſineſs of St. Sardos, which condemned the Gaſcoign lords to baniſhment, and decreed the demoliſhing of their caſtles, was ſtill in force; but the treaty, concluded by the queen, preſerved Edward's pretenſions entire, and left him at liberty to proſecute his right, in the court of peers. The reſignation of Guienne cauſed freſh difficulties; for Edward II. pretended, that Charles, in receiving the homage of the prince, his nephew, obliged himſelf to reſtore that whole province; which the king of France denied.

Edward III. was no ſooner on the throne, than, by the advice of his parliament, he ſent ambaſſadors to France, to negotiate an agreement, between the two crowns; and, ſhortly after, a new treaty was concluded, containing the ſix following articles.

A new treaty made at Paris. Act. Pub.

I. That both parties ſhould reſtore all their conqueſts, during the war.

II. That Edward ſhould pay the king of France 50,000 marks, ſterling, in ſatisfaction for his charges, on occaſion of the rupture.

III. That both ſides ſhould grant a general pardon.

IV. That Charles ſhould pardon the felony of the Gaſcoign lords, as to life and limbs, provided they ſubmitted to baniſhment.

V. That Edward ſhould engage to demoliſh their caſtles.

VI. That this treaty ſhould be void, unleſs ratified by the king of England, before Eaſter.

The court of England was too deſirous of peace, to neglect the performance of the laſt article; ſo that there was a good underſtanding between the two crowns, during the reſt of that year, both monarchs being equally ſollicitous to prevent a freſh rupture.

This affair was ſcarce over, before a new and more important quarrel involved the two king-

1329. doms in a war, which cauſed the effuſion of torrents of blood, and brought France, at laſt, to the very brink of deſtruction. Charles the Fair dying, on the firſt of February, 1328, without male iſſue, and leaving Joanna, his queen, big with child, there aroſe a great diſpute, about the regency of the kingdom, during her pregnancy; for Edward claimed it, as the nephew and neareſt relation of the deceaſed king; but Philip, ſon of Charles de Valois, and couſin-german to the ſaid king, founded his claim upon the Salick law, which, in his opinion, debarred the females and their deſcendants from the ſucceſſion to the crown; from whence he inferred, that neither had they any right to the regency, in prejudice of the male line. This conteſt was decided, in favour of Philip, by the peers of France; and it was partly on this occaſion, that Edward convened the parliament, at Northampton, on account, as was ſaid, of the peace with Scotland. He repreſented to them his reaſons, for claiming the regency of France; the injury that, he pretended, was done him, in the preference of Philip de Valois; and the diſadvantageous inference that might be drawn, from his excluſion, with reſpect to the crown of France, if the child, the queen was big with, ſhould not live, or be a daughter. Hiſtorians do not poſitively relate, what judgment the parliament paſſed, upon this nice and critical point; but, as the members were entirely attached to Iſabella and the earl of Marche, in all probability, they were not more ſcrupulous, concerning the affairs of France, than they had been, with reſpect to thoſe of Scotland. The difficulty of the undertaking, the ſtrength of the kingdom, and the king's age were objections not eaſily to be anſwered; and, beſides, it might ſo happen, that the preparations, to ſupport his cauſe, would be fruitleſs, if the queen dowager ſhould be delivered of a ſon; yet, in ſpite of theſe conſiderations, the young king could not be prevailed on to relinquiſh a right which he apprehended to be juſt; but, as he was ſtill a minor, he perceived, that it would be extremely difficult effectually to oppoſe the advice of the queen, his mother, his council, and the parliament; yet, if he tacitly deſiſted from his pretenſions to a regency, which was about to expire, he was reſolved to act otherwiſe, as to the crown itſelf, unleſs the point in diſpute ſhould be decided, by the birth of a prince. This evidently appears, from ſeveral of his letters to certain lords of Guienne, dated the 28th of March, about a month before queen Joanna's delivery; wherein, provided ſhe was brought to bed of a daughter, he aſſured theſe lords, that he deſigned to uſe all poſſible means, to recover the right and inheritance of the queen, his mother.

Mezerai. Froiſſart. Edward and the earl of Valois diſpute about the regency. It is adjudged to Philip. Act. Pub. The queen is delivered of a daughter.

In April, Joanna was delivered of a princeſs, whoſe birth would, from that moment, have occaſioned a bloody war, if Edward had been in a condition to proſecute his pretenſions. However, he demanded the crown of France, by his ambaſſadors; yet Philip procuring himſelf to be crowned, by vertue of the judgment that aſſigned him the regency, the king of England's ambaſſadors were not ſo much as admitted to an audience; but I ſlightly paſs over theſe particulars, becauſe it will be neceſſary to treat on them more largely, hereafter. It is ſufficient, at preſent, to obſerve, that Edward, not having it in his power to puſh this affair, choſe to let it lie dormant, till a more favourable opportunity; and ſeveral pieces, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſhew, that his ſilence argued nothing leſs than an intention to recede from his right. We ſee there, that, immediately after the coronation of Philip de Valois, he projected meaſures, in order to war againſt him; for his alliance, about this time, with the duke of Brabant and ſeveral lords, who promiſed to ſupply him with troops, clearly prove, that he had formed ſome grand deſign; and his letters to the lords of Guienne demonſtrate, that it was againſt France. In theſe letters, dated, September 16, 1328, he expreſly declared, that he intended to recover his mother's inheritance; whereas he had, then, no quarrel with France, in which the queen, his mother, was particularly concerned; ſo that the inheritance, he mentioned, muſt neceſſarily relate to the whole kingdom of France, ſince his conteſts with Philip, about Guienne, had not any relation to Iſabella's right. 1329.

Philip de Valois, being involved, in the beginning of his reign, in a war with the Flemings, was not very haſty, in demanding Edward's homage, for Guienne and Ponthieu; for it was not till April, 1329, that he cauſed him to be ſummoned to appear, in perſon, on that account. In Edward's preſent diſpoſition, he would gladly have been excuſed, from paying homage to a prince, whom he conſidered, as an uſurper of his right; but his council, reflecting on his youth, and the ſtate of the kingdom which abounded with male-contents, could, by no means, approve a refuſal, which, probably, would plunge him into great difficulties; whilſt the queen, his mother, and the earl of Marche did all that was poſſible, to prevent a quarrel with Philip. They repreſented to the king, that he would infallibly loſe all his dominions, in France, if he raſhly diſcovered his pretenſions to that kingdom, before he was able to ſupport them; but theſe remonſtrances would, perhaps, have proved ineffectual, if, for his ſatisfaction, an expedient had not been deviſed, unbecoming, indeed, the ſincerity kings ought to profeſs, but which his youth and paſſion hurried him to fall in with, without a ſtrict examination. It was ſuggeſted to him, that, by proteſting, before-hand, againſt the homage, he would not, in the leaſt, prejudice his claim; and, accordingly, he made, by a procurator, the following proteſtation, before his council: "That, by any homage whatever to be paid to the lord Philip de Valois, "now ſtiling himſelf king of France, by king "Edward of England, for the dukedom of "Guienne and earldom of Ponthieu, he did "not deſign to renounce his hereditary right "to the realm of France, or any way derogate "from the ſame; even though letters, to that "purpoſe, ſhould be ſigned with either of his "ſeals; and he farther proteſted, that he would "not 1329. "not do any homage to the lord Philip, of his "own free will, but ſolely for the juſt fear he "had of loſing the ſaid dutchy and earldom, "and to prevent other great dangers and irre-"parable loſſes." This declaration was ſigned by the king and council, though it was not communicated to Philip's envoy; who only received a general anſwer, that the king would perform, as ſoon as poſſible, his obligations to the crown of France.

Philip ſummons Edward to do homage. Edward privately proteſts againſt the homage.

How unwilling ſoever Edward was to do this homage, he reſolved upon it, leſt he ſhould too ſoon diſcover his grand deſign; but, to compenſate, in ſome meaſure, for the mortifying ſtep he was forced to take, he ordered a great number of lords to attend him, and, with a very ſplendid equipage, and a retinue of 1000 horſe, came to Amiens, where Philip expected him. On the day appointed, for doing his homage, he appeared before the king of France, in a robe of crimſon-velvet, embroidered with leopards of gold, having his crown on his head, his ſword by his ſide, and gold ſpurs on his heels; and the king of France received him, ſitting on his throne, with his crown on his head, his ſcepter in his hand, and in a robe of blue velvet, powdered with flower-de-luces of gold. Near him were the kings of Navarre and Majorca, with all the peers and principal lords of France, whom he had expreſly ſummoned, to be witneſſes of this authentick homage; and, before Edward's arrival, Philip pretended this ſhould be a liege homage, as, indeed, it ought to have been; but, in the conferences held, before the ceremony, matters were otherwiſe ſettled. Edward, proteſting that he was not perfectly informed of the manner of the homage, propoſed to do it, in general terms; but, at the ſame time, he promiſed, upon his honour, that if, upon conſulting his records, he found the homage to be full, he would give letters-patent of it, under his great ſeal. Upon that condition, Philip accepted the homage, in general terms; and this was really the manner, in which Edward did it, whatever ſome French hiſtorians have affirmed, to the contrary, who, doubtleſs, were miſ-led by bad memoirs. Edward's hiſtorian alſo ſays, upon no better grounds, that the king of France was juſt going to order him to be ſeized, had not the biſhop of Lincoln informed his maſter of it, who withdrew, without taking leave; for this cannot be true, ſince Philip could not have taken this reſolution, but upon Edward's refuſing to do full homage; and yet it is certain, that he readily conſented to receive it, in general terms. Moreover, they had ſeveral interviews, after the ceremony; and, before they parted, it was agreed, that Edward ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to France, to finiſh what the late treaty had left undecided.

1330. The ſequel of the affairs of Edward with France.

As Edward ſtood diſpoſed, with reſpect to the king of France, he was not very forward to ſend the promiſed declaration; but, on the contrary, he tried to gain time, by propoſals of a double marriage of his brother and ſiſter, with the ſon and daughter of Philip. He even continued at London, almoſt a year, under various pretences, ambaſſadors ſent to preſs him to perform his promiſe; and, during that time, Edward was very urgent, in his turn, with the king of France, to put an end to their differences, about Guienne, purſuant to their late agreement. It was obvious, that Edward ſought only to gain time; and, accordingly, Philip, who impatiently bore all theſe delays, ſent him word that he would, not be his dupe. He diſpatched into Guienne the earl of Alenzon, his brother, who took and demoliſhed the caſtle of Xaintes, and plundered that town; and theſe unexpected hoſtilities produced a new treaty, between the two monarchs. Edward poſitively promiſed to ſend the declaration of homage, to pay the 50,000 marks, ſterling, he owed to France, and 60,000 Pariſian livres, for the aſſignment made him, by the king, his father, of Guienne. Moreover, he engaged to ſee the caſtles demoliſhed, belonging to the Gaſcoign lords condemned, in the reign of Charles the Fair; and, ſhortly after, he ſent the king of France letters-patent under his great ſeal, to confirm and ſpecify the homage he had done, at Amiens. He expreſly declared, that the homage was to be eſteemed full; and that the homages which he himſelf, or his ſucceſſors, dukes of Guienne and earls of Ponthieu, paid, hereafter, ſhould be done, in the ſame manner, and with the ſame formalities, as the king of France had expected. In theſe letters, there was a pattern, how the homage was to be performed; and, after he had ſent this authentick declaration, he took a journey to France, under the pretence of fulfilling a vow. In a conference with Philip, he obtained of him an abatement of 30,000 livres, Tournoiſe, for the damage done to the town and caſtle of Xaintes, and an abſolute pardon for the condemned Gaſcoign lords; but let us leave, for a moment, Edward's affairs with France, to ſee what paſſed, in England, during theſe negotiations; for we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to reſume the ſequel of theſe affairs, which are the principal ſubject of the preſent reign.

The downfal of queen Iſabella and Mortimer. Walſing.

Edward, ſoon after his return from Amiens, it is ſuppoſed, began to be ſuſpicious of the queen his mother's conduct; and, when it was perceived at court, that he grew weary of the guardianſhip of Iſabella and Mortimer, their enemies did all that was poſſible, to foment his jealouſy; and ſo many important things were inſinuated to him, that he reſolved, at length, to have a perfect information of his affairs. Thoſe, to whom he applied, repreſented to him, "That the earl of Marche "affected to out-ſhine his ſovereign, by a "magnificence too ſplendid for a ſubject; "that he diſpoſed of all the offices of the king-"dom to his creatures; that he was abſolute "maſter of the fortunes of the Engliſh, ruin-"ing ſome, and advancing others, at his "pleaſure; that Edward II. was murdered, "by his private orders; that the earl of Kent "loſt his life, by his ſecret practices; and, "finally, that, in all probability, the queen "and her miniſter had formed the deſign, of "keeping him always a minor, to ſecure the "royal

1330. "royal authority." Some add, that it was intimated to him, that the queen, his mother, was big with child by Mortimer; but this is very unlikely, ſince, according to Froiſſart, the report of her being with child was ſpread over the whole kingdom. Theſe intimations fully convinced the king, of what he had, hitherto, only ſuſpected; and, now, calling to mind the ſudden death of the king, his father; the beheading of the earl of Kent, his uncle; the diſhonourable peace he was made to conclude with Scotland; the extravagant dowry of the queen, his mother; the credit, riches, and arrogance of the earl of Marche, and deteſting the wickedneſs of thoſe, who, under the pretence of the publick good, conſulted only the gratification of their paſſions, he reſolved to puniſh them. However, he ſtudiouſly concealed his purpoſe, till a proper opportunity offered, when the parliament was to meet at Nottingham; for, the court being come to that town, Iſabella and the earl of Marche lodged in the caſtle, with a guard of 180 knights, whilſt the king, with a ſmall retinue, lodged in the town; and, in ſpite of theſe precautions, Edward having gained the governor, entered the caſtle through a ſubterraneous paſſage, and came into his mother's apartment, accompanied with Montacute, and ſome other officers, who were reſolutely determined to loſe their lives, in his ſervice. At firſt, ſome noiſe was made, and two knights of the guard were killed, who, having leſs reſpect for the king than their companions, offered to reſiſt. The earl of Marche was apprehended, and, notwithſtanding the queen's cries and intreaties, to ſpare the gallant Mortimer, he was carried out, the ſame way Edward came in, and conducted, under a ſtrong guard, to the tower of London.

Act. Pub. Mortimer is ſeized and impriſoned.

Edward calls a new parliament. Act. Pub.

This maſter-piece of policy, proving ſo ſucceſsful, the king diſſolved the parliament, and ſummoned another; but, as the late parliament, regardleſs of the publick good, were entirely at the devotion of the queen and the earl of Marche, Edward bitterly complained, in his ſummons, of the members, and exhorted the people, to chuſe repreſentatives who were more cordially concerned for the welfare of the ſtate. The parliament met, at London, with diſpoſitions widely different from thoſe of the former; for moſt of the members, overjoyed to ſee the kingdom freed from the tyranny of the earl of Marche, had nothing in their view, but the reformation of the government, and the puniſhment of the earl, in proportion to his crimes; the common fate of court-favourites and miniſters, who abuſe their power; for, in ſpite of their grandeur, they muſt expect to find themſelves abandoned by all, whenever their affairs begin to decline.

1330. Edward, in his ſpeech to the parliament, inveighed, in general, againſt the queen and Mortimer; after which, he told them, that, with the conſent of his ſubjects, he intended to aſſume the reins of the government, tho' he was not yet arrived at the age preſcribed by the law; to which the parliament unanimouſly conſented, all the members being equally ready to ſecond his deſigns.

The queen is confined to Riſings. Walſing.

The king, upon his majority, in the firſt place, ſeized the exorbitant dowry of the queen, his mother, and reduced it to a penſion of 3000 l. per annum; and, at the ſame time, ſhe was confined to her houſe, at Riſings, leſt, by her intrigues, ſhe ſhould excite new troubles. Mezerai is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Edward haſtened his mother's death; for it is certain, that ſhe lived 28 years, in her confinement, where the king, her ſon, viſited her, once or twice every year, more out of decency than affection.

The earl of Marche is condemned and executed.

As for the earl of Marche, he was treated with the utmoſt ſeverity; whoſe impeachment, brought before the parliament, contained ſeveral articles, of which theſe were the chief: That he had ſeized the government of the kingdom, without authority, and contrary to the expreſs regulation of the parliament; that he had planted, about the king, ſpies upon all his actions, to prevent his freeing himſelf from the ſubjection under which he was kept by that miniſter; that he had procured the death of Edward II, by his expreſs orders; that he had contrived a treacherous plot, to take away the life of the late earl of Kent; that he had appropriated to his own uſe the 20,000 marks, paid by the king of Scotland; and, laſtly, that he had lived, in too familiar a manner, with queen Iſabella. For all theſe crimes, which were affirmed to be notorious, and, for proof of which, no evidences were ſo much as heard, he was condemned to die *; and his ſentence, that he ſhould, as a traytor, be drawn and hanged, on the common gallows, at Tyburn †, was executed, with the utmoſt rigour. It is very remarkable, that he was condemned, without being heard, as he himſelf had treated the Spencers; but this irregularity proved advantageous to his poſterity; for the ſequel will inform us, that Roger, his grandſon, obtained, afterwards, an act to reverſe this ſentence, as erroneous; and his deſcendants, in the female line, aſcended the throne of England.

Froiſſart.

The article of his impeachment, relating to his commerce with the queen, evidently proves, that the whole kingdom was offended at their familiarity; and, if it had not been notorious, it is not to be imagined, that the parliament would have ſo deeply wounded the honour of that princeſs, which could not but reflect on the king, her ſon. They, who have attempted

The earl had likewiſe ſeven daughters, Katharine, wife of Thomas de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick; Joan married to James, lord Audley; Agnes to Lawrence de Haſtings, earl of Pembroke; Margaret to Thomas, ſon and heir of Maurice, lord Berkley; Maud to John, ſon and heir of John de Charleton, lord Powis; Blanche to Peter de Grandiſon; and Beatrix firſt to Edward, ſon and heir to Thomas of Brotherton, earl marſhal, ſon to Edward II, and afterwards to Sir Thomas de Brooſe. 1330. her vindication, from the little probability, that a perſon of her exalted rank ſhould ſo far forget herſelf, did not conſider, that, a few years before, the three daughters-in-law of Philip the Fair were equally regardleſs of their reputation, by the confeſſion of all the hiſtorians.

The birth of prince Edward.

Thus, Edward began, betimes, to wipe out the blemiſhes which had ſullied his minority, giving auſpicious preſages of the glory and proſperity of his reign; and, for a farther addition to the publick happineſs, Heaven bleſſed the young monarch with a ſon, whom the queen brought, this year, into the world; who was named Edward, after his father, and became, in his time, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt accompliſhed prince, England had ever produced *.

The king forms the project of conquering Scotland.

Edward having entered upon the adminiſtration of affairs, people were impatient to ſee, what ſteps the young prince would take; for his courage, capacity, and active ſpirit induced them to believe, that he would not, like the king, his father, chuſe an indolent life, but rather imitate his grandfather, Edward I. France and Scotland were equally concerned to obſerve his firſt proceedings; for the one might juſtly apprehend, that he would renew his pretenſions to the crown, procured by Philip de Valois, to his prejudice; and the other had no leſs reaſon to fear, that he would break through the diſhonourable treaty, wherein he was engaged by the queen, his mother, and Mortimer, during his minority. Though the king of Scotland was his brother-in-law, it was known, in thoſe days, as well as, at preſent, that the bond of affinity is not always a ſufficient bar to the ambition of princes; and, indeed, Edward had theſe two grand deſigns in his view; but, as it was impoſſible for him to engage, at once, in two ſuch conſiderable undertakings, he reſolved to begin with Scotland, that he might, after the conqueſt of that kingdom, attack France with the united forces of the two nations, which divided Great-Britain.

Act. Pub.

The treaty concluded, two years before, with Robert Bruce, ſeemed to lay an inſuperable obſtacle in his way; but ambitious princes never want pretences, to gratify their paſſions. Edward had one, which, to him, appeared juſt, or, at leaſt, ſufficient to authorize his deſign upon Scotland, viz. that he was betrayed by his mother and Mortimer, in the late treaty with Robert Bruce; yet he did not think fit to uſe it, till he was almoſt ſure of the ſucceſs of his enterprize. In order to accompliſh his ends, he employed Edward Baliol, ſon to John Baliol, who was placed on the throne of Scotland by Edward I, and afterwards depoſed, as a puniſhment, for his pretended rebellion; tho' it was now 38 years, ſince his father was dethroned. After ſo long an interval, the ſon, who, ſince his father's deceaſe, led an obſcure life, in France, little expected, that the king of England would preſs him to proſecute his right to the crown of Scotland; 1331. and yet this was, by Edward's order, inſinuated to him by the lord Beaumont, who, ſince his exile, reſided in France. Beaumont repreſented to him, that there was, now, a fair proſpect of his aſcending the throne of Scotland, uſurped by the Bruces; that David's minority afforded him an opportunity, which would no teaſily be met with, hereafter; and, in fine, that the king of England was diſpoſed to ſecond his endeavours. Baliol attentively liſtened to ſuch a flattering propoſal, and, to be aſſured, how far he might rely on the king, came into England, where he kept himſelf concealed; and, during that time, he treated with Edward, by the mediation of Beaumont, about the terms on which he was to engage in this undertaking. Edward's hiſtorian takes Barnes. a great deal of pains, to vindicate that monarch, in this diſingenuous proceeding, ſo directly contrary to the late treaty with Scotland; but they, who are unprejudiced, will hardly deny, that, on this occaſion, ambition was the ſole or real motive of his conduct; of which I ſhall, in the ſequel, give more than probable proofs.

Baliol prepares for his expedition.

As for Baliol, he thought, that he could not purchaſe, too dearly, a crown, to which he would never have aſpired, had he not been certain of a powerful aſſiſtance; and, on the other hand, Edward, who conſulted his own intereſt, more than that of Baliol, and intended to reap all the benefit of this enterprize, did not ſcruple to promiſe ſtill more than Baliol could have expected; and the articles of their agreement were no ſooner ſettled, than the Engliſh nobility were privately informed, that, in ſerving Baliol, they would pleaſe the king. Upon this, thoſe were gained to his party, who, having received lands, in Scotland, by the bounty of Edward I, had afterwards loſt them, by the revolutions in that kingdom; and, beſides, Baliol could depend, in Scotland itſelf, upon the aid of the old friends of his family; and, indeed, the placing this prince on the throne was the only way, to recover the offices and poſts from which they were removed, after Robert Bruce's advancement.

Edward pretends to keep the peace with Scotland. Act. Pub.

Whilſt Baliol was preparing for his expedition, Edward pretended punctually to obſerve the peace with Scotland; and he even publiſhed a proclamation againſt ſuch, as had engaged in the ſervice of Baliol; but this ſtep was taken, when it was too late to prevent them; and his ſole view was to perſuade the publick, that he was not concerned in an undertaking, of which he was the real author.

1332. Baliol lands in Scotland.

Baliol, being in readineſs, embarqued his little army, conſiſting of no more than 2500 men, and landed, at Kinghorn near Perth; from whence he ſent back his ſhips, to convince his troops, that they had nothing to truſt to, except their valour. However, his preparations could not be ſo ſecretly made, but the Scots had intelligence

The Engliſh had not any hopes of ſafety, but in victory; and, accordingly, expecting their enemies with an heroick reſolution, they fought with ſuch uncommon bravery, that the Scotch general, tho' his army was much ſuperior, was ſhamefully and totally routed. The earl of Fife, who followed Seaton, with a ſtill more numerous army, attempting to revenge this diſgrace, had no better ſucceſs; and Baliol, upon theſe two ſignal victories, proceeding farther into the country, met with another body of Scotch troops, whom he alſo defeated. Five days after, he fought Nigel Bruce, who attacked him with 10,000 men; but, in this laſt action, he gave no quarter, becauſe he would not be incumbered with priſoners.

Baliol becomes maſter of Perth. Knighton.

Four ſeveral battles, loſt in ſo ſhort a ſpace, intimidating the Scots, Baliol had leiſure to beſiege Perth, called alſo St. John's town, which he eaſily ſubdued; where he found a great quantity of warlike ſtores and proviſions, that he wanted extremely, in order to enlarge his conqueſts. His affairs obliging him to remove from Perth, Patrick Dunbar, earl of Marche, took advantage of his abſence, and beſieged that town; but, upon the firſt news of Baliol's marching, to relieve it, he raiſed the ſiege, though his army was ſuperior, in number, ſuch was the conſternation of the Scots, on the account of their former loſſes.

David, king of Scotland, retires into France.

Baliol's good fortune produced the uſual effects; for many Scotch lords and gentlemen came and ſwore fealty to him. This revolt, which threatened king David with a greater, forced the young prince to fly, with his queen, into France; and, in the interim, to influence the affairs of Scotland, Edward ſo managed matters, that ſeveral private perſons fitted out a fleet, in their own name, to give chace to that which the Scots had ſent to ſea, as their laſt refuge. The loſs of this fleet, which was deſtroyed by the Engliſh, entirely confounded David's adherents; and the earl of Fife, who was one of the principal, ſubmitted to the conqueror, whoſe example was followed by many others. Theſe remarkable ſucceſſes determined Baliol to cauſe himſelf to be crowned; and the ceremony was performed, at Scone, the uſual place of the inauguration of the kings.

He does homage to Edward, for Scotland. Act. Pub.

Baliol was no ſooner on the throne, than, purſuant to his treaty with the king of England, he did him homage, for the kingdom of Scotland, in the ſame manner, that his father had done it to Edward I, viz. with all the circumſtances denoting an entire ſubjection; and, in his letters-patent, he expreſly affirmed, that it was with the conſent of the king of England, and the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, that he recovered the poſſeſſion of his inheritance, of which he ſuppoſed, tho' without any grounds, that John, his father, was deprived by Robert Bruce. Moreover, he reſigned to Edward, in payment of the ſupplies received from him, the town and caſtle of Berwick, which were ſtill in the poſſeſſion of king David; offering likewiſe to marry Joanna, Edward's ſiſter, provided that princeſs's marriage with David Bruce could be annulled; and, laſtly, he promiſed to furniſh the king, his ſovereign, with aids of men and money, whenever required; from all which circumſtances, it evidently appears, that Edward was but too deeply concerned in this expedition, how much ſoever his hiſtorians may labour to vindicate his conduct. 1332.

Edward ſends an army into Scotland. Act. Pub.

Whilſt Baliol was purſuing his conqueſts in Scotland, Edward ſummoned a parliament, to demand a ſubſidy; pretending, that, by reaſon of certain commotions, in Ireland, of dangerous conſequence, it was neceſſary to ſend an army thither. The ſubſidy was readily granted; but, whilſt the troops, intended for this expedition, were on their march to embarque, they received orders, to advance towards the borders of Scotland. Edward repreſented to the parliament, that it was hazardous to leave the northern counties defenceleſs, whilſt their neighbours were in arms; and that his preſence was requiſite in thoſe parts; upon which, it was reſolved, that the Iriſh expedition ſhould be deferred; for, in all probability, the parliament voluntarily ſhut their eyes, being unwilling to obſtruct the king's deſigns.

1333. He complains that the Scots violated the treaty. Act. Pub.

In the mean while, Edward perceiving that, by the rapidity of Baliol's conqueſts, his project fully anſwered his wiſhes, immediately, pulled off the maſque; and, upon frivolous pretences, he complained, that the Scots had violated the treaty of peace; for it is manifeſt, that he wanted ſubſtantial reaſons, ſince he made uſe of one ſo very unlikely, in the then circumſtances of Scotland. The regent, left by king David, in Scotland, did not ſpare either excuſes, intreaties, or ſubmiſſions, to divert the impending ſtorm, but all to no purpoſe; for Edward, who had reſolved to take Berwick, ſoon after, beſieged that place; and he preſſed it ſo briskly, that he compelled the governor to ſign a capitulation, promiſing to ſurrender the town, unleſs it ſhould be relieved, within a limited time. During this interval, the regent, finding that Berwick could not be ſaved, without exerting his utmoſt force, levied an army, and advanced, with all expedition, to give the Engliſh battle; but Edward, being informed of it, expected him, at Halydon-hill, where was fought a bloody battle, which ended in the total rout of the army of Scotland. Seven Scotch earls were ſlain, on the ſpot, with 900 knights, 4000 gentlemen, and 32000 common ſoldiers, if we may believe the Engliſh hiſtorians; but the Scots own only 10,000, which, doubtleſs, is the moſt probable account; and this victory was followed by the ſurrender of Berwick, which the king annexed, for ever, to the crown of England.

The battle of Halydon.

Baliol holds his firſt parliament at Edinburgh, and reſigns ſeveral places to Edward.

Edward, pleaſed with the ſucceſs of this campaign, returned into his own dominions, leaving with Baliol a body of troops, to compleat the reduction of Scotland; who, being, thus, reinforced, took ſeveral towns, after which he held his firſt parliament, at Edinburgh. He cauſed whatever had been done, in favour of the 1333. the king of England, to be ratified; and all the Engliſh lords, who had ſerved him, recovered the lands they had loſt, in Scotland, or acquired others; moreover, all the acts of parliament paſſed, in the reign of Robert Bruce, were annulled, as wanting a lawful authority. Baliol was not contented with ſhewing his gratitude to Edward, by the ceſſion of Berwick, and doing him homage, but he alſo reſigned to him Roxburgh, Jedburgh, Selkirk, Dumfries, and the caſtle of Edinburgh, in reward, as he delared himſelf, in his letters, for his aſſiſtance, to recover his dominions.

1334. The Scots rebel againſt Baliol, and drive him out of Scotland.

Baliol, by means of this voluntary homage, and theſe extraordinary alienations, ſoon forfeited the eſteem and affection of his ſubjects; for it was obvious, that he was no more than Edward's inſtrument, to render himſelf maſter of Scotland; and, in this belief, they reſolved to ſhake off the yoke of their new ſovereign. Some of the great men, improving this general diſpoſition, headed a body of malecontents, and went, in queſt of Baliol, who was not, in the leaſt, apprehenſive of any ſuch deſign; and, having ſurpriſed and defeated him, they obliged him to fly, on an horſe without a ſaddle, to Carliſle, from whence he ſent his protector intelligence of his late misfortune.

Act. Pub. About the ſame time, Edward called a parliament, and repreſented to them, that he intended to go to the Holy-Land, with the king of France and ſeveral other chriſtian princes; but the news of the revolution, in Scotland, induced him to alter his pretended project; and, having procured the aid of money he demanded, Edward marches into Scotland, and ravages the country. Knighton. he marched towards that kingdom, at the head of a powerful army, and penetrated, without any reſiſtance, to the northern counties, whilſt the Scotch army kept in poſts, where it was impoſſible to attack them; ſo that, for want of enemies to engage with, he returned into England; though he had hardly reached the borders, when Dunbar, the general of the Scotch army, ſallying out of his retreats, retook ſome places from the Engliſh. However, the ſeaſon not permitting the king to go, in queſt of his enemies, he ſent his troops into winter-quarters; and, that he might be at hand, he reſolved to paſs the winter, at Roxburgh.

1335. Another expedition into Scotland. Act. Pub. In the ſpring, he attacked Scotland, by ſea and land, advancing even as far as the northern ocean; but this incurſion did not prove very advantageous to him, as the north parts of Scotland could not be kept, without a ſtanding army there, ſuperior to that of the Scots; yet, finding that he could not allure them to a battle, he ſtaid, ſome time, at Perth, whilſt the earl of Cornwall, his brother, ravaged the weſtern counties of that miſerable kingdom. It is true, the Scots gained ſome advantage over 500 Engliſh archers, whom they ſurpriſed; and they alſo took the earl of Namure and the prince, his brother, who ſerved in Edward's

The pope and king of France endeavour to divert Edward from the war with Scotland. Act. Pub. In the interim, the pope and the king of France exerted themſelves, though indirectly, in the behalf of king David; for whilſt Edward continued at Perth, he received ambaſſadors from France, who, jointly with the pope's nuncio, preſſed him to perform his engagement, to carry his arms into Paleſtine. He plainly perceived, that their ſole view was to divert him from the war with Scotland; and, therefore, to prevent all farther ſollicitations, he expreſly told Philip's ambaſſadors, that, by God's grace, he was in a condition to make war againſt the Infidels, without their maſter's aſſiſtance, as ſoon as he had compleated the conqueſt of Scotland. This anſwer convincing the Scots, that he was reſolutely determined not to end the war, till he was abſolute maſter of the kingdom, the greateſt part voluntarily ſubmitted; being very ſenſible, that it was not poſſible for them to reſiſt any longer; and theſe obtained very favourable terms, whilſt others choſe rather to be expoſed to the laſt extremities, than be ſubject to the yoke of the Engliſh. After the campaign was over, Edward returned, in triumph to England, having ordered Perth, Edinburgh, and Sterling to be refortified, and committed the government of Scotland to the earl of Athol.

The Engliſh are defeated. The new general, who, tho' a Scotchman, had joined with Edward, in order to revenge ſome affronts received from his countrymen, had no ſooner the command of the Engliſh army, than he went and laid ſiege to Kildrummy; but Dunbar and Douglaſs poſted to its relief, and, though their army was not near ſo numerous, they defeated and ſlew the earl of Athol, and relieved the town; and, this ſucceſs animating the Scots, they flocked together, from all parts, under the conduct of theſe two generals, who made a very conſiderable progreſs.

1336. Edward ravages Scotland. Act. Pub. Edward, who thought he had effectually tamed the Scots, was, to the laſt degree, enraged, upon the news of this freſh revolt; and, as ſoon as the ſeaſon permitted, he marched, a fourth time, into the heart of Scotland, and ravaged, in a barbarous manner, the counties that had declared againſt him. In his return, he burnt the town of Aberdeen, and ſome other places of leſs note; and, leaving a ſmall army with Baliol, he ſet out for England, where he was called by more important affairs. This was Edward's laſt expedition into Scotland; and it was time for that unfortunate kingdom to enjoy ſome repoſe; for, ſince it was firſt invaded by Edward I, ſo much Scottiſh blood had been ſpilt, that it is extremely ſurpriſing, that, after ſo many loſſes, the Scots ſhould ſtill be able to contend for their liberty.

His deſigns againſt France. Edward's four expeditions into Scotland gained him, doubtleſs, great reputation; but, as that part of his glory might have been diſputed, by the conſideration of the ſuperiority of his troops, which were more numerous, better diſciplined, and more amply provided with all neceſſaries, 1336. neceſſaries, than thoſe of the Scots, he was willing to demonſtrate, in a larger and more noble field, that he was not afraid of engaging more formidable enemies; and, therefore, henceforward, neglecting Scotland, which he believed to be ſufficiently ſubdued, and which afforded him no more laurels, he reſolved to attack France, the moſt powerful ſtate of all Europe, and to do all that was poſſible, to wreſt the crown from Philip de Valois. I have already taken notice of his claim to that kingdom, from which he was excluded, by vertue of the Salick law; but, as he alledged, that this law was miſinterpreted, and as that was the cauſe of a long and bloody war, which often brought France into extreme danger, it was highly requiſite, before we proceeded to particulars, to ſhew the real foundation of that war; yet, as this matter requires a copious explanation, I muſt beg the reader's leave to refer him to the diſſertation, at the end of this reign, that the thread of the Hiſtory may not be interrupted. It is ſufficient, here, to ſay, in a word, that Edward pretended that the Salick law, in excluding females from the ſucceſſion to the crown, did not exclude their male iſſue; from whence he inferred, that the next male heir ought, of courſe, to ſucceed.

The Collection of the Publick Acts contains ſeveral pieces, evidently proving, that, altho' Edward ſeemed to ſubmit to the judgment given againſt him, in France, he was forming ſome great deſign, and that againſt France; and, among others, there is a letter to the inhabitants of Bayonne, poſitively promiſing them never to enter into a treaty with France, unleſs they were included, tho' he was not then in war with that crown; ſo that it was not Robert d' Artois, who, being expelled France, retired into England, that inſpired him with the thoughts of invading France, tho' this is unanimouſly affirmed by all the hiſtorians. However, I do not deny, that Robert d' Artois, who was diſguſted with Philip, by his councils, and, perhaps, by the conſideration of his friends, in France, induced Edward to haſten the execution of his project; but, ſince that prince is generally reputed the author of the king of England's undertaking, againſt France, it will not be improper to lay before the reader the reaſons, Robert d'Artois, a deſcendant from Lewis VIII, imagined he had, to complain of Philip; and, to this purpoſe, it will be neceſſary to preſent him with a view of the geneology of the houſe of Artois.

LEWIS VIII.

St. Lewis, king of France.	Robert I. earl of Artois.
Robert II. earl of Artois.	Maud Othenin, earl of Burg.
Philip of Artois d. before his father.	Joanna de B. Philip le Long. / Blanche de Burg. Charles the Fair.
Robert III. of Artois.	Blanche of France. Eudes, duke of Burg.

The ſtate of the earl of Artois's caſe.

Robert, earl of Artois, ſon to Lewis VIII, king of France, had a ſon and a daughter, viz. Robert and Maud. Robert II. was earl of Artois, and Maud married Othenin, earl of Burgundy, by whom ſhe had two daughters, Joanna and Blanche, who were eſpouſed to Philip le Long and Charles the Fair, kings of France; and Joanna had a daughter, named Blanche, who was wife to Eudes, duke of Burgundy. Robert II. had only one ſon, called Philip, who, dying before the earl, his father, left Robert, his ſon, the third of that name, but not earl of Artois; and Robert III. claimed the earldom, as grandſon to Robert II. and the next male heir; but Maud, his great aunt, alledged, that the ſucceſſion belonged to her, as ſiſter to Robert II, and ſo nearer, by one degree, than Robert III. The court of peers decided this affair, in favour of Maud, whoſe two daughters were married to the two younger ſons of Philip the Fair; and Robert d' Artois ſubmitted to the ſentence, during Philip's life and all the reign of Lewis Hutin; but he took up arms, in the regency of Philip le Long, and got poſſeſſion of Artois. When, from being regent, Philip aſcended the throne, the affair of Artois was again brought before the court of peers, and decided, once more, in favour of Maud; but, after the death of Charles the Fair, Robert de Artois was, of all the great men of France, the moſt active, in procuring the crown for Philip de Valois, his brother-in-law, and maintained the moſt ſtrenuouſly the authority of the Salick law; hoping, thereby, to eſtabliſh a precedent, concerning the earldom of Artois, and that, the Salick law being admitted, with reſpect to the crown, all its fiefs would be ſubject to the ſame law; and, therefore, depending upon this precedent, and the advantage of being brother-in-law to the new king, he revived the proceſs, and produced certain charters under the great ſeal, to confirm his right. However, Philip cauſed the charters to be examined ſo ſtrictly, that they were diſcovered to be counterfeit, for which a gentlewoman of Artois, the forger of them, was ſeverely puniſhed; and theſe charters, on which Robert founded his claim, being rejected, the earldom of Artois was adjudged to Blanche, daughter of Philip le Long, by vertue of her right from Maud, her grandmother. Robert, upon this, falling into a furious paſſion with the king, very harſhly upbraided him; and it is ſaid, that he even proceeded to menaces, which determined the king to proſecute him with the utmoſt ſeverity. He ordered him to be ſummoned before the peers; and cauſing, him to be condemned, for non-appearance, he commanded the ſentence to be publickly read in the ſtreets of Paris. Robert withdrew into Hainault; but, Philip interrupting him there, he took the deſperate courſe of throwing himſelf into the arms of the king of England; and, finding Edward finiſhing the war with Scotland, and forming projects againſt France, in all probability, he contributed, by his ſollicitations, to its being more ſpeedily put in execution.

1337. Edward makes an alliance with ſeveral princes.

Such an important war could not be undertaken, without extraordinary preparations, and the ſupport of powerful alliances, which might balance

1337. balance the ſuperiority France had, then, over England; Edward had, now, gained the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the duke of Brabant, the earls of Guelder and Hainault, his brothers-in-law, the archbiſhop of Cologn, and ſeveral other German princes; nay, he did not neglect the private aſſiſtances of ſeveral lords of Germany, Flanders, Holland, Brabant, and Gaſcoigne, who promiſed to ſupply him with a number of horſe, in proportion to the ſums he remitted them; and all theſe troops, joined to the Engliſh, would have made a very formidable army, though all theſe alliances were far from being ſo advantageous to him, as that procured him, by Robert d' Artois, with James d' Arteville, a brewer of Ghent. The credit of that burgher was ſo great, in Flanders, that he had prevailed on the principal cities to revolt againſt the earl; and this prince was even reduced to the neceſſity of flying for refuge into France, till Philip, who had engaged to reſtore him, was in a condition to perform his promiſe. Edward, improving this juncture, offered his protection to the Flemings, who gladly accepted it, as they were apprehenſive of being oppreſſed by Philip; and this alliance was more beneficial, as, beſides the ſupplies he expected from the Flemings, it gave him an opportunity of aſſembling his army, in Flanders, and a means to open a paſſage into the enemy's country, from that quarter. The parliament *, who approved of his undertaking, having granted him large ſubſidies, to carry it on, he raiſed one of the fineſt armies that had ever been levied, in England; and, until his allies were prepared for action, he ſent part of his troops to the relief of the Flemings, whom their earl vigorouſly attacked, with the aſſiſtance of the French; but, upon the arrival of theſe troops, Guy, brother to the earl of Flanders, who was poſted in the iſle of Cadſant, was defeated and taken priſoner; and this auſpicious beginning of the Engliſh arms ſo diſconcerted the meaſures of the earl of Flanders, that the cities, which, till then, had been in his intereſt, declared againſt him.

Prince Edward is made duke of Cornwall. Walſing.

Whilſt Edward continued his preparations, for this important war, the ſole object of his cares, he called a parliament, in order to ſettle the woollen manufacture, which was of very great conſequence to the kingdom; and, in this parliament, he created prince Edward, his eldeſt ſon, duke of Cornwall, who was the firſt, that bore the title of duke in England.

Edward writes to the pope againſt Philip. Act. Pub.

When the king was almoſt in readineſs for the war, he wrote to the pope and cardinals, to vindicate his enterpriſe, againſt France; complaining, in his letters, that though, after the death of Charles the Fair, his uncle, the crown was devolved to him, as the next heir, he was deprived of it, by a raſh and unjuſt ſentence; that the ambaſſadors ſent to Paris, to demand the crown, not only were not heard, but were menaced and put in danger of their lives; that, by taking from a minor the crown, which, of right, belonged to him, the peers of France acted, like robbers rather than judges; and that he proteſted againſt whatever was done, during his minority; and then he added, that Philip de Valois, not ſatisfied with uſurping the kingdom of France, had, without any declaration of war, unjuſtly ſeized Guienne and the earldom of Ponthieu, and united theſe two provinces to the crown; that he had countenanced the Scotch rebellion, inſtead of aſſiſting him, as he was obliged, by the bond of affinity; and, in fine, that, by his whole conduct, he had ſhewn himſelf to be his mortal enemy, and extremely uneaſy at every thing that tended to the honour of England. 1337.

Theſe letters being communicated to Philip, he replied, that, by the Salick law, as well as the judgment of the peers, Edward was excluded from the ſucceſſion to the crown of France, to which, otherwiſe, he could have no manner of right, ſince he was born, out of the kingdom; that, for his part, not only all the French had acknowledged him, for king, but Edward himſelf had ſubmitted to his authority; and that the homage he had done, in perſon, and confirmed, by his letters patent, was an undeniable proof, that he was himſelf convinced of the injuſtice of his pretenſions. Edward made anſwer, that his proteſtation, in the preſence of his council, before he performed homage, prevented its being, any way, prejudicial to his claim; that the fear of loſing his lands, in France, was the only motive to it; which, together with the conſideration of his minority, was more than ſufficient to annul it. As for theſe two reaſons, the firſt would ſcarce have been admitted, in a court of juſtice; but that was not the place, wherein this famous proceſs was to be decided. Edward, to ſhew his allies, that he was too far engaged in the conteſt, to recede, ordered the duke of Brabant, to demand the crown of France, in his name; and, at the ſame time, he made him his lieutenant-general, for that whole kingdom, commanding the French, whom he ſtiled his ſubjects, to pay him obedience.

Philip's anſwer.

Edward's reply.

The pope ſends two legates into England. Act. Pub.

To prevent the evils, into which a quarrel, of this nature, might involve all Chriſtendom, Benedict XII, then pope, was pleaſed very zealouſly to interpoſe; but, as Edward was the aggreſſor, he, firſt of all, ſent two cardinals, as his legates to that monarch, who, purſuant to their inſtructions, did all that was poſſible, to perſuade him to peace. However, they could not help diſcovering ſome partiality, in favour of France, becauſe of Edward's alliance with the emperor, the pope's avowed enemy; but, notwithſtanding this, the king aſſured them, that their mediation was agreeable to him, and that he would enter into a treaty, provided terms were propoſed, that were anſwerable to his rights. He even promiſed to defer the execution of his deſigns, till next March; but this was no mighty favour, ſince it was, now, December. He ſpent the remainder of the winter, in preparing his army and fleet, and eſpecially in ſtrengthening the league with new

* Soon after, the king iſſued out a commiſſion, for ſeizing the eſtates of the Lombard-merchants in England, who were become odious, by reaſon of their uſury and extortion; and he likewiſe ſeized the revenues of the alien priories, eſpecially, of the Cluniac and Ciſtercian orders. Rymer's Fœd.

1337. allies; among whom, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the count palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Auſtria, and the dauphin of Viennois, tho' they were, all three, according to the hiſtorians, the allies of France; which gives occaſion to preſume, that they, at firſt, engaged with Edward, but were afterwards gained by Philip. The dauphin had deſigned to erect his dominions into a kingdom; and he, doubtleſs, joined with Edward, in expectation of his uſing his intereſt with the emperor, to obtain his deſire; but, this project failing, he eſpouſed the quarrel of France. The earl of Hainault, being alſo willing to enter into the league, deſired, that Edward might have the title of vicar of the empire, in order to have a pretence to join forces with him, as general of the emperor's army; and, to ſatisfy the earl, and with a view of bringing over other German princes, Edward was pleaſed to demand that dignity of the emperor.

1338. Edward comes to Antwerp. When he had taken all the precautions, ſuggeſted to him by prudence, he embarqued, with a fleet of 500 ſail, and ſteered his courſe towards Antwerp, where he was called by important affairs; for it was neceſſary, that he ſhould be near his allies, to concert with them all proper meaſures, for the execution of his deſigns. Altho' his ambaſſadors had concluded alliances, in his name, with ſeveral princes, many things ſtill remained to be ſettled with them, before they could aſſemble their forces; and this, indeed, was the occaſion of retarding, for ſome months, the opening of the campaign; but this delay was not entirely fruitleſs. During that interval, Edward went and conferred, at Cologn, with the emperor, who ordered a patent to be drawn up, appointing him vicar of the empire; and this ſort of favour was attended with the promiſe of a powerful aſſiſtance, tho' it was afterwards very lamely performed. The Flemings having entered into the league, by means of James d'Arteville, became apprehenſive of being, one day, abandoned to the vengeance of their earl and the king of France; wherefore, Edward, to encourage them by his preſence, took a journey to Ghent, and granted the principal cities ſeveral privileges, in relation to their trade with England.

1339. He likewiſe engaged to make the marqueſs of Juliers a peer of England; and, accordingly, he afterwards created him earl of Cambridge. His power, as vicar of the empire, enabled him to erect the earldom of Guelder into a dutchy, and to grant the city of Cologn divers privileges, by which means he ſtrengthened his alliance with the archbiſhop; but none of his allies gave him ſo much trouble, as the duke of Brabant, who, fearing, that the two monarchs would be reconciled, at his expence, becauſe great princes often ſacrifice the intereſts of petty ones, who have ſerved them, reſolved to ſecure himſelf, before he joined in the league. However, Edward, to make that prince perfectly eaſy, beſides the money, with which he profuſely ſupplied him, gave him hopes of having, one day, for his ſon-in-law the duke of Cornwall, preſumptive heir to the crown of England; and he was even pleaſed to give it, under his hand, that he would not quit the Low-countries, till the war was compleated. 1339.

Edward borrows money, from all hands. Act. Pub. All theſe affairs, tho' of great importance, were not the ſole cauſe of Edward's long ſtay, in Brabant; but, as he was at exceſſive charges, he attempted, during that time, to borrow money of all the foreign princes; and he did not ſcruple even to apply to private perſons, and take up ſuch ſums as they were willing to lend, tho' never ſo inconſiderable; nay, it appears, from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he pawned his crown to the archbiſhop of Triers, for 50,000 florins.

The birth of prince Lionel. Whilſt Edward was at Antwerp, his queen was delivered, there, of a prince, named Lionel; where he likewiſe received a letter from the pope, repreſenting to him, in ſtrong terms, the dangers to which he was expoſed, by his alliance with Lewis of Bavaria, who lay under the ſentence of excommunication; and he alſo upbraided him, for meanly accepting from the pretended emperor, the title of vicar of the empire, ſo much beneath his royal dignity; but, in ſpite of theſe remonſtrances, and though the pope threatened to proceed to extraordinary cenſures againſt him, he choſe rather to run that hazard, than interrupt the execution of his deſigns.

Edward enters Artois. All things being in readineſs, to open the campaign, which had been retarded, till September, Edward put himſelf at the head of 40,000 men, and encamped, between Marchienne and Doway; and then, marching towards le Cambreſis, he halted, ſome time, before the walls of Cambray; where he heard, that Philip was advancing with a formidable army, to give him battle. As this war was immenſely expenſive, and it was his intereſt to diſpatch it, with all poſſible expedition, he directly paſſed the Schelde, in order to meet his enemy; and, a few days after, the two armies being encamped, pretty near one another, about Vironfoſſe, Philip ſent a herald, to offer him battle, provided it ſhould be on a plain, where there was no incumbrance. Edward accepted the challenge, leaving it to Philip, to appoint the time and place; who fixed on the 22d of October, for the deciſion of this famous quarrel; but, whilſt both ſides prepared, with equal ardor, for an engagement, Philip was diſcouraged, by a letter from Robert, king of Naples. This prince, who was reputed to be a great aſtrologer, foretold him ill ſucceſs, wherever he fought the Engliſh; at leaſt, this is affirmed by ſeveral hiſtorians, who add, that, upon the credit of this prediction, Philip retired, not daring to hazard a battle; yet others maintain, and with greater probability, that this letter would not have induced him to take ſuch a ſtep, if the great men, who attended him, had not checqued his ardor, by more prudent counſels. It is ſaid, they repreſented to him, that, in the battle agreed upon, he run the riſque of loſing even his crown, whilſt Edward ventured only ſoldiers, moſt of whom were not his own; and that, upon this remonſtrance, he reſolved, though with great reluctance, to give his enemy this trifling advantage; but, when Edward perceived, 1339. perceived, that there was no likelihood of bringing Philip to a battle, he marched into Hainault. This is Froiſſart's account, who is accuſed, by the French, of being, on all occaſions, too partial to the Engliſh; but Nangis, a French hiſtorian, gives a quite contrary relation, by ſaying, that Edward retired firſt, being unwilling to hazard a battle; and this is not the only inſtance of the like contradictions, among the hiſtorians. However, it is not, in the leaſt, probable, that Edward, who paſſed the Schelde, to meet Philip, ſhould retire, for fear of fighting; but Philip's reaſons, for not venturing a battle, are very weighty; for the honour of a king, or general, conſiſts not in fighting, upon all occaſions, but only at a proper juncture; and they are never to hazard the loſs of a kingdom, without extreme neceſſity. However that be, the firſt campaign ended, without any blood-ſhed, except in Guienne, where the two parties made war upon each other; but, as nothing very material happened, I ſhall not loſe time, in relating the particulars.

1340. Edward aſſumes the title of king of France. Act. Pub.

It was impoſſible for Edward to return to England, ſo ſoon as he deſired; for, the king of France, mortified to ſee the advantages his enemy reaped, from his alliance with the Flemings, found means, by the artful inſinuations of his emiſſaries, to raiſe, in the cities of Flanders, a ſcruple for taking up arms againſt their ſovereign lord. This ſcruple, inflamed by the eccleſiaſticks, who, for the moſt part, eſpouſed the cauſe of France, had already made a deep impreſſion on the minds of the people; and, perhaps, it would have cauſed, in Flanders, ſome revolution prejudicial to England, had not James d' Arteville adviſed Edward to aſſume the title of king of France. This propoſal being debated in the king's council, it was approved, as a proper means to keep the Flemings in the league; and, indeed, it proved anſwerable to Edward's expectations. Purſuant to this advice, he ſtiled himſelf king of France, and quartered, with his own arms, the flower-de-luces of France; adding this motto, DIEU ET MON DROIT, by which he declared, that he placed his whole confidence in God, and the juſtice of his cauſe. This new title was not very ſurpriſing, ſince all his former proceedings were evident poofs of his deſign; and, ſome time after, he refuſed Philip the title of king, forbidding all his miniſters to give him any other, than that of earl of Valois. Moreover, he had appointed the duke of Brabant his lieutenant-general, in France, which ſufficiently ſhewed, that he thought himſelf the true king, though he had not then ventured to aſſume the name; but, having broken the ice, on account of the Flemings, he did not ſcruple to uſe the title of king of France, in all publick acts, and to mark this year, as the firſt of his new reign. He likewiſe iſſued out a declaration, notifying to the French, that, the kingdom of France being devolved to him, by the death of Charles the Fair, according to God's will, which he would not oppoſe, he was reſolved to act, as their ſovereign; He gave his new ſubjects all the uſual promiſes, on the like occaſions, offering his protection to all that, after the example of the Flemings, would acknowledge his authority; and, the ſame day, he publiſhed a manifeſto, containing a particular account of the pretended injuries received from Philip de Valois, and the propoſals of peace made by himſelf, in order that they might unite their forces againſt the Infidels. 1340.

He goes into England.

Though Edward had promiſed the duke of Brabant, that he would not quit the Low-Countries, till the war was compleated, it was impoſſible for him to perform his promiſe; for his affairs neceſſarily called him into England; but, to ſatisfy the duke, he left him, in hoſtage, four Engliſh lords of the firſt quality, beſides his queen and the new-born prince, who remained at Antwerp, as pledges of his return. After this, he paſſed into England, where he arrived, in February; and, preſently after, he called a parliament, which, upon granting him a conſiderable ſubſidy, procured the Confirmation of Magna Charta. Before they broke up, the lords and commons preſented an addreſs, praying that the title of the king of France, uſed in the Publick Acts, might have no influence over the affairs relating to England; and he, at once, complied with this requeſt. Though he had not, as yet, acquired one foot of land, in France, his new title was not diſpleaſing to the Engliſh, who fancied, that it increaſed the dignity of their ſovereign; but pope Benedict, on the other hand, exerted himſelf, to perſuade Edward to diſuſe that title, alledging he had no right to it, becauſe of the Salick law, concerning which, Philip had taken care to inſtruct him, to his advantage; but his exhortations proved altogether ineffectual.

Great preparations in England.

Though the firſt campaign had produced no remarkable event, Edward's preparations were a plain indication, that he expected greater matters, from the ſecond; for he had increaſed his fleet to 300 ſail of ſhips, fit for war, and his army was much more numerous than the former. Every thing being in readineſs, about midſummer, he embarqued for Flanders, though he had recieved intelligence, that the French fleet, conſiſting of 400 ſail, waited for him, in the way to Sluys. His eager deſire of glory rendering this news more joyful than ſurpriſing, he reſolved to open a paſſage, through the enemy, in ſpite of their ſuperiority; and, meeting them on the coaſt of Flanders, as he expected, he without heſitation, began the engagement; which was the greateſt and moſt memorable, that had been, hitherto, ſeen, in thoſe ſeas, and the firſt, wherein the king of England commanded, in perſon. The ſhips, for the moſt part, grappling one another, both ſides fought, without ſtirring, as if they had been, at land, from eight in the morning, till ſeven at night; and, if Edward's valour filled the ſoldiers with admiration, his conduct raiſed no leſs wonder in the mariners, who were amazed to ſee him give orders, with ſuch prudence and foreſight, that one would have thought he had commanded, at ſea, all his life. The preſence and reſolu- Act. Pub.

Of the whole French fleet, only 30 ſhips eſcaped, the reſt being either taken, or ſunk; ſo that Edward gained a moſt compleat and glorious victory. The Engliſh affirm, that the French loſt 30,000 men; but this terrible misfortune was long unknown to Philip, no one daring to carry him the news, till his buffoon, by an unlucky jeſt, gave him occaſion to diſcover it.

Edward beſieges Tournay. Act. Pub.

Edward's ſignal ſucceſs, in this engagement, afforded him an opportunity, of peaceably landing his troops, in Flanders, where he aſſembled the fineſt army, that was ever commanded by any king of England; for it conſiſted of 150,000 men, Engliſh, Germans, Flemings, and Gaſcoigns. With theſe numerous forces, he beſieged Tournay, after detaching 50,000 men, under Robert d'Artois, who poſted himſelf, near St. Omer, to favour the ſiege; but theſe laſt troops, being chiefly compoſed of the militia of Flanders, and entirely ignorant of military diſcipline, one day, without orders, to the number of 18,000, went and attacked the ſuburbs of St. Omer, for the ſake of plunder. The duke of Burgundy, who had thrown himſelf into that place, being unable to bear this bravado, ſallied out upon them, and ſlew above 3000; but this loſs would have been inconſiderable, had it not produced a fatal effect. The ſame night, the Flemiſh troops, ſeized with a panic conſternation, quitted their camp, in great diſorder, and ſhamefully retreated, ſome to their own homes, and others into Edward's camp; and ſome relate, that there was, on this occaſion, a battle, wherein Robert d'Artois was totally routed by the duke of Burgundy; but Froiſſart, a contemporary author, who gives us the above-mentioned account, ſeems more worthy of credit, than more modern writers.

Philip approaches Tournay. Walſing.

In the interim, Philip, at the head of an army, much ſuperior to that of Edward, advanced to the relief of Tournay, being accompanied by the kings of Navarre and Bohemia, with all the French nobility; not with an intent to engage, but only to harraſs the beſiegers, in order to force them to raiſe the ſiege. Edward was very ſenſible, how difficult it would be to take the town, whilſt the French army was ſo near; and, therefore, to oblige his enemy to alter his purpoſe, he diſpatched a herald, with a letter, challenging him to a ſingle combat, or offering to decide their quarrel by 100 on each ſide, or elſe by a general battle. The letter was directed to Philip de Valois, without any other title; to which Philip replied, Act. Pub. "He had ſeen a letter, addreſſed to one Philip "de Valois; but, as it was not for him, he re- "turned no anſwer; yet he took this occaſion "to acquaint him, that, with God's aſſiſtance, "he hoped, in a ſhort time, to expel him his "dominions."

1340. It was not eaſy to forward the ſiege of Tournay, by reaſon of the French army, which inceſſantly harraſs'd the beſiegers; and Edward lay three months, before the town, without making any conſiderable progreſs. However, he could not reſolve to raiſe the ſiege; but, tho' he was in great perplexity, he was freed from it by Joanna de Valois, his mother-in-law, ſiſter to the king of France, and widow to the late earl of Hainault. This princeſs, who had retired to the abbey of Fontenelle, after the deceaſe of her husband, interpoſed, in order to reconcile the contending monarchs, one of whom was her brother, and the other her ſon-in-law; and, at length, ſhe prevailed on them to conſent to a truce, from the 20th of September, to the 25th of June, in the following year; which was afterwards prolonged, for two years, by the pope's mediation. This truce was no ſooner ſigned, than Edward departed for England, with his queen, who had lived, three years, in the Low-Countries; where ſhe had been delivered of two princes, Lionel, at Antwerp, and John, at Ghent, who was afterwards ſtiled the duke of Lancaſter.

1340. Edward is in great perplexity.

A truce between the two kings. Act. Pub.

The emperor and duke of Brabant recede from the league. Act. Pub.

It was no ſmall mortification to Edward to be conſtrained, by the neceſſity of his affairs, to make a truce, which, in effect, diſconcerted all his meaſures; but three very weighty motives compelled him to take this ſtep, ſo very inconſiſtent with his vaſt deſigns. Firſt, the defection of the emperor and the duke of Brabant, who had both receded from the league; ſecondly, the exceſſive charge of ſupporting ſo numerous an army, for which the money, remitted from England, in leſs ſums than he expected, was far from being ſufficient; and, laſtly, this truce, in ſome meaſure, ſaved him the ſhame of raiſing the ſiege. Theſe reaſons were not only ſo cogent, as to induce him to ſign the truce, but alſo indiſpenſably engaged him to procure ſome reſpite, that he might remove the inconveniences occaſioned by the levity of his allies, and the exhauſting of his treaſure. As for the duke of Brabant, he amuſed him, for ſome time, with the proſpect of the foreſaid marriage; and he even demanded the pope's diſpenſation for it; but this affair, whether it was obſtructed by the king himſelf, or the court of Rome, came to nothing. The duke of Brabant, upon this diſappointment, withdrew his troops, tho' he did not openly break with the king; but, as to the emperor, the aid, Edward received from him, was ſo inconſiderable, that he would not have been a great ſufferer, by that loſs, had he not, in making a private peace with France, under the pretence that Edward concluded a truce, without him, alſo revoked his patent of vicar-general of the empire; which unexpected accident, cauſing ſome of the German princes to go from the league, obliged Edward to take other meaſures.

Edward's principal buſineſs, now, was to conſider of ways and means, to diſcharge his vaſt debts; and likewiſe to continue the war, when the truce ſhould be expired, without being expoſed to the like inconveniences. When he left England, he ſettled his affairs, in ſuch a manner, that he did not queſtion to receive punctually 1340. punctually the ſums he wanted, to pay his numerous army; but ſcarce had he begun the ſiege of Tournay, before he found himſelf in very great ſtraits, for want of money. Upon his arrival at London, he highly complained of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom he had appointed prime miniſter, in his abſence, charging him with maliciouſly obſtructing the levying of the ſubſidy granted by the parliament, though it was, by his advice and inſtances, that he engaged in the undertaking. He farther added, that, having laid ſiege to Tournay, upon his aſſurances, that nothing ſhould be wanting, he was abandoned, when he had moſt need for aſſiſtance; that he had not only violated his word, but even oppoſed all the expedients propoſed, to raiſe money; and, in a word, that he was the ſole cauſe of the length and ill ſucceſs of the ſiege of Tournay. The archbiſhop, having, thus, incurred the king's diſpleaſure, who was reſolved not to ſpare him, attempted to vex him, in his turn; and, with this view, he exclaimed againſt an extraordinary levy of money made, ſince the king's return, contrary to the liberties of Magna Charta, and threatened the collectors with excommunication. His intention was to raiſe a commotion, among the people; and, probably, he would have carried his revenge farther, if the parliament had not diſapproved his proceedings; but, as he was afraid of being abandoned, he choſe, though ſomewhat too late, to ſubmit to the king's mercy; and Edward very readily accepted his ſubmiſſions, to prevent a quarrel, which muſt have been prejudicial to him, on the account of his frequent occaſions for the clergy's aſſiſtance.

Benedict XII. is partial to France. He puts Flanders under an interdict. Walſing.

Some have imagined, that the archbiſhop was gained by the pope, who was very much byaſſed, in favour of France; and the pope, ſoon after, manifeſtly diſcovered his partiality, in putting all Flanders under an interdict, becauſe the Flemings had declared againſt the king of France, their ſovereign lord. The Flemiſh clergy ſo ſtrictly obſerved the interdict, that people were forced to ſend, into England, for leſs ſcrupulous prieſts, to celebrate divine ſervice; and the Flemings received theſe eccleſiaſticks, without any difficulty, pretending to evade the pope's cenſures, by alledging they were built upon an unjuſt foundation, ſince Edward was the real king of France, and Philip an uſurper.

A negotiation for a peace between the two kings. Act. Pub.

Edward's war with France ſucceeded ſo ill, that all his immenſe expences had not acquired him one foot of land, in the kingdom he had undertaken to conquer; and, after ſo ſo great, though fruitleſs, endeavours, there was no appearance of his ever meeting with better ſucceſs. Beſides, the truce affording his enemy leiſure to make preparations, he could have no hopes of ſurpriſing him; and yet it is not eaſy to determine, whether the negotiations for a peace, during the truce, were ſincere, on his part, or intended only to amuſe his enemy. However that be, if he really deſigned to make peace, the proſpect of freſh advantages, from the poſture of affairs in the dutchy of Bretagne, ſoon led him to reſolve to improve ſuch a favourable juncture; but the ſhare England had in the quarrel, about the ſucceſſion of that dukedom, obliges me to give ſome account of the caſe, which is briefly, as follows. 1341.

The affair of Bretagne.

Arthur II, duke of Bretagne, left three ſons, by his firſt wife, viz. John II, his ſucceſſor, Guy earl of Pontievre, and Peter; and, by a ſecond wife, he left a fourth ſon, named John, who was earl of Montfort, by his mother. John II. and Peter had no iſſue; but Guy, who died, in 1330, left a daughter, called Joanna, who was given by her uncle, John, in marriage to Charles de Chatillon, brother to Lewis, earl of Blois, who was generally ſtiled Charles de Blois. John II. dying, in 1341, there ſurvived two of the family, John, earl of Montfort, and Joanna, his niece, wife to Charles de Blois, who both claimed the dukedom; Joanna, by right of repreſentation, as daughter to Guy elder brother of John de Montfort, and the latter, as brother of the late duke, and conſequently, one degree, nearer than his niece. He alſo pleaded the advantage of his ſex; but this reaſon was of little weight, ſince Bretagne did not own the authority of the Salick law; and Charles had a great advantage over his competitor, as being nephew to Philip de Valois, who was to decide the affair. On the contrary, the earl of Montfort, immediately after the death of the duke, his brother, got poſſeſſion of Bretagne, and cauſed the greateſt part of his ſubjects to ſwear fealty to him; and he was, now, in England, where he had privately done homage to Edward, owning him, for king of France, and entered into an alliance with him. By this proceeding, he entirely forfeited that monarch's favour, who had no great kindneſs for him, before; yet Philip, obſerving the cuſtomary formalities, ordered the two competitors to be ſummoned before the court of peers, to defend their rights, and receive judgment. Montfort very imprudently repaired to Paris, fancying that what he had done, in England, was ſtill a ſecret; but, at his firſt audience, the king of France plainly told him, that he had no preteſinons to Bretagne, and upbraided him, for his homage to the king of England. Montfort confeſſed, that he had been in England, to ſee his friends, though he denied the homage; but Philip, being better informed than he imagined, commanded him not to ſtir from Paris, and appointed a day, for the judgment of the proceſs. It was eaſy for Montfort to apprehend, what danger both his cauſe and perſon were in; and, therefore, on a ſudden, he made his eſcape from Paris, diſguiſed like a merchant, and retired to Bretagne; yet his ab-

It is pretended, that the peers did not, on this occasion, proceed, in so regular a manner, as the nature of the cause required; but, though this decision was directly contrary to that, in the case of the earl of Artois, they alledged, that, usually in Bretagne, representation took place, but not in Artois. However that be, Philip, being highly incensed against the earl of Montfort, for doing homage to the king of England, confiscated his lands; but, to compensate this loss, Edward gave him, in England, the earldom of Richmond. Shortly after, John, eldest son to Philip de Valois, being commissioned to execute the decree given, in favour of Charles de Blois, entered Bretagne, at the head of a numerous army; upon which, Montfort retreated to Nantz, where he was, forthwith, besieged; but, presently after, the city being taken, and Montfort made prisoner, he was conducted to Paris, and committed to the great tower of the Louvre.

His wife manages his affairs. Froissart.

This event would, doubtless, have ended the quarrel between the two candidates, had not Margaret of Flanders, wife to John de Montfort, undertook to support her husband's interests, in spite of the ill situation of his affairs; who came to London, with her son, a child only four years old, and renewed the earl her husband's alliance with Edward. By this new treaty, she positively engaged, to put the English in possession of all the places, still in her power; and, the more effectually to secure the assistance of England, she concluded a marriage, between her son and one of Edward's daughters, and left the young prince at the English court, to be educated, or rather as an hostage.

1342. Edward having, by this means, procured an entrance into Bretagne, he, directly, dispatched Robert d' Artois thither, in order to attack Philip, from that quarter; who quickly became master of Vannes, and then ordered Rennes to be besieged; but, whilst his forces were employed in the siege, the heads of the contrary party, knowing he staid, at Vannes, with a few troops, invested the town, and took it, by storm. Robert, being mortally wounded, very narrowly escaped to Hennebond, where he died of his wounds; but Edward, being extremely grieved, when he received the news of his death, swore to revenge it; and he perfomed his oath, with the utmost punctuality. Robert d' Artois's expedition into Bretagne gave Philip occasion to complain, that Edward had violated the truce; and, to be even with him, he caused hostilities to be renewed, in Guienne. Thus, the two monarchs prepared for a fresh war, by mutually accusing each other of breaking the truce.

Edward goes, in person, to Bretagne, where he besieges four towns. Act. Pub.

The earl of Northampton, who had taken the command of the English troops, in Bretagne, upon the decease of Robert d' Artois, was unable to make any progress, with so small an army; and yet it was of vast importance to Edward, to become master of that dutchy; wherefore, he resolved to go thither, in person, with a powerful reinforcement. Upon his arrival, he laid siege, at once, to Nantz, Rennes, Vannes, and Guingamp; but Philip resolved to drive them thence, at all adventures; and, with this view, he raised an army of 50,000 men, under the command of the duke of Normandy, his eldest son. The young prince, marching with the utmost expedition, had the good fortune to enter Bretagne, before any of the places besieged were taken; and his approach obliged Edward to raise these four sieges, and draw all his troops together, which were still inferior to the French. The two armies remained, the greatest part of the winter, encamped near each other, but so well intrenched, that neither of the leaders seemed to be inclined to engage; and the duke of Normandy was unwilling to run any hazard, because, having done what he wanted, he was in hopes of starving his enemies. Edward was equally averse to venture a battle, unless forced, against an army much superior to his own; but, whilst these two princes lay, thus, encamped, two legates from Clement VI, the new pope, had time to arrive, and negotiate, between the two crowns, a truce, for three years, wherein all the allies, on both sides, were included; and they also prevailed on the two kings to promise to send ambassadors to Avignon, to treat of a peace, by the pope's mediation.

1343. A truce for three years. Knighton. Walsing.

Whilst Edward was engaged in his wars with France, the Scots improved that diversion, to make an attempt to recover their liberty; and, since Edward quitted Scotland, king David's adherents had gained great advantages over Baliol, who commanded the English army, but had not sufficient forces to stop their progress. Robert Stuart, regent of Scotland, for king David, maintained, by his valour and conduct, the interests of the young exiled prince; and he was bravely seconded by William Douglas and some other lords, who still continued inviolably attached to their lawful sovereign. Though a body, commanded by Douglas, sustained a dreadful loss, Robert was still in a condition to keep his ground; and he even, shortly after, besieged Perth, or St. Johnston, the strongest place the English had, in Scotland. The siege lasted, three months, by reason of the besiegers great want of ammunition; but a seasonable supply, from France, enabled them, at length, to take the place. This loss obliged Baliol to abandon the center of the kingdom, and retire to the borders, where he sheltered himself, by means of the places he had resigned to the English; and the truce, concluded before Tournay, wherein Scotland was included, constrained Stuart to lay down his arms, for some time; but no sooner was the truce broken, on account of the affairs of Bretagne, than the Scots re-assembled and besieged Sterling, of which they became masters, after numberless assaults, without the least intermission.

This unfortunate accident hindered his entering Scotland, as it deprived him of the proviſions and ammunition, on board his fleet; and he could not expect to find any, in the enemy's country, becauſe the Scots themſelves deſtroyed them, to deprive his army of the means of ſubſiſtence. However, their ignorance of his ſtate freed him from his preſent perplexity; for, finding themſelves much inferior to that monarch, who threatened their country with utter deſolation, they humbly ſued for a truce, and Edward took care not to refuſe it; though, taking advantage of their terror, he would only grant it, upon this condition: That they ſhould own him, for ſovereign of Scotland, and renounce their allegiance to king David, provided that prince came not, in perſon, into that kingdom, before May next enſuing, with an army ſtrong enough to give battle. The king of France, upon this, lay under a neceſſity of aſſiſting his ally, more effectually than he had, hitherto, done, leſt he ſhould loſe the advantages, procured by the frequent diverſions of the Scots; wherefore, he ſupplied king David with men and money, and ſent him into Scotland, where he levied an army, conſiſting, as it is ſaid, of 60,000 men, Scots, French, Danes, and Norwegians; and, with theſe troops, marching towards the frontiers of England, he penetrated as far as Durham, which he beſieged. In a few days, he took the city, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword; and his intent was to make a farther progreſs; but, upon advice, that Edward was haſtening to give him battle, he choſe to retire, his generals repreſenting to him, that he could not remain any longer, in England, without hazarding a battle, which might, a ſecond time, endanger his kingdom. Whilſt he was marching back to Scotland, the garriſon of Werk-caſtle, belonging to the counteſs of Salisbury, attacking ſome of his troops that ſtaid behind, he was ſo highly exaſperated, that he reſolved to take the caſtle; and he ſtormed it, ſeveral times, but was bravely repulſed by the counteſs's people, who was herſelf in the place. This reſiſtance, and the news of Edward's approach, obliged him to deſiſt; and he could not retreat, at a more proper juncture, ſince Edward came, that very day, to the caſtle. He paid a viſit to the counteſs of Salisbury *, which has induced ſome hiſtorians to affirm, he fell deſperately in love with that lady; tho' it would not be difficult to confute their groundleſs aſſertions; but as his love, whether true or falſe, produced no material event, it will be needleſs to enter upon ſuch an enquiry. On the morrow, Edward continued his march, in queſt of the enemy; but, being informed, that the Scots were retired to Gedeour's foreſt, he ceaſed his purſuit. As his affairs were not yet in an agreeable ſituation, in Scotland, and this war was very unſeaſonable, with reſpect to his meaſures with France, he ſent David an offer of a two year's truce, which was accepted, with Philip's conſent; by means of which, the king of Scotland ſettled himſelf firmly on the throne, and the king of England had more leiſure to think of his other affairs. 1343.

Edward's thoughts, for many years, were ſo entirely engroſſed by military affairs, that he could not find time, to redreſs ſeveral grievances complained of by the people, and which juſtly deſerved a particular attention; but, the truce with France and Scotland affording him ſome reſpite, he called a parliament to conſult about means, to ſecure the welfare and tranquillity of the nation. During this ſeſſions, which continued, a conſiderable part of the winter, the parliament made it their principal buſineſs to enact ſeveral regulations, extremely beneficial to the people; and Edward was ſo far from oppoſing them, that he very ſolemnly confirmed all the liberties of Magna Charta; by which he ſhewed, that he was no leſs concerned for the good of his people, than for his own, or that of his ſucceſſors. Among the ſeveral acts paſſed, in this parliament, one of the moſt important was the ſtatute of proviſors, that is, an act againſt thoſe who brought proviſions, for benefices, from the court of Rome; for the former popes exceedingly abuſed the power they aſſumed, to diſpoſe of the benefices of England; nay, without ſtaying till they were vacant, they often conferred them on perſons, who were to take poſſeſſion, upon the death of the preſent incumbents, which raiſed loud complaints from the patrons. Clement VI. proceeding, in this particular, farther than any of his predeceſſors, the parliament was conſtrained to remonſtrate to him, about it, but to no manner of purpoſe; for, inſtead of reforming this abuſe, which was ſtill more intolerable, as all the benefices were beſtowed upon foreigners, the pope exhorted the king, in a letter, to withdraw the complaints againſt the proviſions, which, in his opinion, were an undeniable prerogative of the holy ſee. The parliament, upon this, deſpairing of any redreſs from the pope, reſolved to provide againſt this evil, by their own authority; and, accordingly, the foreſaid ſtatute was paſſed, which made it death, for any perſon, to bring, for the future, the like proviſions into the kingdom. Tho' this ſtatute extremely mortified the pope, he thought fit to be ſilent, being aſſured, that the king and parliament were reſolved to ſupport it, and contemn his cenſures. However, that his pretended right might not be entirely loſt, he feigned to take no notice of the ſtatute; but, altho' he afterwards granted, from time to time, ſeveral proviſions, it was with ſuch caution, that the abuſe was conſiderably leſſened, during the ſequel of this reign. On the other hand, the king being unwilling to occaſion an entire rupture with the court of Rome, was content with leaving the ſtatute in force, without a rigorous execution; but, in proceſs of time, under Edward's ſucceſſors, the popes returning to their former courſes, it became frequently neceſſary to renew this ſtatute, which was called the ſtatute of Præmunire, containing, beſides the pro-

Edward prepares for a war with France.

Tho' Edward ſeemed wholly employed with domeſtick, he did not neglect foreign, affairs; for his mind was continually on the rack, to project means to renew the war with France, the very moment the truce was expired. He appeared, however, inclinable to peace, and continued, at the court of Rome, negotiations, which daily met with freſh obſtacles; but, whether his ſole deſign, by them, was, to amuſe his enemy, or he expected them to be unſucceſsful, he took care to make prepara-

Act. Pub. tions for war. He had reaped ſo little advantage, from his alliances with the princes of Germany and the Low-Countries, upon whom he conſumed ſuch immenſe ſums, to no purpoſe, that he reſolved to take another courſe; and, with that view, he diſpatched, into the Low-Countries and Germany, agents, with power to treat with all ſorts of perſons, that would ſupply him with men, or money. As all theſe aids, when joined in a body, would produce the ſame effect, at a much cheaper rate; ſo he expected to be able to diſpoſe of his troops more abſolutely, than he had done thoſe of the princes. Moreover, he hoped to perplex Philip's intrigues, by which he, on all occaſions, endeavoured to corrupt his allies; and, in order to draw into his kingdom multitudes of foreign lords, with whom he might, in perſon, negotiate, he found out an expedient, which could not fail of ſucceſs, becauſe it was entirely adapted to the taſte of that age. He ordered tournaments to be publiſhed, and gave an honourable reception to all perſons of diſtinction, that were pleaſed to be preſent, careſſing them, in ſuch a manner, that they could never ſufficiently admire his politeneſs, magnificence, and liberality; and, to render theſe entertainments the more ſolemn, and, at the ſame time, to free himſelf from the ceremonies, to which the difference of rank and condition would have obliged him, he cauſed a circular hall of boards to be run up, at Windſor, 200 feet, in diameter; where he feaſted all the knights, at one table, which was called the round table, in memory of the great Arthur, who, it is pretended, inſtituted an order of knighthood, by that name. The following year, he cauſed a more ſolid building to be erected, that he might continue, annually, the ſame diverſions; and, during that time, he treated with theſe ſeveral lords, about the ſupplies each of them could furniſh him with, in proportion to his forces. The Collection of the Publick Acts abounds with inſtances of treaties with private perſons, managed either by himſelf, or his agents; and Philip could not ſee, without jealouſy, Spaniards, Italians, Germans, Flemings, and even Frenchmen, flock to England, to aſſiſt at the tournaments; wherefore, ſuſpecting ſome ſecret deſign in theſe entertainments, to diſconcert Edward's meaſures, he cauſed the like to be publiſhed in his dominions. This method of oppoſing his enemy was, in itſelf, juſt and honourable; but, ſoon after, he uſed another, that was not ſo generally approved, though it was attended with remarkable conſequences. It is ſaid, that, having drawn to Paris, under the pretence of a tournament, Oliver de Cliſſon, and 10 or 12 other lords of Bretagne, attendants of Charles de Blois, he commanded their heads to be ſtruck off, without the leaſt formality of juſtice; but a letter, from Edward to the pope, about this affair, ſhews, that Philip did not allure theſe lords to Paris, but apprehended them, in Bretagne. As this action was the cauſe of breaking the truce, it will be requiſite to explain it; for we cannot otherwiſe diſcover, who was author of the rupture. Oliver de Cliſſon, a lord of Bretagne, having ſerved Charles de Blois, during the war, was taken priſoner by Edward, who having, probably, gained him, conſented, that he ſhould be exchanged for an Engliſhman; but, whether Philip had proof of his having changed ſides, or only ſuſpected it, he ordered him to be apprehended, in Bretagne, with 10 or 12 lords and gentlemen, and conducted to Paris, where they were beheaded. I believe I may venture to affirm, that theſe lords were apprehended, in Bretagne, becauſe the pope, in his anſwer to Edward's letter, wherein he vindicates Philip, to the utmoſt of his power, does not ſay ſo much as a word, to the contrary; but, perhaps, ſome of theſe lords and gentlemen were ſeized, at Paris, and the reſt, in Bretagne, by the king's order. The main difficulty, in judging rightly of this action of Philip's, is, that, according to Froiſſart, Argentre, and all the French hiſtorians, theſe lords had, all along, eſpouſed the cauſe of Charles de Blois; and yet Edward, in his letter to the pope, ſtiles them his adherents. They muſt, therefore, have changed ſides, either publickly, or privately, after the truce; which it is no eaſy matter preciſely to determine; tho' it does not appear, Edward could have had any reaſon to concern himſelf ſo much, in this affair, if theſe lords had only been his private adherents, whilſt outwardly they continued, all along, attached to France; and this, added to Edward's letter to the pope, ſeems to prove, at leaſt, that ſome of theſe lords openly declared for the earl of Montfort. Upon this ſuppoſition, it cannot be doubted, that Philip violated the truce, in commanding them to be ſeized, in Bretagne; but, if theſe lords are ſuppoſed to have been only Edward's ſecret friends, ſince the concluſion of the truce, the two following queſtions may be propoſed: Firſt, whether Philip might juſtly cauſe them to be ſeized, in Bretagne, during the truce? Secondly, whether, as ſovereign lord of Bretagne, he had a right to exerciſe ſuch a power over theſe lords, eſpecially, as the putting them to death, in ſo illegal a manner, was rather a murder than an act of juſtice? However that be, Edward alledged, that this action was a violation of the truce; whilſt Philip maintained, that Edward, to break it, made uſe of this unjuſtifiable pretence.

Philip beheads ſeveral lords of Bretagne. Act. Pub.

An explanation of this affair.

Edward

1344. Edward was ſo incenſed at the tragical death of the lords of Bretagne, that he was upon the point of beheading the Bretagne-priſoners of Philip's party; but, upon the remonſtrances of Henry of Lancaſter, he altered his reſolution. However, he ſent for Henry de Leon, one of the priſoners, and told him, with great emotion, that, though the death of his countrymen, beheaded at Paris, was a ſufficient reaſon to treat him with the ſame ſeverity, he was unwilling to copy after ſo bad an example, or to revenge himſelf on the innocent, but intended to puniſh the author of that barbarity; and then he added, that, though he might demand of him a ranſom of 30 or 40,000 crowns, he would releaſe him for 10,000, provided he would go, in his name, and defy Philip, and declare to him, that having violated the truce, by this barbarous action, he muſt prepare for war.

Edward ſends word to the king of France, that the truce is broken.

He ſends a defiance to Philip.

Edward, reſolving to puſh the war, with more vigour than ever, appointed the earl of Northampton his lieutenant-general in France; commanding him, at the ſame time, to defy Philip, and declare war againſt him, by ſea and land. Soon after, he ſent, into Guienne, Henry of Lancaſter, earl of Derby, to begin hoſtilities, till he ſhould be in readineſs to go thither himſelf; and, in the interim, he invited John de Montfort into England, who had made his eſcape from Paris, and received his homage, for Bretagne. He alſo received the homage of Jeoffrey de Harcourt, for his lands in Normandy confiſcated by Philip, and he engaged, by letters patent, either to recover his eſtate, or give him an equivalent in France, or England. Quickly after, he publiſhed a manifeſto, concerning all the injuries received from Philip de Valois; and he exhorted the French to acknowledge him, for ſovereign, promiſing to exempt them from taxes, and govern them, according to the laws and cuſtoms obſerved in France, under St. Lewis, his predeceſſor. He likewiſe wrote to the pope, to acquaint him with his reaſons to renew the war; but the pope's anſwer evidently ſhewed him to be a partial mediator; for he not only juſtified Philip's proceedings againſt the lords of Bretagne, and accuſed Edward of being the firſt violater of the truce, but even threatened to exert his apoſtolick authority againſt him. This was a convincing proof, that Edward could expect no favour from the pope; and, accordingly, he made no farther addreſſes to him, but only for form-ſake, and to keep up a decorum.

In the interim, the earl of Derby made a conſiderable progreſs, in Guienne, where he carried, by ſtorm, the town of Bergerac, which he gave up to be plundered; but the generoſity of that general, rarely imitated by thoſe of our age, deſerves to be honourably tranſmitted down to poſterity. Whilſt the Engliſh were intent upon plundering the town, a Welch knight chanced to light upon the receiver's office; where he found ſuch a quantity of money, that he judged it his duty to acquaint his general with it, imagining that he had naturally a right to ſo great a booty; but he was agreeably ſurpriſed, when the earl told him, with a pleaſant countenance, that he wiſhed him joy of his good fortune, and did not make his word to depend upon the greatneſs, or ſmallneſs, of what he promiſed. 1345.

During theſe tranſactions, Edward loſt a very powerful ally, by the death of James d'Arteville, who was torn in pieces by the Flemings; and, his death entirely changing the poſture of affairs, in the Low-Countries, it was, by no means, proper to attack France, from that quarter; and, therefore, Edward reſolved to carry the brunt of the war into Guienne. The duke of Normandy had now entered that province, at the head of 60,000 men, to compleat the conqueſt of it; and, upon the approach of this formidable army, the earl of Derby retired to Bourdeaux; but, his retreat giving the duke of Normandy an opportunity of retaking ſeveral places, he was, at length, engaged in the ſiege of the caſtle of Aiguillon, ſeated upon the confluence of the Gironne and Lot. This ſiege was very remarkable, not only for the vigorous aſſaults of the beſiegers, who, for a whole week, ſtormed the town, three times a day, but for the brave defence of the beſieged; and Edward haſtened his preparations, for their relief, determining to oppoſe, in perſon, the duke of Normandy's progreſs.

This ſpeech being ſpread in the army, the ſoldiers cried out, that they were all, to a man,

Edward embarques for Guienne.

1346. ready to follow their ſovereign, wherever he was pleaſed to command them; and, ſuch a ſudden and unanimous reſolution, greatly raiſing his expectations, he embarqued his troops, deſigning to ſail for Guienne; but, being twice driven back by contrary winds, Geoffrey de Harcourt, who attended him, took occaſion to perſuade him to land in Normandy, a very plentiful country, which had been long exempted from the calamities of war; and Edward, purſuant to his advice, landed, at la Hogue in le Cotentin, where he was, by no means, expected.

Edward knights the prince of Wales. Act. Pub.

The moment of his arrival, he knighted the prince of Wales, his ſon, and ſeveral other young lords; and then he headed his army, conſiſting of 30,000 foot, and 2500 men at arms. He divided his troops into three bodies, who marched ſeparately, in the day, but commonly rejoined, in the evening, in order to encamp all together; and, in their firſt marches, they revenged, in a horrible manner, the death of the lords beheaded, at Paris. Valogne, St. Lo, Carentan, and Harfleur were the firſt towns that felt the fury of the Engliſh arms; and Ralph, earl of Eu, conſtable of France, then at Caen, attempting to oppoſe the Engliſh, with the militia of the country, ſerved only, by his being defeated and made priſoner, for a happy preſage of their future victories. After the defeat of the conſtable, Edward continued his march, through the biſhopricks of Liſieux and Evreux, burning and plundering whatever came in his way; and he never halted, till he came to Poiſſi, where he ſtaid, ſome days, to provoke Philip to engage, by ſending a herald to him with a defiance, which was not accepted; for Philip's deſign was to incloſe him between the Seine and the Oyſe. Had this project proved ſucceſsful, the Engliſh army would have been unavoidably ruined; but Edward, perceiving his intent, though ſomewhat too late, decamped from Poiſſi, in order to paſs the Somme, and take ſhelter, in Ponthieu; being ſenſible, that his enemy was advancing with an army of 100,000 men. He marched, a conſiderable way down the Somme, before he could find any paſſage; yet, at laſt, he was ſo happy as to diſcover the ford of Blanchetaque, by means of a priſoner, who was thoroughly acquainted with the country. This diſcovery appeared, at firſt, very advantageous; but Philip, foreſeeing that the enemy might take that rout to retire, detached Gondemar du Fay, with a body of 12000 men, to guard that ford, on which depended the ſucceſs of his deſigns; ſo that Edward was obliged, either to force the paſſage, or fight, with great diſadvantage, his enemy, who cloſely purſued him. However, coming to a reſolution, he ordered his troops to advance, who, being animated by the preſence of their king, leaped into the river, with ſo much intrepidity, that they began to vanquiſh their enemies, before they came to the charge. It is eaſy to conceive the difficulties of ſuch a paſſage, in the face of the enemy, when an army cannot enlarge its front, beyond the breadth of the ford, and is forced to march through the water, and, at the ſame time, handle their arms; but, in ſpite of all theſe obſtacles, the Engliſh, being in the ſight of their king, marched, as to a certain victory. It was impoſſible for the French to ſuſtain ſo furious an attack; and, after ſome attempts to repulſe the Engliſh, they were conſtrained to abandon that important paſſage, through which Edward, immediately, paſſed his whole army. The ſame evening, he encamped, at Creſſy; whilſt Philip croſs'd the Somme, at Abbeville, no more than three leagues diſtant. 1346.

He forces a paſs defended by the French.

Edward ſtays for Philip, at Creſſy. Froiſſart.

Edward, finding that he was cloſely purſued, and that he could not avoid fighting, ſtopped ſhort, in expectation of his enemies, and choſe an advantageous ſpot of ground, where he drew up his army; but Philip, believing that Edward's retreat was the reſult of his fear, did not doubt, if he could but come up with him, that he ſhould quickly vanquiſh him; and, accordingly, he marched, the very next day, from Abbeville, with an intent to attack him. The Engliſh army was divided into three bodies, the firſt of which was commanded by the prince of Wales; the ſecond was led by the earls of Northampton and Arundel and the lord Roſs; and the king kept, at ſome diſtance, with the third, to give aſſiſtance to thoſe that ſhould want it. Philip could not advance, in view of the enemy, till three in the afternoon, having marched, that day, three leagues, ſo that it was almoſt four o' clock, when the battle began; and he had alſo divided his army into three bodies, the firſt of which conſiſted of Genoeſe, under Antonio Doria and Carolo Grimaldi. As the chief ſtrength of his infantry lay in theſe troops, his deſign was, that they ſhould charge firſt; but, juſt as the battle was about to begin, a great and ſudden rain, ſlackening the ſtrings of the Genoeſe croſs-bows, rendered them unſerviceable. However, as they were now too far advanced, they found themſelves expoſed to a ſhower of Engliſh arrows, which made them give way; which being obſerved by Charles, earl of Alenſon, the king's brother, who ſupported them with a numerous body of horſe, that prince, who was ignorant of the cauſe, ſuppoſing it to be the effect of treachery, immediately, ordered the horſe to fall upon them, by which raſh action, he put the French army in diſorder; and, in the interim, the earl, giving himſelf no trouble, about the Genoeſe, nor regarding what paſſed behind him, attacked the firſt body of the Engliſh, commanded by the prince of Wales, and was received with a reſolution that he little expected; tho' he continued his endeavours, which only cauſed him bravely to loſe his life. Upon his death, the body, that was under his command, began, by degrees, to ſtagger; and, as they could not be ſpeedily ſupported, on account of the diſorder occaſioned by themſelves, among the Genoeſe troops, they were, at length, put to flight.

The battle of Creſſy.

The body commanded by Alenſon, is defeated.

The prince of Wales gaining ſo great an advantage, in this firſt onſet, Philip ordered a powerful body of horſe to advance, to repair the diſorder cauſed by the defeat of the firſt; ſo that the French had always the ſuperiority, in number, though the Engliſh ſtill maintained their ground. In all probability, the young prince, 1246. prince, who fought with an heroic valour, resolved to conquer, or die, would have been overpowered by numbers, if the earls of Northampton and Arundel had not come to his relief; whose approach drew thither more French troops, the small extent of the field not permitting the two armies to engage, all at once; and the fight was very obstinate. The valour of the prince of Wales, which filled the English generals with admiration, made them, at the same time, extremely uneasy, with respect to his person, by reason of the superiority of the enemies; wherefore, they speedily sent the king word, that it was time to come to the prince's relief. Edward, far from being moved at this message, enquired, whether his son was still alive; and, being told, that he was not only alive, but fighting with an astonishing bravery, he replied to the messenger, "Tell "my generals, since my son is alive, to send no "more to me; for the honour of this day "shall be his, and he must now merit his "spurs." This answer inspiring the prince with fresh vigour, he forced a passage through his enemies, who were ready to surround him; and he was so valiantly seconded by his troops, that the French gave way, and, at length, dispersed in confusion.

Philip had one body left, which had not yet engaged, commanded by himself; towards which the prince of Wales directed his steps, after routing the other two; and, in this last action, he acquired the greatest honour. Philip, incensed to see his two bodies routed and dispersed, performed wonders, to snatch the victory from the young hero, before it was compleated; and the king of Bohemia, though blind, would be present at the battle, causing his horse's bridle to be tied to those of two brave knights; who was slain, according to his wish, in fighting for France. His standard, on which were embroidered, in gold, three ostrich-feathers, with these words, ICH DIEN, that is, I SERVE, was taken and brought to the prince of Wales, who, in memory of that day, bore three ostrich-feathers, for his crest, with the foresaid motto; and, in the mean while, Edward, being posted, with his troops, on a rising ground, watched the proper time to charge, tho' he was unwilling to make too much haste, lest he should rob the prince, his son, of part of his glory; but, in this state of inaction, he struck terror into the French, who saw him ready to attack them, with advantage. Philip, for his part, after many fruitless attempts to repulse the English, having rallied some of his nobles and men at arms, threw himself into the midst of the battle, in order to invigorate his troops, by his example; and it must be confessed, that he gave signal proofs of an undaunted valour; for he was twice dismounted, and wounded, in his neck and thigh, before he suffered himself to be led, though with extreme pain, out of the field of battle; but, his retreat quite dispiriting those of his men that still maintained the fight, they were entirely routed, with the rest of the army. Then it was, that a terrible slaughter ensued of the flying troops, who were pursued, till the night was far advanced; and it is said, that, in this memorable battle, the English began, for the first time, to use cannon, a thing, hitherto, not so much as heard of, in France. Four pieces planted on a little hill, did great execution, among the French troops, and terrified them, to such a degree, that the success of this day is partly ascribed to the surprise of the French at this novelty; and France lost, in this battle, the king of Bohemia, the earl of Alenson, the king's brother, the duke of Lorrain, the earl of Flanders, the earl of Blois, 15 other great lords of the kingdom, 1200 knights, and above 80 standards. 1346.

The king of Bohemia is slain, and his banner taken.

When Edward perceived, by the precipitant flight of the enemy, that his victory was certain, he advanced, to demonstrate to his son his extreme satisfaction: "Dear son, "said he, embracing him in his arms, you "have behaved your self nobly, this day, and "truly deserve the crown, for which you have "fought." The young prince, out of countenance at the king's commendations, with a modest silence, fell on his knees, and asked his father's blessing, according to the custom practised in England; and the night of this glorious day was spent by the English, in rejoicings; but Edward published, in the camp, express orders, not to insult over the misfortunes of the vanquished, exhorting his army to return God thanks for the victory. On the morrow, some troops being detached to pursue the flying enemy, meeting a body of militia, who, being ignorant of what had happened, were marching to Philip's camp, slew 7000; and it is affirmed, that the loss France sustained, on the second day, exceeded that of the battle, as well by the defeat of the militia, as by the slaughter, or taking of the soldiers, who, in flying, were dispersed in the country. Edward praises his son. Froissart.

Edward continued, some days, near the field of battle, to bury the dead, and take care of the wounded, as well those of the enemy, as his own; and then, marching through le Boulonnois, he approached Calais, in order to besiege it. This place, being extremely well fortified, was no less incommodious to the English, than Dunkirk has been, in our own time; and, in becoming master of it, he would not only free himself from a very troublesome neighbourhood, but also open a passage into France. He invested it, on the 28th of September, and summoned the governor to surrender, threatening, in case of refusal, to put the garrison and all the inhabitants to the sword; but John de Vienne, the governor, replied, he acknowledged no other king of France but the person that committed to him the custody of the town, in whose service, he was resolved to live and die. Edward besieges Calais. Act. Pub.

The king, having taken an exact view of the fortifications of Calais, discovered, that it would be very difficult to accomplish the siege, by force; and, therefore, he, at once, determined to reduce the place, by famine. Accordingly, he drew round the town four lines of circumvallation, with regular fortifications, resolutelybent not to relinquish his enterprize,

1346. till he had taken the place. The governor, from his preparations, foreſeeing the length of the ſiege, ſent away all uſeleſs mouths, to prevent the want of proviſions; and tho', purſuant to the maxims of war, Edward was not obliged to take pity of theſe poor wretches, who were to the number of 1700, he received them into the camp, and permitted them afterwards to depart, where they pleaſed.

1347. The king of Scotland enters England. Act. Pub.

In the interim, Philip made uſe of all poſſible means, to raiſe the ſiege; and he could apprehend only two, proper for that purpoſe. The firſt, which was to attack the lines of the beſiegers, could not be ſo ſpeedily put in practice, as to render it probable, that the town would hold out, till he was able to relieve it; and the ſecond was to make a diverſion, in England, by the arms of the Scots. The latter appearing to be the moſt ſpeedy, he engaged the king of Scotland to make an inroad into England; and he did not queſtion, as all the Engliſh forces were employed in France, but the alarm, cauſed by this invaſion, would raiſe ſuch commotions, in England, that Edward would be forced to raiſe the ſiege. David, conſidering the intereſt of France, as his own, and readily following the ſuggeſtions of Philip, put himſelf at the head of 30,000 men, and advanced, as far as Durham; but this unexpected invaſion, even at ſuch a juncture, though it alarmed the Engliſh, did not diſhearten them; for, young Lionel, left by the king, his father, guardian of the realm, not being yet of age, to command an army, queen Philippa undertook to repulſe the enemy. With this view, heading the troops, drawn together from all parts, with amazing expedition, ſhe marched directly to the Scots, and offered them battle; and David was equally impatient to engage, fancying nothing more eaſy, than to put to flight undiſciplined troops commanded by a woman; whereas he not only had the mortification to loſe the day, but alſo to ſee himſelf a priſoner in the hands of the Engliſh *.

He is defeated and made priſoner by the queen.

Charles de Blois is defeated and taken.

Fortune was never weary of heaping favours on Edward; for, if his arms were victorious, in France and England, they were alſo ſucceſsful, in Bretagne; where Sir Thomas Dagworth, the commander of the Engliſh troops, in that country, twice defeated Charles de Blois, and took him priſoner, in the laſt battle, fought near la Roche de Rien.

Philip tries, in vain, to relieve Calais.

In the mean while, the ſiege, or rather blockade of Calais, was ſtill carried on, by ſea and land; for Edward had ſent for 700 ſhips, to guard the ſea; and, as nothing could be brought into the town, it was, at laſt, reduced to extremity. The king, diſcovering the deplorable condition of the beſieged, by an intercepted letter, ſent it, immediately, to Philip, and, at the ſame time, ordered the meſſenger to tell him, that the greateſt expedition was neceſſary, if he intended to relieve the place; upon which intelligence, Philip ſpeedily took the field, and approached the Engliſh camp, with an army of 150,000 men. He expected to draw the enemy out of his intrenchments, by offering him battle, ſeveral times; but Edward too well knew the impoſſibility of forcing his lines, to run any hazard; and, beſides, he had good reaſon to believe, that the town would quickly be at his mercy; ſo that, notwithſtanding all theſe defiances, he conſtantly anſwered, that his buſineſs there was to take Calais; and, if Philip thought fit to prevent him, he had nothing more to do, than to take the moſt proper meaſures. Philip, ſince he could not, without manifeſt danger, attack him in his intrenchments, nor draw him into the open field, ſent two cardinals with propoſals of peace; and he offered him Guienne, the earldom of Ponthieu, and a marriage between their children; but Edward replied, that Guienne and Ponthieu belonged to him; and that he ſhould ſoon become maſter of Calais; wherefore, he had no need of his bounties. This project failing, Philip propoſed to him, by a herald, to decide the quarrel, by a combat of ſix on each ſide; adding, that the king of France would appoint the time and place; but the earl of Derby anſwered, "That muſt be Edward, "then, becauſe he is the true king of France." This pretenſion, alone, was ſufficient to defeat the propoſal, to which, it is evident, Edward, in his preſent circumſtances, had no inclination; for his ſole intent was to take Calais, without putting that event to arbitration. A few days after, he was reinforced with 17000 men, brought him, by his queen, from England; and, if we may give credit to ſome Engliſh hiſtorians, this ſupply came very ſeaſonably, to enable him to be revenged on Philip. It is related, that he offered to fight him, in the open field, to fill up his trenches himſelf, and demoliſh his works, provided he might have ſufficient ſecurity, that nothing ſhould be conveighed into Calais, till after the battle; and that Philip, rejecting this propoſal, choſe to retire. Thus much is certain, that he did not judge it adviſable to attack Edward, in his intrenchments; ſo that the beſieged, deſpairing of relief, deſired, at length, to capitulate; but a capitulation, deferred, to the laſt, could not be of any great advantage. Accordingly, Edward refuſed the beſieged any terms, but that of life, which he was pleaſed to grant both to the ſoldiers and the inhabitants; yet he excepted out, of the latter, ſix of the principal burghers, for a ſacrifice to his vengeance, leaving them to chuſe the victims themſelves. This ſeverity created a great conſternation in the town; for it was extremely difficult to chuſe

Calais ſurrenders. Froiſſart.

* The Scotch king, though he had two ſpears hanging in his body, his leg almoſt incurably wounded, and his ſword beat out of his hand, diſdaining captivity, provoked the Engliſh, by opprobrious language, to kill him; and when John Copland, governor of Roxborough-caſtle, adviſed him to yield, he ſtruck him on the face, with his gantlet, ſo fiercely, that he knocked out two of his teeth; yet Copland conveighed him out of the field a priſoner. Upon his refuſing to deliver him to the queen, who, ſtaid, at Newcaſtle, during the battle, the king ſent for him to Calais, where he excuſed his refuſal ſo handſomely, that the king ſent him back, with the reward of 500 l. per annum, where he himſelf ſhould chuſe it, near his own dwelling, and made him a Knight-Banneret. Rymer's Fœd. Buchanan.

1347. these six persons; and yet this choice was to be, forthwith, made. History ought not to pass over in silence the generosity of Eustace de St. Pierre, one of the chief inhabitants; who, beholding fear and despair painted on the faces of his countrymen, voluntarily offered to be one of the six; and this extraordinary magnanimity affected the rest, to such a degree, that five more were presently found, who devoted themselves, for the preservation of their townsmen, after his example. These six illustrious burghers, resolved to appease the conqueror's rage, with their lives, went out, bare-footed, in their shirts, with halters about their necks, and presented to him the keys of the town; and they found him so highly incensed, that, in spite of the intercession of the prince of Wales, and of the great men about him, he commanded them to be led to execution; but, if he denied that favour to the pressing instances of his son, he could not find, in his heart, the same insensibility for the queen. This gracious princess, moved with the misfortune of these miserable men, falling down at his feet, intreated him, with tears in her eyes, to pardon them, for Christ's sake; and, notwithstanding his resolution, to the contrary, he could not see, in this prostrate posture, a queen, whom he so tenderly loved, without being overcome by her intreaties. The queen, not satisfied with saving the lives of these unhappy men, ordered cloaths to be brought them; and, after giving them an entertainment, in her own tent, she dismissed them, with a present to each of six pieces of gold; an action which did then, and ever will, redound to the honour of that generous princess.

Thus, the important town of Calais, after a year's siege, became subject to the English.

Edward turns the French out of Calais, and puts in an English colony. Act. Pub.

A few days after Edward had made his entry into Calais, he turned out all the inhabitants, in order to people it with English; and, probably, this precaution was the means of securing that place to the crown of England, for 200 years. The siege had been so tedious and fatiguing, that Edward thought it necessary to give his troops some repose, by consenting to a truce proposed to him, for one year; upon which, leaving a strong garrison, in Calais, he returned, in triumph, to England.

The flourishing condition of England.

Never had the English name been more glorious, than at present; nor had England ever enjoyed more compleat felicity. If the valour, wisdom, and good fortune of the king gave an extraordinary lustre to the kingdom, the singular qualities of the brave prince of Wales, heir apparent to the crown, afforded them a no less agreeable prospect, for the future; and the prodigious plenty, that, immediately, followed Edward's victories, seemed likewise to demonstrate, that Heaven took a peculiar care of the English.

1348. Edward refuses the imperial dignity. Act. Pub.

To increase still more the lustre of Edward's glory, ambassadors from Germany arrived, the next year, with offers of the imperial dignity; for the election of Charles IV, who was crowned, at Bonn, not pleasing all the electoral princes, some of them, being resolved to make a new choice, elected the king of England, whom the battle of Cressy, and taking of Calais, had rendered very famous; but Edward, not insensible how prejudicial the acceptance of this dignity, at a like juncture, had been to Richard, brother of Henry III, was too wise to plunge himself into the same difficulties; and, besides, he stood in need of all his forces and endeavours, to acquire the crown of France, which he apprehended to be a more substantial good; wherefore, he refused the honour designed him by the German princes. 1348.

1349. The corruption of manners in England. Knighton.

During the uninterrupted prosperity of the English, it is no wonder, that ease and plenty threw them into those excesses, that are the usual attendants of such a state. All the historians unanimously affirm, that an unbridled debauchery, now, prevailed in all parts of the kingdom; and that the women, laying aside their modesty, the great ornament of their sex, seemed to glory, in the loss of their virtue; for nothing was more common, than to see them riding, in troops, to the tournaments, dressed like cavaliers, with swords by their sides, and mounted on steeds adorned with rich trappings, without the least regard to their honour or reputation. The lives of the men were no less scandalous; but God did not suffer these disorders to pass long, with impunity. A terrible plague, after raging in Asia, and part of Europe, spread itself into France, and from thence into England, where it swept away one half of the nation; and London, especially, felt the effects of its fury, where, it is observed, in one year, above 50,000 persons were buried, in a church-yard belonging to the Cistercians.

Philip corrupts the governor of Calais.

Though this dreadful scourge had made no less havock, in France, Philip was intent upon great preparations, to renew the war, being resolved to do all that was possible, to recover Calais; but, rightly judging, that it would be extremely difficult to retake the town, by force of arms, he fixed upon a more certain method, by bribing the governor. The lords of Montmorency and Charny very readily undertook the execution of this project, notwithstanding the ignominy of the action; but what Mezerai affirms is very unlikely, that they thought it no great fault, to surprise the town, during the truce. However that be, they held a private correspondence with Aymeri de Pavia, the governor, who promised to surrender the place, for 20,000 crowns; and, this sum being remitted to him, he introduced, by degrees, into the town, 100 men at arms, and 12 French knights, whom he concealed in the castle. On the day appointed for the performance of his promise, the lords of Charny and Ribaumont lay in ambush, near the two gates of the town, with an intent to rush in, as soon as they were opened; and their measures were so well concerted, that they did not, in the least, doubt of success; but they were, after all, disappointed. A little before, Edward, receiving some intelligence of the plot, sent for the governor to London, and promised him a pardon, provided he would betray the French; upon which, he fully informed him 1349. of all the circumſtances of the plot, and the day agreed upon, to let the enemies into the town. Edward, having received this information, took care to come, the evening before, to Calais, attended by the prince of Wales, and 800 men, at arms; and, on the morrow, by break of day, he ſallied out, at one gate, and the prince of Wales, at the other, to attack the French, who were exceedingly ſurpriſed. The king, who was pleaſed to fight, on foot, under the banner of the lord Walter de Manny, engaged, in ſingle combat, with Euſtace de Ribaumont, a knight of Picardy, by whoſe fierce blows he was twice ſtruck down on his knees; but he was ſpeedily relieved by his own men, and even enabled to defeat Ribaumont's troop, and take him priſoner. Froiſſart.

In the interim, the prince of Wales vigouroufly charged the lord Charny, whom he, at length, defeated, and took priſoner; in which action, the French loſt 600 men, beſides a conſiderable number of priſoners, who, with their two leaders, were brought into the town, of which, a few hours before, they hoped to be maſters; and, though the ſtep they had taken was baſe and diſhonourable, Edward, conſidering that it was in obedience to their ſovereign, treated them in a very civil and obliging manner. He, even the ſame evening, entertained the principal priſoners, with a ſplendid ſupper, and vouchſafed to come and ſee them, whilſt at table; tho' he could not forbear upbraiding Charny, with the infamous means he had uſed, to diſpoſſeſs him, by treachery, and during the truce, of a place that was ſo fairly won, and at ſo dear a rate; and then, addreſſing himſelf to Ribaumont, he greatly applauded his valour, and made him a very valuable preſent of a ſtring of pearls, which he wore in his cap, as a teſtimony of his eſteem. He added, that, ſeeing he was a great admirer of the ladies, he deſired him to wear it in their company, aſſuring him, that he would not be leſs agreeable to them, on that account; and, after ſeveral other obliging expreſſions, he releaſed him, without a ranſom. Before he left Calais, he made John de Beauchamp governor, judging it imprudent to truſt any longer the cuſtody of that important place to a Lombard, who had been guilty of bribery; but this was not all the reward the traytor received, for his double treachery; for, the next year, he had the misfortune to fall into the hands of the French, who cauſed him to be torn in pieces, with four horſes.

The attempt upon Calais, unexpectedly, failing, Philip diſowned the authors; and Edward, not being prepared to renew the war, was, for the preſent, contented with that ſlight ſatisfaction.

Edward, having diſpatched his buſineſs, at Calais, returned to England; where, ſoon after, he inſtituted the famous order of the garter; which, according to the common opinion, owes its riſe to a trifling accident, tho', with reſpect to its conſequences very remarkable, if, in reality, it gave birth to this moſt noble order. It is affirmed, that Edward, being at a ball, where the counteſs of Salisbury, in dancing, dropped her garter, ſtooped to take it up; that, the lady imagining he had ſome other deſign, and expreſſing her ſurprize, he ſaid to her, in his own vindication, "Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, "Evil to him that evil thinks;" and that, in memory of this accident, he inſtituted the order of the garter, to which he appointed, for a motto, his words to the counteſs. An origin, ſo unworthy of the luſtre, with which this order has, all along, ſhone, ſince its inſtitution, ſeems, at firſt view, ſo very offenſive, that ſeveral ingenious men have exerciſed their wits, to find out a more honourable; wherefore, ſome ſuppoſe, that the reaſon of Edward's inſtituting this order was, becauſe, on the day of the battle of Creſſi, he had given Garter, for the word; and others, becauſe, on that day, he ordered his garter to be fixed, at the end of a lance, for the ſignal of battle; whilſt, laſtly, ſome aſſert, that Edward only revived and regulated an order of knighthood, begun by king Richard I, at the ſiege of Acres in Paleſtine; for they tell us, that king Richard, reſolving to ſtorm the town, diſtributed to ſome of his principal officers certain leather-ſtrings, to be tied round the leg, to diſtinguiſh them, during the aſſault, and, in memory of that event, Edward inſtituted the order of the garter. However, all this is advanced, without ſufficient proof; and whatever attempts have been made, to give this order a different origin from the firſt above-mentioned, nothing has, hitherto, been found ſatisfactory, as to the reaſon of the motto, HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE; which agrees very well with the firſt circumſtance, but has not any connexion with thoſe ſubſtituted, in its room. It is no leſs uncertain, why the nights wear the garter, on their left rather than on the right leg; or why the founder choſe to put the order under the protection of St. George; but, doubtleſs, that great prince's deſign was to engage the preſent and future knights to diſtinguiſh themſelves by their valour and virtue. This, of all the like orders, has moſt ſtrictly adhered to the rules of its inſtitution; for, tho' it be more antient than thoſe of the golden fleece *, and Holy Ghoſt †, it has never degenerated, as to the number, which has, all along, been 26, including the ſovereign of the order, who is always the perſon

Edward fights the Spaniſh corſairs. Act. Pub.

However glorious Edward had, hitherto, been, he hazarded his reputation, in an affair which, in all appearance, was beneath his notice; but the greatneſs of his courage would not ſuffer him to weigh, too nicely, ſuch conſiderations. The merchants, having complained of certain Spaniſh ſhips infeſting the coaſts of England, aſſembling ſuch of his ſhips as were ſooneſt ready, he went himſelf, to give chace to the corſairs, whom he fought and defeated; having taken 20 of their ſhips, ſunk many more, and diſperſed the reſt; and this action, tho', in itſelf, of ſmall importance, ſeemed to him ſo glorious, that, to perpetuate its memory, he ordered a gold coin to be ſtruck, whereon he was repreſented in a ſhip, with a cutlaſs in his hand.

1350. Philip de Valois dies, and is ſucceeded by John.

Philip de Valois died, before the expiration of the truce with Edward, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1350, being ſucceeded by his ſon, John, who renewed the truce, till Whitſuntide, 1354; but it was ill obſerved, on both ſides. In Bretagne, Gaſcoigne, and Picardy, frequent hoſtilities were committed, which occaſioned mutual complaints and even repriſals; and the earl of Derby, honoured with the title of duke of Lancaſter †, was ſent to Calais with an army, as to an open war; for he made inroads into the French territories, and ravaged the country, from Calais to Terouenne. The greateſt advantage Edward reaped, from the violation of the truce, was the acquiſition of the town of Guiſnes, ſold him by the governor; and, when John complained of it, Edward replied, "That his father, Philip, by attempting to "purchaſe Calais, had taught the Engliſh ge-"nerals, that buying and ſelling was no breach "of a truce."

The Flemings recede from the league with Edward.

However, this advantage did not balance the loſs Edward ſuſtained, by the entire defection of the Flemings; though they had, hitherto, been firmly attached to his intereſts. Upon the deceaſe of the earl of Flanders, ſlain at the battle of Creſſy, they ſent deputies to Philip de Valois, to demand the ſon of their late ſovereign, under the pretence of putting him in poſſeſſion of his father's inheritance; but they no ſooner had the young prince in their power, than they contracted him to one of Edward's daughters; which would, doubtleſs, 1352. have been extremely prejudicial to Philip, if the earl himſelf, who was educated in France, diſdaining the thoughts of marrying into the family of his ſovereign's enemy, had not privately withdrawn from his ſubjects, and caſt himſelf again into his arms. From this very time, the Flemings began, by degrees, to be diſengaged from England; and they even approved of the marriage concluded by Philip, between their earl and the duke of Brabant's daughter, who had entirely deſerted Edward; but their inconſtancy occaſioned the ſtaple of the Engliſh wooll ††, ſet up in Flanders, to be removed into England, to their great damage, 1353. tho' to the benefit of the Engliſh.

1354. A propoſal of peace between the two crowns.

The king of France ſeemed to be impatiently deſirous, that the truce might be changed into a ſolid and laſting peace, to which Edward was not averſe; for he offered to reſign to the king of England Guienne, with the earldoms of Artois and Guiſnes, to hold them, in full ſovereignty, without homage to the crown of France; but, quickly after, to his own prejudice, as well as that of his kingdom, he abruptly broke off the negotiation, the reſult of which was only prolonging the truce, till April, in the following year.

It was obvious, that John's ſole view was to gain time, in order to make preparations, to carry on the war; and Edward, who plainly perceived it, ſtood in need of ſome reſpite, to ſettle ſome important domeſtick affairs. The obſtinacy of the Scots, in ſupport of their king, though a priſoner, fully convinced him, that it would be difficult to reduce Scotland, whilſt he was at war with France; wherefore, he was willing to patch up a peace with the Scots, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity, to renew the war; but this peace could not be made, without the releaſe of their king. Edward appointed commiſſioners ‡ to treat with the Scots, about king David's liberty; and this negotiation, which was prolonged, for ſome time, ended, at length, in a treaty concluded, at Newcaſtle, the 13th of July, 1354, by which Edward promiſed to free David, for a ranſom of 90,000 marks of ſilver. This treaty was ratified, ſoon after, by the prince of Wales, his ſon, tho' it was not executed, for reaſons mentioned, hereafter; ſo that David remained a priſoner, till 1357.

Edward, upon the concluſion of the treaty with Scotland, applied himſelf chiefly to the

1354. affairs of France; and, the truce being about to expire, he inveſted the prince of Wales, his ſon, with the dutchy of Guienne; whom he ſent thither, with orders to renew the hoſtilities. Some affirm, that John inveſted the dauphin, Charles, his ſon, with that dutchy, and, thereby, occaſioned a rupture; but there is no notice taken of this circumſtance, either in the French hiſtories, or in the Collection of the Publick Acts; and, beſides, it is evident, that that the war was not renewed, till after the expiration of the truce. Whilſt the prince of Wales was preparing to renew the war, in Guienne, the king, his father, landing at Calais, ravaged Boulonnois and Artois, without any reſiſtance; upon the news of which, the king of France ſpeedily aſſembled his forces, and, at the ſame time, ſent Edward a defiance, offering to fight him alone, or at the head of their armies; at leaſt, this is related by the French hiſtorians, who add, that Edward declined it, and, knowing that John was approaching to give him battle, retired into England. The Engliſh, on the contrary, maintain, that the defiance was ſent by Edward, and refuſed by John; but it is a wonder, that the Collection of the Publick Acts is ſilent, about this expedition of Edward, though, whenever the kings of England went, beyond ſea, a memorandum of the day, both of their departure and return, is ſcarce ever omitted; yet, ſince the hiſtorians of both nations mention Edward's going to Calais, a bare negative proof ought not, in reaſon, to invalidate their teſtimony. However, if Edward returned ſo haſtily, it is certain, that he was recalled by weighty motives; for the Scots, having taken Berwick, by ſurpriſe, it was very dangerous to leave in their poſſeſſion ſuch an important place, which gave them, at all times, an inlet into England.

The Scots ſurprize Berwick. Walſing.

Avesbury. Immediately after his arrival, he called a parliament, complaining of the treachery of the Scots, who, after a treaty concluded and ratified, abuſed his good faith, at the inſtigation of the king of France; and that aſſembly, convinced of the neceſſity of recovering Berwick, and the king's want of money, to continue the war with France, granted him 50 ſhillings, upon every ſack of wooll, ſold in the kingdom. It is ſaid, that this ſubſidy amounted to more than 350,000 marks, a year, ſo conſiderable was the woollen trade, in thoſe days; and, with this aid, the king ſpeedily raiſed an army, at the head of which he advanced to the borders of Scotland; but, upon his approach, the Scots quitted Berwick, having firſt demoliſhed the fortifications, which he revenged, by ravaging their country. This unexpected rupture ſurpriſed him the more, as he had juſt entered into a treaty with them, for releaſing their king, and only ſtaid, for the payment of the ranſom agreed upon; yet their proceeding cauſed him to take a new reſolution, with reſpect to the affairs of Scotland.

Edward retakes Berwick.

1355. The condition of Baliol. Baliol, notwithſtanding his expulſion, ſtill retained the title of king, but without any real power, and in ſo ſervile a dependence on the king of England, that he was conſidered only, as a ſubject; for, though Edward left him the command of his troops, they were ſo very few, that he was never in a condition to make any progreſs; ſo that he ſpent his days, in a melancholy manner, with a penſion of five marks, a day, allowed him by Edward, and ſome preſents, for his extraordinary expences. There are manifeſt proofs of his great dependence, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, particularly, in the frequent pardons, for hunting in Edward's foreſts; which ſhews, that he was no more than the ſhadow of a king, whom Edward employed, hitherto, as a mere tool, to compaſs his ends. Accordingly, Edward, now, laying aſide his former ſcruples, or rather pulling off the maſque, under which he had concealed his intentions, obliged that prince to reſign all his right to Scotland, for the annual penſion of 2000 l. ſterling; a poor recompence for a crown, had it not been an imaginary one, which Baliol was very willing to part with; but this reſignation proved fatal to king David, who, upon it, was more cloſely confined, and alſo deprived of the hopes he had conceived of recovering his liberty. 1355. Charles de Blois, a priſoner in England, ſince the battle of la Roche de Rien, was more fortunate than the king of Scotland, at leaſt, with reſpect to his liberty, though it was purchaſed at a vaſt expence; for he promiſed to pay Edward 700,000 crowns, for his ranſom, and left his two ſons, in hoſtage, for ſecurity of the payment.

1356. The prince of Wales ravages Languedoc. Walſing.

In the mean while, the prince of Wales rifled the ſouthern provinces of France, and eſpecially Languedoc; where he made a ſudden irruption, that rendered him maſter of Carcaſſone and Narbonne; and, meeting with a very great booty, he then returned to Bourdeaux. As the meaſures, to oppoſe his invaſion, were neglected, by reaſon of his retreat, he thought he might ſafely venture upon a ſecond; and no ſooner were his troops a little refreſhed, than he marched again, at the head of 12000 men, of whom not above 3000 were natives of England. He traverſed le Perigord and le Limouſin, entered Berry, and even appeared before Bourges; but the news of the king of France's approach, with 60,000 men, hindered his laying ſiege to that place, and forced him to take a compaſs, in order to retire to Bourdeaux; though John, foreſeeing his deſign, marched, with ſuch expedition, that he overtook him, near Poictiers. As it was impoſſible for the prince to retreat, he reſolved to intrench himſelf, at Maupertuis, in a poſt incumbered with vines and hedges, and of a very difficult acceſs; and two legates, ſent by the pope to the two monarchs, to perſuade them to peace, exerted their utmoſt endeavours, to prevent an engagement. They even prevailed on the prince of Wales to engage to repair all the damages done, in his incurſion, and not to bear arms againſt France, for ſeven years; but John's ſuperiority induced him to reject theſe offers, who expected the prince, with his whole army, ſhould ſurrender, at diſcretion; but the latter generouſly replied, that he would rather die, ſword in hand, than be guilty of an action

1356. so inconsistent with his own honour, and the glory of the English name.

The battle of Poictiers. Froissart. Walsing.

The prince of Wales, finding that there was not the least prospect of an agreement, in a short speech to his troops, represented to them, "That victory did not depend on numbers, "but on valour; and that, for his own part, "he was resolved to conquer, or die, nor would "he expose his country to the disgrace of pay- "ing his ransom.". King John's generals unanimously advised him to starve this little army, cooped up in the middle of an enemy's country, where they would soon be reduced to the last extremity, for want of provisions; but he disapproved this advice, expecting a more transcendent glory, by the defeat of such a renowned prince, than to conquer, without fighting; and, therefore, flushed with the pleasing expectation of obtaining an easy victory, and revenging his subjects, he determined, without delay, to attack the enemy. He committed, at first, an egregious error, in causing his horse to dismount, and begin the fight; for, being unaccustomed to charge, on foot, they were unable to break through the English, who had the advantage of the ground, in a country full of hedges, through which there was a necessity of passing, in order to force the intrenchments. The dismounted cavalry being repulsed, with great loss, the infantry supplied their place, and met the same opposition; and, in spite of the king's efforts, who maintained the fight, four hours, animating his troops, by his voice and example, and exposing his person to the greatest dangers, after all, it was impossible for him to rout this handful of English, whom the necessity of conquering caused to fight desperately; being also invigorated by the example of the prince, who performed, that day, acts of wisdom and bravery, comparable to those of the most famous generals. Of four sons the king of France had with him, the three eldest retiring, betimes, with 800 lances, their retreat did exceedingly contribute to discourage the rest of the army; yet, in the interim, John, pushed on by despair, signalized himself, in all the most dangerous places, and drew upon him the bravest of his enemies. Though he found himself abandoned, he struck terror even into the boldest; but, in all probability, he would have sunk under the multitude of the enemies that surrounded him, if Denis de Morbeck, a knight of Artois, dispersing those who pressed him, the most vigorously, had not, at last, persuaded him to yield himself prisoner. He would have been extremely well pleased to deliver his sword to the prince of Wales; but, the prince being too remote, he was constrained to surrender himself to Morbeck, with Philip, his fourth son, about 13 years old, who had, all along, fought by his side. Though this unfortunate battle was so fatal to France, there were not above 6000 men slain; but, among that number, were 800 nobles, the duke of Bourbon, a prince of the blood, the duke of Athenes, constable of France, the marshal de Nesle, and above 50 other great lords of the kingdom.

John is taken prisoner. Act. Pub.

If the victorious prince distinguished himself, 1356. by his conduct and valour, on this glorious day, he was no less admired, after his victory, for his modest and generous behaviour to his prisoner. The evening after the battle, the king, supping, in the prince of Wales's tent, pressed him to sit at table with him; but he, very courteously declining it, stood and talked with him, all the while; and, as the king was complaining of his fate, the prince told him, in a free, though modest and unaffected manner, "That he had one great reason to be com- P. Æmyl. "forted, that the battle was not lost, by his "fault; that the English had found, to their "cost, that he was the bravest of princes; but "that God alone had disposed of the victory; "and, as he farther added, if your misfortune "has thrown you into your present disgrace, "you may, at least, rest assured, that an in- "violable regard shall be preserved for your "person; and you shall find in me a very re- "spectful relation, if I may be allowed to glo- "ry in that title." Such a surprising modesty, in a young victorious prince, little more than 25 years of age, melted the king into tears, and filled the hearers with admiration; but he no sooner recovered himself, than, turning to the prince, he said, with an air of satisfaction, "That, since it was his destiny to be van- "quished and taken, it afforded him great "consolation, under his misfortune, that he "had not behaved himself unworthily; and "that he was fallen into the hands of a prince "endowed with so much valour and generosi- "ty. On the morrow, solemn thanks were returned to God, in the English camp, for this signal victory; and the prince thanked his victorious troops, with such expressions, as ascribed to them the honour of the day, without the least mention of himself; after which, he marched for Bourdeaux, laden with an inestimable booty, and so many prisoners, that it would have been difficult for the English to defend themselves, provided they had been attacked.

The moderation and modesty of the prince of Wales. Froissart.

It is easy to imagine, how great joy this 1357. news spread over England; and how joyful it Froissart. was to Edward, in particular. God's protection of the prince of Wales was so visible, that he ordered publick thanksgivings, for this remarkable victory, to be returned to the Almighty, in all the churches of the kingdom; but the prince passed the winter, Truce for two years. at Bourdeaux, where two legates, that were Act. Pub. sent by the pope, pressed him so urgently, that he consented, with the approbation of the king, his father, to a truce, for two years, wherein all the allies of both crowns were included. In April following, he returned to England, bringing his prisoner along with him; and he was received, with the utmost demonstrations of joy; but he constantly refused all the honours that were offered him, being contented with those paid to the captive king. When they made their entry into London, the prince of Wales rode on a little black nag, by the king of France's side, who was mounted on a stately white courser, adorned 1357. with coſtly trappings; and one would have thought, that all the pomp * diſplayed, on this occaſion, was ſolely intended to do honour to the captive monarch; for, though Edward diſputed with him the title of king of France, he treated him, like a king; and, the ſight of the captive prince, reminding him of the inſtability of human grandeur, he received him with as cordial embraces, as if he had been his own brother, or was come, on purpoſe, to make him a viſit. In this noble and generous manner, the father and ſon ſtrove, with emulation, to comfort the unhappy king, by all the marks of reſpect, due to a great prince, in whatever condition fortune might have placed him; and it is reported, that, when Edward was firſt informed of the victory of Poictiers, he ſaid to his attendants, that his ſatisfaction, at ſuch a glorious ſucceſs, bore no proportion to the pleaſure cauſed by the generous behaviour of the prince. King John and prince Philip, his ſon, were lodged together, in the palace of the Savoy, with all the honourable freedom they could deſire; and the other captive lords met with the ſame obliging treatment.

The king of Scotland is releaſed. Act. Pub.

Edward's preſent glory was ſo much the greater, as it was very uncommon, ſince he had his two moſt potent enemies in his power; the king of France being confined, at London, and the king of Scotland, at Odiam, in Hampſhire. King David ſhould have, long ago, been releaſed, purſuant to the articles agreed upon, three years before; but, for the reaſons abovementioned, he ſtill was detained in captivity; yet, when he could leaſt have expected any favour from a victorious enemy, who had juſt reduced Scotland to an irretrievable ſtate, Edward, moved by the preſſing inſtances of the queen, his ſiſter, conſented to renew the treaty of 1354. Accordingly, he granted ſafe-conducts to ambaſſadors from Scotland, who, during a ſhort truce, obtained their king's liberty, upon much the ſame terms as in the former treaty; engaging to pay, for his ranſom, 100,000 marks, ſterling; namely, 10,000 every year, till the whole was paid; and, for ſecurity, David gave 20 hoſtages; and, at the ſame time, a 10 years truce was concluded, between England and Scotland. David was releaſed, upon theſe conditions, which he took care to ratify, as ſoon as he came into his kingdom, after an 11 years captivity; and, in all appearance, Edward, being then wholly employed, about his vaſt projects, againſt France, had loſt all thoughts of becoming maſter of Scotland; at leaſt, he judged it adviſable to defer the execution of that deſign to a more convenient ſeaſon.

1358. A magnificent tournament at Windſor.

Edward's late truces, with France and Scotland, having freed him from the trouble of foreign affairs, he applied his mind to the government of his kingdom; but, as nothing extraordinary happened, he ſpent part of his time, in diverſions, to which the king of France and the other chief priſoners were always invited. The tournament he held, at Windſor, on the 23d of April, 1358, to ſolemnize the feaſt of St. George, patron of the order of the garter, was the moſt ſumptuous and magnificent, that had ever been ſeen, in England; at which the duke of Brabant, with ſeveral other ſovereign princes, and an infinite number of knights of all nations, were preſent and ſplendidly entertained. 1358.

Queen Iſabella's death. Act. Pub.

This diverſion was followed by the funeral of queen Iſabella, the king's mother; who died, at the caſtle of Riſings, aged 63 years, after a 28 years confinement; and, if her marriage was fatal to the king, her husband, it was no leſs ſo to France, ſince it occaſioned a long and bloody war, which brought that kingdom to the very brink of deſtruction.

Geoffrey d' Harcourt, whom I formerly mentioned, on occaſion of the king's deſcent, at la Hogue, and who ſerved the king of Navarre, in Normandy, was there ſlain, about this time; and, as he had, by will, made the king of England his ſole heir, his lands being in the demeſnes of the king of Navarre, in Normandy, Edward took poſſeſſion, and gave them to the lord Holland.

Great troubles in France. Froiſſart.

Whilſt England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, France was in extreme deſolation, on account of the inteſtine troubles cauſed by the king's impriſonment; for, tho' Charles, the dauphin, John's eldeſt ſon, held the reins of the government, by the title of lieutenant-general, afterwards changed into that of regent, his regency was ſo diſturbed by the cabals of ſome factious men, who found their advantage, in the confuſion of affairs, that it was impoſſible to take effectual meaſures, to procure the king's liberty. The affairs of France were, then, in a deplorable ſituation; and Charles the Bald, king of Navarre, though ſprung from the family royal of France, raiſed daily commotions and tumults, in Paris, where he had a powerful party; by which means, the dauphin's power was ſo reſtrained, that, though a prince of great abilities, he knew not how to govern ſuch a divided ſtate. In the interim, the French lived in a ſort of anarchy; and the nobility and officers of the army oppreſſed the people of an inferior rank, eſpecially the peaſants, to whom they gave the nickname of Jaques Bonn homme; but, raillery and oppreſſion driving theſe miſerable wretches to deſpair, they aſſembled, in great troops, in le Beauvoiſin, reſolved to extirpate all the nobles. In a ſhort time, their number being conſiderably augmented, they became ſo formidable, that there was a neceſſity of drawing together all the forces of the kingdom, to diſperſe this army of ruſticks; which war, called the Jaquery, created the regent great trouble; and it was one of the principal cauſes, that pre-

A treaty, between the two kings, is rejected by the ſtates of France. Act. Pub.

During all theſe diſorders, king John, heartily tired of his confinement, in England, however eaſy, treated himſelf with Edward, about his liberty, tho' he could not obtain it, without yielding to the conqueror's terms; but, believing that he could not purchaſe, at too dear a rate, a freedom which might put it in his power to reſtore peace to his kingdom, he conſented to a treaty very diſadvantageous to France, by which he reſigned ſeveral provinces to the king of England. The general aſſembly of the ſtates meeting, on this occaſion, in 1359, found the conditions ſo hard, that they refuſed to ratify the treaty; which defeated all the hopes of the captive king; yet, plainly perceiving, that they had given a pretence to renew the war, they offered the regent all neceſſary aſſiſtance, to procure better terms, by arms, tho' they promiſed more than they 1359. performed. Edward loudly complained of being deceived; and, ſuddenly altering his carriage to king John, he confined him in the caſtle of Sommerton, and afterwards removed him to the tower of London; for, doubtleſs, he did not think it prudent to leave that prince, at London, upon his parole, as before, whilſt he himſelf ſhould be in the heart of France, where he reſolved to carry the war.

1360. He goes to Calais with a great army. Walſing.

The preparations, for this freſh expedition, were prodigious; and an army of 100,000 men, tranſported to Calais, was an evident indication of his deſign, to make a powerful effort to ſubdue France, during the troubles of that kingdom. When his forces were landed, at Calais, he divided them into three bodies; the firſt of which was commanded by the duke of Lancaſter, who had lately given his only daughter in marriage to John of Gaunt, the king's fourth ſon; the prince of Wales headed the ſecond, and the king himſelf commanded the laſt. With theſe numerous troops, conducted by the three moſt renowned generals, then in Europe, Edward marched into France, without any reſiſtance; for the dauphin, not being in a condition to appear in the field, was contented with providing his principal towns, with ammunition, unwilling to hazard a battle, with forces ſo unequal to thoſe of the enemy.

He ravages France to the very gates of Paris. Froiſſart.

In the interim, Edward traverſing Artois, entered Champagne, and approached Rheims, with an intent to ſurprize the city, where ſome, tho' without any grounds, affirm, he deſigned to be crowned; but that, being diſappointed, he fell upon Sens, which he eaſily ſubdued. The duke of Burgundy, finding that he could not ſave his country from plunder, obtained a ſeparate truce, for three years, upon the promiſe of paying 200,000 florins, and ſupplying the Engliſh army with proviſions; and le Nivernois followed the example of Burgundy; but la Brie and le Gatinois were ravaged. As Edward's aim was to draw the French to a battle, he did all that was poſſible, to provoke them; and he even went, about the end of lent, and encamped, within ſeven leagues of Paris, between Chartres and Mont le Herry; but, his approach not anſwering his expectation, he advanced to the very gates of the city; but, though the ſmoke of the villages, ſet on fire by the Engliſh, might be ſeen, from the walls, the dauphin, who was afterwards ſirnamed the Wiſe, being inſtructed by the fatal examples of the kings, his father and grandfather, took care not to venture the crown, upon the deciſion of a battle, where he had ſo little reaſon to expect ſucceſs. As he knew, that Paris was able to maintain a long ſiege, he kept himſelf ſhut up in the city; and all Edward's inſults could not induce him to alter his reſolution. However, he tried to free France from the impending danger, by making certain propoſals to his enemy; but they were ſcornfully rejected by Edward, who thought himſelf in condition to a give law, and preſcribe what terms he pleaſed. He ſeemed, at firſt, to have formed the deſign of beſieging Paris; but, afterwards perceiving it to be too difficult an undertaking, he marched back towards la Beauce. Cardinal de Langres, the pope's legate, attended him, in all places, and continually preſſed him to bound his ambition; but theſe remonſtrances were, then, to no purpoſe. Edward ſtaid, ſome time, in la Beauce, from whence he intended to lead his troops to the Loire; yet, in the interim, though his army ſtill paſſed through very plentiful countries, it was daily diminiſhed, by ſickneſs. It was, doubtleſs, a very great mortification to that monarch, to find, that, though he was in the heart of France, with ſuch a numerous army, he could not flatter himſelf with any one certain conqueſt; and this, perhaps, was one reaſon of his liſtening, at laſt, to the legate's ſollicitations, though his change is aſcribed to another cauſe. Froiſſart. One day, as he lay encamped, in the country about Chartres, a ſudden and dreadful ſtorm aroſe, accompanied with thunder and hail, of a prodigious ſize, which killed 6000 horſes and a 1000 men; which extraordinary accident was conſidered by the troops, as a ſign of God's wrath; and the king himſelf appeared to be poſſeſſed with the ſame opinion. Poſſibly, he was very glad, that this event furniſhed him with an opportunity, to ſhew his willingneſs to grant a peace to France, from a pure motive of generoſity, and, thereby, hide the ſhame of not being able, with ſo fine an army, to do any thing more than deſtroy the open country; but, however that be, in the midſt of the ſtorm, he turned his face towards the church of Chartres, which he diſcerned, at a diſtance, and, falling on his knees, made a vow to conſent to a peace, upon equitable terms. The legate, improving this diſpoſition, urgently preſſed him to execute his generous deſign, and prevailed on him to ſend plenipotentiaries to Bretigny, a village near Chartres, to treat of a peace, where the dauphin and his chief counſellors came, in the behalf of France; and, for England, the prince of Wales, with ſuch aſſiſtants as the king, his father, appointed. In a few days, a treaty was concluded, that gave ſome intermiſſion to the calamities of France; which, as it annulled all former treaties, and ſerved for a foundation

THE TREATY of BRETIGNY.

Edward, eldeſt ſon to the king of France and England, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter; to all thoſe who ſhall ſee theſe letters, greeting: We make you know, that, after all the debates and diſorders whatſoever, between our lord and father, king of France and England, on the one part; and our couſins the king, his eldeſt ſon, regent of France, and all thoſe it may concern, on the other part, for the good of peace, it is agreed, the eighth day of May, 1360, at Bretigny near Chartres, in the manner following:

'I. THAT the king of England, with his poſſeſſions, in Gaſcoigne and Guienne, 'ſhall, have, for him and his heirs for ever, 'all thoſe things which follow, to hold them, 'in the ſame manner the king of France, or 'his ſon, or any of his anceſtors, kings of France, 'held them: viz. thoſe in ſovereignty in ſove'reignty *, and thoſe in demain in demain, 'according to the time and manner, hereafter, 'declared, The city, caſtle, and earldom of 'Poictiers, with the whole land and country of 'Poictou; together with the fief of Thouars, 'and land of Belleville; the city and caſtle of 'Xaintes, and the whole land of Xaintonge, 'on this ſide, and beyond the river of Charente; 'the city and caſtle of Agen, and the land and 'country of Agenois; the city, caſtle, and 'whole earldom of Perigort, and the land and 'country of Perigeux; the city, caſtle, and 'whole earldom of Limoges, the land and 'country of Limoſin; the city and caſtle of 'Cahors, and the land and country of Cahor'ſin; the city, caſtle, and country of Tarbe, 'and the land, country, and earldom of Bigorre; 'the earldom, land, and country of Gaure; the 'city and caſtle of Angouleſme, and the earl'dom, land, and country of Angouleſmois; the 'city and caſtle of Rhodes; the land and coun'try of Rovergne: And, if there be any lords, 'as the earls of Foix, Armagnoc, Liſle, Peri'gort, and the viſcount of Limoges, or others, 'which hold any lands, within the bounds of 'theſe places, they ſhall do homage to the 'king of England, and all other ſervices and 'devoirs due, by reaſon of their lands, in the 'ſame manner they did, in time paſt.

'II. The king of England ſhall have all that 'any of the kings of England antiently held, in 'the town of Monſtrel upon the ſea, with their 'appurtenances.

'III. The king of England ſhall have all the 'county or earldom of Ponthieu entirely; ſave 'and except, that, if any things of the ſaid 'county or appurtenances have been alienated 'by the kings of England, for the time being, 'and to other perſons than the kings of France, 'the king of France ſhall not be obliged to re'ſtore them to the king of England; and, if the 'ſaid alienations have been made to the kings 'of France, for the time being, without mean, 'and he doth poſſeſs them, at preſent, they 'are entirely to be releaſed to the king of Eng'land; except the kings of France had them, 'by exchange for other lands of the kings of 'England, than both were to releaſe.: But, if 'the kings of England, for the time being, 'had alienated any thing to other perſons than 'to the king of France, and afterwards they 'came into his hands, he ſhall not be obliged 'to reſtore them. Alſo, if the things above'ſaid owe homage, the king of France ſhall 'conveigh them to others, who ſhall do it, for 'the king of England; and, if they do not owe 'homage, the king of France ſhall appoint a 'truſtee, or tenant, to perform the devoir, 'within one year after he ſhall depart from 'Calais.

'IV. The king of England ſhall have the 'caſtle and town of Calais; the caſtle, town, 'and ſeigneury of Merk; the towns, caſtles, 'and lordſhips of Sangate, Colongue, Hames, 'Wale, and Oye, with lands, woods, marſhes, 'rivers, rents, lordſhips, or ſeigneuries, ad'vowſons of churches, and all other appurte'nances lying between the meeſes and bounds 'following: namely, from Calais by the courſe 'of the river that goes before Graveling, and 'alſo by the courſe of the ſame river round a'bout Langle, and by the river which goes 'beyond the Poil, and by the ſame river that 'falls into the great lake of Guiſnes, and ſo to 'Fretun, and from thence by the valley about 'the hill Calculy, incloſing that hill, and ſo to 'the ſea, with Sangate and all the appurte'nances.

'V. The king of England ſhall have the 'caſtle, town, and county, or earldom of Guiſnes, 'with all the lands, towns, caſtles, fortreſſes, 'places, men, homages, lordſhips, woods, fo'reſts, and the rights of them, as entirely as 'the earl of Guiſnes, lately deceaſed, had them, 'at the time of his death; and the churches 'and good people, within the limits of the 'county of Guiſnes, of Calais, and Merk, and 'other places aboveſaid, ſhall obey the king of 'England, as they obeyed the king of France, 'or earl of Guiſnes, for the time being; all 'which things of Merk and Calais, contained 'in this and the preceding article, the king of 'England ſhall hold, in demain, except the he'ritages of the churches, which ſhall remain to 'them entirely, wherever they be; and alſo ex'cept the heritages of other people, of the coun'ry of Merk and Calais, lying out of the town of 'Calais, to the value of 100 livres of yearly rent, 'or under, of current money of the country, 'which ſhall remain to them: But the heri'tages and habitations, in the town of Calais, 'with their appurtenances, ſhall be to the king

‘ VI. The king of England and his heirs ſhall ‘ have and hold all the iſles adjacent to the lands, ‘ countries, and places above-mentioned; toge- ‘ ther with all other iſles, which he now holds.

‘ VII. The king of France, and his eldeſt ‘ ſon, the regent, for them, their heirs and ‘ ſucceſſors, as ſoon as they can, without de- ‘ ceit, and at fartheſt, by the feaſt of St. Mi- ‘ chael, in one year, after the ſame feaſt next ‘ coming, ſhall render, transfer, and deliver to ‘ the king of England, his heirs and ſucceſſors, ‘ all honours, obediences, homages, liegeances, ‘ vaſſals, fees, ſervices, recogniſances, rights, ‘ mere, and mixt empire, and all manner of ‘ juriſdiction, high and low, reſorts, ſafeguards, ‘ collations and patronages of churches, and all ‘ manner of ſeigneuries and ſovereignties, and ‘ all the right they have, or can appertain to ‘ them, by what cauſe, title, or colour of right ‘ ſoever, or to the kings and crown of France, ‘ by reaſon of the cities, counties, towns, ‘ caſtles, lands, countries, iſles, and places be- ‘ fore-named, and all their appurtenances and ‘ dependences, and every one of them, where- ‘ ever they are, without retaining any ‘ thing to them, or their heirs and ſucceſ- ‘ ſors, or to the kings or crown of France. ‘ And alſo, that the king and his eldeſt ſon ‘ ſhould ſend their letters patent to all the arch- ‘ biſhops, and all other prelates of holy church; ‘ and to the earls, viſcounts, barons, noblemen, ‘ citizens, and others of the cities, lands, coun- ‘ tries, iſles and places above-mentioned, that ‘ they ſhould obey the king of England and his ‘ heirs, and their certain command, in the ‘ ſame manner they had obeyed the kings and ‘ and crown of France; and by the ſame let- ‘ ters they ſhould quit and abſolve them after ‘ the beſt manner they could; from all faiths, ‘ homages, oaths, obligations, ſubjections and ‘ promiſes made by any of them, to the kings ‘ and crown of France, in what manner ſoever *.

‘ VIII. Alſo, it is agreed, that the king of ‘ England ſhall have the cities, counties, caſtles, ‘ lands, countries, iſles, and places before- ‘ named, with all their appurtenances and de- ‘ pendences, wherever they are; to hold to ‘ him, his heirs and ſucceſſors, heritably and ‘ perpetually in demain, as the kings of France ‘ held them, and in the ſame manner, ſaving ‘ what hath been ſaid, above, in the article of ‘ Calais and Merk; and alſo the cities, caſtles, ‘ counties, lands, countries, iſles, and places ‘ before-named, rights, mere and mixt empire, ‘ juriſdiction and profits whatever, which any ‘ kings of England held there, with their ap- ‘ purtenances and dependences; any aliena- ‘ tions, donations, obligations, or incumbran- ‘ ces, had, or done by any of the kings of ‘ France, in 70 years from that time, by what- ‘ ſoever cauſe or form; all ſuch alienations, do- ‘ nations, obligations, or incumbrances, are ‘ now, and ſhall be wholly annulled, repealed, ‘ and made void: And all things, ſo given, ‘ alienated, or incumbered, ſhall be really ren- ‘ dered and delivered to the king of England ‘ entirely, and in the ſame condition they were ‘ 70 years ſince, or to his ſpecial deputies, as ‘ ſoon as they may, without fraud; and at ‘ fartheſt, before Michaelmas next come twelve- ‘ months, to hold them heritably and perpe- ‘ tually, and to his heirs and ſucceſſors; ex- ‘ cept what is ſaid in the article of Ponthieu, ‘ which is to remain in force; and ſaving all ‘ things given and alienated to churches, which ‘ ſhall peaceably remain to them, in all coun- ‘ tries before and after-named, provided the ‘ parſons of the churches pray diligently for the ‘ kings, as for their founders, with which their ‘ conſciences ſhall be charged.

‘ IX. That the king of England ſhall have ‘ and hold all the cities, counties, caſtles, and ‘ countries above-named, which antiently the ‘ the kings of England had not, in the ſame ‘ eſtate as the king of France and his ſons hold ‘ them, at preſent.

‘ X. That if, within the limits of the coun- ‘ tries the kings of England antiently poſſeſſed, ‘ they ſhould now have any thing that was not ‘ then theirs, of which the king of France was ‘ in poſſeſſion, on the 19th of September, 1356, ‘ they ſhall be and remain to the king of Eng- ‘ land, and his heirs, as aboveſaid.

‘ XI. That the king of France and his eldeſt ‘ ſon, the regent, for them and their heirs, ‘ and for the kings of France and their ſuc- ‘ ceſſors, for ever, as ſoon as they can, without ‘ deceit, and at fartheſt before Michaelmas, ‘ 1361, ſhall render and deliver to the king of ‘ England, his heirs and ſucceſſors, and tranſ- ‘ fer to them all the honours, liegeances, obe- ‘ diences, homages, vaſſals, fees, ſervices, re- ‘ cogniſances, oaths, right, mere and mixt em- ‘ pire, all manner of juriſdictions, high and ‘ low, reſorts, ſafeguards, and ſeigneuries, which ‘ can or may belong, in any manner, to the ‘ kings, or crown of France, or to any other ‘ perſon, on account of the king, or crown of ‘ France, at any time, in the cities, counties, ‘ caſtles, lands, countries, iſles, and places a- ‘ bove-named, or in any of them, their appur- ‘ tenances and appendences whatſoever, or in ‘ perſons, vaſſals, ſubjects, or whoſoever of them, ‘ whether they be princes, dukes, earls, viſ- ‘ counts, archbiſhops, biſhops, barons, noble- ‘ men, or others, without reſerving or retain- ‘ ing any thing to them, their heirs, and ſuc- ‘ ceſſors, or to the crown of France, or others, ‘ whatever it be, whereby they, their heirs, and ‘ ſucceſſors, or any kings of France, or other per- ‘ ſon, under pretence of the king and crown of ‘ France, may challenge, and demand any ‘ thing, hereafter, from the king of England, ‘ his heirs and ſucceſſors, or upon any of the ‘ vaſſals and ſubjects aforeſaid, on account of

‘ fore-named perſons, their heirs and ſucceſſors,
‘ ſhall, for ever, be the liegemen and ſubjects
‘ of the king of England, his heirs and ſucceſ-‘ ſors; and that he and they ſhall hold all the ‘ perſons, cities, counties, lands, countries, iſles, ‘ caſtles, and places aforenamed, and all their ‘ appurtenances and appendences, and they ‘ ſhall be and remain to them fully, perpetu-
‘ ally, and freely, in their ſeigneury, ſovereign-
‘ ty, obedience, liegeance, and ſubjection, as the ‘ kings of France had, and held them, in any ‘ time paſt; and that the ſaid king of England,
‘ his heirs and ſucceſſors, ſhall have and hold ‘ perpetually all the countries before-named,
‘ with their appurtenances and appendences,
‘ and other things before-named, with all per‘ petual franchiſes and liberties, as ſovereign
‘ and liege-lord, and as neighbour to the king
‘ and realm of France, without acknowledging
‘ any ſovereign, or performing any obedience,
‘ homage, reſort, ſubjection, and without do-
‘ ing, henceforward, any ſervice, or making
‘ recogniſance to the king, or crown of France,
‘ for the cities, counties, caſtles, lands, coun-
‘ tries, iſles, places, and perſons before-named,
‘ or for any of them *.

‘ That the king of France and his eldeſt ſon,
‘ the regent, for them and their heirs, and for
‘ the kings of France and their ſucceſſors, for ‘ ever, as ſoon as they can, without fraud, and
‘ at fartheſt before Michaelmas, 1361, ſhall
‘ render and deliver to the king of England,
‘ his heirs and ſucceſſors, and transfer to them
‘ all the honours, liegeances, obediences, ho-
‘ mages, vaſſals, fees, ſervices, recogniſances,
‘ oaths, right, mere and mixt empire, all man-
‘ ner of juriſdiction, high and low, ſafeguards
‘ and ſeigneuries, which can or may belong in ‘ any manner to the kings or crown of France, ‘ (ou a aucun autre perſon a cauſe du roy & de ‘ la coronne de France) at any time, in the ci‘ ties, counties, caſtles, lands, countries, iſles,
‘ and places above-named, or in any of them,
‘ their appurtenances and appendences, what‘ ſoever, or in perſons, vaſſals, ſubjects, or who-
‘ ſoever of them.

‘ XII. That the king of France and his eldeſt
‘ ſon ſhall renounce expreſly all reſorts and ſo-
‘ vereignties, and all the right they have, or can ‘ have, in all thoſe things, which by this treaty ‘ ought to belong to the king of England: And
‘ in like manner, he and his eldeſt ſon ſhall re‘ nounce expreſly all thoſe things, which by this ‘ treaty ought not to belong or be delivered to ‘ him, and all demands he makes of the king
‘ of France, and eſpecially to the name, and to ‘ the right of the crown of France, and to the ‘ homages, ſovereignty, and demain of the ‘ dutchy of Normandy, the dutchy of Tourain,
‘ the counties of Anjou and Main, the ſove-
‘ reignty and homage of the dukedom of Bre-
‘ tagne, and the homages and ſovereignties of
‘ the country and county of Flanders, and all o‘ ther demands he can or ſhall make of the king
‘ of France, for what cauſe ſoever, except what
‘ by this treaty ought to remain, and be deli- 1360.
‘ vered to the king of England and his heirs;
‘ and one king ſhall part with, releaſe, and tranſ-
‘ fer to the other perpetually all the right which ‘ either of them hath, or can have, in all the ‘ things which by this treaty ought to remain,
‘ and be delivered to each of them; and of the ‘ time and place, where and when the ſaid re-
‘ nunciations ſhall be made, the two kings
‘ ſhall agree and appoint, when they meet at ‘ Calais †.

‘ XIII. That, to the end this treaty may
‘ ſpeedily be accompliſhed, the king of Eng-
‘ land ſhall bring the king of France to Calais,
‘ within three weeks after Midſummer, there
‘ being no juſt hindrance, at his own expence.

‘ XIV. That the king of France ſhall pay to ‘ the king of England three millions of crowns
‘ of gold, of which two ſhall be of the value of ‘ a noble of Engliſh money; 600,000 crowns
‘ whereof ſhall be paid to him, or his deputies,
‘ within four months after the king of France
‘ ſhall arrive at Calais, and within a year fol‘ lowing 400,000 crowns to be paid at Lon‘ don, and ſo every year 400,000 crowns to be ‘ paid there, until the whole be diſcharged.

‘ XV. That, for the payment of the 600,000
‘ crowns at Calais, and for the delivery of the ‘ hoſtages hereafter named, within four months
‘ after the king of France ſhall be come to Ca-
‘ lais, the town, caſtle, and fortreſſes of Ro‘ chelle, the caſtles, fortreſſes, and towns of the ‘ county of Guiſnes, ſhall be rendered to the ‘ king of England, with all their appurtenan‘ ces and appendences; and the perſon of the ‘ king of France ſhall be delivered out of pri-
‘ ſon, who is not to arm himſelf or his ſubjects
‘ againſt the king of England, but is to perform
‘ the conditions of this treaty; and the hoſta-‘ ges were the great priſoners taken, at the ‘ battle of Poictiers, and theſe following:

‘ Lewis, earl of Anjou, John, earl of Poic-
‘ tiers, the king's ſons, the duke of Orleans, the ‘ king's brother, the duke of Bourbon, the earl ‘ of Blois, or his brother, the earl of St. Paul,
‘ the earl of Alenſon, or Peter of Alenſon, his ‘ brother, the earl of Aarcourt, the earl of ‘ Portien, the earl of Valentinois, the earl of ‘ Briene, the earl of Vaudemont, the earl of ‘ Foreſt, the viſcount Beaumont, the lord of ‘ Coucy, the lord of Fienne, the lord of Preaux,
‘ the lord of St. Venant, the lord of Garen-
‘ cieres, the dauphin of Huvergne, the lord of ‘ Hangeſt, the lord of Montmorency, William
‘ de Craon, Lewis of Harcourt, John de Lig-
‘ ny. The names of the priſoners taken, at ‘ Poictiers, were theſe:

‘ Philip of France, the earl of Eu, the earl
‘ of Longueville, the earl of Ponthieu, the earl ‘ of Joigny, the earl of Sancerre, the earl of ‘ Dammartin, the earl of Ventadour, the earl ‘ of Salbruche, the earl of Auxerre, the earl of ‘ Vendoſme, the earl of Craon, the lord of ‘ Darnalt, or Rual, the marſhal of Danchan,
‘ or d' Andeneham, the lord of Aubigny.

XVI. ‘ That the priſoners aforeſaid, which 1360. 'come to remain, in hoſtage, for the king of 'France, ſhall therefore be delivered out of 'priſon, without paying any ranſom, accord-'ing to the agreement, made before the third 'of May laſt paſt; and, if any of them be out 'of England, and not in hoſtage at Calais, 'within the firſt month after the ſaid three 'weeks, after Midſummer, without a juſt im-'pediment, he ſhall not be quit of his impri-'ſonment, but be forced by the king of France 'to return into England, and there remain pri-'ſoner, or pay the penalty by him promiſed 'and incurred, for not returning.

'XVII. That, inſtead of thoſe hoſtages, 'which ſhall not come to Calais, or ſhall die, 'or remove out of the power of the king of 'England, the king of France ſhall deliver o-'thers of the ſame quality, as ſoon as may be, 'within four months after the bailiff of Amiens 'and the major of St. Omer, upon the king of 'England's certificate, ſhall have notice there-'of; and the king of France, upon his depar-'ture from Calais, may have in his company '10 of the hoſtages, ſuch as the two kings 'ſhall agree upon, ſo as 30 may remain.

'XVIII. That the king of France, within 'three months after his departure from Calais, 'ſhall ſend thither, to remain in hoſtage, four 'perſons of the town of Paris, and two of e-'very town following, of St. Omer, Arras, A-'miens, Beauvais, Liſle, Doway, Tournay, 'Rheims, Chalons, Troyes, Chartres, Tho-'louſe, Lyon, Orleance, Campiegne, Rouen, 'Caen, Tours, Bourges; the moſt ſufficient of 'theſe towns, for the accompliſhment of this 'treaty.

'XIX. That the king of France ſhall be 'brought from England to Calais, and remain 'there, for four months, but ſhall pay nothing, 'the firſt month, for his guard and maintenance; 'but, for each of the other three months, he 'ſhall remain there, he ſhall pay 6000 royals, 'as they ſhall be then current in France, be-'fore his departure from Calais, and ſo after-'wards, for the time he continues there.

'XX. That, as ſoon as may be, within a 'year after the king of Franen is departed 'from Calais, John, earl of Montfort, ſhall have 'the earldom of Montfort, with all its appur-'tenances, doing liege-homage to the king of 'France, and his devoir and ſervice, in every 'caſe, as a good and loyal liege-vaſſal ought to 'do his liege-lord, on account of his earldom; 'and alſo his other heritages ſhall be rendered 'to him, that do not belong to the dutchy of 'Bretagne, doing homage and other dues be-'longing to them; and, if he will demand any 'thing, in any of the heritages belonging to 'that dutchy, out of the country of Bretagne, 'he ſhall receive good and ſpeedy reaſon from 'the court of France.

'XXI. Alſo, upon the queſtion of the de-'main of Bretagne, between John de Mont-'fort and Charles de Blois, it is agreed, that 'the two kings, calling before them, or their 'deputies, the principal parties, ſhall inform 'themſelves of their right, and ſhall endeavour 'to make them agree, about all that is in diſ-'pute between them, as ſoon as they can: 'And, if neither the kings, nor their deputies, 'can make an agreement, within a year after 'the king of France ſhall arrive at Calais, 'friends, on both ſides, may make the beſt 'agreement between them they can, and as 'ſoon as they can; and, if they cannot com-'promiſe the matter, within half a year, they 'ſhall make report thereof, and what they find 'concerning the rights of each party, and why 'the debate remains between them, to the two 'kings, or their deputies, and then they, as 'ſoon as may be, ſhall make an accord, giving 'their final ſentence, as to the right of each 'party, which ſhall be executed by the two 'kings; and, if they cannot end the contro-'verſy, in half a year, then the two principal 'parties of Blois and Montfort ſhall do what 'ſeems beſt to them, and the friends of both 'ſhall aſſiſt which party they pleaſe, without 'any hindrance of the ſaid kings, or without 'receiving any damage, blame, or reproach 'from them; and, if one of the parties will 'not appear before the kings, or their deputies, 'at the time appointed; and alſo, if the kings, 'or their deputies, ſhall declare an accord be-'tween the parties, and ſhall give their opi-'nion of the right of one party, and either of 'the parties will not conſent to, and obey the 'declaration, then the ſaid kings ſhall oppoſe 'him with their whole power, and in aid of 'the other which ſhall comply and obey; but 'the two kings ſhall not, in any caſe, in their 'proper perſons, or by others, make war upon 'one another for the cauſe aforeſaid, and the 'ſovereignty and homage of the dutchy ſhall 'always remain to the king of France.

'XXII. That all the lands, towns, coun-'tries, caſtles, and other places, delivered to 'the king, ſhall enjoy ſuch liberties and fran-'chiſes as they have, at preſent, which ſhall 'be confirmed by the ſaid kings, or their ſuc-'ceſſors, ſo often as they ſhall be duly re-'quired, if they be not contrary to this ac-'cord.

'XXIII. That the king of France ſhall ren-'der, or cauſe to be rendered, and confirm 'to Philip of Navarre, and to all his adhe-'rents, as ſoon as may be, without, de-'ceit, and at fartheſt within a year after 'the king of France ſhall depart from Calais, 'all the towns, fortreſſes, caſtles, lordſhips, 'rights, rents, profits, juriſdictions, and places 'whatever, which he, in his own right, or in 'right of his wife, or his adherents, held or 'ought to hold, in the kingdom of France: 'And that he ſhall not do them any damage or 'injury, or reproach them, for any thing 'done, before that time, and ſhall pardon 'them all offences and miſpriſions, for the time 'paſt, by reaſon of the war; and for this they 'ſhall have good and ſufficient letters, provid-'ed the ſaid Philip and his adherents return to 'their homage, perform their devoirs, and be-'have as good and loyal vaſſals.

'XXIV. That the king of England may 'give, for this time only, to whom he pleaſes, 'the lands and heritages that were Godfrey 'de Harcourt's, to hold of the duke of Nor-'mandy, or other lords of whom they ought 1360. 'to hold, by homage and ſervices antiently 'accuſtomed.

'to

'XXV. That any man, or country, under 'the obedience of one party, may, on account 'of this accord, go under the obedience of the 'other party; and he ſhall not be impeached, 'for any thing done, in time paſt.

'XXVI. That the lands of the baniſhed, 'and adherents of both parties, and the churches 'of both parties, and all thoſe that are diſinhe-'rited and outed of their lands, or charged with 'any penſion, tax, or impoſition, or otherwiſe 'in any manner charged, by reaſon of the war, 'ſhall be reſtored entirely to the ſame rights and 'poſſeſſions which they had, before the war be-'gan; and that all manner of forfeitures, treſ-'paſſes, or miſpriſions, done by them, or any 'of them, in that time, ſhall be wholly pardon-'ed; and theſe things are to be done, as ſoon 'as they well can, or at fartheſt within one 'year after the king ſhall leave Calais, except 'what is ſaid, in the article of Calais and Merk, 'and the other places named in that article; 'except alſo the viſcount of Fronſac, and John 'Gaillard, who are not to be compriſed in this 'article, but their goods and heritages ſhall re-'main, as they were before the treaty.

'XXVII. That the king of France ſhall de-'liver to the king of England, as ſoon as well 'he may, at fartheſt within one year after his 'departure from Calais, all the cities, towns, 'countries, and other places above-named, 'which, by this treaty, ought to be delivered 'to him.

'XXVIII. That upon the delivery of the 'the towns, fortreſſes, and whole county of 'Ponthieu; the towns, fortreſſes, and whole 'county of Montfort; the city and caſtle of 'Xainctes; the caſtles, towns, fortreſſes, and 'all the king held in demain, in the county of 'Xaintonge, on both ſides of the river Cha-'rente; the city and caſtle of Angouleſme, and 'the caſtles, fortreſſes, and towns which the 'king of France held in demain, in the coun-'try of Angouleſmois, with letters and com-'mands of releaſing of faith and homage to the 'king of England, or his deputies. He, at 'his own coſt and charge, ſhall deliver all the 'fortreſſes taken and poſſeſſed by him, his ſub-'jects, adherents, and allies, in the countries 'of France, Anjou, Main, Berry, Auvergne, 'Burgoigne, Champagne, Picardy, and Nor-'mandy, and in all other parts and lands of 'of the kingdom of France; except thoſe in 'the dutchy of Bretagne, and thoſe countries 'and lands which by this treaty ought to be 'and remain to the king of England.

'XXIX. That the king of France ſhall 'give up, and deliver to the king of England, 'his heirs, or deputies, all the towns, fortreſſes, 'caſtles, and other lands, countries, and places 'before-named, with their appurtenances, at 'his own coſt and charge: And alſo, if he ſhall 'have any rebels, that will not render and give 'up to the king of England any cities, caſtles, 'towns, countries, places, or fortreſſes, which 'ought to belong to him, the king of France 'ſhall be obliged to cauſe them to be delivered, 'at his own expence: And likewiſe the king 'of England ſhall cauſe to be delivered, at his 1360. 'expence, the fortreſſes that by this treaty 'ought to belong to the king of France. And 'the ſaid kings, and their people, ſhall be ob-'liged to aid one another, when they ſhall be 'required, at the wages of the party that ſhall 'require it, which ſhall be one florin of Flo-'rence a day, for a knight, and half a florin, 'for an eſcuyer, and to the others in the ſame 'proportion. And, for the ſurplus of the double 'wages, it is agreed, that, if the wages be too 'ſmall, on account of the rate of proviſions or 'victuals in the countries, they ſhall be ordered 'by four knights choſen for that purpoſe, two 'of one party, and two of the other.

'XXX. That all the archbiſhops, biſhops, 'and other eccleſiaſticks, by reaſon of their 'temporalities, ſhall be ſubject to that king un-'der whom they hold their temporalities; and, 'if they have temporalities under both kings, 'they ſhall be ſubject to each king, for the 'temporality they hold of him.

'XXXI. That good alliances, amities, and 'confederacies be made between both the kings 'and their kingdoms, ſaving the conſcience and 'honour of one king and the other, notwith-'ſtanding any confederacies they have made on 'this ſide, or beyond the ſea, with any per-'ſons, whether they be of Scotland, Flanders, 'or any other country.

'XXXII. That the king of France and 'his eldeſt ſon, the regent, for them and their 'heirs, kings of France, as ſoon as it may be 'done, ſhall declare themſelves, and depart 'from all the confederacies they have with the 'Scots; and promiſe, that they, nor their heirs, 'nor the kings of France, for the time being, 'ſhall give or do to the king or realm of Scot-'land, nor the ſubjects thereof, preſent and 'to come, any aid, comfort, or favour, againſt 'the king of England, his heirs and ſucceſſors, 'nor againſt the kingdom, nor againſt the ſub-'jects in any manner; and that they ſhall not 'make other alliances with the Scots, hence-'forward, againſt the kings and kingdom of 'England. And in like manner, as ſoon as it 'may be done, the king of England and his 'eldeſt ſon ſhall declare themſelves, and de-'part from all alliances they have with the 'Flemings; and promiſe that they, nor their 'heirs, nor the kings of England, for the time 'being, ſhall give or do to the Flemings pre-'ſent and to come, any aid, comfort, or fa-'vour againſt the king of France, his heirs and 'ſucceſſors, nor againſt his kingdom, nor a-'gainſt his ſubjects in any manner, and that 'they make no alliances with the ſaid Flemings, 'henceforward, againſt the kings and kingdom 'of France.

'XXXIII. That the collations and provi-'ſions made of benefices, vacant in time of the 'war, by one party and the other, ſhall hold 'and be good; and that the coſts, iſſues, and 'revenues, received and levied of any bene-'fices, or other things temporal whatever, in 'the kingdoms of France and England, by 'one party or the other, during the wars, 'ſhall be quitted by one party and the o-'ther.

'XXXIV. That

1360. 'XXXIV. That the kings aboveſaid ſhall 'be obliged to cauſe to be confirmed all the 'things aboveſaid by our holy father, the pope; 'and they ſhall be made ſure, and ſtrengthened 'by oaths, ſentences, and cenſures of the court 'of Rome, and all other places, in the moſt 'ſtrong manner that can be; and there ſhall be 'obtained diſpenſations, abſolutions, and let-'ters from the court of Rome, for perfecting 'this treaty, and they ſhall be delivered to the 'parties, at fartheſt within three weeks after 'the king ſhall be arrived at Calais.

'XXXV. That all the ſubjects of the ſaid 'kings, which come to ſtudy in the univerſi-'ties and places of ſtudy in the kingdoms of 'France and England, ſhall enjoy the privileges 'and liberties of thoſe places and univerſities, as 'well as they might have done, before the war, 'or as they do, at this preſent.

'XXXVI. That, to the end the things 'debated and treated of, as above, may be 'more eſtabliſhed, firm, and valuable, there 'ſhall be made and given the ſecurities which 'follow: Viz. letters, or inſtruments, ſealed 'with the ſeals of both kings and their eldeſt 'ſons, the beſt that can be made or directed 'by their council. And the ſaid kings, their 'eldeſt ſons, and other ſons ſhall ſwear, and 'alſo thoſe of their lineage, and other great 'men of their kingdoms, to the number of 20 'on each ſide, that they will obſerve and keep, 'and help in the keeping of the things treated 'and agreed, as far as ſhall concern them, and 'without fraud or deceit ſhall accompliſh them, 'without ever doing any thing to the contrary, 'and without any hindrance of the ſame. And 'if there ſhall be any of the kingdom of Eng-'land or France, which ſhall be rebels, and will 'not agree to the things aboveſaid, the ſaid 'kings ſhall uſe the power of their bodies, 'goods, and friends to bring ſuch rebels to obe-'dience, according to the form and tenor of 'the treaty. And farther, the ſaid kings, their 'heirs and kingdoms, ſhall ſubmit themſelves 'to the coercion of our holy father, the pope, 'that he may conſtrain, by ſentences, cenſures 'of the church, and all due ways, him that ſhall 'rebel, according to reaſon. And, according 'to theſe eſtabliſhments and ſecurities above-'ſaid, both kings and their heirs ſhall, by faith 'and oath, renounce all wars and contention. 'And if by diſobedience, rebellion, or power 'of any ſubjects of France, or any juſt cauſe, 'the king of France, or his heirs, cannot accom-'pliſh all the things aboveſaid, the king of Eng-'land, his heirs, or any for them, ſhall not make 'war againſt the king of France, his heirs, or 'kingdom; but both together ſhall endeavour 'to bring the rebels to obedience, and ac-'compliſh the things aboveſaid. And, if any 'of the realm or obedience of the king of Eng-'land will not render the caſtles, towns, and 'fortreſſes, which they hold in the realm of 'France, and obey the treaty aboveſaid, or 'for juſt cauſe cannot do that, which by 'this treaty they ought to do, the king of 'France, nor his heirs, nor any for them, ſhall 'make war upon the king of England, or his 'kingdom; but both together ſhall employ their 'power to recover the caſtles, towns, and for-'treſſes; and that all obedience and compli-'ance may be given to the treaty. And there 'ſhall be made and given on both ſides, ac-'cording to the nature of the fact, all manner 'of ſecurity that ſhall be known, or can be de-'viſed, as well by the pope, the college of the 'court of Rome, as otherwiſe, holding and 'keeping the peace perpetually, and all the 'things, as above agreed. 1360.

'XXXVII. That, by this preſent treaty all 'others, if any have been made before, ſhall 'be null and void, and never be of any advan-'tage to either party, nor cauſe any reproach 'of one to the other for not obſerving them.

'XXXVIII. The preſent treaty ſhall be ap-'proved, ſworn to, and confirmed by the two 'kings, when they ſhall meet at Calais; and, 'after the king of France ſhall be gone from 'thence, and be in his own power, within a 'month next following, he ſhall make letters 'patent of confirmation, and ſend and deliver 'them at Calais to the king of England, and 'receive ſuch and the like from the king of 'England.

'XXXIX. That neither king ſhall procure, 'or cauſe to be procured by himſelf or others, 'any injury, or moleſtation by the church of 'Rome, or any of the holy church, whoever 'they be, to, or concerning this treaty, to-'wards either of the kings, their coadjutors, 'adherents, and allies, whoever they be, or 'their lands or ſubjects, on occaſion of the war 'or other thing, or for ſervice the coadjutors, 'adherents, or allies of either ſide have per-'formed; or if our holy father will do it, of 'himſelf, both kings ſhall hinder it, as well as 'they can, without deceit.

'XL. The hoſtages that are to be delivered 'to the king of England at Calais, and the 'manner and time thereof, the two kings ſhall 'there direct *.

Remarks on the treaty of Bretigny.

The conditions of this treaty ſeem ſo hard, for France, that the reader can ſcarce forbear repreſenting to himſelf a triumphant king treading upon the neck of his vanquiſhed enemy; but, if we pretend to add the idea of an unjuſt conqueror exacting, from his enemy, terms entirely repugnant to reaſon and equity, we ſhall, doubtleſs, form a wrong judgment of this famous treaty. It muſt be remembered, that almoſt all the provinces, reſigned by France to England, belonged formerly to Edward's predeceſſors, not by conqueſt, or treaties extorted by force, but by a right of inheritance, immemorially received from their anceſtors; for it does not appear, that the king of France ever complained, that the dukes of Guienne, or the earls of Poictiers, had wreſted theſe countries from them, by compulſive methods. On the contrary, we have ſeen, in the hiſtory of the preceding monarchs, that Philip Auguſtus

* In the corrected inſtrument of this treaty, the words, Reſort and Sovereignty, are always omitted, with reſpect to the king of England's enjoying them, in the places which were to be delivered to him; whereas, in the uncorrected inſtrument, they are given to him.

1360. and St. Lewis diſpoſſeſs'd, by violence, John Lackland and Henry III, not only of the provinces in diſpute, but alſo of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and Normandy; and the treaty, by which they were ſurrendered to France, was made, whilſt Henry III. was in captivity to the earl of Leiceſter; from which conſiderations, it is eaſy to perceive the foundation of this treaty. Edward, improving ſuch favourable junctures, aimed at the recovery of what France had, before, extorted from his anceſtors; and, if he likewiſe required Calais, the earldom of Guiſnes, and the ſovereignty of the provinces he recovered, it muſt be obſerved, that Edward had a right to demand whatever belonged to his predeceſſors, not to mention his claim to the crown itſelf. In this belief, he thought, that, in leaving to France, Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, with the homage of Bretagne, he gave an equivalent for Guiſnes, Calais, and the ſovereignty of Guienne; and, if to this ceſſion, be added his title to the crown of France, which, undoubtedly, he apprehended to be very plauſible, ſince he made it the ground of the war, perhaps, there will not be any great cauſe to exclaim againſt the unreaſonableneſs of this treaty. Edward cannot be blamed, for being willing to recover Guienne and all its dependences, without condemning Philip Auguſtus and St. Lewis, who took, by force, the greateſt part of that province from his anceſtors; and Philip de Valois, who ſeized the reſt, before the war was declared, on the frivolous pretence of Edward's refuſing to obey his order, prohibiting all his ſubjects and vaſſals to harbour Robert d' Artois. If Edward had received that prince, at Bourdeaux, he would have given room for ſome objections; but his being vaſſal, for Guienne, could not deprive him of the privilege of acting, as king of England. In fine, if it be alledged, that the foreſaid kings of France had a right to re-annex to the crown provinces, that were a part of the kingdom, under the ſecond race; I anſwer, that Hugh Capet granted them, in fee, to lords, from whom they were devolved to the kings of England, by lawful ſucceſſion. It can, therefore, only be pretended, that Philip Auguſtus had juſt reaſon to confiſcate Normandy, Poictou, Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and that Guienne was juſtly forfeited by Edward III; but all this is much eaſier ſaid than proved; and, if a preſcription of 70 years is advanced, in favour of France, a much longer may be pleaded, in behalf of the kings of England, when theſe countries were taken from them.

If any one ſhould ſtill imagine, that Edward did not perform his vow, to conclude a peace upon equitable terms, let him farther conſider the poſture of the French affairs, at the time of this treaty. King John was a priſoner, at London, and the dauphin ſhut up, in Paris; whilſt an army of 100,000 Engliſhmen was in the center of the kingdom, to which no conſiderable body of troops could be oppoſed; and Edward was poſſeſſed of many places taken by himſelf, or his generals, ſince his invaſion. In a word, an univerſal conſternation was ſpread all over France; and inteſtine commotions deſtroyed all hopes of ever being able to expel the Engliſh. Theſe were very ſubſtantial advantages, which Edward actually enjoyed; ſo that he might juſtly expect to become maſter of that whole kingdom, and attain the end he propoſed, in beginning the war. What reaſon then, can be aſſigned, for his not improving ſo fair an opportunity? Certainly, it could proceed from nothing elſe but his willingneſs to be ſatisfied with a part, when he might have demanded the whole; and with a part that he believed might, in juſtice, be taken from France, by whom it was unjuſtly acquired. But to return to the Hiſtory. 1360.

This famous treaty, negotiated, in eight days, was approved by both kings; and John was conducted to Calais, in July, where he continued, four months, purſuant to the agreement. At his firſt meal, he was waited upon by Edward's four ſons, who treated him, with all poſſible reſpect, according to the king their father's orders; and theſe four months were ſpent, in drawing up all the neceſſary acts, as well for explaining as confirming and executing the treaty, that they might be all ſigned, the ſame day; for it was not till the 24th of October, that the two kings ſigned and ſwore to the treaty, at Calais. This affair being over, king John was releaſed, on the 26th of the ſaid month; and, juſt before his departure, Edward gave him a convincing proof of his friendſhip, in permitting him to carry with him prince Philip, his ſon, taken at the battle of Poictiers. Of all his children, this was his greateſt favourite; yet, though, of all the hoſtages, in Edward's hands, this was the chief, by reaſon of his father's affection for him, he very readily conſented, that he ſhould be one of the 10 that were to be freed, by the XXII article of the treaty of Bretigny; and the two monarchs, at parting, gave mutual tokens of cordial love and eſteem. John is conducted to Calais.

John no ſooner arrived at St. Omer, than he ratified, by his letters patent, and voluntarily ſwore to, all the articles of the treaty of Bretigny; from whence it appeared, that he was not compelled to ſwear, at Calais. He ſhewed, on all occaſions, that his intent was to perform his engagements, which, at laſt, he proved, in the moſt ſenſible manner, by putting Edward in poſſeſſion of the countries reſigned to him; and there was only ſome difficulty, relating to the earldom of Gaure, in Gaſcoigne, and the territory of Belville, in Poictou, about which the two kings could not agree. He ratifies the treaty, when in France. Act. Pub.

The peace between the two crowns ſeeming to be ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, Edward ſent Sir John Chandos into France, to command, in his name, in the countries belonging to him, with the title of lieutenant-general, who was one of the moſt accompliſhed lords, at that time, in England. He was affable and temperate, in peace, and brave, in war; and conſequently a perſon, in all reſpects, qualified for ſuch an honourable employ. As the king intended to gain the affection of his new ſubjects, he took care to ſend them a governor, whoſe prudence was extremely proper to produce that effect; beſides, he ſettled upon him a very handſome ſalary, 1361. John Chandos.

1361. salary, which enabled him to keep a ſplendid court, at Niort, in Poictou, where he reſided; and he inveſted him with power to pardon all ſorts of crimes, that, both by his outward luſtre and the diſtribution of his favours, he might procure for his maſter the love of the people, ſo lately brought under ſubjection to his authority.

Edward reſtores to the priories their lands.

Edward, finding that he was like to enjoy a laſting peace, reſtored to the alien-priors the lands taken from them, 20 years before, towards the charges of the war; tho' it very rarely happens, that princes voluntarily make reſtitution of what they have once acquired.

The plague ſtill raged in England, this year; which, among the reſt, deprived the kingdom of the duke of Lancaſter, the moſt beloved of all the Engliſh lords, being uſually ſtiled the Good Duke; and, accordingly, his death was greatly lamented. He founded the collegiate church of Leiceſter; and, in the ſame place, an hoſpital, for 300 poor men, which ſubſiſts to this day.

The marriage of the prince of Wales.

The prince of Wales, who never hought of marrying, during the war, in this peaceable time, eſpouſed Joanna of Kent, his couſin, counteſs dowager of Holland; who was daughter to Edmund, earl of Kent, beheaded by the intrigues of queen Iſabella and Mortimer; and ſhe was commonly called Joanna the Fair, on account of her extraordinary beauty.

1362. Edward makes Guienne a principality. Act. Pub.

The next year, the king, willing to give publick marks of his eſteem and affection for the prince, his eldeſt ſon, who had ſo highly exalted the glory of the Engliſh name, erected the dutchy of Guienne into a principality, under the name of the principality of Aquitaine; and then he ſolemnly inveſted the prince with it, obliging him only to pay, annually, in lieu of all ſervice, an ounce of gold to the crown of England.

The publick acts are to be in Engliſh. Walſing.

Edward ſpent the remainder of this year, in making ſeveral wiſe regulations, with the advice of his parliament, about domeſtick affairs; ſuch, for inſtance, was the decree, that, for the future, in the courts of juſtice, and in all publick acts, the Engliſh language ſhould be uſed, inſtead of the French or Norman, introduced by William the Conqueror.

In this parliament, the king declared, that, as he was arrived to his 50th year, he would have it ſolemnized, as a ſort of jubilee; wherefore, he granted a general pardon for all offences whatſoever, treaſon itſelf not excepted; and he confirmed Magna Charta, which was ratified, 10 ſeveral times, in his reign.

After Edward had performed what he judged neceſſary, for the publick, he was pleaſed to do ſomething, for his family, by creating Lionel, his third ſon, duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt, his fourth ſon, duke of Lancaſter, and the fifth, named Edmund, earl of Cambridge; and, in fine, having eſtabliſhed the ſtaple of wooll, at Calais, he took a progreſs into ſeveral counties, attended by the principal lords, and the French hoſtages, who partook of all the recreations, with which the people ſtrove to divert their ſovereign.

In the beginning of 1363, the prince of Wales departed for his government of Aquitaine; and he reſided at Bourdeaux, where he kept a royal court, being beloved and reſpected by all his ſubjects, who were extremely happy, under the government of ſo great a prince. 1363. The prince of Wales goes and keeps his court at Bourdeaux.

The ſame year was remarkable, for king John's return into England, where, it is pretended, he came to ſurrender himſelf priſoner again, to atone for the fault committed by the duke of Anjou, his ſecond ſon, in withdrawing from Calais, without leave; at leaſt, this is the reaſon generally aſſigned for this extraordinary proceeding. Some add, that his view was to confer, in perſon, with Edward, about the Cruſade, of which he was declared general by the pope; and there are hiſtorians, who have not ſcrupled to advance a much leſs noble motive of his return; alledging, that his paſſion for the counteſs of Salisbury was the real cauſe of this journey, though he made uſe of other pretences; but this is a romantick notion, and entirely groundleſs. Notwithſtanding all former enquiries, concerning this affair, the true occaſion of this prince's return is ſtill a ſecret; but that of love is the moſt improbable; and that of repairing the faulr of the duke of Anjou, though adopted by the generality of hiſtorians, is, in my opinion, without the leaſt foundation. To illuſtrate this point, it will be requiſite to relate ſome particulars, belonging to the Hiſtory, which I have reſerved for this place, though they were tranſacted, between the treaty of Bretigny and the preſent time. King John returns to England. Act. Pub. The pretended reaſons of his return. Froiſſart. Mezerai.

Among the 30 hoſtages in Edward's hands, beſides the burghers of ſeveral cities, there were four princes of the blood; viz. Philip, duke of Orleans, king John's brother; Lewis, duke of Anjou; John, earl of Poictiers, afterwards duke of Berry; and the duke of Bourbon; which four princes, commonly ſtiled, the Lords of the Flower-de-Luce, being tired of England, ſought all poſſible means, to return into France; though it was a difficult task, ſince, upon theſe four hoſtages, Edward chiefly relied, for the full performance of the treaty of Bretigny, and particularly for the payment of king John's ranſom. Nevertheleſs, by their ſollicitations, he was prevailed on to grant them their liberty, upon the following terms: I. Provided that, before the firſt of November, the territory of Belville and earldom of Gaure were reſigned to him, with 200,000 florins. II. That, before the departure of the princes, certain lands, in Poictou, ſhould be given him, for ſecurity. III. That, if the firſt article was not executed, by the time agreed on, the lands given in pledge ſhould remain to the king, for ever, and the four princes be obliged to ſurrender themſelves, in hoſtage, as before. There were ſome other articles; but they are of no uſe, in clearing this fact. John ratified this agreement; and the four hoſtages were conducted to Calais, where they ſtaid, upon their parole, till the execution of the firſt article; having alſo liberty to go out of the town, whenever they pleaſed, and even to be abſent, three days,

1363. on condition they came and lodged, within the walls, on the fourth. It appears from Edward's letter to the prince of Wales, inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this agreement was not executed; which led the princes to deſpair of recovering their liberty, ſo ſoon as they expected. The duke of Anjou, more impatient and leſs ſcrupulous than the reſt, took advantage of this permiſſion to go out of Calais, to make his eſcape, and returned no more; and four other inferior hoſtages followed his ill example. It is aſſerted, that, on this account, king John came and ſurrendered himſelf priſoner, at London; namely, to repair the fault of the prince, his ſon; but, as the Collection of the Publick Acts does not give the leaſt hint, that this was the motive of his voyage, it may be juſtly diſputed; moreover, king John was, by no means, obliged to take this ſtep, even though all the hoſtages had made their eſcape, his whole engagement conſiſting in ſending the ſame hoſtages, or others of the like quality, in their room. Now, it is not ſaid, that the duke of Anjou abſented himſelf from his father's court, and conſequently it was eaſy to ſend him back; and, in a word, if John returned to London, as a priſoner, he would, in ſo doing, have freed all the hoſtages, ſince they were detained, at preſent, only as ſecurity for the payment of his ranſom. All the reſt of the articles of the treaty of Bretigny were executed, except that concerning Gaure and Belville, which did not require ſo great ſecurity; and yet, though John ſtaid, three months, at London, there was never any diſcourſe, about releaſing the hoſtages. Froiſſart, whoſe teſtimony is urged, does not affirm, that John ſurrendered himſelf priſoner again, but only that one of the motives of his voyage was to excuſe, and not to repair, the duke of Anjou's fault. The hiſtorian's own words are, as follows: "I was then informed, and on good "grounds, that king John deſigned and de"ſired to go and ſee king Edward, his brother, "in England, and could not be diſſuaded from "it, though he was ſufficiently adviſed to the "contrary: And, being told by ſeveral barons "and prelates, that he was about to commit a "great indiſcretion, he replied, He had found "ſo much honour, in the king of England and "his ſons, that he did not doubt their proving "his true and faithful friends, on all occaſions; "and, beſides, he was willing to excuſe the "duke of Anjou, his ſon, who was returned "into France." Nothing, in this paſſage, can import, that John returned to England, to yield himſelf priſoner; and, therefore, it is evidently a groundleſs aſſertion. As for the third motive, viz. his deſire to confer with Edward, about the Cruſade, it is much more probable; but, after all, even this is no more than a conjecture.

John is honourably received in England.

When Edward heard, that John was landed, at Dover, he ſent the princes, his ſons, with a numerous retinue of nobles, to receive him, and conduct him to London, where he paid all the reſpect due to his rank and merit. The king, of Scotland and Cyprus, who were then 1363. in England, added to the ſplendor of his reception, the former of whom came, to pay Edward a viſit, and the latter, to requeſt his aid againſt the Infidels. Upon ſuch an extraordinary occaſion, Edward took a pleaſure, in entertaining his illuſtrious gueſts, with all poſſible magnificence, and with all imaginable diverſions; and the mayor of London made a magnificent entertainment for the four kings, in the name of the city. The ſumptuouſneſs of Sir Henry Picard, citizen and wine-merchant, ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence; who invited all the four kings, with their retinues, to a feaſt at his own houſe, where they were ſplendidly entertained. King John lodged in the palace of the Savoy, as before, and was ſtill treated, at Edward's expence. About the middle of March, three months after his arrival at London, he was ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he died, on the 8th of April, 1364; and his death was greatly lamented by the king of England, who had a ſingular eſteem for his virtue. There is aſcribed to this prince a ſaying, worthy to be had in eternal remembrance by poſterity: "Though faith "and truth were baniſhed from the reſt of the "world, they ought, however, to be preſerved "in the mouth of kings." It is pretended, that this was ſaid, on the occaſion of his returning to England; but it may, with much more probability, be aſcribed to his ſincere performance of the treaty of Bretigny, in ſpite of the obſtacles thrown into his way by ſome of his counſellors, tho' Charles V, his ſucceſſor, did not follow the ſame maxims.

The battle of Avray.

Edward's good fortune not only ſhed its influence on himſelf and his ſubjects, but alſo on his allies; for, this very year, John de Montfort, his ſon-in-law, won the famous battle of Avray, againſt Charles de Blois, his competitor, who was ſlain. This victory decided the quarrel between the two houſes, who contended for the dutchy of Bretagne, and produced the treaty of Guerande, by which Bretagne was aſſigned to John de Montfort, who did homage for it to the king of France; and Bertrand du Gueſclin, who ſerved Charles de Blois, and became afterwards very famous, was taken in this battle by Sir John Chandos, commander of the Engliſh troops, in Montfort's ſervice.

1365. The fortune of Thomas Hackwood. Walſing.

The Engliſh name was, then, renowned, in all parts of the world. Some gallant Engliſhmen, who had attended Guy de Luſignan, king of Cyprus, into the Eaſt, performed wonders, and returned, laden with honours and riches taken from the Infidels; and, at the ſame time, Thomas Hackwood, an Engliſhman, who departed from England a journyman-taylor, taking afterwards to arms, ſignalized himſelf, in the Italian wars, by his valour and conduct, which raiſed him to the moſt exalted poſts; and he gained ſuch honour and reputation, for reſtoring, in thoſe parts, military diſcipline, that was almoſt entirely loſt, that, after his death, the Florentines erected, in their city, a black 1365. black marble-ſtatue, to his memory *. John Chandos and Robert Knolles diſtinguiſhed themſelves alſo, in a very ſingular manner, in all Edward's wars with France; and the fame of the Engliſh not only reached beyond the Alps, but flew likewiſe over the Pyrenæan mountains, as we ſhall ſee preſently.

1366. Urban VI. proudly demands the arrears of his tribute. Raynold.

Edward's great acquiſitions, in France, induced pope Urban VI, to think the preſent juncture very proper, to demand the tribute, promiſed, by king John Lackland, to the Roman church, and of which 30 years arrears was now due; and he required the payment, in ſuch an imperious manner, that he nominated, even before-hand, commiſſioners to ſummon Edward before him, in caſe of refuſal; but, the king's great ſpirit diſdaining ſuch haughty proceedings, he cauſed the pope's demand to be laid before the parliament, who declared, "That "the king of England could not bring his realm "in ſuch ſervitude, without the conſent of par-"liament; and that, if neceſſity compelled "king John to ſuch a proceeding, his engage-"ment was null, as being contrary to his co-"ronation-oath." This auguſt aſſembly, not ſatisfied with ſo particular a deciſion, came alſo to this vigorous reſolution: "That, if the "pope ſhould attempt, by any means whatſo-"ever, to proſecute his unjuſt pretenſions, "the nation ſhould oppoſe him, with all their "might." The firmneſs of the parliament obliged the pope to deſiſt; and it had not only a preſent effect, but prevented the kings of England from being ever after moleſted, on that account.

The affairs of Caſtile. Mezerai.

The prince of Wales reſided, three years, in Guienne, without exerciſing his valour, and even without any proſpect of doing it, for a conſiderable time; but, on a ſudden, he was drawn out of this ſtate of tranquillity, by the ſollicitations of Peter, king of Caſtile, ſirnamed the Cruel, who was lately expelled his dominions. No prince ever gave his ſubjects greater cauſe of diſcontent; for, being cruel to exceſs, and of an inſatiable avarice, he illegally put to death his great men, with the ſole view of confiſcating their eſtates. He conſulted only the gratification of his paſſions, without any regard to honour, or conſcience; and he even poiſoned Blanche de Bourbon, his wife, ſiſter to the queen of France, to marry Maria de Padilla, whom he had long kept, as his miſtreſs. Of his five baſtard-brothers, the eldeſt had lately been ſacrificed to his ſuſpicions; and the other four were in danger; but Henry, earl of Treſtamare, one of that number, being continually threatened with the ſame fate, rebelled againſt Peter, and engaged in his quarrel the king of Arragon, with the principal Caſtilian lords, who could no longer endure the tyranny of their ſovereign. He was, at firſt, repulſed by the tyrant, and forced to fly to the king of France, who promiſed to aſſiſt him; for, beſides Charles's deſire to revenge the death of the queen, his ſiſter-in-law, he was very glad to find employment for a multitude of idle ſoldiers, who, ſince the late peace, ſwarmed in France, and committed great diſorders. With this view, he raiſed an army, the command of which he gave to John de Bourbon, earl of Marche, the queen's couſin-german; and he was pleaſed, that du Gueſclin, whoſe ranſom he paid to Chandos, ſhould be concerned in this expedition. 1366.

Peter the Cruel is expelled his dominions.

With theſe troops, and the aid of the Caſtilians, Henry marched through Arragon into Caſtile; where the tyrant found himſelf immediately abandoned by all his nobles, except a ſingle knight; upon which defection, he would have retired into Portugal, but was denied entrance. In this extremity, he left Spain, and repaired to Bourdeaux, to implore the aid and protection of the prince of Wales; but, if the young hero had reflected on the unworthineſs of the prince, who deſired his aſſiſtance, he would, doubtleſs, have refuſed his requeſt; yet, conſidering only the honour of reſtoring a depoſed king, and, perhaps, being weary of an unactive life, he undertook to replace him on the throne. Accordingly, he levied an army of 30,000 men, and marched at their head towards Spain, loaded with promiſes from the Caſtilians, and flushed with the expectation of gathering freſh laurels; and, as he could not enter Caſtile, but by the way of Navarre, he took care to ſecure a paſſage, by a treaty with the king of that country; ſo that he marched, without interruption, to the frontiers of Caſtile. Henry, who was now crowned, at Burgos, receiving intelligence of the march of the Engliſh prince, advanced towards Navarre, with a numerous army, to oppoſe his paſſage; and he might, very poſſibly, have been ſucceſsful, by reaſon of the ſuperiority of his forces, had he been ſo prudent as to avoid a battle; but the prince of Wales, to provoke him, ſent him a very inſulting defiance, which Henry could not forbear to accept; and, the two armies approaching each other, the battle was fought, near Nejara, a little town on the frontiers of Caſtile. As the fields of Creſſy and Poictiers had ſeen the prince of Wales perform wonders, that of Nejara was alſo witneſs of his heroic actions; and, after a long ſtruggle, the Spaniſh army, tho' reinforced with a powerful body of French troops, was entirely routed. Bertrand de Gueſclin, with the marſhal D'Endreghen, were taken priſoners; and Henry, after this defeat, retired into Arragon, from whence he repaired to Languedoc, to implore the aid of the duke of Anjou, the governor.

The battle of Nejara.

Peter was, at firſt, ſo grateful, that, preſently after the battle, he threw himſelf at the prince of Wales's feet, to thank him, for reſtoring him to his crown; but the prince of Wales, lifting him up, immediately, and holding him in his arms, ſaid, "It was to God "alone he was indebted for the victory, and "not to a prince who was no more than a "weak inſtrument in his hand." Want ſoon bred among the ſoldiers a mortality, which ſwept away great numbers; and the fear of loſing the reſt conſtrained the prince, who perceived, that he was baſely deceived, to retire, extremely diſguſted; being even forced to ſell his plate, to provide for the more preſſing occaſions of his army, till he could give them entire ſatisfaction; and, what was ſtill more unfortunate, during his ſtay in Spain, he contracted a diſtemper of which he never recovered.

The cataſtrophe of Peter.

This was the reſult of the prince of Wales's expedition; which was glorious, indeed, if we only regard the ſucceſs, but rather infamous, as to the cauſe he eſpouſed, ſince it was, purely, deſigned to reſtore to the throne the baſeſt of princes; and Heaven afterwards revenged both the Engliſh and Caſtilians. Du Gueſclin, paying his ranſom, joined Henry again; and they laboured, with the aſſiſtance of France, to bring a freſh army into the field. As ſoon as they were in readineſs, they re-entered Caſtile, and made ſo great a progreſs, that they were ſoon in a condition to beſiege Toledo; and Peter, flying to the relief of that city, was defeated, and compelled to retreat to the caſtle of Montiel, where he was directly inveſted; but, his caſe being deſperate, he reſolved to go to Du Gueſclin, in his tent, fancying that he would procure him tolerable terms, or help him to make his eſcape. However, unhappily meeting Henry, his brother, there, the two princes falling firſt to reproaches and then to blows, Henry threw his brother to the ground, and ſtabbed him with his dagger; and then he cauſed himſelf to be once more acknowledged king of Caſtile, without the leaſt oppoſition.

A difference between the end and beginning of Edward's reign.

Edward III. has, hitherto, appeared, on the theatre of the world, as one of the moſt glorious princes that ever ſwayed a ſcepter; but his latter years will preſent us with a very different ſcene. Fortune grew weary of favouring this monarch, in his old age, notwithſtanding her former careſſes; for ſhe robbed him, before his death, of all his glorious conqueſts, which were purchaſed, at ſo dear a rate; and theſe loſſes were attended with many other vexations.

Prince Lionel's ſecond marriage.

Lionel, duke of Clarence, Edward's third ſon, who was contracted to Violanta, daughter to John Galeazzo, duke of Milan, went to conſummate his marriage, with a ſplendid retinue, being honoured with the attendance of many young noblemen; and, for ſome time, there was nothing but entertainments and diverſions, that were daily renewed, in favour of a prince whoſe alliance was ſo honourable to the duke of Milan; which diverſions, ſo laviſhly procured him, haſtened his end. Five months after his marriage, he died in Montferrat, in the 32d year of his age; and, by his firſt wife, the ſole heireſs of the earl of Ulſter, in Ireland, he left a daughter, named Philippa, of whoſe poſterity I ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak, hereafter. 1368.

1369. Charles V. forms the deſign of breaking the treaty of Bretigny.

Edward's grief, for the loſs of his ſon, was quickly ſucceeded by another, of which he was no leſs ſenſible; for the treaty of Bretigny was ſo diſadvantageous to France, that Charles V, who had himſelf made it, probably conſented to it, with no other view, than to break it, the firſt opportunity. The French were no better diſpoſed; which ſoon appeared, in all the difficulties they created, when the reſigned provinces came to be delivered to the king of England. King John was the only perſon that acted, with ſincerity, who, by his own authority, prevented theſe obſtacles from being carried too far; but Charles, his ſon and ſucceſſor, ſirnamed the Wiſe, no ſooner aſcended the throne, than he tried to evade what remained unexecuted of the treaty; for he even neglected to do Edward juſtice, upon the duke of Anjou's eſcape, nor would he deliver up the earldom of Gaure. The judgment, about the affair of Belville, referred to arbitrators, was delayed on various pretences; and king John's ranſom was deferred; or, if Charles paid any thing, after his acceſſion to the crown, it was but a ſmall part, in reſpect of what ſtill remained due. In the interim, Edward, having in his hands the dukes of Berry and Orleans, and ſeveral other hoſtages, could not imagine, that Charles thought of renewing the war, believing that his inability was the ſole cauſe of all theſe delays. Affairs proceeded thus ſlowly, from the death of John, till Charles was in a condition to take proper meaſures, to accompliſh his deſigns; who always pretended a willingneſs to compleat the execution of the treaty, and, under colour of paying his father's ranſom, to which he was obliged, heaped up money very liberally ſupplied by the ſtates, well knowing for what uſes it was intended. With this aid, he engaged ſeveral other German princes, in his intereſt; and, having brought his matters to maturity, he ſought a pretence, to break with England.

Edward diſguſts the lords of Guienne. Act. Pub.

When Edward was projecting a war with France, he judged it expedient to attach to his ſervice the principal lords of Guienne, by ſeveral grants which he revoked, immediately after the peace; but they were ſo exaſperated by this, that they wanted only a favourable opportunity, to ſhew their reſentment. In all probability, they would have long waited in vain, if Charles had not given them private intimations, that they ſhould be ſupported; but, being aſſured of his protection, nothing was wanting but a pretence to complain; and the prince of Wales, by laying upon Guienne a tax, called Feuage, or chimney-money, in order to pay the arrears due to the troops, levied for the Spaniſh war, inadvertently, furniſhed his enemies with the deſired opportunity, to declare themſelves. The lord d' Albret, the earls of Armagnac, Cominges, Perigord, and Carmaing, encouraging their vaſſals to complain

1369. complain of this new tax, brought their complaints to the prince, and addreſſed him, on that occaſion; and their remonſtrances were rejected, not only becauſe the prince was in want of money, but on account of the haughty manner, in which they were made. The lords, having gained the very point they wanted, under the pretence, that their prince would not do them juſtice, applied to the king of France, whom they ſuppoſed to be ſtill ſovereign lord of Guienne, and intreated him to grant them letters of appeal to his parliament. Charles, tho' he did not think it adviſable, as yet, to throw off the maſque, cheriſhed this diſpoſition, and, in the mean time, kept them, at Paris; but the journey of theſe lords, and their long
Walſing. ſtay, at the court of France, exciting the jealouſy of the prince of Wales, he ſent, from time to time, ſeveral letters to the king, his father, to warn him that ſome project was forming againſt him, at Paris, tho' to no purpoſe; for the king and his council, regardleſs of his remonſtrances, imagined, that the warlike prince, tired with an inactive life, only ſought an occaſion, to renew the war.

In the interim, the prince's diſtemper, daily growing more dangerous, turned, at laſt, to a real dropſy; and his ill ſtate of health, together with his father's infirmneſs, haſtened the reſolutions of the king of France. Accordingly, he granted the Gaſcoign lords the letters of appeal they requeſted, pretending, notwithſtanding his oaths, and all his father's reſignations and renunciations, that he was ſtill ſovereign of Guienne; and he founded his pretenſions on Edward's not having ſent his renunciation to the crown of France, purſuant to the treaty of Bretigny; but, that renunciation being only a conſequence of the full performance of the treaty, Edward did not think himſelf, as, indeed, he was not, obliged to make it, till the whole was executed, tho' he had abſolutely quitted the title of king of France, a convincing proof of the ſincerity of his intention. Moreover, Charles himſelf had not renounced the provinces yielded to England, by the treaty of Bretigny; which reciprocal renunciations were conſidered, as the ſeal of the treaty, after the two kings ſhould be ſatisfied about the execution. However that be, Charles, under this pretence, ſummoned the prince of Wales to appear before the court of peers, to anſwer for his pretended tyranny upon the people of thoſe provinces; but, the prince's high ſpirit not permitting him to bear this affront, without diſcovering his reſentment, he replied, that he would not fail to appear, but it ſhould be at the head of 60,000 men. In the mean time, Charles, amuſing Edward, expoſtulated with him, as if he were deſirous, that the affair ſhould be put in negotiation; and Edward anſwered, by giving words for words, not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting, that he really intended to diſpute his ſovereignty over Guienne, ſo clearly ſettled in the treaty of Bretigny; and much leſs, that France was in a condition to renew the war; but he prepoſterouſly flattered himſelf. It was not the ſovereignty of Guienne only, that Charles deſigned to diſpute; for he likewiſe alledged, that the treaty of Bretigny was void, becauſe Edward had not prevented certain plunderers, that came out of his dominions, from entering France, nor had evacuated all the towns that were to be reſtored. On theſe accounts, he ordered war to be proclaimed by a footman, becauſe the prince of Wales had ſeized thoſe that brought him the ſummons; and, ſoon after, he publiſhed an edict, confiſcating all the lands held by the Engliſh, in France, which he annexed to the crown. 1369.

Charles ſummons the prince of Wales.

His anſwer.

The encomiums beſtowed on this prince, by the French writers, for ſo wiſely improving the junctures that offered, to recover his dominions, deſerve ſome reflections. Indeed, he acted with prudence, if ſincerity and honeſty are inſignificant terms; and the ſucceſs of his conduct freed France, for a time, from her unhappy condition; but, if we conſider it cloſely, this prudence is real perfidiouſneſs; for, even ſuppoſing, that Edward had not executed any one article of the treaty, his non-performance did not give Charles a right to proclaim war againſt him. The king, his father, and himſelf had expreſly renounced, with an oath, all violent methods, in the caſe of non-execution; and, beſides, he had not himſelf performed all the articles of the treaty, ſo that all he could reaſonably demand was a compenſation; but it was an open renouncing of good faith, to annul the whole treaty, under the pretence that ſome articles remained ſtill to be performed by England, when the caſe was the ſame, with reſpect to himſelf. Moreover, his pretences for a rupture were ſo frivolous, that the French hiſtorians, not being able to relate them preciſely, confine themſelves to generals; and the moſt plauſible pretence, alledged by Froiſſart, is this, "The prince of Wales be- "ing unable to pay the troops lately returned "from Spain, 6000 men disbanding them- "ſelves, and afterwards rejoining, committed "great ravages, in Guienne; and, the prince "deſiring them to depart his dominions, they "threw themſelves into all the neighbouring "provinces of France, and plundered them, "with impunity, it not being in the power of "the French to hinder them." Suppoſing Froiſſart's account to be fact, it was no leſs impracticable for the prince of Wales to go into France, and quell theſe roving plunderers, who had entered that kingdom; yet it appears that he did all that was poſſible for him, ſince he he impoſed on his dukedom the Feuage-tax, in order to pay his troops; but Charles made this very thing a pretence for a rupture. The ſame hiſtorian farther adds, that, Charles ordering the treaty of Bretigny to be examined, in his council, the chief debate ran upon the article, by which the two kings renounced all violent methods, in the caſe of non-execution; and that he was adviſed, upon that foundation, to proceed to hoſtilities, becauſe Edward inceſſantly made war upon France; but he does not tell us, how, or where, nor make the leaſt mention of any particulars. However, from the relation of that author, it is a very natural inference, that, before the treaty was examined, Charles had reſolved upon war; and that the Remarks on this rupture.

1369. the ſole intent of this examination was to find ſome pretence. Mezerai affirms, that Edward's not withdrawing all his troops out of the kingdom was the cauſe of this rupture; but he does not ſo much as name one place, where theſe troops remained.

From what has been ſaid, it evidently follows, that Charles's wiſdom was not a very ſcrupulous virtue; whether he ſigned the treaty, with an intent to break it, or did not form that deſign, till he met with a favourable juncture. It is, therefore, the effect, and not the cauſe, which occaſioned this prince's conduct to be ſo much admired; for, had he been as fortunate, as he was ſucceſsful, he would have re-plunged France into a gulph of miſery and, thereby, juſtly incurred the blame of the whole world, and, doubtleſs, of thoſe very authors, who have given him ſuch high commendations.

The ſtate of affairs between the two crowns.

Before I deſcend to the particulars of this ſecond war, it will be farther neceſſary to conſider the poſture of affairs, between the two crowns, at the time of the rupture. The French complained, that Edward had not ceaſed to make war againſt France, nor withdrawn all his troops out of the kingdom, purſuant to his engagements; but theſe are no more than general complaints; and, beſides, it is, to the laſt degree, improbable, that Edward, to whom this treaty was ſo beneficial, would have furniſhed France with a pretence to break it. The treaty it ſelf ſhews, that the Engliſh monarch's engagements were inconſiderable, in compariſon of his advantages; from whence it may be fairly preſumed, that, being a prince of great abilities, as all muſt acknowledge, he could not be ſo imprudent, as to raiſe any obſtacles himſelf againſt the execution of it; and, as for the pretended injury done the Gaſcoigns, by the prince of Wales, it plainly appears from the treaty, that Charles had no right to interpoſe.

The caſe was otherwiſe, with reſpect to the Engliſh. Indeed, king John's ſincerity can never be too much commended, who no ſooner returned into his dominions, than he ratified every article, ſeparately, by particular acts, and not only ſwore himſelf to the obſervance of the treaty, but obliged the dauphin, his ſon, who was to ſucceed him, to take the ſame oath; ſo that all defects, in his engagements, by reaſon of his captivity, were removed, by his ratifications, when at full liberty in his own kingdom. Moreover, he actually put Edward in poſſeſſion of the lands reſigned by the treaty, without any reſerve, and particularly thoſe held of Guienne; and, if he had not intended to give up the ſovereignty with the lands, is it to be imagined, that he and the prince, his ſon, ſhould make no exception to that ſovereignty, either in the treaty itſelf, or in ſome of the ratifications of each particular article? at leaſt, they would not have neglected to make a proteſtation, when Edward erected Guienne into a principality, and inveſted the prince, his ſon, without the participation of France. It muſt be confeſſed, that there was a diſpute, between the two kings, about two inconſiderable territories; but, to prevent a quarrel, for ſuch a trifle, the matter was referred to arbitration. As for the ranſom, king John's inability was the ſole cauſe of his not paying it, as ſoon as it became due; and Edward was ſo well ſatisfied of that prince's ſincerity, that he made no ſcruple to prolong the time of payment. On this account, when king John died, there remained ſtill to pay 200,000 crowns of the firſt million; and, expecting that John, or the dauphin, his ſon, would pay him, in time, Edward was no leſs moderate, with regard to the hoſtages. I have obſerved, he readily conſented, that prince Philip, afterwards duke of Burgundy, ſhould be one of the 10 to be releaſed by the XVIIth article of the treaty, tho' he might have refuſed it; and the reſt had, in England, all the liberty they could reaſonably deſire. The Collection of the Publick Acts abounds with licenſes granted them, to go and take care of their private affairs, in France; tho' the duke of Anjou, the earls of Granpre and Brenne, and the lords of Clere and Derval abuſed this favour; and Edward, notwithſtanding all his inſtances, could not procure the leaſt ſatisfaction, as to that article. 1369. Act. Pub.

The duke of Orleans, by the grant of certain lands to Thomas of Woodſtock, one of the king's ſons, obtained his own, with the freedom of Audreſel, another of the priſoners. Froiſſart.

The duke of Bourbon, having an opportunity to do the king ſome ſervice with the pope, was ſet at liberty, on the payment only of 12000 crowns, given, by the prince of Wales, to the perſon that took him, at Poictiers.

The affair of Belville being put to arbitration, Edward, relying on the ſincerity of the French, and the juſtice of his cauſe, was pleaſed, even after the duke of Anjou's eſcape, to promiſe to releaſe the duke of Berry and the earl of Alenſon, if the matter in diſpute was decided, in favour of France; and he carried his generoſity ſo far, that he permitted theſe two princes to return home, being ſatisfied with their bare word, that, if the affair was determined, in his behalf, they would return to England, and remain in hoſtage, only till he was in poſſeſſion of the territory in diſpute. The princes embraced his generoſity, and went to France; whilſt, in the interim, the affair was left undecided, and the hoſtages thought no more of returning.

The earl of St. Pol procured his liberty, by leaving his two ſons, in his room.

Charles d' Artois made his eſcape, without taking leave.

The lords of Luxemburg, Eſtampes, and Hengeſt died, in England; but Charles ſent no other hoſtages, in their ſtead, though he was often required.

The earl of Harcourt received leave, for a limited time, and returned no more.

Guy de Blois behaved, in the ſame manner; tho' he agreed afterwards with Edward, by giving him Soiſſons.

Montmorency, Boucherche, and Maulevrier had leave to go to France, and never returned; tho', in all probability, they gave the king ſome ſatisfaction, ſince we do not find any complaint 1369. complaint againſt them, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, from whence I have extracted theſe particulars.

As for the other inferior hoſtages, and the burgeſſes of the towns, of which Tholouſe neglected to ſend her's, Edward generouſly releaſed ſome; and the reſt either compounded for their ranſom, or died, in England.

As for king John's ranſom, near two millions ſtill remained unpaid; for, tho' Edward received of Charles, at ſeveral times, about 300,000 crowns, beſides the ſums paid by the king, his father, the whole amounted to little more than the firſt million, which was due, ſeven or eight months before.

It is evident, then, that Edward was the only perſon injured; and yet Charles alledged, that the treaty of Bretigny was void, by the non-performance of ſome articles, on the part of England, tho' they are not diſtinctly mentioned by any of the hiſtorians. Upon this foundation, he aſſerted, that France, being reſtored to her antient right, might juſtly confiſcate the provinces reſigned to England; but, having made theſe neceſſary remarks, it is time to reſume the thread of the Hiſtory.

Ponthieu is taken from Edward.

Edward was extremely ſurpriſed, that Charles, who did not paſs for a warrior, ſhould dare to enter into competition with a prince that had gained ſo many battles; and he was ſtill more aſtoniſhed, quickly after, when he heard, that the earldom of Ponthieu was ſeized, and the principal cities of Guienne were in arms againſt him. He called a parliament, which granted him a great ſubſidy, to ſupport ſuch a neceſſary war; and, by the advice of this aſſembly, he re-aſſumed the title of king of France, which he had quitted, ſince the peace. Upon the grant of this aid from his ſubjects, and a poſitive promiſe, to furniſh him with ſupplies, during the continuance of the war, he, firſt of all, ſent troops to the prince of Wales, to recover the cities of Guienne; and then he diſpatched the duke of Lancaſter, his fourth ſon, to Calais, with a numerous army; but the duke's progreſs ended, in ravaging the open country, without making ſo much as a ſingle conqueſt.

The death of the queen. Walſing.

The renewal of the war was not the only thing, that, this year, interrupted Edward's tranquillity; for the loſs of his queen exceedingly increaſed his affliction. He had lived with her, 40 years, in perfect union; and he had by her no leſs than 12 children. This excellent queen was extremely lamented by the people, who had always found her ready to relieve their neceſſities; and the poor, eſpecially, were great ſufferers by her death *.

1370. The death of Chandos.

The war was continued, in France, under the conduct of Chandos, who commanded, in Xaintonge and Poictou, and maintained his maſter's affairs, in thoſe parts, in a flouriſhing condition; but, this valiant general being ſlain, at length, in a battle, they began to decline, in theſe two provinces. 1370.

The caſe was much the ſame, in Guienne; for the prince of Wales, who, by reaſon of his illneſs, could do little more than give directions, was extremely weakened, by the revolt of the principal towns, depending on his principality of Aquitain; and Limoges, a city of great importance, was ſurpriſed by the French, or rather deſired to change maſters; but the diſloyalty of the citizens ſo exaſperated the prince, that, having received a ſupply of troops, brought him by the duke of Lancaſter and the earl of Cambridge, he beſieged the town, took it, by ſtorm, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword.

The prince of Wales's diſtemper increaſes.

This was the laſt martial exploit of that renowned prince, whoſe diſtemper obliged him to be carried in a litter; but, at laſt, finding himſelf utterly unfit for action, he reſolved to return into England; entertaining ſtill ſome ſmall hopes, that his native air would reſtore him to his health. After reſigning to the king his principality of Aquitain, which he could no longer govern, he departed, leaving the command of the army to the duke of Lancaſter; but, before his departure, he was afflicted with the loſs of Edward, his eldeſt ſon, in the ſeventh year of his age; a prince of very promiſing hopes, that ſeemed much more to reſemble his father and grandfather, than his younger brother, Richard, who ſucceeded them; and the prince of Wales took his ſon, Richard, with him, in order to have him educated, in England.

1371. He returns to England. Act. Pub.

The death of the king of Scotland.

David, king of Scotland, died, the laſt year, leaving his crown to Robert Stuart, his nephew, ſon to his eldeſt ſiſter; who was no ſooner on the throne, than he made an alliance offenſive and defenſive with France againſt England; but this league was kept ſecret, as Charles did not then ſtand in need of this aid, which, doubtleſs, he reſerved for a more preſſing occaſion.

The departure of the prince of Wales entirely ruined the affairs of the Engliſh, in Guienne; for the duke of Lancaſter and earl of Cambridge, being ſenſible, that it was impoſſible for them, with ſo few troops, to reduce the revolted towns, or effectually withſtand the French, reſolved to return into England, to ſollicit freſh ſupplies; but, before they departed, they married the two daughters, of Peter the Cruel, king of Caſtile, expelled and ſlain by Henry, his baſtard-brother. The duke of Lancaſter, eſpouſing Conſtantia, the eldeſt, immediately aſſumed the title of king of Caſtile and Leon, by which he ſhewed, that it was his intent to proſecute his wife's right †; but 1372. The duke of Lancaſter aſſumes the title of king of Caſtile. Act. Pub.

* She died, on the 15th of Auguſt, 1369, having been married, 42 years, and was interred in the chapel of the kings, in Weſtminſter-abbey, under a fair tomb of black touch-ſtone, with her portraiture on it, of alabaſter; and, about her monument, were placed the figures, and now remain the ſhields of arms carved and painted of 30 illuſtrious perſons. Among other works of charity, ſhe contributed largely towards the building and endowing of Queen's college, in Oxford, founded in 1340, by Robert Egleſfield, her chaplain and confeſſor.

† Pedro king of Caſtile, when he came to implore the aſſiſtance of prince Edward, brought two young daughters with him, who were left, as pledges for their father's performance of the conditions agreed on between him and that prince;

1372. but this proceeding obliged Henry to enter into a more cloſe alliance with France; and, as it was his intereſt to promote the humbling of England, he determined to aſſiſt Charles, with all his forces.

About this time, the Flemings, who had declared for France, were defeated, at ſea, by the earl of Hereford, who took 26 of their ſhips.

Gueſclin defeats the Engliſh.

However, this advantage bore no proportion to thoſe gained by du Gueſclin upon England, in Guienne and the neighbouring provinces; for this brave general, whom Charles had drawn from the king of Caſtile's ſervice, to make him conſtable of France, after expelling the Engliſh Limoſin, Perigord, and Rovergne, carried his progreſs ſo far, that he found himſelf in a condition to march into Xaintonge, and, at length, to beſiege Rochelle, with the aſſiſtance of a fleet ſent by the king of Caſtile, to block up the town, by ſea. Edward, upon the news of this, diſpatched the earl of Pembroke, with 40 ſhips, to throw ſuccours into the town; which precaution ſeemed ſufficient to ſave Rochelle; but, for ſome time, nothing had ſucceeded with the Engliſh. The earl of Pembroke, as he was about to ſail into the port, met the Spaniſh fleet, commanded by admiral Boccanegra, a Genoeſe, who fiercely attacked him; but, though the fight laſted two days, it ended, at length, in the entire defeat of the Engliſh fleet, the admiral and many officers being taken and ſent bound into Spain; which loſs compleated the ruin of the Engliſh affairs. Rochelle might have held out longer, were it not for the treachery of the mayor, who cauſed the garriſon to be drawn out of the citadel, under the pretence of a muſter, by means of a forged order of the king, which the governor, not being able to read, apprehended to be real; but, when the garriſon was come out, he ſhut the gates, and would not ſuffer them to re-enter; upon which, the town capitulated, and obtained ſuch advantageous terms, that ſhe rather became free than changed her ſovereign.

He beſieges Rochelle.

The earl of Pembroke is beaten, at ſea. Walſing.

Rochelle is taken.

Gueſclin beſieges Thouars. Froiſſart.

The loſs of Rochelle alarming Edward's adherents, in theſe parts, du Gueſclin marched into Poictou, where he took ſeveral towns, and, at length, formed the ſiege of Thouars, where the principal lords of the country had retired; which was ſo vigorouſly carried on, that the beſieged were, at laſt, conſtrained to capitulate, and promiſe to return to the obedience of France, if the king of England, or one of his ſons, did not come, before Michaelmas, with an army ſtrong enough to give battle. Such capitulations were very frequent, in thoſe days, when good faith was in greater repute than, at preſent; and, accordingly, they are no longer practiſed. The loſs of Thouars was of too great conſequence, to leave that place without relief, eſpecially as the king's honour was concerned; and Edward's extreme deſire, to ſave that town, and with it the reſt of Poictou, induced him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours. He 1372. ſoon aſſembled a fleet of 400 ſail, with which he would have gone, in perſon, to raiſe the ſiege; but, by reaſon of contrary winds, all his efforts proved abortive; for he was ſix weeks, at ſea, without being able to reach Poictou; and, at laſt, he was forced to return to England, after great fatigues and a vaſt expence, which almoſt exhauſted his treaſury; and he was ſcarce arrived at London, when he heard that the French were maſters of all Poictou.

1373. The affairs of Bretagne.

Edward's affairs, in Bretagne, were in no better ſituation; though the duke, his ſon-in-law, did all that was poſſible, to promote them. The people were tired of war, and extremely troubled to find, that, ſolely for the intereſt of the Engliſh, they were about to be replunged into their late calamities; and, on the other hand, the lords of Bretagne, bribed by French penſions, vigorouſly oppoſed their prince's deſigns, and treated, as enemies, the troops ſent thither by Edward, to ſupport the war. In this extremity, the duke, whoſe heart was entirely Engliſh, could not ſerve the king, his father-in-law, as he deſired, nor perform his late treaty; wherefore, he reſolved to go himſelf into England, to ſollicit a ſupply capable of procuring him greater authority, in his own dominions. Edward very evidently perceived the importance of this demand; but, not being able to do every thing, he was obliged to ſend back the duke of Bretagne, with fair promiſes only; whilſt he applied all his thoughts to reſtore the affairs of Guienne, which affected him, in a ſtill more ſenſible manner.

1374. The duke of Lancaſter goes to Guienne. Act. Pub.

Accordingly, he aſſembled an army of 30,000 men, the command of which he gave to the duke of Lancaſter, his ſon, ſtiled in England, king of Caſtile; who, landing at Calais, traverſed all France, without any reſiſtance, and came to Bourdeaux. From thence he advanced into upper Guienne, deſigning to expel the duke of Anjou, who had taken ſeveral towns; and he offered him battle, which the French prince accepted; but, tho' the time and place were appointed, both the generals, receiving intelligence of a truce concluded between the two crowns, retired.

1375. Froiſſart. Act. Pub.

Some time ſince, at the preſſing inſtances of the pope, the two monarchs ſent plenipotentiaries to Bruges, where the foreſaid truce was concluded, in order more ſedately to negotiate a peace; but the only fruit of their negotiation, was the prolongation of the truce to April, 1377; and, as ſoon as the truce was 1376. ſigned, the duke of Lancaſter led back his troops into England.

Though France recovered, in this war, whatever ſhe loſt, in the former, the particulars are very far from being equally entertaining; for, in the firſt, Edward's conqueſts were rendered illuſtrious by a naval engagement, in which the king commanded, in perſon; and the battle of Creſſy, where all the nobles of both kingdoms fought, in the preſence of the two kings, prince; but, their father taking no care to perform them, and being killed, not long after, the young ladies were left in prince Edward's cuſtody. When they arrived at years of maturity, the duke of Lancaſter was adviſed to marry the eldeſt, being eſteemed the true heireſs to the crown of Caſtile; and the earl of Cambridge married Iſabella, the youngeſt.

1376. and gained by a prince no more than 16 years old, is one of the moſt ſurpriſing ſcenes, in hiſtory. The conqueſt of Calais, in the view of an army of 150,000 men, is no leſs amazing; and the victory of Poictiers, gained by an army of 12000 againſt 60,000, and the taking of king John, are events, which command admiration. In a word, the firſt war was ended by the moſt important and ſolemn treaty, ever made between the two crowns; but, in the ſecond, the two monarchs, contented with directing their affairs in the cabinet, never appeared at the head of their armies; and, as for the ſieges, excepting thoſe of Limoges and Rochelle, there was ſcarce one that deſerves to be related. The towns, loſt by the Engliſh, were taken, or ſurpriſed, with a wonderful rapidity; and ſome even ſurrendered, before the approach of the enemy. The loſſes, therefore, of the Engliſh, may be juſtly called a defeat, which affords but very little matter proper to ſatisfy the reader's curioſity; and, for this reaſon, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that, at the time of the laſt treaty, England had loſt whatever was acquired by the treaty of Bretigny, except Calais. This plainly proves, that acquiſitions, obtained by force of arms, ought not to be relied on, as has been, and is daily confirmed by numberleſs inſtances; for, ſooner or later, a ſuperior force wreſts them from the conqueror, or his children. Thus, France loſt, in the reign of John, what was conquered upon the Engliſh by Philip Auguſtus and St. Lewis, as did Edward III. alſo loſe the conqueſts made by himſelf, in France; and the ſequel of this Hiſtory will inform us, that one of Edward's ſucceſſors amply retrieved all theſe loſſes, and the French, in their turn, recovered, ſoon after, whatever was taken by the ſaid prince. Such frequent examples ought to teach princes to bound their ambition; but few are ſo wiſe as to make this improvement of them. If we inquire into the natural cauſes of Edward's loſing what he had acquired by the treaty of Bretigny, they will appear to be extremely obvious; for the revolt of the Gaſcoigns, the prince of Wales's diſtemper, Edward's old age, his too credulous reliance on the king of France's ſincerity, the prudence of Charles the Wiſe, who, without ſtirring from the cabinet, managed the whole war, with the conduct and bravery of Bertrand du Gueſclin, were the inſtruments in the hand of Providence, to produce this great revolution.

Edward falls in love with Alice Pierce. Walſing.

The Engliſh were, in ſome degree, comforted for all their loſſes, by the tranquillity enjoyed by the truce; and the king himſelf ſeemed to lay aſide his martial inclinations, for others, which ſomewhat endangered his reputation; for, in his old age, his paſſion for Alice Pierce had ſuch an aſcendant over him, that it led him to be guilty of weakneſſes unbecoming ſuch a renowned monarch. The money, raiſed for the war, was ſpeedily conſumed by this avaricious ſhe-favourite; which occaſioned an univerſal diſcontent, in the kingdom. The king, now, employed his thoughts, about nothing elſe, but the pleaſing of his miſtreſs; and entertainments were daily made, at an immenſe expence. Taxes were the more inſupportable, as the nation was entirely drained, by a continual war; and it gave them the greateſt uneaſineſs to ſee the money, deſigned for the payment of the national debts, expended in ſuch a vain and profuſe manner; but, above all, a tournament, held in Smithfield, gave great offence, where Alice Pierce, whom her old lover had ſtiled the Lady of the Sun, appeared by his ſide, in a triumphant chariot, and attended by many ladies of quality, each of them leading a knight by his horſe's bridle. 1376.

The parliament obliges the king to turn off his favourites and miniſters. Cotton. Walſing.

The king's coffers being empty, he called a parliament, to demand a ſubſidy; but his ſubjects, who had granted him ſuch powerful aids, for his glorious undertakings, had not the ſame zeal, to provide for his idle expences. Before they complied with his demand, the parliament bitterly complained of the miſmanagement of his miniſters, particularly of the duke of Lancaſter, his ſon, Alice Pierce, Latimer lord chamberlain, and others that were moſt in his favour; which petition was made, with ſo much warmth, that the king, finding that he could not reject it, without danger, granted their requeſt, leſt the parliament ſhould refuſe him the money he wanted; and it was not queſtioned, but the prince of Wales had ſecretly induced the parliament to take this ſtep, in order to remove the duke of Lancaſter, who was in too great credit with the king. The prince, perceiving that he was near his end, was not a little concerned about leaving his young ſon, Richard, to the mercy of an ambitious uncle, who might uſe his credit, to ſnatch the crown from him; and, indeed, Richard, by reaſon of his youth, was incapable of oppoſing the duke's deſigns, if they ſhould tend, as it was ſuſpected, to procure himſelf to be declared the king's preſumptive heir, after the deceaſe of his elder brother. This obliged the prince of Wales to ſecure, for his ſon, the protection of the parliament; who, for the ſame reaſon, probably, petitioned the removal of the duke of Lancaſter; and, during this ſeſſion, Edward, now in the 50th year of his reign, cauſed a general pardon to be publiſhed, to the great ſatisfaction of all his ſubjects.

A general pardon. Act. Pub.

The death and character of the prince of Wales. Walſing.

A ſorrow no leſs univerſal quickly ſucceeded the preſent joy, by the death of the prince of Wales, the moſt excellent prince England had ever produced; for he was poſſeſſed of all the virtues, in an eminent degree. He was a good ſoldier, and a great general, brave, without fierceneſs, bold, in battle, and yet extremely affable, in converſation, and of a modeſty which could never be ſufficiently admired. Such was his reſpectful behaviour to the king, his father, that he never once diſobliged him; and he was generous, liberal, and delighted with rewarding merit, wherever he found it; ſo that he wanted no qualification requiſite to form a perfect hero. The Engliſh commonly called him, the Black Prince, not for his martial exploits, as ſome have imagined, but becauſe he wore black armour; the news of whoſe death was received with inexpreſſible grief, tho' it was long expected; and the parliament, to demonſtrate their juſt ſorrow, for the loſs of

ſo

1376. so glorious a prince, who had gained the affection and esteem of the whole kingdom, attended his corpse to Canterbury, where he chose to be interred. This renowned prince died, in the 46th year of his age, lamented by the king, his father, who shewed, upon this occasion, less firmness, than he had discovered, in all his other misfortunes; and the king of France himself, though he had no great cause for sorrow, to testify his respect for him, ordered a solemn service to be celebrated, at Paris, at which he was pleased to be present, in person. Prince Edward left but one legitimate son, about 10 years old, and two natural sons, who made no great figure, in history.

1377. The king recalls the duke of Lancaster and Alice Pierce. Walsing.

The late loss of the English was soon followed, by a fresh occasion of sorrow. The king recalled to court those, that were removed from his person; and Peter de la Moore, speaker of the house of commons, who, in presenting the foresaid petition to the king, had spoken somewhat too freely, against Alice Pierce, was, at her instigation, confined in Nottingham-castle. The duke of Lancaster re-assumed his old post; and all the other ministers were restored to their former offices; but though Edward gave the duke of Lancaster this express testimony of his affection and confidence, he cut him off from all hopes of being his successor; for he created Richard his grandson duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester, and, presently after, conferred on him the title of prince of Wales; and he even obliged the nobility to swear fealty to him, as to the heir apparent of the crown. Finally, the more effectually to prevent any of his uncles from ascending the throne, to his prejudice, he put him, as it were, in possession of the rank for which he designed him, by causing him to take place of them, in all publick solemnities; pleasing himself in, thus, honouring the memory of a son, whom he tenderly loved and perfectly esteemed, by doing justice to young Richard.

The troubles, on account of Wickliff. Walsing.

In the interim, John Wickliff, doctor of divinity in the university of Oxford, began to publish his belief, as to several articles of religion, wherein he differed from the received doctrine; but pope Gregory XI, being informed of it, condemned some of his tenets, and commanded the archbishop of Canterbury and bishop of London, to oblige him to subscribe the condemnation, and, upon his refusal, to summon him to Rome. It was very difficult to execute this commission; for Wickliff had, now, many followers in the kingdom, and for his protector, the duke of Lancaster, whose authority was very little inferior to that of the king. Nevertheless, the archbishop held a synod, at St. Paul's, in London, and cited Wickliff to make his appearance; and, he accordingly appeared, accompanied by the duke of Lancaster and the lord Piercy, marshal of England, who judged their presence necessary, to protect him. After he had taken his place, according to his rank, and been interrogated by the bishop of London, he would have answered, sitting; and, thereby, he occasioned a great dispute. The bishop insisted upon his standing, and uncovered; but the duke of Lancaster alledged, that Wickliff was there only, as a doctor, to give his vote and opinion, and not as a party accused. The contest grew so high, that the duke of Lancaster proceeded to severe menaces; upon which, the people, that were present, believing the bishop in danger, espoused his cause, with such heat and clamour, that the duke and earl marshal thought fit to withdraw, taking Wickliff with them; tho' this did not appease the tumult. Some incendiaries spread a report, that, at the instance of the duke of Lancaster, it was moved, that day, to the king in council, to abolish the office of lord mayor, deprive London of its privileges, and reduce it under the jurisdiction of the earl marshal; but, this highly enraging the people, they ran, immediately, to the marshalsea, and released all the prisoners; and, the number of the mutineers continually increasing, they posted to the duke of Lancaster's palace, in the Savoy, and, missing his person, plundered the house, and dragged his arms along the streets. The duke was so provoked at this affront, that he could not be pacified, but by the removal of the mayor and aldermen, whom he accused of not using their authority, to restrain the seditious. 1377.

Wickliff explains his notion of the eucharist.

To return to Wickliff. The bishops being assembled, a second time, the doctor declared before them his sentiments, about the sacrament of the eucharist, explaining the eating of the body of Christ, much in the same manner as Berengarius had done before him; but, though his opinion was contrary to the doctrine of the church, in those days, the bishops not daring to proceed rigorously against him, were contented with injoining him silence; and it is said, he promised obedience; however, the dispute was revived, in the following reign.

The king makes Richard a knight of the garter. Walsing.

Let us conclude this reign with Edward's last publick action, who, in an assembly of the knights-companions of the garter, at Windsor, conferred that order on Richard, his grandson, which was the only honour he could yet give him, after declaring him his successor. This great prince, who was, now, indisposed, soon after, fell so dangerously ill, that his life was despaired of; but, before he left the world, he had the mortification to see the world leave him. Alice, his favourite, who managed him, in his sickness, permitted very few to come into his room. When he was on the point of death, she seized every thing of value she could find, even to the rings on his finger, and withdrew; and all his courtiers and chaplains, following her example, deserted him, without vouchsafing to warn him of the little time he had to live, and of the account he was presently to give of his actions to God. There was only a single priest, who, chancing to see him abandoned, in his dying agonies, approached near the bed, to comfort him; and he addressed to him some exhortations, to which the king endeavoured to reply; but the only word, distinctly pronounced, was the name of Christ, just as he expired. Thus, died this illustrious prince, 1377. prince, at Shene, now Richmond, in the 65th year of his age, and the 51ſt of his reign *.

Edward's death and character.

He was very tall, but well-ſhaped, and of ſuch a noble and majeſtick aſpect, that his very countenance commanded reſpect and veneration; and, as to his temper and diſpoſition of mind, he was affable and obliging to the good, but inexorable to the bad. Inſtances of princes are extremely rare, in hiſtory, that ſo conſcientiouſly perform'd the duties of a ſovereign, as well thoſe of an honeſt man, and a good chriſtian; though, in this laſt particular, his conduct was not altogether blameleſs. His converſation was eaſy, and continually accompanied with gravity and diſcretion; and, being a friend to the poor, the fatherleſs, the widow, and all who were unhappily fallen into misfortune, he made it his buſineſs to procure them ſome comfort, in their affliction. No monarch, before him, had ever beſtowed honours and rewards, with more judgment, and greater regard to real merit; and, though his valour was notorious and admired by all the world, inſtead of ſwelling him with pride, he never diſcovered greater ſigns of humility, than in the courſe of his victories, which he conſtantly aſcribed to the ſole protection of Heaven. He underſtood, how to maintain the prerogatives of the crown, without incroaching on the privileges of the people; and, in all the former reigns, there had not been enacted ſo many ſtatutes, advantageous to the nation, as in the preſent; moreover, Edward, always agreeing with the auguſt body of the nation's repreſentatives, made that harmony inſtrumental, to curb the deſigns of the court of Rome. The glory of the prince of Wales, his ſon, added a new luſtre to his own; and his uninterrupted union with his queen increaſed his happineſs. He was never either too much elated, in proſperity, or dejected, in adverſity; and he ſhewed no leſs moderation, in his loſs of the provinces, that had coſt him ſo much toil and treaſure, than in his victories, which had gained him the poſſeſſion. In a word, he would have been an accompliſhed prince, if his ambition had not cauſed him to violate, in a diſhonourable manner, the treaty made with Scotland, in order to diſpoſſeſs a minor king, that was likewiſe his brother-in-law; and ſome add to this the rupture with France, and his pretenſions to the crown of that kingdom, which they entirely aſcribe to an ambitious motive; but the following diſſertation will aſſiſt the reader, in forming a judgment, about this conduct. As to his paſſionate love of Alice Pierce, in his old age, the blemiſh of it is much leſſened, by his other noble qualities; and one might, in ſome meaſure, excuſe him, by ſaying, that he conſidered this paſſion, at firſt, only as an amuſement, in his troubles; and that, having felt very little of the effects of love, in his youthful days, he was not ſufficiently careful to guard againſt it, in his old age †. 1377.

His iſſue.

Philippa of Hainault, his queen, brought him 12 children, ſome of whom died, before him; and Edward, prince of Wales, his eldeſt ſon, left only one ſon, who ſucceeded his grandfather. William, his ſecond ſon, died, in his infancy; and Lionel, duke of Clarence, who ended his days, in Italy, left only a daughter, named Philippa, by his firſt wife, an Iriſh lady ‡. John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, was twice married, in his father's life-time, and had children, whom I ſhall have occaſion to mention, in the following reigns; and Edward's fifth ſon was Edmund, ſirnamed of Langley, the place of his nativity; who was created earl of Cambridge, by the king, his father, and afterwards duke of York, in the reign of Richard II, his nephew. William, ſirnamed of Windſor, died young; and Thomas of Woodſtock, the ſeventh ſon, was made duke of Buckingham, by Richard II, and afterwards duke of Glouceſter.

Iſabella, eldeſt daughter to Edward, was married to Ingelram de Coucy, earl of Soiſſons; and Joanna was firſt contracted to the duke of Auſtria, but afterwards to Pedro  the Cruel, king of Caſtile, before he was king; who died, at Bourdeaux, as ſhe was on her journey to Spain, to conſummate her marriage. Blanche lived only a few years ‡†; Mary was eſpouſed to John de Montfort, duke of Bretagne, and died, in 1363; and Margaret was wife to John Haſtings, earl of Pembroke ‡‡.

* He died of the ſhingles, on June 21, 1377; and he lies buried, in Weſtminſter-abbey, with the following epitaph upon his tomb:

Hic decus Anglorum, flos regum præteritorum,

† King Edward rebuilt Windſor-caſtle, of which ſtructure the famous William of Wickham was the ſurveyor; and he likewiſe founded King's-hall, in Cambridge, now a part of Trinity-college, and the collegiate chapel of St. Stephen's, at Weſtminſter, for a dean and 12 ſecular canons. Rymer's Fœd.

‡ Elizabeth de Burgh, in whoſe right, he was created earl of Ulſter, in Ireland; and William de Burgh, her father, eſpouſed Maud, daughter to Henry, ſon of Edmund, ſecond ſon to Henry III.

 She was married, by proxy, and entitled queen of Spain, but died of the plague, as ſoon as ſhe came into that country; ſo that the king, her ſpouſe, coming to meet her, to ſolemnize the nuptials, accompanied her to church, only at her funeral, in 1348. She was born in the tower, 1335; and all the Engliſh hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, that ſhe was contracted to Alphonſo XI, king of Caſtile; but that it was to his ſon Pedro, ſirnamed the Cruel, is undeniably evident from Rymer's Fœd.

‡† She was ſtiled de la Tour, by reaſon of her being born in the tower of London.

‡‡ This lord, being ſent to raiſe the ſiege of Rochel, was taken by the Spaniards, and, after two years captivity, ſold to a nobleman of France; but, after he had agreed with him, for his ranſom, he was, at his departure, poiſoned at a banquet, 1375.

A DISSERTATION on the SALICK LAW, and the DISPUTE between PHILIP of VALOIS and EDWARD III.

THE Salick law, at preſent, is generally taken to be a fundamental law of the monarchy of France, that excludes the females, and their deſcendants, from the crown; and in this ſenſe it is that Bodin ſays, this law was the foundation of the monarchy; Marca, that it was a privilege and cuſtom peculiar to the French; and Thuanus, that it was the Palladium of France. I might cite numberleſs other French authors, who give into the ſame opinion; and this idea of the Salick law is the reaſon, that moſt people, believing that it always had a particular relation to the ſucceſſion of the crown of France, ever ſince the eſtabliſhment of that monarchy, cannot conceive, how Edward III, ſon to a princeſs of France, could, with the leaſt colour, diſpute the crown of France with Philip de Valois, deſcended, in the male line, from Hugh Capet; not conſidering, that they take for granted a thing not conteſted, indeed, at preſent, but which, at the time of this famous diſpute, was the only point in queſtion between the two kings. Since the deciſion of that point, the preſent notion of the Salick law is juſt and certain; but I will venture to aſſert, that it was, then, doubtful; which I hope to demonſtrate, in a very clear and convincing manner.

By the Salick law, Edward, the next male heir of Charles the Fair, was deprived of the ſucceſſion; and the regency, or, to ſpeak more properly, the crown was adjudged to a more diſtant relation. It will, therefore, be neceſſary, for the better underſtanding this proceſs, to know, what is meant by the Salick law; which term, tho' it is in every one's mouth, ſo very few have any knowledge of; and, about which, the French themſelves are not agreed, though they eſteem it to be a fundamental law of their monarchy.

Some, as the famous Jerom Bignon, affirm, that it is in vain to look for the Salick law, among records, becauſe it is a law of nature; and, if there are any nations, where it does not take place, they are examples more worthy of wonder than imitation *. Some pretend, that Pharamond, the firſt king of the Francs, decreed, by an expreſs law, that the females ſhould not ſucceed to the crown, which has, ever, ſince been inviolably obſerved; but others attribute this law to Clovis; and Mezerai aſſerts, that the ſucceſſion of the males to the crown of France was only eſtabliſhed, by an inviolable cuſtom. This confuſion of ideas, concerning the Salick law, exceedingly perplexing this ſubject, I ſhall endeavour to illuſtrate this point, in order to conveigh to the reader a true notion of the famous conteſt, between the two kings.

Before the Francs ſettled, in that part of Gaul, they have ſo long poſſeſſed, they were diſperſed, by troops, in Germany and the Low-Countries, and received ſeveral names, from the different parts they inhabited; for ſome were called Salians, from the river Sala which ran through the country †; whilſt others were named Chamavi, Catti, Attuarians, Ripuarians, or Ribarols. Each of theſe colonies had laws, common, doubtleſs, to all the Francs, and probably ſome that were particular; of which the laws of the Salians and Ripuarians are ſtill extant; and, among the Salian laws, we find this:

" De terra vero Salica, nulla portio ad Mu-
" LIEREM tranſit, ſed hoc VIRILIS SEXUS
" acquirit."

This law manifeſtly relates to private inheritances; and the title de Alodio, under which it is placed, puts it out of diſpute. Accordingly, this is the opinion of numberleſs authors, as well French as others, whoſe names it would be needleſs to recite; and Mezerai was, queſtionleſs, of the ſame opinion, who ſays, that the ſucceſſion of the males to the crown was not eſtabliſhed, by any written law. Nothing plauſible can be advanced by thoſe, who found the excluſion of the females upon the foreſaid paragraph of the Salian law, unleſs that the ſucceſſion to the crown is included in the law, which ſettled the ſucceſſion to the inheritances of the noble families; which opinion is likewiſe embraced by father Daniel, in his Hiſtory of France. He pretends, that the rule, about the ſucceſſion to the crown, is contained in that particular article of the Salian or Salick law, that includes all the laws of the Salian Francs; but, as what this able hiſtorian affirms, in the reign of Clovis, is of great ſervice to clear up this matter, I ſhall tranſcribe part of it, here, to ſave the reader the trouble of conſulting him.

' It was then, probably, that Clovis pub- Edit. d'

' Many ſpeak and hear of this law, with' out knowing its meaning; and it is general-
' ly believed, that it concerns ſolely, or chiefly,
' the ſucceſſion of the males to the crown of ' France, by determining the qualifications of
' thoſe who may put in their claim. This no-
' tion is unjuſt, in ſeveral reſpects; for, of the

* One may juſtly affirm, that there is no beginning nor end of the Salick law; for it is the law of nature born with men, and not written, as Ariſtotle obſerves, The law of nature and nations is not written. Bignon. Rapin.

' 72 ar-

'72 articles of this law, there are only three 'or four lines of the 62d, that relate to this 'point; and, moreover, they do not par-'ticularly concern the ſucceſſion of the males 'to the crown, but belong, in general, to all 'the noble families, whoſe rights they regu-'late, as well as thoſe of the royal family. 'The words runs, thus: "As for the SALICK "LAND, no part ſhall deſcend to the FEMALE, "but all ſhall go to the MALE."

'By Salick land, is meant the lands of the 'nobles of the nation; and, beſides, according 'to ſome, the lands of conqueſt, ſuch as were 'almoſt all thoſe of the French monarchy, on 'this ſide of the Rhine. The principal occa-'ſion of this popular notion was the great diſ-'pute formerly between Philip de Valois, and 'Edward III, king of England. ----- Beſides 'this famous conteſt, the little uſe made of 'this law, at preſent, which is ſeldom cited by 'our lawyers, upon other accounts, was the 'cauſe of this common perſuaſion of its being, 'thus, limited; but, in reality, it contained 'numberleſs regulations, with reſpect to all 'ſorts of affairs.

'I am apt to believe, that what we, now, 'have of the Salick law, is no more than an 'abſtract of a larger code, abridged on purpoſe, 'that the people and judges might more eaſily 'learn the ſubſtance and principal points; and 'that becauſe, in the preſent book of the Sa-'lick law, the Salick law itſelf is quoted with 'certain forms, not to be found in that book. '----And this alſo leaves no room to queſtion, 'that it was, at firſt, compoſed in the language 'of the Francs; and that, afterwards, the ab-'ſtract was tranſlated into Latin, for the uſe of 'the Gauls, to whom it was to be common, 'in ſeveral articles, with the Francs; which is 'the abſtract or abridgment that has been 'tranſmitted to us.

Thus, we have three different opinions, of three learned criticks, concerning the Salick law; namely, the law which renders women incapable of ſucceeding to the crown. Bignon affirms, that it is a law of nature, which ought to be common to all nations; but, according to father Daniel, the Salick law is no other than an abridgment of the Salian laws, publiſhed by Clovis. As for the particular law, ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown of France, he pretends, that it is a mere chimera, a vulgar error; and he adds, tho' without alledging any proof, that the excluſion of the females, with reſpect to the crown, derives its whole force, from that particular paſſage of the Salick code, which ſettles the inheritance of the noble families, and conſequently, in his opinion, the inheritance of the royal family, that is, of the crown. According to Mezerai, the Salick law, or the law that ſettles the ſucceſſion, is not a written law, but an inviolable cuſtom, which is inſtead of a law; but, to ſet this matter in a true light, I ſhall examine theſe three opinions, and point out the objections that may be produced againſt them.

Firſt, as to the opinion that ſuppoſes the Salick law, or the excluſion of the females, and their deſcendants, from the ſucceſſion to the crown, to be a law of nature, I own, it might, with ſome reaſon, be maintained, that nature requires ſtates and kingdoms to be governed by men, if the Salick law extended no farther; but, ſince it reaches to the excluſion of the male-heirs of the women of the royal family, in my opinion, nature does not appear in that extenſion. Moreover, if the Salick law was a law of nature, it would be practiſed in all ſtates; or, at leaſt the exceptions, if any, would be very few; and yet it is, on the contrary, manifeſt, that, of all the independent kingdoms of Europe, eſtabliſhed by the northern nations, France alone follows this pretended law of nature; for all the other ſtates, Spain, Portugal, Naples, Sicily, Bohemia, Hungary, Swedeland, Denmark, England, and Scotland, admit of the female ſucceſſion. Whilſt France, then, is ſaid to follow nature, all the other ſtates deviate from her law, which I conceive to be abſurd; wherefore, in the third place, the Salick law has, all along, been accounted, as it is, at preſent, a law peculiar to France; and, it does not appear, that Philip le Long, or Philip de Valois, ever pretended to urge it, upon any other foundation.

As for father Daniel's opinion, tho' I prefer his Hiſtory to any other written by the French hiſtorians, I cannot forbear ſaying, that it is not only groundleſs, but improbable; and it is eaſy to demonſtrate, that the paragraph of the Salick code, on which he founds the excluſion of the females, and their deſcendants, has not any relation to the ſucceſſion of the crown, from the very title under which it is placed; viz. the 62d, de Alodio, which ſettles the inheritance of the Alodial lands. However, it muſt be, firſt, obſerved, that Alodial lands were lands of inheritance, not held of any other lord; which diſtinguiſhes them from thoſe termed Beneficia, that were diſtributed among the nobles, on condition of perſonally ſerving the ſtate, upon certain occaſions, of which women were incapable; and theſe were the lands called Terra Salica, becauſe they were conſidered, as belonging properly to the collective body of the nation, being held by private perſons, on the ſole condition of ſerving the ſtate. This being ſuppoſed, the whole title of the Salick law, where the paragraph is inſerted, runs, thus:

TIT. 62. DE ALOD. 10.

" 1. Si quis homo mortuus fuerit, & filios non " dimiſerit, ſi pater aut mater ſuperfuerint, ipſi " in hæreditatem ſuccedant.

" 2. Si pater aut mater non ſuperfuerint, & " fratres vel ſorores reliquerit, ipſi hæreditatem " obtineant.

" 3. Quod ſi nec iſti fuerint, ſorores patris " in hæreditatem ſuccedant.

" 4. Si vero ſorores patris non extiterint, ſo-" rores matris ejus hæreditatem ſibi vendicent.

" 5. Si autem nulli horum fuerint, quicunque " proximiores fuerint de paterna generatione, " ipſi in hæreditatem ſuccedant.

" 6. De terra autem Salica, nulla portio hæ-" reditatis mulieri veniat, ſed ad virilem ſexum " tota terræ hæreditas perveniat."

From

From whence it appears, I. That the Salick lands were Alodial, like the other, that is, were the real patrimony of the poſſeſſor. II. That the intent of the ſixth paragraph was to diſtinguiſh the Salick, from the common Alodial lands, the former being liable to military ſervice, which women could not perform; but, as the ſenſe of the ſixth paragraph muſt, I think, be ſtrangely wreſted, to extend it to the ſucceſſion of the crown, the moſt, that can be pretended, is, that the king's own demeſnes were ſubject to this law.

But, more fully to ſhew, that this article does not relate to the ſucceſſion to the crown, it muſt be remarked, that there are two original editions of the Salick law, one procured by Herold, and the other by Fr. Pithou; in the latter of which, this ſixth article of title 62 is imperfect, there being no more than what is inſerted above, whereas, in the other edition, the paragraph runs, in the following manner:

" De terra vero Salica in mulierem nulla " portio hæreditatis tranſit, ſed hoc virilis ſexus " acquirit, hoc eſt, Filij in hæreditate ſuccedunt. " Sed ubi inter nepotes & pronepotes, poſt " longum tempus, de Alode terra contentio " ſuſcitatur, tunc non per ſtirpes, ſed per ca- " pita dividantur."

I cannot imagine, if we conſider the whole paragraph, how it can, with the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon, be applied to the ſucceſſion to the crown.

Beſides, in all probability, when the Salick law was made, the Francs had not yet a king; for there is not the leaſt appearance of any ſuch thing, in the ſeveral articles of this law; and the preambles alſo ſufficiently prove, that the Francs were not ſubject to a ſovereign power.

This is the beginning of the Salick law, according to Herold's edition.

How comes it to paſs, if the authors of theſe prefaces were of opinion, that the Francs had a king, when the Salick law was made, that they have not taken the leaſt notice of him? For, as to the abſtract of the chronicle, it is a ſeparate piece, added by the author of the laſt preface, becauſe it treated on the ſame ſubject; but, if the Francs had not a king, how can the ſixth paragraph of the 62d title be applicable to the ſucceſſion to the crown of France.

It may be farther objected to father Daniel's opinion, that, admitting the article, " De terra " vero Salica", to relate to the crown, as well as private inheritances, if it be true, that this law was abrogated, under the third race of the kings of France, with reſpect to the Salick lands or great fiefs, it may, by parity of reaſon, be inferred, that it was likewiſe annulled, with regard to the crown; whereas it is undeniably evident, that the dukedoms, earldoms, and, in a word, all the great fiefs of the crown descended to the females. Normandy, Guienne, Ponthieu, and Montreuil fell to the kings of England, by the women; and the case was the same with the earldom of Tholouse, Provence, and Bretagne. The succession of the earldom of Flanders always devolved to the next heir, without any preference of sex, since the time of Charles the Bald; and all these examples actually subsisted, at the time of Lewis Hutin's death, when the Salick law was, for the first time, urged in favour of the males; and large portions of the Salick lands fell to women, purely, by right of inheritance. Where was, then, the observance of the article, "De "terra vero Salica nulla portio ad mulierem "transit?"

The history of the earls of Flanders, at the Hague. 1698.

The only ways of answering this objection are these two that follow: First, by alledging, that the Salick lands, or great fiefs of the crown, never descended to the women, unless when there was no male heir in the family; but this reply has no foundation. Not to repeat what has been said, about the earldom of Flanders, in the very time of Philip de Valois, Artois was adjudged to Maud, to the prejudice of Robert de Artois, grandson, by his father, to the last duke; as was also the dutchy of Bretagne, to the wife of Charles de Blois, though earl Montfort, brother of the late duke, was alive; and, supposing this law was not annulled, when Hugh Capet ascended the throne, it was, at least, abrogated by that monarch, in granting, in fee, to the nobility the great fiefs, without excluding the females.

The other way of answering the objection is by asserting, that, though the law was repealed, as to the Salick lands, it was not so, with respect to the succession to the crown, where it was always inviolable; but is it to be imagined, that a law should be abrogated, in the undoubted sense of the words, and yet remain in force, in a disputable sense, which is taken for granted, without the least proof? Moreover, I shall, in the sequel, evidently prove, that there never had been any occasion to repeal it.

A third objection, against father Daniel's opinion, may be drawn from his own preface to the History of France; wherein he maintains, article III, that the crown, after being hereditary, in the first race, became elective, in the second, and was hereditary, in the third, only by way of association practised by the first kings of that race, from Hugh Capet to Philip Augustus. If so, where shall we find the observance of the Salick law, as it relates to the crown, from Pepin the short to Lewis VIII? How could it subsist, in an elective kingdom, where it was in the power of the great men to place whom they pleased on the throne, and even to chuse kings not of the royal family, as, for instance, Ralph and Eudes? Hear father Daniel's account of this affair.

The last page of the preface.

"It is extremely probable, that Hugh Ca-
"pet, having confirmed the dukes, earls, and
"other lords in their usurpations, not only for "themselves, but their posterity, obtained also
"from them the establishment of the hereditа-
"ry succession to the crown, in his family; but,
"suspecting their levity, he associated his son,
"Robert. Robert did the same, by his son,
"Henry; and the custom of associating conti"nued, till Philip Augustus, who, believing he"reditary right to be sufficiently established, by
"the succession of several of his predecessors,
"from father to son, down to Hugh Capet,
"whose reigns, for the most part, were very "long, took no care to associate Lewis VIII,
"his son."

I shall, now, examine the opinion of Mezerai and those, who, with him, found the Salick law, that is, the exclusion of the females, and their descendants, only upon an inviolable custom; but it will be previously necessary to remove all ambiguity, as to that term; for it may signify either a negative, if I may be allowed to use that expression, or a positive custom. By a negative custom, I mean that to which no instance, to the contrary, can be produced; and which, however, does not form or establish any right. For example, there never was, in England, a lame or a one-handed king; now, though it should be asserted, in the strongest terms, that this is a custom that was never violated, if, unfortunately, the only son of a king of England should become lame, or lose a hand, would this be a valid reason to exclude him from his father's succession? The case is the same, as to the inviolable custom of France, taken in this sense; for it is not a necessary consequence, because there never was, in France, a queen that wore the crown, by her own right, that the females have no right to the succession; no more than it can be said, in England, that a lame or a one-handed man cannot ascend the throne, because there never was, in that kingdom, a lame or a one-handed king. I call a positive custom, that which is grounded upon some law, or, at least, upon examples and precedents, which demonstrate it to have been inviolably practised, and to have served for a rule, on certain occasions; and, in this sense, doubtless, Mezerai uses that term, since he confounds it with the Salick law, and attempts to produce an instance of its being observed. The question, then, is, whether there was, in France, any such positive custom, before Philip le Long, who, in support of his right, pleaded the Salick law, whether he, thereby, meant the paragraph of the Salick code above-mentioned, or an inviolable custom; but is it not extremely surprising, that, for 900 years, from Pharamond to Philip le Long, this inviolable custom, though it serves for a fundamental law to a great kingdom, should not even be mentioned by a single author? I believe I may affirm this for certain fact, though I have not read all; because it seems to me impossible, that, of so many learned men, who, from the reign of Philip le Long to this day, have diligently sought after proofs, in defence of the Salick law, not one should have been so happy as to discover, in the antient authors, any passages countenancing, or, at least, alluding to, this written or unwritten law; for, of all the testimonies that are alledged, there is not so much as one, but what is later than the time of Philip le Long. I am not insensible, that this objection has already been answered, by affirming that Marculphus, who lived, in the middle of the VIIth century, mentions the Salick law, in his Formularies; but this is a fallacy. No one ever pretended to diſpute the exiſtence of the Salick law, as it means the Salian or Salick code, in general; but the point to be proved is the exiſtence of this particular law, termed the Salick law, by which women, and their deſcendants, were deprived of the right of ſucceeding to the crown, before the reign of Philip le Long. Marculphus frequently mentions the former, in his Formularies; but he is altogether ſilent, about the latter, which is the point in diſpute. This unwritten law, this inviolable cuſtom, therefore, is to be founded upon examples and precedents, by which it was eſtabliſhed, or, at leaſt, confirmed; and it ſhould be ſhewn, that, before the reign of Philip le Long, there were inſtances of women, and their deſcendants, being excluded from the crown, by vertue of the Salick law, or inviolable cuſtom; and this is what remains to be examined.

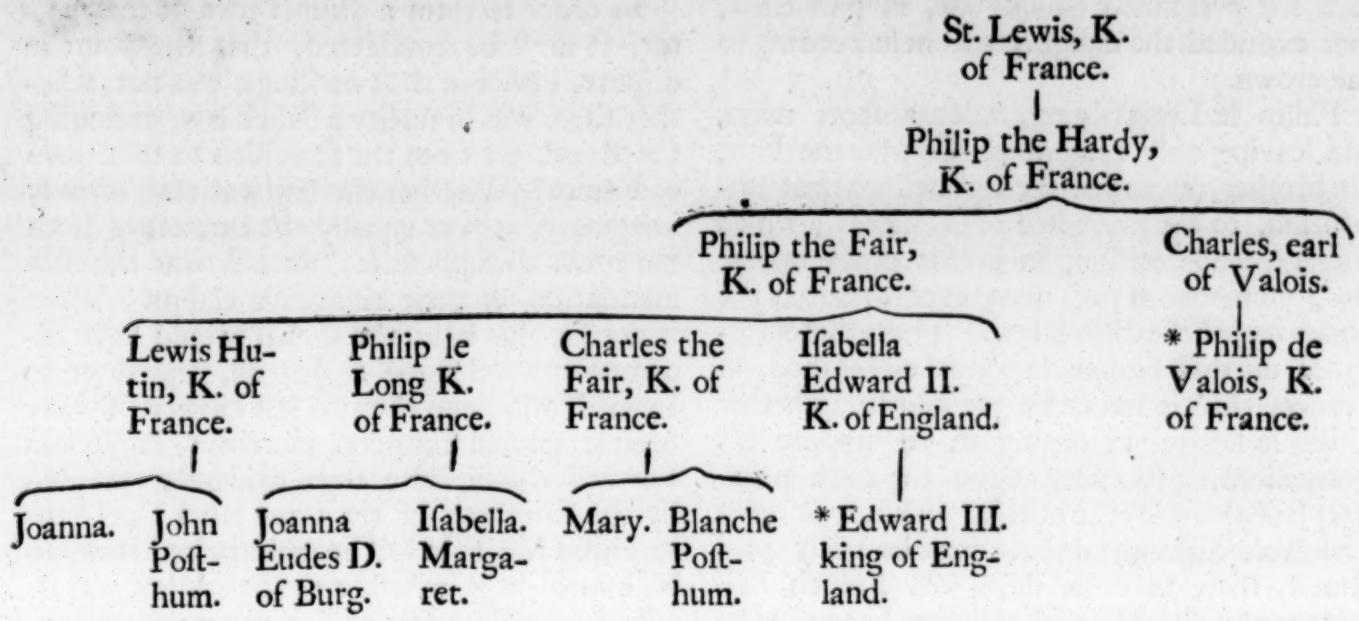
To begin with the third race, from Hugh Capet to Philip le Long, no ſuch caſe could happen; becauſe the kings of that family ſucceeded, from father to ſon.

In the ſecond race, it is impoſſible to find any inſtance, in favour of the Salick law, or inviolable cuſtom; though, on the contrary, a precedent might be produced, in favour of the females, from various princes, deſcended from Charlemain, by the female line, dividing the French monarchy, and poſſeſſing ſeveral parts of Charlemain's ſucceſſion; but, as this was at a time, when there were only two princes alive of that emperor's family, viz. the emperor Arnold, a natural ſon, and Charles the Simple, who might alſo be accounted, as ſuch, I ſhall not inſiſt upon it.

The firſt race affords three precedents, which may favour the cuſtom in diſpute. The daughters of Childebert I, king of Paris, did not ſucceed their father; but Clotaire I, their uncle, poſſeſſed his brother's kingdom. Soon after, Cherebert, king of Paris, dying without male iſſue, Gontran, Sigebert, and Chilperic, his brothers, ſhared the ſucceſſion, who did not leave any part to his daughters; and Gontran, having only one daughter, left his kingdom to Childebert II, his nephew. If it could be proved, that all this was done, in conſequence of the Salick law, or inviolable cuſtom, theſe precedents would amount to the moſt valid proofs; but, unhappily, not a ſingle author, before Philip le Long, ſpeaks, on this occaſion, of the Salick law, or cuſtom. Indeed, Mezerai, who wrote, 1200 years after, boldly aſſerts, that Clotaire ſucceeded his brother, by vertue of the Salick law; and that this is the firſt inſtance of its obſervance; but, at the ſame time, he ſays, that Clotaire impriſoned his nieces, leſt they ſhould diſpute with him their father's ſucceſſion. The ſame thing fell out, in the ſucceſſion of Cherebert; for his brothers, by force, ſeized his kingdom, without alledging the Salick law, to ſupport their right. Accordingly, preſident Fauchet, on account of the violence practiſed, on both theſe occaſions, gives up theſe two precedents, and confines himſelf to the third, which is the moſt plauſible: Gontran, having only one daughter, adopted Childebert II, his nephew, and left him his kingdom; but this daughter was a nun; and, moreover, from Gontran's believing it in his power to leave his ſucceſſion entire to Childebert II, without giving any ſhare to Clotaire II, who was likewiſe his nephew, and Childebert's brother, in all appearance, it may be inferred, that he did not conſider himſelf, as bound by any law; and that there was not, then, any ſettled rule, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion. It will be ſaid, perhaps, that, in appointing Childebert, the eldeſt of the two brothers, for his ſucceſſor, he only followed the diſpoſition of the law or cuſtom; but the whole hiſtory of the firſt race evidently ſhews, that the eldeſt had no privilege; and that the kingdoms, of which the French monarchy, then, conſiſted, were always divided among the brothers. However that be, it is not ſufficient to prove, that Gontran did a thing conformable to the pretended diſpoſition of the Salick law or cuſtom; but it muſt alſo be made appear, that he did it, with an intent to obſerve that cuſtom or law, which I think impoſſible. It would entirely alter the caſe, if the law was perfectly known, or the cuſtom undeniably eſtabliſhed by former precedents; which might give occaſion to preſume, that Gontran intended to conform himſelf to it; but, if we inquire into what paſſed, during the firſt race, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion, we ſhall find nothing fixed or ſettled, as to that point; and that force and arms were more concerned in it than laws. This is ſo certain, that it is even doubtful, according to father Daniel, whether the children ought to be preferred to the brothers; which queſtion was not fully decided, till long after the beginning of the ſecond race; and it is manifeſt, then, from what has been ſaid, that the opinion, that there was, in France, before the time of Philip le Long, a law or cuſtom excluding the daughters from the ſucceſſion to the crown, cannot be ſupported by any undubitable teſtimony, or indeniable matter of fact.

Having explained the meaning of the Salick law, which, though it be a common term, is generally miſunderſtood, it will be neceſſary, in order fully to clear this matter, to ſhew, how the practice of this law was eſtabliſhed, in France; but, that the reader may the better underſtand this ſubject, I ſhall preſent him with the following part of the genealogy of the kings of France; which will alſo be of uſe to diſcover the occaſion of the conteſt, between Edward and Philip de Valois.

St. Lewis,



Lewis Hutin, dying, in 1316, left, by Clemence of Burgundy, his wife, only one daughter, an infant, named Joanna; but, his queen being big with child, the crown was not diſpoſed of, till after her delivery; becauſe, if the queen was delivered of a ſon, he was to ſucceed his father, not by vertue of the Salick law, but by a law common to all ſtates, purſuant to which the males have always the preference to the females of the ſame degree. In the interim, Philip le Long, the eldeſt of the deceaſed king's two brothers, was appointed regent; I ſay, appointed, in the words of father Daniel, who does not inform us, by whom he was appointed. Philip was, then, at Lyons, intent upon procuring a conclave for the election of a new pope; which was the reaſon of his not coming to Paris, till three weeks after the deceaſe of the king, his brother; where he found a party already formed againſt him, at the head of which was Charles, earl of Valois, his uncle, who deſigned to diſpute the regency with him, and was in poſſeſſion of the Louvre. However, Philip, at his arrival, diſlodged him; and, the next day, he aſſembled the parliament, who unanimouſly adjudged the regency to him, for 18 years, provided the queen was delivered of a ſon.

In the interim, as the queen might chance to have a daughter, Eudes, duke of Burgundy, uncle, by the mother's ſide, to Joanna, daughter of the late king, was preparing to proſecute his niece's right; and, at length, the queen was brought to bed of a prince, named John, who lived but a few days. Upon this, Philip, founding his claim upon the Salick law, pretended that the crown was fallen to him; and, as he had a powerful party, and was unwilling to have his title diſputed, he repaired to Rheims, in order to be crowned; but the duke of Burgundy, oppoſing the coronation, proteſted, in the preſence of the peers, that he would maintain Joanna's right, to whom he alledged the crown belonged, both by natural and civil law; and, that, at leaſt, the coronation ought to be deferred, till the pretenſions of the young princes were duly examined. Though the earl of Valois had attended Philip to Rheims, he was known to be in the duke of Burgundy's intereſt; and, on the other hand, Charles, earl of Marche, the king's own brother, who was of the ſame party, left Rheims, the morning before the ſolemnity. If the Salick law could be proved to be owned and admitted, before that time, I confeſs, the oppoſition of theſe princes would be of very little weight; but, as that proof is extremely difficult, as I have already ſhewn, it may be inferred, from the oppoſition of the princes of the blood themſelves, and contrary to their own intereſts, that this law, was not, then, eſteemed to be inconteſtable.

Philip, upon the duke of Burgundy's proteſtation, and prince Charles's retreat, ordered the gates of Rheims to be ſhut, during the ceremony of his coronation, to prevent an interruption, or leſt other peers might abſent themſelves; and, a few days after, he held an aſſembly, at Paris, at which were preſent a great number of lords, almoſt all the prelates, the principal burgeſſes of Paris, and the univerſity. It was this aſſembly that examined the laws of the ſtate, decided that the females were incapable of ſucceeding to the crown, and approved and confirmed the king's coronation; tho' it might be demanded, whether ſuch an aſſembly had power to make ſuch a deciſion; but, as the French nation has thought fit to receive it, this inquiry is entirely needleſs. I ſhall only remark, that it was, now, almoſt 900 years, ſince the eſtabliſhment of the monarchy; and yet this is the firſt time it was expreſly decided, in France, that the daughters were incapable of ſucceeding to the crown.

Notwithſtanding this deciſion, queen Clemence, widow to the late king, the earl of Marche, his brother, the earl of Valois, his uncle, the duke of Burgundy, a prince of the blood, and their adherents did not fail to diſcover their uneaſineſs, at Philip's acceſſion to the throne; but the new king, to free himſelf from it, brought over the duke of Burgundy, the head of the party, by giving him his eldeſt daughter in marriage, with the earldom of Burgundy, for her portion; upon which, the party diſperſed, and the Salick law paſſed, thenceforward, for a law as antient as the monarchy; tho' great care was taken to confound, as has been done, ever ſince, the Salick law, in general, or the collection of Salick laws, with with the pretended Salick law, in particular, that excluded the daughters from ſucceeding to the crown.

Philip le Long dying, after a ſhort reign, and leaving only daughters, Charles the Fair, his brother, aſcended the throne, without oppoſition, to the prejudice of his nieces; which was a ſecond deciſion, in favour of the males; and, from that time, none ever diſputed the authority of the Salick law. Thus, the obſervance of this famous law was eſtabliſhed, in France, tho' it was not yet known, whether Philip le Long, in urging it, to ſupport his pretenſions, proceeded upon the ſixth paragraph of the 62d title of the Salick law, or upon inviolable cuſtom; and it may be fairly preſumed, that, in thoſe days, the French had very confuſed notions of this law, ſeeing, even after its being inconteſtably owned, for authentick, the moſt learned cannot agree, upon that ſubject.

I come, now, to the famous conteſt, between Philip of Valois and Edward III. Charles the Fair died, in February, 1328, without any male iſſue; but, his queen finding herſelf with child, the ſame rule was obſerved, as after the death of Lewis Hutin; that is, the crown was not diſpoſed of, till the queen's delivery. However, tho' ſhe was ſeven months gone with child, it was neceſſary to appoint a regent, to take care of the government, in the interim; which occaſioned the great diſpute, between Edward III, nephew, by his mother, to Charles the Fair, and Philip earl of Valois, couſin-german to the ſaid monarch. This was an affair of the greateſt conſequence; not only as the regency was to be long, provided the queen was delivered of a ſon, but as it was obvious, that the judgment given, for the regency, would be a ſtrong precedent, for the crown, if ſhe chanced to have a daughter; wherefore, the affair was very warmly conteſted, on both ſides, not before the ſtates general, as ſome have aſſerted, without any foundation, but before an aſſembly of great men, purpoſely convened, on that occaſion. Edward inſiſted on his being the next male heir of the late king; but Philip adhered to the Salick law, which, he affirmed, not only excluded the daughters, but likewiſe their deſcendants, from the ſucceſſion to the crown, and conſequently from the regency. Philip carried the cauſe, as to the regency, and was afterwards crowned, upon the queen's being delivered of a daughter, in April; and as Edward did not proſecute his right, till ſome years after, the queſtion, between them, no longer concerned the regency, but the crown itſelf. All the French hiſtorians ſtile Edward's pretenſions chimerical; and the Engliſh, on the other hand, exclaim againſt the injuſtice that was done him. The buſineſs, then, at preſent, is to examine the rights of both parties, independently of the events, and Philip's poſſeſſion; which will be the only way to enable us to judge, whether the war, occaſioned by this affair, was juſt, or unjuſt, or whether, as I believe, there were, on both ſides, ſufficient reaſons, to juſtify the attack and the defence.

In order to form a diſtinct idea of this matter, it muſt be conſidered, that the point in diſpute, between the two kings, was not, whether there was in reality a Salick law, excluding the daughters from the ſucceſſion to the crown of France? Whether the law was real, or only imaginary, it was equally the intereſt of both monarchs to ſuppoſe it; ſince it was the ſole foundation of their reſpective claims. Were it not for this law, the crown would have inconteſtably belonged to Joanna, daughter to Lewis Hutin; and the two laſt kings muſt have been accounted uſurpers; moreover, Philip and Edward would have been evidently excluded by the daughters of the three laſt kings, ſons to Philip the Fair. The main point, then, to be known, was, whether the Salick law was limited to the perſons of the daughters, to exclude them from the ſucceſſion, or whether it extended to all their poſterity; and this was a query, that had never been decided, becauſe the ſame caſe had never happened, ſince the beginning of the monarchy. Philip alledged, that Edward could pretend to the crown, only by right of repreſentation, as ſon to Iſabella; and that, by repreſenting his mother, he could not derive a right, which ſhe had not herſelf; but Edward took care not to found his claim upon repreſentation. He inſiſted, on the contrary, on proximity of blood; affirming that he was the next male heir, capable of ſucceeding to the crown.

Indeed, it cannot be imagined, what uſe he could have made of repreſentation, which ſerves only to put a diſtant relation, in the place of the perſon repreſented; for he had no occaſion to be brought nearer, being nephew to the late king; whilſt Philip de Valois was only couſin-german. Accordingly, in all the pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts, about this affair, there is not ſo much as one, where he pleads the right of repreſentation, but always that of nearneſs of blood; and yet almoſt all the French authors, that have treated on this ſubject, combating a mere chimera, ground their reaſonings upon the impertinency of this repreſentation, though, after all, it was never urged by Edward. The Engliſh alſo, falling into the like error, ſtrenuouſly oppoſe the exiſtence of the Salick law, little conſidering, that it was no leſs neceſſary for Edward than for Philip; ſo that it may be affirmed, both ſides have miſtaken the true ſtate of the queſtion.

But, to have a juſt notion of this matter, a man muſt fancy himſelf contemporary with this conteſt, and conſider that the point in debate was never decided. Each party, therefore, was at liberty, before the deciſion, to explain and comment upon the Salick law, as he thought would beſt anſwer his purpoſe; whereas, now, it would be ridiculous to diſpute about the interpretation of a law, acknowledged by the French, and admitted, as then explained by Philip; and which they have, ever ſince, obſerved.

The buſineſs, then, in order to decide this new query, was fully to underſtand the meaning of the Salick law; with reſpect to which there was reaſon, as I have ſhewn, to doubt, whether whether it ever exiſted; but, ſuppoſing its exiſtence, the queſtion was to be decided, either according to the paragraph of the Salick code, "De terra vero Salica, &c." which gave no light to the point in queſtion, or according to the inviolable cuſtom of France, for 900 years, though there had never been occaſion to put it in practice; but, if, upon either of theſe foundations, a man grounded a judgment, he muſt, of courſe, meet with great difficulties. Could he ſay, that, from the paragraph "De terra "Salica," it was evident, that the male iſſue of the daughters were to be excluded from the ſucceſſion to the crown? or that this law, ſo long diſuſed, with reſpect to the Salick lands, and the eſtates of the nobles, had preſerved its full force, with regard to the crown? On the contrary, if a man founded his judgment upon cuſtom, how could he know, whether it was the deſign of the firſt eſtabliſhers, whoever they were, to exclude from the ſucceſſion the male heirs of the daughters, as well as the daughters themſelves? He could have no precedents nor examples, to direct him, ſince the ſame caſe had never happened. It is, therefore, raſhneſs, in my opinion, abſolutely, to decide, now, againſt either of the competitors, and more ſo, peremptorily to pronounce the pretenſions of either to be extravagant; which is the more unjuſt, as they both ſupported their claims by very plauſible reaſons, the ſubſtance whereof I am about to relate, if part of theſe reaſons have not, ſince, been fathered upon them.

Edward alledged, that all former deciſions, about the Salick law, concerned only the perſons of the daughters, and could not be extended to their male iſſue, without proving it to be the intent of the law; but this was impoſſible, on account of the time, between its eſtabliſhment and the firſt occaſion of putting it in practice: That, indeed, the excluſion of the daughters was built on very ſpecious reaſons, drawn from the weakneſs of their ſex, and the temper of the French nation, which would never venture to be governed by a woman; but that theſe reaſons could not be produced againſt their ſons: That formerly, among the Oſtrogoths of Italy, who followed the ſame cuſtom, there was an inſtance, that plainly proved, that the excluſion of the daughters might ſubſiſt, without that of their male heirs: That, upon the death of Theodoric, Amalazonta, his daughter, was not placed on the throne, becauſe ſhe was a woman; yet that did not prevent Athalaric, her ſon, tho' an infant, from ſucceeding to the crown. He farther added, that the Salick law was an extraordinary law, contrary to the law civil and natural; wherefore, it was to be reſtrained within due bounds, rather than extended, as if the females of the royal family were to be puniſhed, for ſome atrocious crime, which deſervedly drew down vengeance on all their poſterity. If the French believed women unworthy, or unfit, to govern them, he did not pretend to oppoſe that law; but why ſhould all the poſterity of the princeſſes of the blood ſuffer a puniſhment, from which the daughters of the peers, and the other great men of France were exempted, as well as their deſcendants? Finally, to interpret the Salick law, ſo as to deprive the male iſſue of the women of a natural right, was to make a new law, under the pretence of explaining the former.

Philip replied, that Edward, owning the authority of the Salick law, was greatly miſtaken, in limiting the intent of that law, to the hindering the kingdom of France from being governed by a woman; but that there was another, and no leſs eſſential end, namely, to prevent the crown from devolving to foreigners: That the French had willingly ſubmitted to Hugh Capet and his houſe, but never intended to ſubject themſelves to other families; and that a new contract was neceſſary to receive a foreign king: That the deſign of the French manifeſtly appeared, in their not conſidering the deſcendants of the princeſſes of the blood, as preſumptive heirs of the crown; and conſequently, that it was not indifferently the next male heir, which was to ſucceed, but the next deſcended, from father to ſon, from Hugh Capet.

It is extremely ſurpriſing, that, among ſo many authors as have treated on this famous conteſt, not one, at leaſt that I know of, except father Daniel, underſtood the true ſtate of the queſtion, between the two kings; but they have all amuſed themſelves, with combating chimeras, and made the parties alledge arguments foreign to the purpoſe, and ſometimes even contrary to their real intereſts. Some make Philip urge very valid reaſons, againſt the right of repreſentation, which it is certain Edward never intended to uſe; whilſt others alledge, in Edward's behalf, the moſt ſpecious arguments, againſt the Salick law, tho' it was manifeſtly his intereſt to ſupport it. I am, therefore, apt to believe, that the harangue, Paulus Æmilius puts into the mouth of Robert d' Artois, in defence of Philip's right, is a mere invention of the hiſtorian; ſince the orator does not confine himſelf to the true caſe, though, in all probability, Robert d' Artois was not ignorant of the ſtate of the queſtion. Paſquier, though a famous civilian, and well acquainted with the hiſtory of France, and, in a word, all the writers, as well Engliſh as French, are guilty of the ſame error; and, as for father Daniel, after truly ſtating the controverſy, and briefly relating the reaſons of Philip de Valois, without giving his own opinion, he makes Edward's pretenſions to be conſidered, in the courſe of his hiſtory, as chimerical.

This caſe was never decided, as to the crown, but only with reſpect to the regency; and it cannot be denied, that, in this judgment, Philip had a great advantage, as the judges were all his relations and friends, and his competitor was a minor and foreigner. Philip afterwards took it for granted, in imitation of Philip le Long, that the judgment, which adjudged him the regency, gave him alſo a right to the crown; and, by that, the queſtion was really decided. He was ſo greatly prejudiced, in favour of his own right, that he ordered the hands and feet of a burgher of Compiegne to be cut off, for maintaining that Edward's title was better than his; but we cannot ſay, what the iſſue would have been, if the deciſion of the affair had been referred to the ſtates of the realm; which ſeveral thought to be the only means, firmly to eſtabiiſh Philip's right. All that can be affirmed is, that the eſtabliſhment of the Salick law, in favour of Philip le Long, and its confirmation, by Charles the Fair's acceſſion to the throne could not have prejudiced Edward; for the ſole buſineſs was, either to limit the Salick law to the perſons of the daughters, or to extend it to all their poſterity; which had never been decided, before.

My intent, in what has been ſaid, as well concerning the Salick law, as the diſpute, between the two kings, was, I. To rectify moſt people's miſtaken notions of this law. II. To ſhew preciſely, wherein conſiſted the diſpute between the two competitors. III. That this affair, having its difficulties, was not eaſily to be determined, by law. IV. and Laſtly, that both the monarchs had very plauſible reaſons; and conſequently it was a juſt matter of proceſs. This would have occaſioned too great a digreſſion, in the body of the Hiſtory; but, as the war, cauſed by this quarrel, was of a long continuance, and renewed by ſeveral of Edward's ſucceſſors, I imagined that it would not be unacceptable to the reader to know the origin and foundation of it; nay, it may be ſaid, that this quarrel is not yet ended, ſince, from the time of Edward III, the kings of England have, all along, borne, and ſtill bear the title of kings of France.

12. RICHARD II. ſirnamed of Bourdeaux.

1377. EDWARD III, having finiſhed his glorious life, Richard, his grandſon, had naturally a right to be his ſucceſſor, as repreſenting the late prince of Wales, his father; but, though Edward himſelf had ſo ordered it, many were apprehenſive, that the execution of his laſt will would meet with mighty obſtacles. Richard had three uncles, who might have ſupported their pretenſions to the crown, with ſpecious and illuſory reaſons; and the young prince could claim it, only by right of repreſentation, of which there had been no precedent, at leaſt, with reſpect to the crown, ſince the Norman conqueſt. However lawful this right might be, as to private perſons, by the general diſpoſition of the laws, it did not neceſſarily follow, that it was inconteſtable, concerning the crown; for, in France, the ſucceſſion of the kingdom was not regulated by the laws of private eſtates. In Spain, the kings, who, for a century, had ſucceeded to the crown of Caſtile, were the deſcendants of a prince that obtained it, in prejudice of his nephews, ſons to his eldeſt brother; nay, a natural ſon was, then, in actual poſſeſſion, though, among private perſons, baſtards had no right to the inheritance of their fathers. In Artois, the aunt, by the judgment of the peers of France, was preferred to the nephew, who repreſented his father; and a quite contrary deciſion of the ſame court, with reſpect to Bretagne, had occaſioned, in that dukedom, a war, which, at length, was ended, to the advantage of the uncle againſt the niece, and Edward himſelf had eſpouſed the cauſe of the former. This was ſufficient to give the duke of Lancaſter, the eldeſt of the three brothers, a very plauſible pretence, if he had deſigned to ſeize the crown, as was ſuſpected by the late prince of Wales, his brother, the king, his father, himſelf, and all England; beſides, Richard's youth, who was only in his 11th year, and the expiration of the truce with France ſeemed to furniſh the duke with farther motives, to demand the crown, which he was better able to defend than a minor prince; but, on the other hand, if the duke of Lancaſter ſhould have entertained ſuch a thought, he might have been diverted from it, by conſidering the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, as to young Richard, whom the memory of his illuſtrious father, rendered extremely dear to them, and for whom the king, his grandfather, had intended the crown. Whether this conſideration prevented his uncles from taking advantage of his minority, or they acted purely upon the principles of moderation and equity, inſtead of ſupplanting him, they were the firſt to do him homage; the duke of Lancaſter, ſtiled, in England, king of Caſtile, ſatisfied his ambition, with governing the ſtate, during Richard's minority; and the princes, his brothers, were no leſs inclined to perform their father's laſt will; ſo that Richard was crowned, without oppoſition, on the 16th of July, 24 days after Edward's deceaſe. 1377. Richard is crowned.

At this coronation, we meet with the firſt mention in Hiſtory of a champion, who appeared compleatly armed, in Weſtminſter-hall, where the king dined, and, throwing his gantlet on the ground, challenged all perſons, who ſhould diſpute the king's title to the crown; but the original of this cuſtom, which is ſtill preſerved, is unknown; yet it is certainly of a more antient date than the coronation of Richard II, ſince Sir John Dimmock, who then performed the office of champion, was admitted to it, by vertue of a right annexed to a manor, he held, in Lincolnſhire. The king's champion. Walſing.

Immediately after the ſolemnity, the young king created Thomas of Woodſtock, his uncle, earl of Buckingham, and Guiſchard d' Angouleſme, his governor, earl of Huntingdon; and, at the ſame time, he conferred the title of earl of Nottingham upon John de Mowbray, and that of earl of Northumberland upon Henry Piercy, who was likewiſe earl marſhal. Richard confers ſeveral honours. Act. Pub.

Edward's truce with France was expired, ſince April the 1ſt; and yet no preparations were made by the Engliſh, to renew the war; for, 1377. for, whether the late king's illneſs occaſioned this negligence, or it was prepoſterouſly imagined, that France, with the great advantages ſhe had gained, would reſt contented, there was, in England, an amazing ſecurity; whereas, in France, Charles V. was diligently preparing to improve this indolence, to his own advantage. He no ſooner heard, that Edward was incapable of acting, than he diſpatched orders to levy troops, on all ſides; ſo that, when he received the news of his death, he was in a condition to bring five armies into the field.

Charles V. brings five armies into the field.

He ſent the firſt into Guienne, to compleat the expulſion of the Engliſh out of that province; the ſecond into Auvergne; the third into Bretagne; the fourth into Artois; and the fifth he kept with him, in order to aſſiſt the reſt, in caſes of neceſſity. Beſides theſe armies, he had alſo equipp'd a powerful fleet, which was ordered to infeſt the coaſt of England; and, the Engliſh being wholly unprepared, the French, landing in ſeveral places, burnt Haſtings, Portſmouth, Dartmouth, Plymouth, and defeated ſome troops aſſembled by the prior of Lewis, in order to put a ſtop to their ravages. They were repulſed at Wincheſter; but they landed in the iſle of Wight, where they plundered all the inhabitants; and, after a fruitleſs attempt to take Carisbrook-caſtle, retired, with their booty.

The king's uncles govern the ſtate.

All this happened, whilſt the Engliſh were employed, in placing Richard on the throne; and, in the interim, they had neither fleets nor troops, to oppoſe the enemies. The duke of Lancaſter and the earl of Cambridge, the king's uncles, by reaſon of his minority, aſſumed the reins of the government; but they exerciſed their authority, with great caution, leſt they ſhould create any prejudices againſt them, that might be detrimental to them, in the approaching parliament. The duke of Lancaſter had incurred the ill-will of the Engliſh, by the abuſe of his power, in the late reign, and eſpecially of the Londoners, by cauſing them to be puniſhed, for the tumult raiſed, on Wickliff's account; and though, ſince the king his father's death, he had been reconciled to the city, that proceeding was conſidered, only as the effect of his policy, and it was feared that he would behave, as imperiouſly as ever, if he was entruſted with the adminiſtration. As he was no ſtranger to the ſentiments of the people, he was extremely circumſpect in his conduct, to prevent his being excluded from the regency, to which he aſpired; but all his precautions were ineffectual; and the little care the two princes took, to guard the coaſts, was openly complained of, without conſidering that they had neither fleet, troops, money, nor even any lawful authority to raiſe extraordinary forces. Another accident contributed very much to incenſe the people againſt them; for, the Scots having taken, by ſurpriſe, the caſtle of Roxborough, the loſs was aſcribed to the negligence of thoſe, who governed the kingdom.

The parliament, that met, in October, firſt of all, took care to appoint ſeveral governors to the king, during his minority, and ordered that his three uncles ſhould be regents of the kingdom; but they joined with them ſome biſhops and temporal lords, being apprehenſive of the danger of truſting the perſon and affairs of a minor king, ſolely to the management of the neareſt relations, who might have ſelfiſh views; but this was a great mortification to the three princes, and particularly to the duke of Lancaſter, who had flattered himſelf with the hopes of being ſole regent. 1377.

The parliament appoint regents.

This affair being ſettled, the parliament granted the king a ſubſidy, for the ſupport of the war; but it was clogged with this condition, that the money ſhould be lodged in the hands of Philpot and Walworth, two eminent aldermen of London, who were ordered to take care, that it ſhould be expended only in repulſing the French and Caſtilians in league againſt England. Moreover, it was declared, that this ſubſidy ſhould not be drawn into a precedent; but that, for the future, what ſhould be neceſſary, for maintaining his houſhold, and defraying the charges of the war, ſhould be ſupplied out of his ordinary revenues. After this, the parliament admitted an accuſation againſt Alice Pierce, the late king's favourite, who, being convicted of ſeveral miſdemeanours, received a ſentence, by which all her eſtate was confiſcated to the king's uſe, and herſelf condemned to baniſhment; but this politick and intriguing woman quickly found means to be recalled by the king, and reſtored to her eſtate. Before the parliament broke up, Richard confirmed king John's two charters; and he gave his aſſent to ſeveral acts, relating to the conteſts England had with the court of Rome.

A ſubſidy is granted to the king, upon hard conditions.

The duke of Lancaſter was not, without reaſon, debarred from the ſole management of affairs; for he was of a proud and haughty temper, which would not ſuffer him to have much regard for his inferiors, eſpecially in caſes wherein his intereſt was concerned; and, preſently after the breaking up the parliament, he gave a proof of his violent temper by an action, which ſhewed what he was capable of, if the whole power had been lodged in his hands. As he had ſome pretenſions to the kingdom of Caſtile, he thought it adviſable to gain to his intereſt the young earl of Denia, a Caſtilian lord, then at London; whoſe father, being taken, at Najara, by two Engliſh knights, was brought into England, where he had remained, ſeveral years, in the cuſtody of thoſe who took him priſoner; but, at length, by leaving his ſon, in hoſtage, he obtained leave to return home, where he died, before his ranſom was paid. The duke of Lancaſter, hoping to procure friends, in Caſtile, by means of the young captive earl, ſo managed, that the king ordered the two knights to releaſe him; but, as there was no mention of the ranſom, they concealed their priſoner, and obliged him to promiſe, that he would not diſcover himſelf. This diſobedience exaſperating the duke of Lancaſter, he ſent the two knights to the tower; from whence, however, they made their eſcape, and took ſanctuary in the church of Weſtminſter, but to no purpoſe; for, the duke of Lancaſter, ſending ſoldiers into the church, to 1378. to bring them away, one of the knights was retaken, and the other, defending himſelf, was ſlain, with a monk who too warmly took his part. The archbiſhop of Canterbury excommunicated all that were concerned, in the violation of the church's privileges; but the duke's authority put a ſtop to the proſecution of this affair; and, ſome time after, the king taking upon him to pay the Spaniſh earl's ranſom, it was diſcovered, to the people's great admiration, that the young lord, not to be forced to violate his promiſe, had, all along, attended, in a footman's habit, the perſon to whom he had paſſed his word.

The money granted by the parliament, is put into the duke's hands. Walſing.

In the interim, the duke of Lancaſter, being mortified to ſee the money granted the king, by the parliament, in the hands of two citizens of London, neglected the equipment of the ſhips, for the defence of the coaſts; but, this affected negligence occaſioning many complaints, he pretended, that he could not form any project, leſt it ſhould be diſapproved by thoſe, who had the management of the money; and, in fine, he ſo importuned the other regents, that the two aldermen were ordered to deliver into his hands the ſums they were charged with. Upon this, he promiſed, that the coaſts ſhould be better guarded, and the merchant-men protected; yet he ſtill delayed, a conſiderable time, ſending out a fleet, becauſe he expected from Bayonne ſome ſhips, which were to join thoſe he equipped.

The king of Navarre delivers Cherbourg to the Engliſh.

Whilſt the fleet was preparing, the earls of Arundel and Salisbury received orders to go to Normandy, and take poſſeſſion of Cherbourg, which the king of Navarre had promiſed to ſurrender to the Engliſh; but they had ſcarce left the coaſts of England, when they were met by ſome Spaniſh men of war, who fiercely attacked them, and did them ſome damage; yet, in ſpite of this obſtacle, they planted a garriſon in Cherbourg, which afforded the Engliſh an inlet into Normandy, as Calais did into Picardy.

Philpot defeats a Scotch pyrate.

Before the fleet, intended for the guard of the coaſts, was quite ready, one Mercer, a Scotch pyrate, perceiving that the Engliſh took no care of the northern ſeas, entered the port of Scarborough, and carried away the merchant-men that lay there; and, upon this ſucceſs, he long cruiſed in thoſe ſeas, taking conſiderable prizes. The damage, ſuſtained by the merchants, on this occaſion, cauſed freſh complaints againſt the duke of Lancaſter, who ſo ill performed his promiſe; and Philpot before-mentioned, to the laſt degree, incenſed to ſee the Engliſh merchants expoſed to the ravages of this pyrate, undertook, at his own expence, what the duke neglected to do, with the publick money. He fitted out ſome ſhips, and, with 1000 ſoldiers, went in queſt of the Scotch pyrate, whom he defeated; and, taking him priſoner, he returned in triumph to London. This action, tho' it gained him the applauſes of the people, offended the regents, who apprehended it to be of dangerous conſequence, to ſuffer a private perſon to engage in ſuch an undertaking, without the permiſſion of the government; but he made ſuch a handſome defence, and with ſo much modeſty, that he was diſmiſſed, without farther trouble. 1370.

A ſchiſm in the church.

The late ſchiſm cauſed in the church, by the double election of Urban VI. and Clement VII, employed the parliament, for ſome time, which met, in October, 1378. France was in the intereſt of Clement; and, perhaps, that was the chief reaſon of England's declaring for Urban; however, as the matter is ſtated by the partiſans of Clement themſelves, it cannot be denied, that his election was very irregular.

The riſe of it.

Gregory XI. leaving Avignon, upon certain pretended revelations, to reſide at Rome, died, March the 7th, 1328; and, of the 23 cardinals then in being, ſix remained at Avignon, one was a legate, and the other 16, of whom 12 were Frenchmen, and four Italians, were at Rome, at the time of Gregory's death; and theſe laſt, having entered the conclave, to proceed to the election of a pope, were greatly embarraſſed. Their intent was to chuſe a Frenchman; but, foreſeeing that the people of Rome would oppoſe it, they reſolved to give them a ſeeming ſatisfaction, by pretending to elect an Italian; tho' they agreed firſt among themſelves, that, as ſoon as they were at full liberty, they would elect another, who ſhould be the true pope; a project which could ſcarce fail of creating a ſchiſm. Purſuant to this agreement, of which we could have no certainty, but by their own confeſſion, they elected the archbiſhop of Bary, a Neapolitan, who aſſumed the name of Urban VI; and the election was notified to all Chriſtian princes, as canonical, even by the cardinals the electors, who, for ſome time, acknowledged Urban, for head of the church; but, whether in conſequence of their agreement, or, as ſome affirm, becauſe Urban treated them too imperiouſly, theſe very cardinals, leaving Rome, on pretence of great heat, convened at Anagnia, and elected one of the cardinals of Avignon, who ſtiled himſelf Clement VII; and theſe two elections, by the ſame perſons, long employed the moſt eminent divines in Europe, and occaſioned a ſchiſm, which continued, above 30 years. It ought not to ſeem ſtrange, that it was ſo difficult to decide, which of the popes was head of the church; for it would have been much eaſier, to produce good reaſons to reject them both; yet the ſchiſm divided all Chriſtendom, each ſtate declaring for one or other of the two popes, not ſo much on account of the right of the parties, as for political reaſons. France, whoſe intereſt it was, that the pope ſhould reſide at Avignon, eſpouſed the cauſe of Clement; but England thought it more advantageous to adhere to the pope of Rome.

The duke of Lancaſter undertakes to reſtore the duke of Bretagne.

Whilſt the two pontiffs darted their ſpiritual thunders againſt each other, the duke of Lancaſter, at length, equipp'd his fleet, according to his engagement, not only to guard the coaſts, but to reſtore the duke of Bretagne, diſpoſſeſſed by the king of France, with the connivance of the lords of Bretagne, whom he had brought over to his intereſts. This unfortunate prince, being abandoned by moſt of his ſubjects 1378. ſubjects, came into England, towards the end of Edward's reign, to demand his aſſiſtance; but, upon the death of his father-in-law, he retired to the earl of Flanders, his relation and ally. During his ſtay in that country, a French envoy, being ſtopped on his way to Scotland, by the earl's order, Charles pretended it was done, at the duke of Bretagne's inſtigation, and inſiſted upon the earl's diſmiſſing him from his court; who, not believing that his vaſſalage obliged him to that condeſcenſion, furniſhed the king, by his refuſal, with the pretence he was apparently ſeeking, to be revenged on the duke, another way. He ſent into Bretagne an army, to compleat the ruin of that unhappy prince, who was unable to reſiſt him; and England was too much concerned to ſupport him, not to make ſome effort, in his favour. The duke of Lancaſter, finding his fleet ready for ſea, embarqued himſelf, and ſet ſail for Bretagne, where he beſieged St. Malos'; but he met with ſo many obſtacles from Du Gueſclin, the general of the French army, in thoſe parts, that he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

The duke of Bretagne delivers Breſt to the Engliſh. Walſing.

This ill ſucceſs would, perhaps, have diſcouraged the Engliſh, had not the duke of Bretagne repaired to England, and offered to deliver to the king the town of Breſt, during the war, on condition that he would furniſh him with proper ſupplies; but this beneficial propoſal inſpired the king's council with freſh hopes; and, indeed, if the Engliſh had wiſely improved their advantages, they might have invaded France from four ſeveral quarters, viz. Guienne, Picardy, Normandy, and Bretagne, by means of Bourdeaux, Calais, Cherbourg, and Breſt, which afforded the Engliſh ſo many inlets into that kingdom. Richard's council, accepting the duke of Bretagne's offer, entered into a treaty with him, on the terms, propoſed by himſelf; and, the parliament approving the reſolutions of the council, granted a very conſiderable ſubſidy, to put ſuch an advantageous project in execution; and, beſides the party the duke of Bretagne ſtill had, in his own country, ſeveral of his adverſaries began to wiſh for his reſtoration, being unable to bear the inſolence of the French; but, as the fortified places were in the hands of the friends of France, the duke's adherents could undertake nothing, unleſs ſupported by the Engliſh, who were, with all poſſible expedition, preparing the promiſed ſupplies.

The Scots take Berwick. Buchanan.

In the interim, the king of France, concerted meaſures, to divert the impending ſtorm, by procuring, from the ſide of Scotland, a diverſion, to hinder the Engliſh from carrying their arms abroad; for the king of Scotland, gained by the preſents and promiſes of the French monarch, on a ſudden, broke the truce, and took Berwick-caſtle, by ſurpriſe, that town having been diſmantled, in the former wars. The earl of Northumberland, governor of the northern counties, aſtoniſhed at the loſs of that place, which was imputed to his negligence, ſo ſpeedily drew together a body of troops, that he arrived at Berwick, before the Scots had notice of his deſign; and, immediately after, inveſting the caſtle, he ſeized a bridge, the only paſs by which ſuccours could be thrown into the place, and ſo vigorouſly puſhed the ſiege, that, in nine days, he took it, by ſtorm. Douglaſs, advancing to raiſe the ſiege, found himſelf diſappointed, and haſtily retired into his country, to avoid a battle; but he was purſued by the earl of Northumberland, who, to retard the retreat of the enemy, detached a body of 600 men, under the command of Muſgrave, with orders to amuſe them, without engaging too far; yet, whilſt he followed them himſelf, with the reſt of the army, he received intelligence, that his detachment was fallen into an ambuſh, and entirely defeated. Henry Piercy, his ſon, ſignalized himſelf, both at the ſiege of Berwick and in the late action, and gave extraordinary proofs of his valour, which gained him the ſirname of Hotſpur; but the plague, beginning to rage in the northern counties, obliged the two nations to a ſtricter obſervance of the truce, without a new treaty. 1379.

In the mean while, the preparations, for the aſſiſtance of the duke of Bretagne, were diligently carried on; but, as the expence roſe higher than was expected, the parliament granted the king another ſubſidy, the burden of which was entirely borne by the nobility and clergy. The archbiſhops, biſhops, dukes, earls, and mitred abbots were taxed, at 10 marks a-piece, beſides 40 pence to be paid by the abbots, for each of their monks; and, the reſt of the clergy and nobility, with all that had places, being rated, in proportion to their incomes, the ſubſidy produced very conſiderable ſums.

The king of France confiſcates Bretagne. Walſing.

The king of France was furiouſly enraged againſt the duke of Bretagne, for attempting to recall the Engliſh into his country; at leaſt, he made that a pretence to ſummon him before the court of peers, where the duke took care not to make his appearance; but the widow of Charles de Blois ſent agents to the king, to repreſent to him, that he had not any right to confiſcate Bretagne, it not having been originally a fief of the crown of France; and ſhe maintained, that, if any of the former dukes had thought fit to ſubmit to any perſonal ſervices to the kings of France, they could not ſubject the dukedom, without the conſent of their ſubjects; yet the court, regardleſs of theſe remonſtrances, decreed the confiſcation of Bretagne to the king's uſe. This proceeding convincing the Bretons, that Charles's quarrel was not ſo much with the duke as the dutchy, they were apprehenſive of falling under the dominion of France, and that their country would be made a province of that kingdom; which apprehenſion occaſioned an aſſociation of the great men, that ended, at length, in recalling their lawful ſovereign. The duke, upon the receipt of this agreeable news, haſtened his return into his dominions, in expectation of the Engliſh ſuccours; and he was received by his ſubjects, with great demonſtrations of joy; but, in the interim, the principal places being in the hands of his enemies, he earneſtly intreated the court of England to ſend him ſome troops, to ſupport him, till a more powerful ſupply ſhould be ready.

1379. dy. Accordingly, the council diſpatched ſome ſhips, with troops; but they were, for the moſt part loſt, in a violent ſtorm.

The war continues between France and England. Walſing.

In the mean while, the French and Engliſh continued the war, in ſeveral places, but without coming to a deciſive battle; and, if the governor of Cherbourg gained ſome advantage over the French, they, quickly, after took ſeveral merchant-men, belonging to the Engliſh.

1380. The parliament, which met, in October, 1380, granted the king a new aid, to continue the war with France and Scotland, as well as to aſſiſt the duke of Bretagne; which parliament is famous for a ſtatute againſt the bloodſuckers, who had long devoured the kingdom; I mean, the foreign eccleſiaſticks, who, by this ſtatute, were rendered incapable of holding any benefice, in England; but, as this, probably, would not be ſufficient to curb the court of Rome, who did not think herſelf bound by acts of parliament, another ſtatute was enacted, to render the pope's favours, in this reſpect, fruitleſs to foreigners; for, by this act, all the king's ſubjects were prohibited, on ſevere penalties, to farm benefices conferred on ſtrangers by the court of Rome. This was properly attaining the ſame end, another way; for, the pope uſually giving Engliſh benefices to his domeſticks, to Italian biſhops and cardinals, they could neither reſide on their benefices, nor find any farmers in the kingdom; and, at the ſame time, the parliament petitioned the king to expel all foreign monks, leſt they ſhould corrupt the Engliſh, by impreſſions deſtructive to the good of the ſtate.

An act againſt alien eccleſiaſticks.

The earl of Warwick is ſole governor to the king. Walſing.

The parliament, having, thus, regulated the eccleſiaſtical affairs, removed all the king's governors, as well to retrench the great expence, as becauſe their number was prejudicial to his education; and, inſtead of theſe lords, Thomas de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, was appointed to have the ſole care of educating the king.

Commiſſioners are appointed to inquire into the ſtate of the king's revenue.

Such was the miſmanagement of Richard's revenues, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, that the houſe of commons, being deſirous of knowing on whom the blame was to be laid, appointed 84 commiſſioners, to examine to what uſes the revenues of the crown had been applied, and to lay their report before the next parliament, which was not to meet, under a twelvemonth.

Engliſh ſuccours are ſent into Bretagne.

Shortly after, the ſuccours intended for the duke of Bretagne being ready, the command was given to the duke of Buckingham, the king's uncle; who landed at Calais, in order to go to Bretagne, by land; and, perhaps, he would have found it difficult to perform his enterprize, with an army conſiſting only of 8000 men, had not the duke of Burgundy, who cloſely followed him, with much more numerous forces, received expreſs orders from the king of France, his brother, not to attack the Engliſh. That monarch had a more effectual way to be rid of his enemies, namely, by a reconciliation with the duke of Bretagne, who could have no proſpect of peaceably enjoying his dutchy, whilſt France was his enemy; and, for this reaſon, the duke of Buckingham, meeting with little reſiſtance, committed great ravages, upon his rout; but, in the interim, the king of France died, leaving for his ſucceſſor Charles VI, his eldeſt ſon, about 12 years of age. His death might have been very beneficial to the Engliſh, if the duke of Bretagne had inviolably adhered to their intereſts; but that prince, taking advantage of the confuſion of the court of France, in the beginning of a minority, ſpeedily concluded a treaty with the new king, who granted him whatever he could deſire. 1380.

Upon this agreement, the Engliſh met with a cold reception, in Bretagne; and, though the duke did not openly declare himſelf, at firſt, becauſe the Engliſh were in poſſeſſion of Breſt, it was obvious, that he did not intend to make uſe of them, ſince all the towns denied them admittance; but, at length, he diſcovered his mind to the duke of Buckingham, and, making the beſt excuſe he could, provided him with ſhips, to return into England. The Engliſh are ſent back. Froiſſart.

A truce with the Scots. Walſing.

The plague, which raged, at the ſame time, in England and Scotland, occaſioned the truce to be renewed, between the two kingdoms, till the following Eaſter.

A parliament. Walſing.

Though it was agreed, that the parliament ſhould not meet, under a twelve-month, ſome unexpected affairs obliged the king to convene it, in November, in order to demand a freſh ſupply of money, which was accordingly granted, to enable him to execute the reſolutions of his council, with reſpect to Portugal; but, whereas the nobility and clergy had ſupplied the former ſubſidy, this was a poll-tax, from which no perſon was exempted, not even the very monks and nuns; for all, above 15 years old, were to pay 12 pence a head.

They reſolve to aſſiſt Portugal againſt Caſtile. Act. Pub.

It is extremely ſurpriſing, that, whilſt England was actually engaged in war with France and Scotland, the king's council ſhould leave it unprovided, by ſending troops to the king of Portugal, who was in war with Caſtile; but private intereſt had the aſcendant over that of the publick, which is uſually the caſe, in the councils of kings, eſpecially, during minorities. The motive of this reſolution, in appearance, ſo diſagreeable to the ſtate of the kingdom, was this: Ferdinand, king of Portugal, had undertaken a war againſt John, king of Caſtile, ſon to Henry the Baſtard, in which he had been ſo unſucceſsful, that, inſtead of making conqueſts upon his enemy, he had drawn him into his dominions. In this extremity, he courted the alliance of the Engliſh, in order to obtain ſuccours againſt the Caſtilians, their common enemies; and, though it was altogether improper to ſend troops ſo far, when England could ſcarce defend her own coaſts, the duke of Lancaſter's credit was ſo great, in the council, that it was reſolved, Ferdinand ſhould be aſſiſted. This reſolution was made, under the pretence of hindering the growth of the king of Caſtile, a mortal foe to the Engliſh; but the duke of Lancaſter's private advantage was the ſole motive. This prince, who had aſſumed the title of king of Caſtile, on account of his marriage with Conſtantia, eldeſt daughter to Peter the Cruel, hoped, by ſending troops into Portugal, 1380. gal, to promote his own affairs; and, therefore, after the parliament's approbation of the intended expedition, and the grant of a ſupply, to carry it on, he cauſed the command of the troops to be given to the duke of Cambridge, his brother, deſigning ſpeedily to follow him, in perſon, with greater forces. In the interim, as the truce with Scotland was about to expire, the council, by his direction, reſolved to propoſe to the king of Scotland the prolongation of it, that the ſending the troops into Portugal might not be obſtructed; and, to forward this negotiation, he undertook it himſelf, and, forthwith, repaired to the frontiers of the two kingdoms, where he was met by the Scotch ambaſſadors; however, whilſt he was treating with them, there happened, in England, affairs of far greater conſequence than the truce with Scotland, or the war with Caſtile.

1381. The inſurrection of Wat Tyler.

The poll-tax, impoſed by the parliament, was levied, in ſo gentle a manner, that the collectors excuſed many perſons; but, as there are too many, who make it their buſineſs to inrich themſelves, at the expence of the publick, there were ſome that perſuaded the king and council, that, if more rigour was uſed, the tax would bring in much greater ſums, and even offered money, to have the management of it. In all probability, they were Flemings that farmed the tax, and obliged themſelves to give the king a certain ſum, for the produce of it; and the new collectors, appointed by theſe farmers, levied the tax, with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs. One that collected, in Kent, demanding of a tyler, at Deptford, named Walter, 12 pence, for one of his daughters, the father affirmed, that ſhe was not arrived at the age ſet down in the act of parliament; upon which, the inſolent collector, as theſe ſort of people generally are, attempting to know the truth, by an indecent action, the father, with his hammer, knocked out his brains. All the ſpectators applauded the action, and promiſed to protect the murderer, commonly called Wat Tyler *; and the ſpirit of rebellion did not only ſeize the inhabitants of Deptford, but all the meaner ſort of the county of Kent, who were ſoon followed by thoſe of Eſſex. The poll-tax was not their ſole grievance; for the people of thoſe parts had long been in a ferment, which, being inflamed by this accident, broke out into an open rebellion. They complained of the little care to hinder the frequent deſcents of the French, who had committed great ravages in thoſe two counties; and to this was added a general diſcontent againſt judges, and all the agents of the law, who ruined families, by their extortions. The nobles and gentry were no leſs deteſted by the peaſants, by reaſon of the right of villainage, which was extremely abuſed; and the populace were, to the laſt degree, incenſed againſt the duke of Lancaſter, whoſe negligence they conſidered, as the cauſe of all their calamities. Theſe complaints being ſpread in thoſe parts, and countenanced by the ſeditious, or, according to ſome, by the monks, who thought themſelves injured by the poll-tax, to which they were liable, produced an amazing effect; for, in a ſhort time, Wat Tyler, whom the ſeditious choſe, for their chief and protector of the poor people, appeared at the head of above 100,000 men, breathing revenge on the nobles and profeſſors of the law. Thus, attended, he marched directly to London, freeing, in his rout, all the priſoners in the publick jails; and, among the reſt, John Ball, a prieſt of Maidſton, who, by his ſeditious ſermons †, perſuaded the people, that, as all men were equally the ſons of Adam, it was their duty to reduce the world to a perfect equality. Purſuant to this maxim, they reſolved to diſpatch all the nobility, and thoſe that were diſtinguiſhed by their poſts; and, without farther conſideration, they cut off the heads of all the lords, gentlemen, judges, counſellors, and lawyers, that fell into their hands. After this, they took a ſolemn oath, that they never would own, for king, any man, named John; which reſolution ſprung from their hatred to the duke of Lancaſter, who bore that name, and was ſuſpected of aſpiring to the crown.

1381.

He is at the head of 100,000 men.

They behead the nobles and judges.

Richard, hearing that the rebels were come as far as Black-Heath, where Wat Tyler reviewed his army, ſent to know their demands; who replied, that they had affairs of great importance to communicate to the king, and deſired to have a conference with him. This inſolent requeſt being debated in council, ſome were of opinion, that the king ſhould comply with the rebels; alledging, that, ſince he was not in a condition to withſtand them, gentleneſs was the only way to reclaim them; but Simon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Robert de Hales, prior of St. John's and high-treaſurer of England, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, maintaining that it was not ſafe for the king to venture his perſon with ſuch a rabble; and, accordingly, the requeſt of the ſeditious was rejected, and with menaces, little agreeable to the preſent ſituation of the court. The news of this ſo furiouſly enraged the rebels, that they directly marched towards London, and entered Southwark, parted from the city by the Thames; and, having plundered the ſuburbs, without great interruption, they endeavoured to enter the city. London-bridge had then gates, which, being ſhut, at their approach, might have ſtopped, for ſome time, their impetuoſity, if the mob, who preſently ſided with them, had not opened them, in ſpite of the magiſtrates; upon which, they entered into the city, where they committed all the ravages that could be expected from ſuch a numerous body, guided ſolely by their fury. The duke of Lancaſter's palace was reduced to aſhes; and the houſes of ſuch, as they apprehended to be their enemies, were given up to be rifled, tho' their leaders, pretending not to be ſwayed by avarice, would not ſuffer their people to appropriate to themſelves any part of the booty, 1381. and even threw into the fire, which consumed all their plundered riches, a man that would have retained a piece of plate. In this universal confusion, London was like a town taken, by storm; for the archbishop's palace, the temple with all the writings preserved there, and the houses of the judges, lords, and principal citizens were devoured by the flames. This unruly mob took care to accomplish their oath, to extirpate all appearances of grandeur or distinction; but the Flemings, above all others, were exposed to their fury. They dragged them from the churches, where they had taken sanctuary; and, upon their not being able to pronounce certain words, very difficult for foreigners, they were, immediately, massacred.

They seize the tower, and behead the archbishop and treasurer. Walsing.

The rebels, having given these first marks of their fury, approached the tower, which might have been easily defended, had not the terror, spread in the garrison, caused them to open the gates; and, finding there the archbishop of Canterbury and the treasurer, they, without any process, cut off their heads. Upon this, they divided themselves into three bodies; for Wat Tyler continued about the tower, with 30,000 men; Jack Straw, another of their captains, advanced into the city, with the rebels of Essex, to the number of 60,000; and the rest, under the conduct of another leader, lodged themselves upon Mile-end-Green.

The Essexians accept the king's offers. Walsing.

In the interim, the king and council, after long debates, how to put a stop to these furious proceedings, could discover no better expedient, than to offer the rebels an authentick charter, confirming the privileges of the people, and a general pardon for all crimes committed, since the insurrection; which offers the Essexmen readily accepted, though they were now in the heart of the city; and, leaving some of their leaders to forward the charters and pardon, they returned to their habitations.

Wat Tyler rejects them. Walsing.

However, Wat Tyler was not so tractable, though he pretended, that his sole view was to obtain equitable terms; yet, as he seemed willing to enter into a negotiation with the king himself, Richard, with a few attendants, came to Smith-field; from whence he sent a knight, to desire him to come and confer with him. Wat insolently replied, that he would come, when he thought proper; yet he advanced, immediately, at the head of his troops, but so slowly, that the king, being impatient, and willing to press him to make haste, dispatched the same knight to him again, tho' it had like to have cost him his life. Wat Tyler was just entered Smith-field, when the knight delivered the king's message, without alighting, not imagining that he would insist on that ceremony; but the proud leader so highly resented this want of respect, that he would have killed him, if the king, who was himself advancing, had not cried out to the knight to dismount.

The king's conference with Tyler.

In Wat Tyler's interview with the king, being both on horseback, he made such extravagant proposals, that Richard was utterly at a loss, what to reply; for he demanded, that all the antient laws should be abolished, and the government modelled, according to certain fantastical notions framed by himself; and, even whilst he made these demands, he, every now and then, lifted up his sword, as it were to threaten the king, if he did not, immediately, comply with what he had proposed; but that this brutish insolence so raised the indignation of William Walworth, mayor of London, who attended the king, that, without considering to what danger he exposed his master, he discharged such a blow on the rebel's head, with his sword, that he laid him dead at his feet. 1381.

The king is in great danger. Walsing.

This imprudent, tho' resolute, action had a natural tendency to ruin the king, and all his attendants; and, indeed, the rebels, when they saw their leader on the ground, encouraged each other to revenge his death, and even bent their bows, to shoot at the king and his retinue; but Richard prevented the danger, by a bolder and more prudent action than could be expected from a prince only 15 years old; who, turning to the rebels, cried with a loud and courageous voice: "What, my lieges! "will you then kill your king? Be not de- "jected, for the loss of your leader; for I my- "self will, now, be your general; follow me "into the field, and you shall have all the "satisfaction you can possibly desire." Upon these words, he gently turned his horse, and, putting himself at their head, rode towards St. George's-fields; and the young king's resolution had such an effect on the minds of the rebels, that they altered their first purpose, and followed him, without delay; but they were no sooner come into the fields, than they perceived, on their march towards them, a troop of 1000 armed citizens, raised by the mayor, under the command of Sir Robert Knolles, an officer of great reputation. They were so extremely terrified at this sight, falsly concluding that all London was in readiness, to attack them, that the foremost ranks threw down their arms and begged quarter; which proceeding struck such a terror into the rest, tho' they were ignorant of the cause, that, in a few moments, the whole multitude was dispersed, without the effusion of any blood, except that of their leader.

The rebels throw down their arms. Knighton.

This event is, in many respects, so singular and extraordinary, that it is matter of the greatest amazement. An insurrection, indeed, is not so very surprising; yet that it should be headed by such a person, as Wat Tyler, is unusual, though parallel instances may, possibly, be found, in other histories; but it is, doubtless, very extraordinary, that a single man, as the mayor of London, should dare to kill this leader, attended by 30,000 men. It is still more astonishing, that a young prince, but 15 years old, should have the resolution discovered by Richard, on this occasion; and that his boldness should produce so good an effect. In fine, that such a numerous multitude, just glutted with blood and slaughter, should disperse, on a sudden, by a panick fear, at the sight of a few armed citizens, is what cannot be considered, without ascribing the cause to the Almighty, who holds the hearts of the people in his hand; and, indeed, it will appear, 1381. appear, preſently, that nothing leſs than a ſort of miracle could, at that time, prevent the utter deſtruction of England.

The like inſurrections in other counties. Knighton.

It was not only in the counties of Kent and Eſſex, that the ſpirit of rebellion poſſeſſed the people; for, whilſt Wat Tyler and Jack Straw advanced towards London, John Ball and John Wraw, two ſeditious prieſts, ſtirred up the populace of Suffolk, where they ſoon aſſembled 50,000 men; who committed, in thoſe parts, numberleſs barbarities, as if they were ambitious of exceeding in cruelty, thoſe who exerciſed their fury, in London. Sir John Cavendiſh, chief juſtice, fell a ſacrifice to their rage; and they burnt all the antient charters, in the abbey of St. Edmundsbury, and in the univerſity of Cambridge.

The inſolence and cruelty of Litteſter.

At the ſame time, Litteſter, an ale-houſe-keeper, at Norwich, headed another body of rebels in the county of Norfolk, and cruelly put to death all the judges and lawyers, that fell into his hands; and, as for the lords and gentlemen, he was ſo inſolent, as to oblige them to ſerve him, on the knee; but, if any one ſcrupled to ſubmit to that indignity, they, immediately, ordered him to be beheaded. Thus, he treated the earl of Suffolk, who would not feign to approve of their rebellion; but, as it was impoſſible for the king's council to take ſpeedy and effectual meaſures, to remedy theſe diſorders, it was neceſſary that private perſons ſhould, of themſelves, uſe their endeavours, without ſtaying for orders from court, to free themſelves from the impending danger. Henry Spencer, biſhop of Norwich, a prelate of great courage, tho' not of a military profeſſion, thinking it his duty to do ſomething more than barely offer up prayers, on ſuch a preſſing occaſion, which equally threatened clergy and laity, headed a few loyal ſubjects; and, attacking the rebels, he made a terrible ſlaughter; but, the two leaders, Wraw and Litteſter being taken, in the fight, the firſt was beheaded, upon the ſpot, and the other ſent to London, to receive the juſt reward of his crimes.

The Puniſhment of the rebels. Walſing.

Theſe commotions being appeaſed, ſooner and more happily than could be expected, the king, by advice of his council, reſolved to chaſtiſe the guilty; and, accordingly, the lords received orders to raiſe, in every county, troops of known loyalty, and bring them to London. In a ſhort time, was drawn together an army of 40,000 men; which being divided into two bodies, one marched into the county of Kent; and, at the head of the other, the king went himſelf, to puniſh the people of Eſſex, who began to ſtir again, upon the revocation of the charter and general pardon; but, as they had not leiſure to concert juſt meaſures, being prevented by the king's diligence, they were eaſily defeated. Great numbers were ſlain, and many others reſerved, for publick examples; and, among the latter, was Jack Straw, companion to Wat Tyler, and head of the Eſſex-rebels; who confeſſed, that their deſign was to murder the king, extirpate all the nobility and clergy, except the Mendicant friars, part England into ſeveral kingdoms, make Wat Tyler king of Kent, aboliſh all the antient, and make new laws. Poſſibly, theſe projects were framed only, in general, and over their bowls, whilſt they were on their march to London; but, however that be, ſuch a deſign, managed by heads, very incapable of putting it in execution, could ſcarce fail of producing the ruin of the authors. It is ſaid, that beſides thoſe that fell, with their arms in their hands, above 1500 died by the halter; and judge Treſilian was commiſſioned to go into the revolted counties, to try the guilty. As the number was extremely great, he had an opportunity to gratify his cruel and revengeful temper, in puniſhing the unfortunate wretches, with the utmoſt ſeverity; and the barbarities he exerciſed, during his commiſſion, may juſtly be compared to thoſe practiſed, by a judge of the ſame character *, in the reign of James II.

A vindication of the Wickliffites. Walſing.

Some would father this rebellion upon the Wickliffites, who were commonly called Lollards, but without any foundation; for it is certain, that religion had no concern in this inſurrection, ſince the duke of Lancaſter, an open protector of Wickliff, was the principal object of the malice of the rebels; and Wickliff, who, then, reſided on his living of Lutterworth, in Leiceſterſhire, was never queſtioned, on that account. All that can be alledged, to give the leaſt colour to this accuſation is, that John Ball, a Franciſcan friar, one of the ring-leaders of the rebels, was, a little before, impriſoned, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury's order, for preaching the new doctrine; but it cannot be inferred from thence, that Wickliff's followers excited theſe commotions; beſides, inſurrections, cauſed by a religious zeal, are ſeldom appeaſed, in ſo ſhort a time as this, which laſted only a month, from the beginning to the end.

The duke of Lancaſter is unjuſtly accuſed.

The duke of Lancaſter was on the northern borders, when the rebellion broke out, in Kent, which lies at the other extremity of the kingdom; who, upon the firſt news ſpeedily concluded a three years truce with the Scots; but, being apprehenſive of expoſing himſelf to the fury of his enemies, if he returned to court, and alſo of giving the northern counties a pretence to imitate the ſouthern, if he ſtaid in England, he choſe to retire into Scotland, where he continued, till the ſedition was appeaſed. The king of Scotland offered him 20,000 men, to ſuppreſs the rebels; but he refuſed them, leſt, by introducing foreigners, he ſhould occaſion a general revolt in the kingdom; yet theſe precautions could not prevent his enemies from ſpreading a report, that he intended to march to London, at the head of a Scotch army, and ſeize the crown, tho' he eaſily cleared himſelf from this groundleſs aſperſion.

The king's marriage. Act. Pub.

Whilſt, by this unexpected inſurrection, Richard found himſelf in danger of loſing his crown and life, his ambaſſadors negotiated his marriage, in Germany. From the year 1379,

* Judge Jeffreys.

1381. he had been deſirous of eſpouſing the daughter of Barnabas, duke of Milan; but, this project miſcarrying, he demanded, in 1380, a princeſs of Bavaria, daughter to the late emperor Lewis; which negotiation had no better ſucceſs than the former. At laſt, on May 2, 1381, his marriage with Ann of Luxemburg, ſiſter to the emperor Wenceſlaus, was concluded, at Nuremberg; and this princeſs, arriving in England *, a little after the troubles were appeaſed, was received, in a very pompous manner, agreeable to the king's humour, who was extremely fond of ſuch ſolemnities.

1382. The death of the earl of Marche.

Edmund, earl of Marche, grandſon to Roger Mortimer beheaded, in the beginning of the reign of Edward III, died, in February, 1382, in his government of Ireland; who had married Philippa, only daughter to Lionel, duke of Clarence, third ſon of Edward III, and by her had a ſon, named Roger, who ſucceeded him, in his honour of earl of Marche.

The parliament which met, about the end of the year 1381, and was prorogued, on account of the queen's arrival, ſat again, the following year; and ſome hiſtorians affirm, that, in this parliament, an act was paſſed, impowering the biſhops to impriſon hereticks, without the king's licenſe; but others, and with more probability, maintain, that the commons refuſed to paſs the bill, and that the biſhops obtained that power of the king alone. This laſt opinion is confirmed by the complaints made afterwards by the commons to the king, as of a breach of privilege; but, however that be, it is certain, that, before this time, the biſhops had no ſuch power, without the king's expreſs conſent, for every particular caſe; and, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, we find the like permiſſions granted by Edward III, to the biſhop of London and others. It is manifeſt, that theſe permiſſions would have been needleſs, had the biſhops enjoyed this privilege, without the king's conſent; and, moreover, in a commiſſion of the ſame ſort directed by Richard II, to the univerſity of Oxford, extant alſo in the Collection, no notice is taken of any ſtatute upon that ſubject, though it was a conſtant cuſtom, when the king acted, by vertue of an act of parliament, to mention it, in his letters patent or orders; which evidently appears in the foreſaid Collection.

Richard's character.

Richard, being, now, in his 17th year, began more plainly to diſcover his inclinations, which, hitherto, had been reſtrained by the authority of his governors. Having a vaſt conceipt of his own merit, he thought himſelf no leſs capable of governing the ſtate than Edward III. was, at his age; but there was a wide diſparity between theſe two princes. Edward, when very young, with an uncommon penetration, had none but noble and generous inclinations, tending to his own glory and the happineſs of his ſubjects; whereas Richard, minding only trifles, was entirely devoted to his pleaſures. He affected pomp and magnificence, more than any of his predeceſſors; and he conſumed his revenue, in idle and ſuperfluous expences. He was exceedingly ſwayed by flatterers; and he expreſſed no leſs affection for thoſe that applauded his paſſions, than averſion for ſuch as adviſed him to lead a life worthy a great prince. As he was not, in the leaſt, inclined to war, he in council always preferred negotiation to vigorous reſolutions; and, as ſoon as he was out of his childhood, he was obſerved to chuſe favourites, whoſe temper and diſpoſition ſuited with his own, or, at leaſt, who artfully feigned to approve of all his proceedings. Among theſe were Alexander Nevil, archbiſhop of York, Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young man full of vivacity, whoſe youthful ſallies were extremely pleaſing to his maſter, Michael de la Pole, a merchant's ſon of London, and judge Treſilian, who never wanted reaſons, to countenance whatever was agreeable to the king. Theſe favourites, who, on all occaſions, flattered him, were amply rewarded, for the leaſt petty ſervices; whilſt thoſe, who managed the publick affairs, and took all the pains, were very little regarded. This behaviour was diſpleaſing to the people; but an accident, towards the end of this year, entirely alienated their affections from their ſovereign. One of the abovementioned courtiers obtaining of the king a conſiderable grant, Richard Scrope, the chancellor, refuſed to annex the great ſeal to the patent; and he even expreſly told the perſon who ſollicited him, that the duty of his office would not ſuffer him to ſet the ſeal, committed to his cuſtody by the parliament, to all the king's grants, till he had acquired a little more experience. Richard, incenſed at this refuſal, ſent for the great ſeal; but he refuſed to deliver it, alledging that he did not hold it of the king. This reſolution ſtill farther exaſperating the young prince, he went himſelf to the chancellor, to require his obedience; upon which, the chancellor gave him the ſeal, declaring that he would ſerve him no longer, in any publick poſt, but content himſelf with maintaining, in all other reſpects, the allegiance due from a ſubject to his ſovereign. Richard kept the great ſeal, ſome days, in his hands; and, leſt another chancellor ſhould obſtruct, in the ſame manner, his inconſiderate grants, he annexed the ſeal himſelf to ſeveral patents; after which he delivered it to Robert Braybrook, biſhop of London, who, probably, was not ſo ſcrupulous as his predeceſſor. This action, extolled by the favourites with the higheſt encomiums on the king's ſteadineſs, diſguſted the reſt of the nation; and the king, henceforward, was conſidered, as a prince capable of falling into great exceſſes, unleſs timely care was taken to bridle his paſſions.

1382.

The biſhops power of impriſoning hereticks is revoked.

Accordingly, in the next ſeſſions of the parliament, the houſe of commons reſolved to remove this inconvenience, ariſing from the too great authority the king began to aſſume; for

* She arrived at Dover, about the latter end of December, and was married to the king, in the chapel-royal at Weſtminſter, on January 14, being alſo crowned, quickly after; but, inſtead of Richard's having any dowry with her, he gave the emperor no leſs than 10,000 marks, or 80,000 florins, for his alliance; and he was likewiſe at the whole charge of her coming over. Tyrrel. Walſing. Rymer's Fœd.

1382. the power of the bishops, to imprison heretieks, was apprehended to be very destructive to liberty, since it tendered the clergy, in a manner, absolute masters of the honour and fortune of private persons. The complaints, from all parts, obliged the commons to present a petition to the king, to revoke a concession to which they had not given their consent; and Richard, being in want of money, durst not reject their request; but some pretend, that, by the artifices of the clergy, this revocation was razed out of the parliament-rolls, where it is not to be found.

Urban VI. publishes a Crusade against Clement VII. Froissart.

The schism still continued, in the church, to the great scandal of the Christians, who were at a loss to know, which of the two popes was to be regarded, as Christ's vicar; but Urban, whose party was strongest, spiritual weapons proving insufficient, judged it more advantageous to use temporal arms; wherefore, he published, against Clement and his adherents, a Crusade, of which Henry Spencer, bishop of Norwich, was declared general. The pope, by this bull, granted the same indulgences to all that would engage in this undertaking, as to those who bore arms against the Infidels; and, upon the publication of this Crusade, the English nobility, gentry, people, and clergy entered into it, with the same ardor, as if they had been to wage war with the enemies of the christian name; for, whilst they waited for the approbation of the parliament, which was not at all questioned, every one diligently prepared, to obtain the promised indulgences, either by serving, in person, in the war, or contributing money for promoting the same.

During these preparations, the earl of Cambridge returned from Portugal, extremely dissatisfied; because the king of Portugal made use of the English succours, to procure a beneficial treaty with the king of Castile, to whom he even gave Beatrix, his only daughter, promised to the earl of Cambridge's eldest son; for, by this means, the English prince lost all hopes of obtaining for his son the crown of Portugal, and placing the duke of Lancaster, his brother, on the throne of Castile.

1383. The success of the Crusade.

The parliament, which met, in the beginning of the year 1383, not only approved of the Crusade published by Urban, but also granted a considerable subsidy, on that account; and, every thing being in readiness, the bishop of Norwich embarqued the Croises, consisting 50,000 foot and 2000 horse. Upon his arrival at Calais, he held a council of war; and the majority were for entering France, since, according to the tenor of the bull, the Crusade was intended against Clement and his adherents. This was, probably, the reason, why the court of England had engaged so cordially in the affair; but the general, on private motives, not discovered, in history, caused it to be resolved, that the war should be carried into Flanders, under the pretence that Flanders was a fief of the crown of France, though the earl of Flanders had owned pope Urban. Thus, contrary to the intention of the court, and, doubtless, of the pope himself, the Croises invaded Flanders, and took Graveling, Bourbourg, Mardike, and Dunkirk. The earl of Flanders, surprised at this sudden attack, levying some troops, with all possible expedition, was so rash, as, with 12000 men, to offer the Croises battle, who had received a powerful reinforcement from the Gantois; but, by this imprudent boldness, he had the misfortune to see this army, his only refuge, entirely routed; and, in this extremity, when his country was on the point of being utterly destroyed, he had no other way, to free himself from this danger, but to apply to the court of France. He represented to the young king's council, how much it was the interest of France to save Flanders, especially as, in all appearance, it was not the intent of the Croises to rest satisfied with that single conquest; and the court of France, to prevent Flanders from falling into the hands of the English, resolved to assist the earl. Charles VI, with a numerous army, marched against the Croises, who were besieging Ypres; and, upon his approach, raising the siege, they retired to Bourbourg, where they were invested. The bishop-general, for want of provisions, would have been at a loss to extricate himself out of this perplexity, had not the duke of Bretagne, by his mediation, obtained leave for the Croises to retire, upon restoring the places they had taken. Thus, ended the Crusade, undertaken for the sole interest of Urban, though neither the pope nor England received the least advantage; but, upon the bishop's return, the king ordered the temporalities of his see to be seized, and several of his principal officers imprisoned, for not observing their instructions. 1383.

The French and Scots ravage England. Froissart.

Whilst the Croises were employed, in ravaging Flanders, England greatly suffered, in her turn, by the frequent descents of the French, and incursions of the Scots; and, having no army, to repulse these enemies, the king was obliged to call a parliament, who granted him a subsidy to continue the war with Scotland, the conduct of which was committed to the duke of Lancaster; but the king of Scotland, upon the news of the preparations against him, sued for a peace, tho' it was absolutely refused.

A truce with France. Walsing. Froissart.

In the interim, the duke of Bretagne endeavoured to reconcile the two crowns of France and England; and, after many sollicitations, he, at length, prevailed with the two kings, to send their plenipotentiaries, between Calais and Boulogne; but the result of this negotiation was only a truce, for 10 months, in which the kings of Scotland and Castile, if they requested it, were to be included. The duke of Burgundy, uncle to the king of France, undertook to answer, within a limited time, for the king of Scotland; but, the earl of Flanders, his father-in-law, dying, in this interval, his care, to take possession of his dominions, induced him to forget, or neglect, his engagement. In the mean time, whether the English thought the Scots would not be included in the treaty, or were desirous of reaping some advantage, from the expence they had been at, the duke of Lancaster went and ravaged Scotland, to the very gates of Edinburgh; but this incursion obliged the king of Scotland to desire to be included 1383. ded in the truce, which was granted, by the mediation of the duke of Burgundy.

1384. Soon after the duke of Lancaſter's return, a certain Iriſh monk came to court, then at Salisbury, and diſcovered to the king a ſecret of great importance, viz. that the duke of Lancaſter, his uncle, had conſpired to murder him, and ſeize the crown; which accuſation was attended with too many probable circumſtances, for Richard to doubt of the truth of it; but the duke, without the leaſt emotion, vindicated himſelf, as to each article, ſo as to give Richard ſeeming ſatisfaction. However, he ordered the accuſer to be taken into cuſtody, either to puniſh him, or examine him more ſtrictly; but, when he was to be brought before the council, it was found that he was hanged, over-night, in the priſon, without any poſſibility of diſcovering the author of this outrage. This accident proved very injurious to the duke of Lancaſter, ſuch were the people's prejudices againſt him; though it was no leſs probable, that the monk was murdered by the authors of the accuſation, than that it was done by the duke's orders.

The duke of Lancaſter is accuſed of conſpiring againſt the king. Walſing.

He is farther ſuſpected.

Another accident, ſoon after, confirmed the people in the ſuſpicion, raiſed by the monk's report, againſt the duke of Lancaſter: An alderman of London, a ſpecial favourite of the duke, being charged with conſpiring againſt the king, was convicted, after a ſtrict examination; yet, though the duke was abroad, his cloſe friendſhip with the criminal, and the endeavours of his friends, to prevent the ſentence, and afterwards to obtain the king's pardon, occaſioned ſevere reflections on the duke's character; who was then upon an ambaſſy to Paris, where he ſpent 50,000 marks, in procuring only the prolongation of the truce, for ſome months.

The project of deſtroying the duke of Lancaſter. Walſing.

If the duke of Lancaſter was not beloved by the people, he was no leſs deteſted by the favourites, who could not hope to diſpoſe of all things, at their pleaſure, whilſt he preſerved his credit with the king; for it is the known practice of moſt favourites, not to ſuffer about their maſter any, except their own creatures. Accordingly, theſe, conſidering the duke of Lancaſter, as a troubleſome inſpector, and incapable of condeſcending to court them, believed that they ought, above all things, to be rid of that prince; wherefore, they all acted in concert, to create in the king ſuſpicions againſt this uncle, as a very dangerous enemy. Richard, who neither did, nor would, ſee any thing but with their eyes, ſuffered himſelf to be ſo prejudiced, that he conſented to a reſolution of accuſing the duke of high-treaſon; and judge Treſilian, a man of a cruel and daring temper, undertook to draw up the articles of accuſation, and manage the evidences; even offering to try him, as a private perſon, though, by the laws of the land, he could be only judged by his peers. As this conſpiracy could not be ſo ſecretly projected, as to eſcape the duke's notice, he thought it imprudent to deliver himſelf into the hands of his enemies, who were intent upon his ruin; and, therefore, regardleſs of his vindication, he withdrew to his caſtle of Pontefract, where he aſſembled ſome troops, and made other preparations for his own defence, in caſe of an attack. Though he had not many friends; yet, being perſecuted by the miniſters, who were ſtill more hated than himſelf, it was not difficult to find a ſufficient number of people to join him; and a civil war was upon the point of being kindled in the kingdom, when the princeſs of Wales, the king's mother, interpoſed, to make peace, before hoſtilities were commenced. She ſucceeded, at length, after many journies and fatigues; and Richard, convinced of the falſhood of the ſuſpicions, ſuggeſted to him, againſt the duke, his uncle, reſtored him to his favour. 1384.

1385. During theſe broils, no preparations were made for the war, though the late truce with France and Scotland was about to expire; for it was imagined, that it might be renewed; but the king of France had other deſigns; and, as the court of England was in a perfect ſecurity, he reſolved to improve it, by making a vigorous effort, from which he expected great advantages. With this view, he ſent a powerful army into Guienne, to compleat the conqueſt of that dukedom, before the Engliſh ſhould be in a condition to oppoſe it; and, at the ſame time, he ſent the king of Scotland an aid of 1000 men at arms, under the command of John de Vienne, who was to make a diverſion, in the north, to favour the deſcent of the French, in the ſouthern parts of the iſland. The alarm, taken by the Engliſh, at all theſe preparations, turned to their ſafety; for the court gave ſuch preſſing orders to levy troops, and the orders were executed, with ſuch ardor and diligence, that, if we may believe the hiſtorians, Richard quickly found himſelf at the head of 300,000 men. He detached 60,000, under the command of the duke of Lancaſter, to march into Scotland, whilſt, with the reſt, he himſelf lay in expectation of the French, upon the ſouthern coaſt; but, upon the duke of Lancaſter's approach, the Scots, from ravaging the borders of England, retired to the center of their kingdom, leaving the Engliſh general at liberty to revenge his countrymen, by his ravages in Scotland, where he had purſued them. The great army aſſembled, by Richard, defeating the king of France's hopes of ſucceſs, he deferred the execution of his project, to a more convenient ſeaſon; and, by this means, Richard had leiſure to march towards Scotland, with the choice of his army. In all probability, he would have entirely ſubdued that kingdom, ſince the king of Scotland was unable to withſtand him, if, by the favourites jealouſy of the duke of Lancaſter, who commanded under him, he had not irrecoverably loſt ſo fair an opportunity. The Scots, perceiving that the king of England only amuſed himſelf with ravaging the country, about Edinburgh, began to recover from their conſternation, cauſed by his formidable forces; but, being too weak to attack him, to oblige him to quit Scotland, they reſolved upon making a diverſion, in England. Purſuant to this reſolution, they removed, at a greater diſtance from the Engliſh army, to induce Whilſt they were on their march thither, Richard never ſo much as inquired after them; but, fancying that they were fled, and ſatisfied with the advantages already gained, he determined, not being fond of war, to return into England. He received intelligence, by the way, of the Scots entering Cumberland, and might eaſily have cut off their retreat; yet, in ſpite of all the duke of Lancaſter's endeavours, to perſuade him to a vigorous reſolution, he choſe rather to follow the earl of Oxford's advice. This favourite perſuaded him, that the duke of Lancaſter only ſought to expoſe him to danger; and, this counſel correſponding with his own ſuſpicions and inclinations, he neglected going in queſt of the enemy, whilſt all, except the favourites, were ſo amazed at his conduct, in overlooking the calamities of his ſubjects of Cumberland, that they loudly murmured, and conſidered him, as a prince regardleſs of the good of the publick.

The lord Holland kills the lord Stafford. Walſing.

Whilſt the king was on his march to London, the lord Holland, his half-brother, quarrelling with the earl of Stafford's eldeſt ſon, killed him, and took ſanctuary in Beverly-abbey; but this action was ſo heinous, that, notwithſtanding the ties of blood, Richard reſolved to abandon the murderer to the rigour of the law; and, though the princeſs of Wales, their common mother, interceded for her ſon, ſhe could never obtain his pardon. This refuſal ſat ſo heavy upon her mind, that ſhe died with grief, a few days after; yet, whether the king was ſorry, for being ſo cruel to his mother, or the murderer found a more powerful interceſſor, the princeſs was ſcarce in her grave, before he granted the pardon ſhe had ſued for, to no purpoſe.

The fear of the French invaſion being vaniſhed, the duke of Lancaſter demanded aſſiſtance of the king, to proſecute his right to the crown of Caſtile; and there could never happen a more proper opportunity, to obtain his deſire. Ferdinand, king of Portugal, dying, without leaving any legitimate children but Beatrix, queen of Caſtile, the king, her huſband, pretended, that the crown of Portugal was devolved to his queen, by the deceaſe of the king, her father; but the Portugueſe, not bearing the thoughts of living in ſubjection to the Caſtilians, placed on the throne John, natural ſon to the late king. As it was next to impoſſible, that this quarrel ſhould be decided, without arms, the king of Caſtile entered Portugal, and, advancing as far as Lisbon, beſieged the city; but, meeting with a braver defence than he expected, he was conſtrained to retire. In the next campaign, he loſt a battle, which obliged him to quit Portugal, ſtill hoping to accompliſh his ends, by the aſſiſtance of France; and the new king of Portugal, finding that his enemy was about to receive aid from the king of France, diſpatched ambaſſadors to England, to negotiate an alliance with Richard, offering to acknowledge the duke of Lancaſter, for king of Caſtile, and ſupport his right, with all his forces. The preſent poſture of affairs, in England, had a natural tendency to forward the negotiation of the Portugueſe ambaſſadors; for Richard, prejudiced againſt the duke, his uncle, heartily wiſhed his removal, his favourites repreſenting him, as a formidable relation, and a very troubleſome governor. They told him, moreover, that it was his intereſt to dethrone the king of Caſtile, an avowed enemy to the Engliſh; which was the more practicable, as the king of Portugal was willing to make a powerful diverſion. The duke of Lancaſter haſtened, with all poſſible ardor, the concluſion of this affair, expecting, with the forces of England, and aſſiſtance of Portugal, to ſucceed in his deſigns; and all theſe conſiderations prevailed on the king's council, to give a favourable hearing to the king of Portugal's propoſals, and to promiſe the duke of Lancaſter an aid proportionable to the importance of the undertaking. Purſuant to this reſolution, the king called a parliament, to demand a ſubſidy, on that account; and the commons readily granted it, expreſſing great earneſtneſs for this expedition, not ſo much out of love to the duke, as to remove him out of the kingdom, where it was continually feared, that he would, at laſt, occaſion troubles fatal to the ſtate; and, the clergy refuſing to pay their quota of the ſubſidy, they petitioned the king to ſeize their temporalities. Richard, who would not quarrel with the clergy, for his uncle's ſake, refuſed to comply with the requeſt of the commons; tho' his moderation procured him, from the clergy, what force would ſcarce ever have extorted from them. Thus, the duke of Lancaſter, ſecure of the parliament's aſſiſtance, made, as king of Caſtile, a league offenſive and defenſive with the king of Portugal, and prepared for the war, with all poſſible expedition.

Act. Pub.

The earl of Marche declared heir to the crown.

In the ſame parliament, Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, was declared preſumptive heir to the crown, provided Richard died, without iſſue; who was ſon of Philippa, only daughter to Lionel, duke of Clarence, third ſon to Edward III, and grandſon to Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, executed, as a traytor, in the late reign; but the ſentence, paſſed upon him, was afterwards repealed, becauſe the formalities, preſcribed by the laws and cuſtoms of the realm, were not obſerved at his trial.

The king confers new honours on his uncles and favourites. Walſing.

Before the breaking up of the parliament, the king conferred on the earl of Cambridge, his uncle, the title of duke of York; and on the earl of Buckingham, his other uncle, that of duke of Glouceſter. It was neceſſary for him to promote theſe two princes to higher degrees of honour, unleſs he would leave them below the earl of Oxford, whom he created, at the ſame time, marqueſs of Dublin, and, ſoon after, duke of Ireland; who was the firſt that bore the name of marqueſs, in England; and Michael de la Pole, another of the king's favourites, was made earl of Suffolk, and lord chancellor.

The duke of Lancaſter ſets out for Spain. Walſing.

The duke of Lancaſter, having finiſhed his preparations for his Spaniſh expedition, embarqued at Portſmouth, with an army of 20,000 men, among whom were 2000 men at arms; and he carried with him Conſtantia of Caſtile, his wife, and his two daughters, Philippa and Cathanina, the firſt of whom he had by Blanche of Lancaſter, and the other by Conſtantia; being alſo accompanied by the king and queen to Portſmouth, who wiſhed them good ſucceſs, and preſented them with two gold crowns. The duke, ſetting ſail, made ſome ſtay at Breſt, and obliged the duke of Bretagne to raiſe the ſiege of that town, which all his ſollicitations had not, hitherto, been able to recover from the Engliſh; and then, purſuing his voyage, he arrived, Auguſt the 9th, at Coruna, where he landed his troops. Upon his arrival, he made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places in Gallicia, and, at laſt, of Compoſtella, where he paſſed the winter; and, whilſt the ſeaſon prevented him from continuing his progreſs, he concluded a marriage, between Philippa, his eldeſt daughter, and the king of Portugal, and ſpent the reſidue of the time, in projecting the next campaign.

Great preparations in France, to conquer England.

As England, upon the duke of Lancaſter's departure, deprived of her beſt troops, would be, probably, defenceleſs, the king of France reſolved upon a freſh effort, to conquer that kingdom; and he made ſuch prodigious preparations, that all Europe expected, with aſtoniſhment, the ſucceſs of this undertaking. He had prepared 900 tranſport-ſhips, and cauſed a wooden fort to be made, which could be taken in pieces, for the defence of his army, after landing; and, if the duke of Berry, his uncle, purely, to render the project abortive, becauſe, as an hiſtorian remarks, he was not the author, had not too long delayed his coming, the French would have found England unprovided with troops for her defence; but, the duke not repairing to Sluice, till the 14th of September, Richard had leiſure ſo to prepare, as to have no reaſon to dread the mighty efforts of his enemies; and, in all likelihood, the great diligence of the Engliſh, rather than the ſeaſon, which was not too far advanced, for ſo ſhort a paſſage, obliged the king of France to ſend his troops into winter-quarters.

Richard raiſes a great army. Walſing.

The grand deſigns of France were no ſooner known in England, than troops were levied, with ſuch ſpeed and ſucceſs, that an army of 200,000 men were drawn together; and part of theſe forces were put into the places moſt expoſed, whilſt the reſt ſtood ready to prevent the landing of the enemies; but, as this army was to be maintained, as well as raiſed, which could not be done, without a vaſt expence, a parliament was called, to conſider of ways and means. The king demanded a ſubſidy, proportionable to his wants, which the parliament were very willing to grant; but they could not think of leaving the money in the power of the king and his favourites, among whom the marqueſs of Dublin and the earl of Suffolk were the chief; for theſe lords were, ſo univerſally and exceſſively, odious, that, in order to ruin them, the parliament did not ſcruple to hazard the loſs of the whole kingdom. 1386.

They preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring that the treaſurer and the earl of Suffolk, the chancellor, might be removed from their places; and that all thoſe might be called to an account, through whoſe hands the publick money had paſſed, affirming, that the king would find, in the confiſcation of the eſtates of the miſmanagers, ſums ſufficient to anſwer the exigences of the ſtate. Richard, ſurpriſed at this addreſs, in the preſent poſture of affairs, received it, with an indignation, which it was impoſſible for him to conceal; and he anſwered very ſharply, that the parliament ought to mind the buſineſs, for which they were called, and not meddle with what did not concern them; raſhly adding, that, "To pleaſe the parliament, he would not "turn out the meaneſt ſcullion in his kitchen." At the ſame time, he withdrew to Eltham, without ſtaying for a reply.

The king demands a ſubſidy, in an imperious manner.

Though the king could not doubt, but ſuch an offenſive anſwer would extremely exaſperate the commons, he ſent, a few days after, the chancellor himſelf, to order them, in an imperious manner, to grant the deſired ſubſidy; upon which order, hitherto, unuſual, in affairs of this nature, the two houſes uniting, as having one common intereſt, ſent the king word, that they would proceed to no buſineſs, till he returned to his parliament, and his miniſters were puniſhed, according to their deſerts. This reply, to the laſt degree, incenſing the king, he commanded the two houſes to ſend to him 40 of their members, to give an account of their proceedings; but the parliament, inſtead of complying, would have come to an open rupture, if the moſt prudent had not prevailed on them, though with extreme difficulty, to ſend to the king the duke of Glouceſter, his uncle, and the biſhop of Ely. Theſe two lords, arriving at Eltham, told the king, in the name of both houſes, that, as the ſovereign had power to aſſemble them, they had alſo a right to require his preſence, in his parliament; adding, that it was enacted by an old ſtatute, that, if the king abſented himſelf, 40 days, from his parliament, without a lawful cauſe, the members might return to their habitations; which they were reſolved to do, if the king perſiſted to deprive them of the honour of his preſence. To this vigorous declaration Richard replied, in a furious paſſion, and with great imprudence, that he plainly perceived his ſubjects were reſolved to rebel againſt him; and, therefore, he had nothing more to do, than to deſire the aſſiſtance of the king of France, to reduce them to their allegiance. The lords made anſwer, that the king of France was the moſt mortal enemy of the Engliſh nation, as appeared from his preſent endeavours to deſtroy them; and 1386. and that the king's desperate resolution could only proceed from the pernicious advice of his evil counsellors, whose sole view was to set him at variance with his faithful subjects. Upon this, they withdrew, affirming that their orders extended no farther, than to intreat him to return to his parliament, who solely consulted the welfare of him and the kingdom.

The king consents to the removing of his favourites.

The deputies being retired, Richard came to more moderate resolutions; for, probably, the ministers and favourites dreaded the consequences attending a rupture with the parliament. In this disposition, he repaired to the parliament, and, with a good grace, granted all their requests; for the chancellor was not only removed from his office, but summoned to appear and give an account of his administration, wherein he was notoriously guilty of many misdemeanors; and, as for the marquess of Dublin, lately made duke of Ireland, he was sent thither, with a pension of 3000 marks, his whole estate being confiscated, by order of parliament. This done, the two houses appointed 14 commissioners, to take care of the publick affairs, jointly with the king; and they authorized the duke of Gloucester and the earl of Arundel, to examine the publick accounts, and to what uses the king's revenue had been applied. A few days after, the chancellor, being found guilty of mismanagement, was forced to restore all the grants he had received from the king; which were so excessive, that Richard himself, who had never computed them, being surprised, upbraided his favourite, for abusing his good-will.

The French fleet are lost, in a storm.

Towards the end of this session, the agreeable news came, that the French army were separated, and their fleet so damaged by a storm, as not to be fit to put to sea again, for a considerable time; for, of the powerful fleet prepared by the French, the greatest part of the ships foundered, at sea, or were lost, on the English coasts; and, among the latter, were found some laden with plank, for building the fort above-mentioned.

Richard recalls his favourites, who stir him up to revenge. Knighton.

The parliament breaking up, as soon as the apprehensions of the invasion were removed, the king quickly recalled to court the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, and the archbishop of York; and he even affected to caress them, more than before their disgrace, and load them with fresh favours. The favourites re-assumed their former post, with hearts full of revenge, especially, against the two commissioners of the publick accounts, who had occasioned their condemnation; and they easily made the young king believe, that they had suffered, for his sake, and that the designs of their enemies were pointed, not so much at the ministers, as at the king himself. They represented to him, "That accusing the counsellors is an evident "proof, that the sovereign is judged incapa- "ble of governing; and that the readiest way, "to discredit a prince, is to persuade his sub- "jects, that he makes use of ill ministers." These insinuations, frequently repeated, made so deep an impression on the king's mind, that he resolved to free himself from the subjection of the parliament; but the favourites intimated to him, that it would be very difficult to accomplish it, whilst the duke of Gloucester was at the head of the factious; and, by this means, they induced him to consent to all their plots, for his uncle's destruction. Having obtained the king's approbation, they could find no better way, to compass their ends, than to poison the duke and some other of their principal enemies, at a feast to which they were invited by the city of London; but, as they durst not execute this conspiracy, without securing the mayor, he gave the duke of Gloucester intelligence of it, who came not to the feast. 1386.

The ruin of the duke of Gloucester is determined. Walsing.

He escapes being poisoned.

Had it been as easy for the favourites to destroy their private enemies, as it was to excite the king's hatred against them, there would hardly have been left, in the kingdom, a lord capable of protecting them; but, in a government like that of England, particularly, during a minority, it is next to impossible for the king and his ministry to do whatever they please; and the favourites, then, continually afraid of being themselves prevented, were obliged to have recourse to secret ways, to ruin their enemies, in the interim, prejudicing the king against his best subjects, till being of age, he might act, with a more absolute authority. The earls of Arundel and Nottingham, admirals of England, embarquing, in the beginning of the spring, took a fleet of French, Spanish, and Flemish merchant-men, and brought some of them to England, laden with wine; and they afterwards, sailing to Bretagne, relieved Brest, besieged by the duke. However, this signal service only exposed them to the king's indignation; and, when they returned from their expedition, he would not vouchsafe even to speak to them; for, it was intimated to him, by his ministers, that the taking of these ships would infallibly plunge him into troubles, which would exceedingly embarrass him; but the two earls, greatly offended at this uncivil reception, resigned their commission, which was given to the earl of Northumberland. 1387.

The favourites stir up the king against their enemies.

The duke of Ireland divorces his wife, cousin to the king. Walsing.

Thus, did the favourites stir up their master against the principal lords, expecting to reap the fruit of their artifices, when the king should be of age, of which he wanted but a little; but an accident, that fell out, soon after, hastened the execution of their projects. The duke of Ireland, presuming upon his influence over the king, had the insolence to divorce his wife, daughter to the lord Coucy, and grand-daughter to Edward III, in order to marry Lancerona, maid of honour to the queen, a Bohemian of mean extraction; and, though this divorce reflected a dishonour on the royal family, Richard did not discover the least concern; but the duke of Gloucester, highly resenting this affront, declared, that he would revenge it, the first opportunity. The duke of Ireland resolved to prevent him; and, with this view, having concerted the means with the king, he feigned to go into Ireland, taking the road to Wales, where the king was pleased to accompany him; but this pretended voyage was only to consult, more privately, how to execute their design of assuming an arbitrary power, of which the duke of Gloucester, the earls of Arundel, Warwick, 1387. Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham were to feel the effects. The reſult of this conſultation was, that the king ſhould raiſe an army, to terrify theſe lords, and then call a parliament, the election of which ſhould be ſo managed, that the members ſhould be entirely devoted to him; and that he ſhauld cauſe to be paſſed all ſuch acts, as were neceſſary to ſecure him an unlimited power.

Richard communicates his deſign to the ſheriffs, Walſing.

Purſuant to this reſolution, they went to Nottingham, where the king ſent for all the ſheriffs, ſome of the principal citizens of London, and all the judges; and, when they were aſſembled, he repreſented to them, that he intended to raiſe an army, to chaſtiſe ſuch lords, as he named to them, among whom was the duke of Glouceſter, and demanded of the ſheriffs, what number of troops each of them could furniſh him with; adding, that he deſigned to call a parliament; and he ordered them to ſuffer no repreſentative to be choſen, that was not in the liſt he ſhould give them himſelf. The ſheriffs replied, that it was not in their power to execute his orders; that the people were ſo well affected to the lords he had mentioned, that there was no proſpect of levying an army againſt them; and that it was ſtill more difficult to deprive the people of their right, of freely electing their repreſentatives in parliament. However, the judges * were not ſo ſcrupulous; who, when the king asked them, whether he had not power to turn out the 14 commiſſioners appointed by parliament, and annul ſuch acts, as were prejudicial to him? anſwered, "The king was "above the laws." Nevertheleſs, being required to ſubſcribe their opinion, ſome endeavoured to be excuſed, but were compelled to it, by the menaces of the favourites; and it is affirmed, that one of the judges ſaid aloud, after ſigning, "No action ever better deſerved "hanging, than that he had done, on this oc-"caſion." The opinion of the judges being, thus, extorted, Richard, immediately, iſſued out commiſſions to levy an army; but ſo few were willing to ſerve him, that he was conſtrained to deſiſt from his project; and, enraged at this diſappointment, he returned to London, after a fruitleſs declaration of his deſigns, which rendered him ſtill more odious to the publick.

The duke of Glouceſter tries to appeaſe the king. Walſing. Knighton.

A plot of this nature, ſo openly contrived, and not put in execution, very rarely fails of proving fatal to the authors. The duke of Glouceſter and the other lords of his party plainly perceived, that, if the king and his favourites had not already ſacrificed them to their animoſity, it was not for want of will but of power; and the only remedy left, in their opinion, was a recourſe to arms; but the duke of Glouceſter thought, that, before he made uſe of this violent method, he ſhould try, once more, to remove the king's prejudices, and, therefore, he ſent the biſhop of London, with reſpectful aſſurances of his allegiance, and an offer to clear himſelf, by oath, of the crimes falſly laid to his charge. Richard appeared, at firſt, inclinable to admit of this juſtification; but the earl of Suffolk preſently made him alter his ſentiments, by telling him, even before the biſhop, that he would never be ſafe on the throne, whilſt the duke of Glouceſter was alive; but the biſhop of London, being greatly provoked by theſe words, told the favourite, that, as he was condemned by the parliament, and held his life, merely, by the king's grace, it became him, leſs than any man, to accuſe loyal ſubjects. The king was ſo highly offended at the prelate's boldneſs, that he commanded him to depart from his preſence; upon which, the proſcribed lords, believing that a vigorous defence was the only way left, to ſcreen them from the deſigns of the court, reſolved, at length, to take up arms; and, having a great intereſt in the people, who conſidered them, as their protectors, they ſoon drew together an army of 40,000 men, with which they marched directly to London. 1387.

The king's deſign is fruſtrated. Walſing.

The diligence of the lords diſconcerted all the meaſures of the king and his miniſters; wherefore, Richard reſolved to go to France, and reſtore to king Charles Calais and Cherbourg, in order to procure a powerful aid, to reduce his rebellious ſubjects, as he was pleaſed to term them; but the ſudden approach of the lords obliged him to have recourſe to other means, to free himſelf from the preſent difficulties; and the beſt way, in his opinion, was to amuſe the male-contents, whilſt the duke of Ireland raiſed an army, in Wales. Purſuant to this reſolution, he ſent word to the male-content lords, that he was ready to grant them all their reaſonable demands, and ſhould be, on the morrow, in Weſtminſter-hall, where they might come and preſent their petition; which propoſal was gladly embraced by the lords; who, taking care not to be ſurpriſed, repaired to the place appointed, where they found the king ſeated on a throne, in his royal robes, expecting their coming. As they approached the throne, they fell on their knees, in a ſuppliant poſture, tho', in reality, it was not ſo much to ask pardon, as to obtain of him the puniſhment of his miniſters; and, the biſhop of Ely, who was chancellor, asking the reaſon of their taking up arms, they replied, that it was ſolely with a view to procure the good of the king and kingdom; adding, that they ſhould always maintain an inviolable regard to the king's perſon, and that their intent was only to bring the traytors about him to condign puniſhment; and they named, in particular, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, the archbiſhop of York, judge Treſilian, and one Brembar, an alderman of London, who was of the ſame cabal. The king gravely anſwered, that, in the next parliament, juſtice ſhould be done to all; and then he upbraided them, for their preſumption, intimating, that it was in his power to cruſh them, though, out of pure condeſcenſion, he vouchſafed to give them a favourable audience. After this, he took the duke of Glouceſter by

As they were apprehenſive of being, on a ſudden, oppreſſed, when they ſhould be no longer feared, they reſolved to continue in arms, till the parliament was aſſembled; and they quickly perceived the neceſſity of this precaution. The duke of Ireland, having very ſpeedily levied an army, in Wales, marched, with all expedition, to the king's aſſiſtance; and, had he been able to approach London, it might hinder the citizens from joining the confederates. To prevent this danger, the earl of Derby, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, marching with part of the army, met the duke of Ireland, in Oxfordſhire; where he gave him battle, and gained an eaſy victory over a general who was nothing leſs than a warrior. In the beginning of the fight, the duke, afraid of falling into the hands of his enemies, took to flight, entirely regardleſs about what became of his army; and, all his baggage being taken, in a casket, was found a letter from the king, commanding him to march to London, with all poſſible ſpeed, and promiſing him to live and die with him. This defeat breaking all the king's meaſures, the duke fled into Holland, and, after ſome ſtay at Utrecht, he went and lived, at Louvain, where he died, three years after. The earl of Suffolk would have retired to Calais; but the governor, not daring, at ſuch a juncture, either to arreſt or protect him, choſe to ſend him back to the king; and, in the interim, Richard, uncertain, how the victorious lords would treat him, took refuge in the tower. He had the more reaſon to fear, as a Frenchman was ſeized, at that time, bringing him a ſafe-conduct to come to Charles, at Boulogne; and it was farther diſcovered, by a letter found upon the ſame perſon, that Charles expected to be put in poſſeſſion of Calais and Cherbourg, and had even advanced part of the ſum, he was to give for theſe two places.

1388. A conference of the lords with the king. Walſing.

The confederate lords, upon theſe diſcoveries, entering London with their whole army, demanded a conference with the king; and Richard would fain have been excuſed; but, in his preſent condition, being apprehenſive of ſtarving in the tower, he durſt not refuſe it. At this interview, they ſharply upbraided him with the Nottingham-plot to deſtroy them; with his deſign to render himſelf abſolute, by means of an army; with his attempting to have a parliament at his devotion; with his orders to the duke of Ireland, to march to London, whilſt he was amuſing them with empty promiſes; and, laſtly, with his treaty with the king of France, to reſign Calais and Cherbourg. Richard anſwered theſe reproaches, with a ſhower of tears, which moved the lords; who imagined, that the king's ill conduct proceeded only from his want of experience, and the evil counſels of his favourites; and they entertained hopes of his being reclaimed, as theſe counſellors were removed; wherefore, it was agreed, that the king ſhould, on the morrow, come to Weſtminſter, to ſettle with them the affairs of the government. However, they were ſcarce out of the tower, before he ſent them word, that he would not confer with them; which fickleneſs ſo highly incenſed them, that they, forthwith, acquainted him, that, unleſs he came to Weſtminſter, the next day, according to his promiſe, they would go themſelves, and proceed to the election of a new king. This peremptory declaration threw him into ſuch a conſternation, that he not only came to the place of conference, but even conſented to the baniſhment of his two principal favourites, with the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of Durham and Chicheſter, and ſeveral other lords and ladies, who had countenanced the deſigns of the court; but, as for the judges, whom they deſigned to puniſh with the utmoſt ſeverity, they were taken off the benches, in Weſtminſter-hall, and ſent to the tower. 1388.

The parliament meeting, in February, 1389, ſeveral perſons were accuſed of high-treaſon, and ſentenced to various puniſhments. Treſilian, Brembar, and ſome other knights and gentlemen were hanged, at Tyburn; and the reſt of the judges, with the biſhop of Chicheſter, received the ſame ſentence; but, their lives being afterwards granted to them, they were baniſhed to Ireland *; moreover, the two favourites and the archbiſhop of York were condemned to exile, and their eſtates confiſcated to the uſe of the king. The parliament meets.

The parliament having, thus, paid what was thought due to juſtice, two acts were paſſed, the firſt of which prohibited the aſcribing to the king the late commotions; and the other granted a general pardon to both the parties. The king renewed his coronation-oath, as if he begun a new reign; and all the lords not only did him homage, but alſo repeated their oaths of allegiance. This parliament, called the Mercileſs, did not break up, till the 4th of June. A general pardon.

During the troubles in England, the Scots advanced, as far as Newcaſtle, under the command of Sir William Douglas, and committed great ravages, on the borders; but theſe commotions were no ſooner appeaſed, than Henry Piercy, ſirnamed Hotſpur, ſon to the earl of Northumberland, marched againſt the Scots, and giving them, battle, ſlew Douglas, with his own hand; but the earl of Dunbar, falling upon him, during the engagement, with a body of freſh troops, the Engliſh army was, at length, defeated, and Hotſpur taken priſoner. The Engliſh are defeated by the Scots.

* They had allowances made them out of the exchequer, for their maintenance, as follows: Fulthorp, 40 l. per annum; Burgh, 40 marks; Belknap, 40 l. and Cary and Lokton, 20 l. per annum a-piece. Rymer's Fœd. Knighton.

1388. About the ſame time, the earl of Arundel, whom the parliament had made high-admiral, went to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Bretagne, attacked by the king of France; but, this aid obliging Charles to enter into a treaty with the duke, the Engliſh were diſmiſſed; and the earl of Arundel, in his return, took from the French 80 freighted ſhips, and plundered the iſles of Ree and Oleron; after which, he ſailed with his fleet to England; and, ſoon after, the two crowns agreed upon a three years truce, wherein the Scots were included.

The exploits of the earl of Arundel. Walſing.

1389. Since the laſt parliament, England enjoyed uninterrupted tranquillity; for the new miniſters took care to give the king prudent advice; but, though the king's council was happily changed, it was not ſo eaſy to alter his temper. Richard, full of his own merit, was extremely concerned to be under the direction of others, when he was of age to hold the reins of the government himſelf; and, upon his entering into his 22d year, he called his council, ordering all the members to be preſent. When they were aſſembled, he asked them, how old he was; to which it was replied, that he was, at leaſt, 20 years of age; upon which he made anſwer, "I will govern my kingdom my-"ſelf; for the condition of a king ought not "to be worſe than that of his ſubjects, who "are at liberty, at that age, to manage their "own affairs." Having, thus, declared his intentions, he commanded the chancellor to deliver him the great ſeal, which he gave to the biſhop of Wincheſter; and, at the ſame time, he turned out the biſhop of Hereford from being treaſurer, and removed from the council-board the duke of Glouceſter, his uncle, the earl of Warwick, and ſome others, whom he diſliked, appointing ſuch to ſucceed them, as he believed to be more obſequious to his will. This proceeding was not, in itſelf, ſurpriſing, becauſe it was in his power to make theſe alterations; but, however, it was obſerved, that he had never given leſs ſigns of prudence, which thoſe, of his age, are ſuppoſed to have, than in the choice of his new miniſters, who were, by no means, qualified for their poſts; and, it was not long, before diſorder and confuſion were viſible, in the publick affairs. The favourites, in the firſt place, took care to inſinuate to the king, that the duke of Glouceſter had ill deſigns upon his perſon; but the duke ſo fully vindicated his innocence, that the king was aſhamed of giving credit to ſuch a groundleſs charge; tho' he would not ſuffer the duke to proſecute his accuſers, who were even confuted, in his preſence.

1389. Richard aſſumes the government. Walſing.

1390. In the mean while, the duke of Lancaſter returned from his Spaniſh expedition, who was repreſented to Richard, as a no leſs formidable enemy; whoſe progreſs, in that country, at length, obliged the king of Caſtile to make a treaty with him, promiſing to pay down 600,000 livres, with an annual penſion of 40,000, during the lives of him and his dutcheſs; and this treaty was followed by a marriage of the princeſs Catharine, the duke's daughter by Conſtantia, with Henry, eldeſt ſon to the king of Caſtile, on account of which the duke and dutcheſs reſigned their pretenſions to that crown. 1390.

The return of the duke of Lancaſter. Walſing.

Richard, upon the duke of Lancaſter's arrival, received him with ſuch careſſes, as gave a fair proſpect of a happy union in the royal family, for the future; and the hope of this was confirmed, by the reconciliation procured by the duke of Lancaſter, between the king and the duke of Glouceſter; a reconciliation, in all appearance, ſo ſincere, on the king's ſide, that all the world was deceived; yet, notwithſtanding theſe ſpecious appearances, the duke of Lancaſter's preſence was extremely diſagreeable to the king, who was willing, at any rate, to purchaſe his abſence. To compaſs his ends, he made him the richeſt preſent that a king of England could, then, make a ſubject, by inveſting him with the dutchy of Guienne, with the ſame privileges that were granted to the late prince of Wales, the king's father; for, as he never had any affection for him, this valuable preſent could be made with no other view than to remove him from England.

The king is reconciled to his uncles. Walſing.

Shortly after, the earl of Derby, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, went and carried arms, in Pruſſia, where he ſignalized himſelf, by many gallant exploits; but, whilſt this prince laboured to acquire a reputation, by his martial atchievements, Richard paſſed his time, in ſham-fights; and, conſuming immenſe ſums, in tournaments, he gave occaſion to compare him, tho' exceedingly to his diſadvantage, with his couſin, the earl of Derby, who was in great eſteem *.

The earl of Derby ſerves in Pruſſia.

1391. Whilſt the king was intent upon theſe diverſions, the parliament revived and confirmed a ſtatute, enacted in the reign of Edward III; by which it was made high-treaſon, to bring into the kingdom proviſions from the court of Rome, without the king's licenſe. A nuncio, ſent to England, on that account, loudly complained of this act, and even threatened, that the pope would proceed to extremities; but his menaces were incapable of obliging the parliament to annul it; and all he could obtain was a reprieve, for this new ſort of offenders, till the enſuing parliament.

1391. The ſtatutes againſt the proviſions are revived.

Though a terrible plague, and a famine no leſs intolerable, then, afflicted England, the king retrenched none of his diverſions, or extravagant expences; for he is ſaid to entertain daily 6000 perſons; and he valued himſelf upon ſurpaſſing, in magnificence, all the ſovereigns of Europe, as if he had been poſſeſſed of an inexhauſtible fund of treaſure. In his kitchen alone, 300 domeſticks were employed; and the queen had as many women, in her ſervice. The courtiers ſo eaſily obtained whatever they requeſted, that the king's favours were the leſs valued; and, in a word, he affected, in every thing, a profuſeneſs, which 1392. As his revenues were inſufficient for ſo many expences, he reſolved to try to procure ſome aſſiſtance from the Londoners; and, being contented, at firſt, to ſee how they ſtood affected, he only borrowed 1000 l. but, how inconſiderable ſoever this ſum was, he was refuſed, in a very mortifying manner, even to the cutting in pieces, by the populace, an Italian merchant, who offered to lend the money himſelf. Richard highly reſented this affront; and he, ſoon after, found an opportunity to revenge it; for, under the pretence of puniſhing a tumult of little conſequence, raiſed by a baker's apprentice, he deprived the city of all her privileges, took away her charter, and removed the courts of juſtice to York. Indeed, he reſtored the whole; but the Londoners were obliged to redeem their charter, with a preſent of 10,000 l. and two gold crowns. However, though they paid dearly, for refuſing to lend the king 1000 l. it was nothing in compariſon of the prejudice the king himſelf received; for, by this proceeding, he entirely forfeited the affection of the citizens, who made him ſenſible, afterwards, how dangerous it is for a king of England to have London, for his enemy.

Richard takes away the charter of the Londoners, which he reſtors for money. Act. Pub.

1393. In the beginning of the year 1393, deputies arrived at London, from the Engliſh ſettled in Ireland, imploring aid againſt the natives*; who, for ſome time, by their frequent inſurrections, ſhewed, that they were deſirous of ſhaking off the yoke of the Engliſh. Theſe diſorders ſhould have had a ſpeedier remedy; though Richard, too much addicted to his pleaſures, had entirely neglected the affairs of Ireland; but, at laſt, the rebellion roſe to ſuch an height, that he could not, without hazarding the loſs of the iſland, any longer delay ſending ſuitable ſupplies. The duke of Glouceſter offered his ſervice, to ſuppreſs the rebels; but the king, afraid of truſting him with the command of an army, reſolved to go himſelf; and, with this view, he called a parliament, which granted him a large ſum, as well for the Iriſh war, as for the charges of an ambaſſy of the dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter, who were to negotiate a final peace with France. However, the latter affair came to nothing by an accident, which prevented the meeting of the plenipotentiaries, between Ardres and Guiſnes, according to agreement; for king Charles, who was, from time to time, ſeized with a diſtemper, that deprived him of his underſtanding, being come to Abbeville, on purpoſe to convince the Engliſh, that he was in his ſenſes, fell into one of his uſual fits; which relapſe occaſioned the deferring of the negotiation to a more convenient ſeaſon.

A rebellion in Ireland. Walſing.

The king's preparations, for his voyage to Ireland, were ſomewhat interrupted, in the beginning of the year 1394, by the funerals of his queen, and of the dutcheſſes of Lancaſter and York, who died, about the ſame time; and it is affirmed, that the queen, being a great favourer of Wickliff's doctrine, had ſhe lived any longer, would have preſerved the Lollards †, that is, Wickliff's followers, from many of the calamities they afterwards endured; for the departure of the duke of Lancaſter, their chief patron, to take poſſeſſion of Guienne, did not a little contribute to forward the deſigns of their perſecuting enemies.

1394. 1394. The death of the queen.

How much ſoever Richard lamented the death of the queen, he, purſuant to his reſolution, ſet out for Ireland; where he arrived, in September, and, at firſt, made ſome progreſs againſt the rebels; but, the ſeaſon not permitting him to proceed, he went to Dublin, where he held a parliament, whilſt the duke of York aſſembled another, in England, which granted a ſubſidy, for the ſupport of the Iriſh war.

The king goes to Ireland, and makes ſome progreſs againſt the rebels.

Richard was preparing to take the field again, when the archbiſhop of York and biſhop of London came from England, to intreat him, in the name of the clergy, to haſten his return; and they even intimated, that the leaſt delay might bring an irreparable damage to religion. The foundation of this alarm was, that, in the late parliament, the Lollards had ſollicited a reformation of the church; and, as they had many friends in the kingdom, and in the parliament itſelf, the clergy were apprehenſive, that they would proceed to a reformation; wherefore, the two deputed prelates ſo magnified the danger religion was in, that Richard, immediately, embarqued for England, leaving to the earl of Marche the conduct of the war. Upon his arrival at London, he concerted meaſures with the clergy, to ſuppreſs the Lollards; and he compelled Sir Richard Story publickly to abjure their doctrine, threatening to puniſh him with death, if ever he relapſed.

1395. The deſigns of the Lollards oblige the clergy to ſend to the king. Walſing.

Shortly after, was brought into England, by the king's order, the corpſe of the duke of Ireland, who died, at Louvain; and, this object reviving Richard's affection, he cauſed the coffin to be opened, that he might, once more, have the pleaſure of ſeeing the man whom he had ſo tenderly loved. Then he ordered him a magnificent funeral; which he was pleaſed to honour, with his preſence, as Edward II. had formerly done, as to that of Gaveſton; but, the nobility declining to ſhew that reſpect to a favourite, whom they had ſo much reaſon to deteſt, Richard, like Edward II, was attended, at the funeral pomp, with only ſome of the clergy ‡.

The corpſe of the duke of Ireland is brought into England.

* King Edward III. received from that kingdom 30,000 l. per annum; but, after his death, the Engliſh, ſettled there, flocked to England, in ſuch multitudes, that the reſt not only remained expoſed to the depredations of the natives, but it coſt the king 30,000 marks a year, to preſerve the Engliſh pale, in that iſland; upon which he ordered all that belonged to Ireland, to repair thither, on pain of death. Whilſt 1396. Whilſt the king was employed in his Iriſh expedition, the duke of Lancaſter, who went to Bourdeaux, to cauſe his ſovereignty to be acknowledged, met with unexpected obſtacles; for the Gaſcoigns maintained, that it was not in the king's power to alienate their country, which, they alledged, was inſeparably united to the crown of England; and they farther ſaid, that, if they were once ſeparated from England, they ran the riſque of loſing the ſole protection, capable of preventing their falling under the dominion of France; and, therefore, they aſſerted, that the alienation in diſpute was equally prejudicial to themſelves and the crown of England. It was objected, that they were not ſo ſcrupulous, with regard to the prince of Wales, the king's father; but they replied, that the firſt alienation, being made, in favour of the next heir to the crown, was to be only, for a time, whereas this might eaſily happen to be, for ever; and, after ſeveral conteſts on this ſubject, the king reſolved, at length, to revoke the grant, to which the duke of Lancaſter, being unable to help it, readily ſubmitted. To comfort him, in ſome meaſure, for this loſs, he permitted him to marry Catharine Rowet, widow to Sir Thomas Swinford *. The duke had long kept her, as his miſtreſs, and had by her ſeveral children, that were legitimated by the king and parliament, by the name of Beaufort; and, ſome time after, the king created the eldeſt earl of Somerſet †.

Richard marries the king of France's daughter. Walſing.

Before the duke of Lancaſter's return, the king had ſent ambaſſadors to France, to demand in marriage Iſabella, daughter to Charles VI; but the court of France, at firſt, rejected this propoſal, becauſe the princeſs was no more than ſeven years old, and, moreover, was promiſed to the duke of Bretagne; yet, in ſpite of theſe difficulties, the marriage was concluded, in a ſecond negotiation, and likewiſe a 28 years truce, between the two crowns. Soon after this, both the kings met, between Ardres and Calais, under tents pitched, on purpoſe; where the two courts diſplayed all their magnificence; and, at the ſame time, the treaty was ſigned and the nuptials ſolemnized ‡; on which occaſion, it is ſaid, that Richard expended 300,000 marks, a far greater ſum than that of 200,000, which he received, in deduction of what was promiſed him with his queen. The duke of Glouceſter diſliked both the marriage and the truce; and he even roundly told the king, that it would have been more adviſable to attempt, by a vigorous war, to recover what England had loſt, in France, than to enter into an alliance with a crown, that had, all along, procured more advantages, by treaties with the Engliſh, than by the ſucceſs of its arms.

1397. The king's illegal ways to raiſe money. Walſing.

Richard's uſual expence, with the charges of his late marriage, having entirely drained his exchequer, and obliged him to borrow large ſums, there was a neceſſity of having recourſe to extraordinary ways, to fill his coffers; for, though the parliament, in the beginning of the year 1397, granted him a very conſiderable ſubſidy, it was not ſufficient to diſcharge his debts; and, beſides, he increaſed the expence of his houſhold, on account of a report, that the electoral princes intended to raiſe him to the imperial dignity. As he was aſhamed to demand a freſh ſupply from the parliament, he, again, borrowed or rather extorted money from the rich; for there was not a lord, biſhop, gentleman, or wealthy burgeſs, whom he did not oblige to lend him money, though they were very ſenſible, that he never deſigned to repay it. However, tho' this method of exacting money from the people had been always conſidered, by the Engliſh, as one of the greateſt violations of their privileges, it occaſioned no commotion; for every one was intimidated, and, though this injuſtice was highly reſented, it was borne with patience, in expectation that it would prove the laſt. 1397.

He delivers up Breſt and Cherbourg. Act. Pub.

The caſe was quite otherwiſe, with reſpect to the reſtitution of Cherbourg to the king of Navarre, and of Breſt to the duke of Bretagne; for, though theſe two places did not, originally, belong to England, the Engliſh had been at ſuch a great expence, in aiding the princes to whom they appertained, that they might have been juſtly detained, till the whole was repaid; wherefore, this occaſioned a general diſſatisfaction, and the more, becauſe it brought the king but an inconſiderable ſum, which was alſo ſquandered away, in ſuperfluous expences. Indeed, Richard pretended, that his engagement to reſtore theſe places, after a peace, or a long truce with France, rendered this reſtitution neceſſary; tho' it was notorious, that the king of Navarre and the duke of Bretagne had failed him, firſt; but, however that be, the duke of Glouceſter apprehended this fault to be ſo prejudicial to England, that he could not forbear upbraiding the king, in very ſharp terms. Richard, by his anſwer, evidently ſhewed, how much he was offended at his remonſtrance; and this accident revived his former hatred of the duke of Glouceſter, which, being rather ſtifled than extinguiſhed, diſcovered itſelf, from time to time, notwithſtanding his care to conceal it. He complained to the dukes of Lancaſter and York, that the duke of Glouceſter preſumed to controul his actions; and he dropped ſome expreſſions, from whence they concluded, that he ſuſpected all three of having ill deſigns upon him. The two princes proteſted, that they had an unſhaken loyalty for him, and did not doubt but the duke, their brother, had the ſame, though his haſty temper cauſed him ſometimes to ſpeak, with too much warmth; and the king ſeemed ſatisfied with their juſtification; yet his being ſo eaſily pacified bred

Their withdrawing, probably, paved the way for the duke of Glouceſter's ruin, as it gave his enemies an opportunity to inflame the king's diſpleaſure againſt him, and to determine him, at length, to be rid of ſo troubleſome an inſpector; but, as they could find nothing in his conduct, that might expoſe him to the rigour of the law, and, beſides, it would be of dangerous conſequence to take that courſe, to deſtroy him, Richard reſolved to make uſe of a ſpeedier and more effectual method. Accordingly, he came, one morning, to his uncle's country houſe, and, finding him in bed, deſired him to riſe, immediately, and accompany him to London; pretending that he wanted him in a very important affair, which he would impart to him, on the road. The duke, preſently, mounting his horſe, rode by the king, who diſcourſed with him, about the pretended affair; but, at length, they came to a hollow way, where the duke was, on a ſudden, ſurrounded with ſome horſe-men, and carried on board a ſhip, which lay ready in the Thames, to conveigh him to Calais. When the king arrived at London, he ſent for the earls of Warwick and Arundel, and, after he had familiarly talked with them, ſome time, he ordered them to be apprehended and ſent to the tower; and he treated the lord Cobham in the ſame manner, with ſome others whom he intended to get rid of; but, in the interim, hearing that the people began to ſtir, he iſſued out a proclamation, declaring, that theſe lords were taken into cuſtody, for new miſdemeanours, and promiſing, that they ſhould be proceeded againſt, according to law.

This proclamation having ſomewhat appeaſed the people, the king ſummoned all the peers of the realm to Nottingham, under the pretence of conſulting them, about the manner of proceeding againſt the priſoners; though he was, in this reſpect, already determined, and his intent was to ſound them, rather than to ask advice. The affair being debated in council, the lords, fearing to incur either the king's indignation, or the hatred of the publick, if they came to any reſolution, declared it to be of ſuch a nature, that it could only be decided by the authority of the parliament; which was the very thing the king wanted; for he had, before, taken all neceſſary meaſures to have a parliament at his devotion. Some time ſince, he had changed all the ſheriffs of the kingdom, and ſuffered none, that would not promiſe to be ſubſervient to his deſigns; and he had uſed the ſame precautions, with reſpect to all officers that had credit and power, in the boroughs and counties. Thus, by means of the magiſtrates, and perſons in publick poſts, he had cauſed ſuch perſons to be elected, as were agreeable to his inclinations; and, if any were choſen, that he had not, previouſly, ſecured, the ſheriffs were ordered not to return them, but to cauſe others to be choſen, in their room; moreover, the houſe of commons being the ſole judges, in the affair of elections, he was fully aſſured, that ſuch a parliament would approve, or reject, whom he pleaſed. 1397.

The king gets a parliament at his devotion.

It muſt not be thought extremely difficult for a king of England to put ſuch a project in execution; for experience has ſince confirmed, on numberleſs occaſions, that, by the like practices, it is very poſſible to cauſe repreſentatives to be choſen, devoted to the court. However, hiſtorians obſerve, that it was in this parliament, that ſuch methods were, firſt, uſed; but it muſt alſo be added, that it was one of the principal cauſes of Richard's deſtruction, as will be ſeen, hereafter; and, indeed, it is impoſſible, that a nation can ſee their liberties in the hands of men, whom they have not themſelves freely choſen, without deſiring to be delivered from ſuch an oppreſſion.

The biſhop of Exeter's ſpeech upon the abſolute power of the king. Walſing. Act. Pub.

The parliament being, thus, compoſed, the biſhop of Exeter opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, labouring to prove, that the regal power was abſolute; and that all, who endeavoured to limit it, deſerved the ſevereſt puniſhments. Purſuant to this principle, which met with a general approbation, the parliament repealed the act of grace, paſſed, nine years before, in favour of the duke of Glouceſter, the earls of Warwick and Arundel, and all their adherents; and they likewiſe annulled all the acts, which appointed the 14 governors to the king, as being extorted, during his minority.

The unjuſt and violent proceedings of the parliament. Cotton. Walſing.

If the parliament of 1386 deſerved to be termed the Mercileſs, I know no name black enough for the preſent; who, by a manifeſt prevarication, ſacrificed, to the paſſions of the king and his miniſters, the moſt diſtinguiſhed lords of the kingdom, as well as the liberties and privileges of the people. Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was impeached of high-treaſon, for being one of the commiſſioners appointed by the parliament of 1386, to inſpect the adminiſtration of the publick affairs; and, for this new ſort of offence, the archbiſhop was baniſhed, and his eſtate confiſcated to the uſe of the king. After this, the earls of Arundel and Warwick were accuſed of the ſame crimes, for which, nine years before, the king had granted a pardon, and ſentenced to die by this truly mercileſs parliament; and Froiſſart tells us, that the king would be preſent at Arundel's execution; but another hiſtorian adds, that the ſpectacle remained ſo deeply imprinted in his memory, that his ſleep was frequently interrupted by dreams, repreſenting to him the earl covered with blood, and upbraiding him with his injuſtice. Perhaps, to this alſo contributed the rumour, that ſeveral miracles were wrought, at the tomb of the deceaſed, and that his head was miraculouſly rejoined to his body; for, though, to prevent the ill effects of this falſe notion, the king had ordered the corpſe to be taken up and expoſed to publick view, 10 days together, in a church, it was impoſſible to cure the people of their prepoſſeſſion. The earl of Warwick, who voluntarily confeſſed himſelf guilty, without taking advantage of the pardon, was treated with leſs ſeverity, 1397. his puniſhment being changed into perpetual baniſhment, in the iſle of Man; and, as to the duke of Glouceſter, in all probability, the king was apprehenſive, that it would be very dangerous to put him to death publickly, or that the parliament would refuſe to ſacrifice ſo conſiderable a perſon; but, however that be, he had taken care, as was afterwards known, to Act. Pub. have him privately ſtrangled, at Calais. In the mean while, his enemies gave out, that he died of an apoplexy, and, before he expired, confeſſed himſelf guilty of treaſon againſt the king; upon which report, without any examination of the grounds, the duke's whole eſtate was confiſcated to the uſe of the king.

The king gratifies ſeveral lords. Walſing.

It was next to impoſſible but theſe ſeverities ſhould produce ſome alteration, among the nobility; and, therefore, Richard took care to gratify the principal lords, and particularly the princes of the blood. He created Henry, earl of Derby, his couſin, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, duke of Hereford; Edward Plantagenet, earl of Rutland, eldeſt ſon to the duke of York, duke of Albemarle; and Thomas de Holland, earl of Kent, duke of Surrey. John de Holland, earl of Huntingdon, the king's half-brother, was made duke of Exeter; Thomas Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, duke of Norfolk; and Sir William le Scroope, earl of Wiltſhire. Laſtly, out of complaiſance to the duke of Lancaſter, the king honoured John Beaufort, his eldeſt ſon, by his third wife, who was already earl of Somerſet, with the title of marqueſs of Somerſet; and he, moreover, diſtributed, among theſe lords, the forfeited eſtates of the duke of Glouceſter, and of the earls of Arundel and Warwick.

The parliament is adjourned to Shrewſbury. Walſing.

In thoſe days, the parliament very rarely ſat, above one ſeſſion, unleſs the buſineſs required a ſhort prorogation; but this was ſo agreeable to the king's inclinations, that, inſtead of diſſolving it, he was pleaſed to adjourn it to Shrewsbury; a town, in the neighbourhood of Wales, where he had many friends, ſeemingly more proper for his deſigns than London, where he knew he was not beloved.

1398. The extraordinary proceedings of the parliament at Shrewſbury. Cotton.

The new ſeſſion was only a continuation of the late extraordinary proceedings, at Weſtminſter; for the parliament ſtrove to carry the prerogative royal to a greater height, than any monarch of England had ever pretended to ſtretch it, and eſtabliſhed maxims, that were deſtructive of the conſtitution and the liberties of the people. They approved, as conformable to law, the opinions, for which, nine years before, the judges were condemned; and, accordingly, the judges, who attended, during the ſitting of the parliament, decided, that, "When the king propoſed any articles to be "debated in parliament, it was high-treaſon "to bring in others, before theſe were diſ-"patched." By this and the like deciſions, the caſes of high-treaſon were ſo multiplied, that it was ſcarce poſſible to avoid being guilty of that crime, without making the king's will and pleaſure the ſole rule of action; and, at laſt, under the pretence of diſpatching buſineſs, the parliament appointed a certain number of commiſſioners, whom they inveſted with the authority of the whole houſe. Thus, by an unprecedented act, the whole power of the nation was devolved to the king, 12 peers, and ſix commoners; and, to render more valid theſe irregular proceedings, the king cauſed them to be confirmed by the pope's bull, which was publiſhed, in all the counties of the kingdom. 1398.

Cheſhire is made a principality.

During this ſecond ſeſſion, Richard brought into Shrewsbury a numerous guard of the militia of Cheſhire, who expreſſed ſuch an ardent zeal for his ſervice, that, to gratify the county, he erected it into a principality.

Remarks on the Engliſh conſtitution.

Let us ſtop here, a moment, and reflect on the conſtitution of the Engliſh government. It is certain, that the inſtitution of parliaments is extremely advantageous to the people, who, without that, would, long ſince, have fallen into a fatal ſlavery; but, on the contrary, it cannot be denied, that theſe aſſemblies become ſometimes very dangerous, when influenced by popular factions, or the cabals of an ambitious prince. Accordingly, it has often happened, that, inſtead of procuring the good of the kingdom, they have produced confuſion and the ſubverſion of the laws, ſometimes by by too much depreſſing the royal prerogative, at other times, by ſtretching it farther, than is conſiſtent with the welfare of the ſtate; and, in ſuch caſes, the evil is ſo much the harder to be cured, as the proceedings of the parliament are ſuppoſed to flow from the unanimous conſent of the whole nation. On this account, it ſeldom happens, that this diſorder can be remedied, without means as violent as thoſe that produced it, which generally occaſion civil wars; and this is one of the principal cauſes of the domeſtick troubles that have, all along, afflicted England, more than any other European ſtate.

It may be likewiſe remarked, that the violent method practiſed by Richard, to attain to arbitrary power, viz. forced elections, and, the opinions of the judges, was exactly copied, in our own time, by one of his ſucceſſors, and doubtleſs, with the ſame intention; but we may add, that the attempts of both theſe monarchs only promoted their own deſtruction, and that their deſigns had the ſame fatal iſſue; which we ſhall preſently ſee, with reſpect to Richard II, in the ſequel of his reign.

Richard lives in a deceitful ſecurity.

All things ſeemed to contribute to the ſupport of the king, in the enjoyment of the deſpotick power he had lately aſſumed; for they, who were moſt capable of oppoſing him, had ſuffered a tragical death, or were baniſhed the realm; and the reſt were brought over, by places, grants, or other favours. The great officers of the crown, with the governors of the towns and counties, were all at the king's devotion; and all the magiſtrates of the towns and country were ready to do all that was poſſible, to increaſe the regal power; yet, after all, Richard was greatly miſtaken, in fancying that this new acquired power was ſafe, ſince the people were againſt him, and even deteſted him, for his violent actions. It is farther probable, that many of his adherents, out of weakneſs 1398. weakneſs or prudence, only concealed their real ſentiments, till an opportunity offered, to free the kingdom from the yoke it groaned under; and a proper juncture preſented itſelf, ſooner than the king imagined; for, being ſwayed by his paſſion, he had not the prudence to keep within ſome bounds, an error which princes, of his character, very rarely fail of committing. As they are continually ſurrounded with flatterers, they fondly conclude, that all the reſt of the people entertain the ſame ſentiments; and it is, for the moſt part, too late, before they perceive, that the ſmall numbers, they have gained, is a poor defence againſt the fury of an inraged nation. Indeed, for a while, five or ſix hundred perſons, who compoſe the parliament, and ſome hundreds of magiſtrates in the towns and counties, appear to make the body of the nation, and the remainder are accounted, as nothing; but a time comes, when every individual perſon is taken into the account; and then the number of thoſe, that are in office, is infinitely ſmall, in compariſon of the bulk of the nation.

A quarrel between the dukes of Hereford and Norfolk. Walſing.

Richard, incapable of making theſe reflections, ſuffered himſelf to be blindly directed by his paſſion, which led him to conſider, as a great advantage, all opportunities of exerciſing the arbitrary power he thought to have ſo firmly eſtabliſhed; and, towards the end of the year 1398, he gave a ſignal proof of the little regard he deſigned to have for his ſubjects, on occaſion of a quarrel between two of the principal lords of his court. The duke of Hereford, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, overawed by the examples of the duke of Glouceſter, his uncle, and the other lords, whom the king had ſacrificed to his reſentment, limiting his deſires, made it the height of his ambition, to keep in his favour, and carefully endeavoured to avoid giving any cauſe of ſuſpicion; and it was, probably, with this view, that, fearing the duke of Norfolk had laid a ſnare for him, in ſpeaking to him very diſreſpectfully of the king, he informed Richard of the ſame. The duke of Norfolk, denying that he uttered any ſuch words againſt Richard, and the duke of Hereford maintaining his accuſation, it was ordered, that the affair ſhould be decided, by ſingle combat, Coventry being the place appointed for the duel; and the king intended to be preſent at it; but, juſt as the two dukes were entering the liſts, Richard, under the pretence of avoiding the effuſion of blood, but, in reality, to be rid of theſe two lords, at once, commanded them to proceed no farther; for, though only one of them could be guilty, he baniſhed them both, the duke of Norfolk, for life, and the duke of Hereford, for 10 years. The former died, ſoon after, at Venice, und the other retired into France; but this act of authority was no leſs contrary to the privileges of the nobility, than what the king had, hitherto, done, with reſpect to the nation, in general; for, by the laws of the land, theſe lords could only be tried by their peers.

Not long after the duke of Hereford's being ſent into exile, his father, the duke of Lancaſter, died, little lamented by the people, and ſtill leſs by the king; and, by the death of this prince, his honours and eſtates, which were very conſiderable, fell to the duke of Hereford, his ſon, to whom, before his departure, the king had remitted four years of his baniſhment. Moreover, he had granted him letters patent, impowering him to take poſſeſſion, by his attorney, of all the fees, that ſhould fall to him, in his abſence, with a ſuſpenſion of homage, till his return; yet, immediately after the deceaſe of the duke, his father, the king, by a ſentence, no leſs unjuſt than the former, decreed, that his baniſhment ſhould be perpetual, and confiſcated all his eſtate.

The ill ſtate of the kingdom.

The laws and liberties of England were in a deplorable ſtate, by reaſon of ſuch acts of deſpotick power; and, the dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter and the earl of Arundel being dead, Warwick ſent away, the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the dukes of Hereford and Norfolk in exile, there was ſcarce a man in the kingdom able to oppoſe the arbitrary power uſurped by the king. The duke of York alone, the king's uncle, might have defended the nation's intereſts; but, as he loved his eaſe, he was an improper perſon to engage in ſuch an undertaking. Richard, therefore, being above all reſtraint, gave himſelf up to a ſoft and effeminate life, entirely regardleſs of the good of the publick; whilſt, in the interim, his miniſters, neglected their affairs, and ſaw, without the leaſt concern, the Engliſh nation, ſink into the utmoſt contempt. The Scots often violated the truce, by incurſions upon the borders, being very ſure, that the court of England would overlook their inſults; and the Engliſh poſſeſſions, in France, were almoſt reduced to nothing, the places, which might, one day, have contributed to repair theſe loſſes, being alſo ſold, without any occaſion. The merchant-ſhips were daily plundered, by the corſairs of France and the Low-Countries, as no means were uſed to protect the trade; and, amidſt theſe diſorders, the miniſters, of whom the earl of Wiltſhire was the chief, ſought only to augment the king's revenues, by borrowings, new taxes, and ſtill more illegal methods. Pretences were no longer made uſe of to demand ſubſidies; for the whole buſineſs of the miniſters was only to find effectual means, to extort money from the people, to whom the very demanding it was thought to be too great an honour; and, at length, having practiſed various expedients, no leſs unjuſt than extraordinary, to ſupply the king's prodigious expences, and ſatisfy the avarice of his miniſters, a method was uſed, which could not fail of procuring large ſums. As the late parliament had reverſed the pardon granted, in 1386, to the duke of Glouceſter's adherents, accuſations were exhibited againſt them; and, by the judgments upon theſe accuſations, 17 counties were condemned, as guilty of treaſon, and the eſtates of all the inhabitants adjudged to the king. In this extremity, the principal gentlemen and burgeſſes were conſtrained, to avoid the ſeizure of their eſtates, to give blank obligations, which the king

It was impoſſible, that ſuch a tyrannical government ſhould not incur the hatred of the nation, againſt the prince and his inſtruments; and it was alſo very viſible, that theſe oppreſſions created, in the hearts of the people, an ardent deſire of recovering their liberty, inſomuch that the leaſt ſpark was capable of producing a fatal combuſtion.

A rebellion in Ireland. Walſing.

Whilſt England was expoſed to all theſe calamities, the Iriſh, deſpiſing the ſmall number of troops left by Richard, in Ireland, took up arms, with one conſent; and Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, governor of that iſland, oppoſing the rebels, was ſlain, in the very firſt engagement. This prince, who was declared, by an act of parliament, preſumptive heir to the crown, left two ſons, Edmund and Roger, the eldeſt of whom ſucceeded him, in his honour of earl of Marche, and died, without iſſue, as well as Roger, his brother; but the marriage of Ann, their ſiſter, with the duke of York's ſecond ſon, proved a fertile ſource of troubles, which, for many years, afflicted the kingdom.

Richard prepares to go to Ireland. Act. Pub.

Richard, receiving the news of the Iriſh revolt, reſolved to go, in perſon, and chaſtiſe the rebels, being, to the laſt degree, enraged, that the Iriſh ſhould dare to contemn his power, at a time when he found no oppoſition in England; and, accordingly, he levied a powerful army, which furniſhed him with a freſh occaſion to exact great ſums from his ſubjects, by which he conſiderably increaſed their former diſaffection.

1399. When he was ready to embarque, ſome ſuſpicions inſtilled into him, of the earl of Northumberland, governor of the northern counties, prompted him to ſend that earl a poſitive order, to come and join him, with all expedition; but the earl, to excuſe himſelf, alledging that his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary in thoſe parts, the king, forthwith, pronounced him a traytor, and ordered all his eſtate to be ſeized; and then, leaving the regency of the kingdom to the duke of York, his uncle, he ſet ſail, and arrived, May the 31ſt, at Waterford, from whence he marched to Dublin. He was attended by the ſons of the duke of Lancaſter, by his third wife, and by thoſe of the late duke of Glouceſter, whom he carried, as hoſtages; and he took with him the beſt part of his jewels, as if he had foreſeen, that he ſhould never return to his palace. He made, at firſt, ſome progreſs againſt the rebels; and, in ſeveral encounters, he gave proofs of his valour; wherefore, it was believed, that, if, hitherto, he had diſcovered no great inclination for war, it was not ſo much to be aſcribed to his want of courage, as to a bad education.

Froiſſart.

He leaves the duke of York regent. Walſing.

However, whilſt he flattered himſelf with the advantages he gained over the Iriſh, a conſpiracy was forming, in England, to deprive him of the crown; for, under an arbitrary government, like that of Richard, there muſt, of courſe, be great numbers of male-contents. Some perſons, indeed, find their account, in the abſolute power of the prince; but they are far from being the majority. A king, therefore, of this character, though he is generally ſurrounded with a crowd of flatterers, who endeavour to perſuade him, that the people patiently bear his yoke, if he had any knowledge of the world, ought to conſider, that the power, acquired by force, is only to be preſerv'd by the ſame way it was uſurped; and, if he is ſo impolitick, as to confide in ſubjects he has violently oppreſſed, it will be to no purpoſe for him to expect from them a fidelity, which only tends to increaſe their miſery. Accordingly, Richard, by leaving his kingdom, and carrying all his forces into Ireland, at a juncture when the people's hatred of him was at the higheſt, committed a capital error, which his enemies took care to improve; for he had ſcarce ſet out for Ireland, with almoſt all the lords, his creatures, before the male-contents, in England, began to project means to dethrone him. With this view, after ſeveral conferences together, they ſent word to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, ſince his baniſhment, was retired into France, "That all England was "diſpoſed to riſe, and nothing was wanting "but a leader of diſtinction to head the male-"contents; that, upon mature deliberation, "they judged none ſo proper as the duke of "Hereford, for whom the people had a great "eſteem and affection, and who, moreover, "had a very plauſible pretence to take up "arms, to demand ſatisfaction for the injuries "he had received; that, if the duke would "return into England, they engaged to aſſiſt "him, to the utmoſt of their power; and, "they aſſured him, that the body of the na-"tion would join thoſe, that ſhould undertake "to deliver them from their inſupportable "oppreſſions." The archbiſhop, who was himſelf extremely exaſperated againſt the king, communicating this letter to the duke, that prince reſolved to try what fortune would do, in his favour; but, being ſenſible, that he could not alone carry on this enterprize, he proceeded ſo cautiouſly, that he might eaſily deſiſt, if things did not prove anſwerable to his expectations. Purſuant to this reſolution, he privately repaired to Bretagne, where he fitted out three ſhips, and embarqued, in company with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and 80 men, among whom there were no more than 16 or 18 lances; and he hovered, ſome time, about the coaſt of England, without landing any where; deſigning to ſee what effect his approach would have among the people, and to induce the Engliſh openly to declare for him, in a belief that he was attended with a greater force. It was no ſooner known, that the duke was on the coaſt, than the people roſe, in ſeveral parts, not conſidering, whether the aid which appeared was ſufficient to protect them; and, this readineſs determining him

1399. him to puſh his enterprize farther, in the beginning of July, he landed at Ravenſpur, in Yorkſhire, where the earl of Northumberland and Henry Piercy, his ſon, immediately, joined him with ſome troops. After this, ſuch was the concourſe of people, flocking, in crowds, to liſt under his banners, that, in a few days, his army was 60,000 ſtrong; ſo eager were the nobility and people to put themſelves under the protection of a prince, who ſtood himſelf in ſo great need of their aſſiſtance.

The regent, in vain, tries to prevent a general revolt. Walſing.

As ſoon as the duke of York, regent of the kingdom, heard of the duke's landing, he called a council, to conſult about the neceſſary meaſures, on this occaſion; but the hourly news of the increaſe of the duke's forces, and the diſpoſition of the kingdom, ſoon made the counſellors, of whom there were few perſons of abilities, deſpair of removing the evil. In this perplexity, they committed a capital fault, in reſolving to quit London and retire to St. Albans; for the lords of the council had no ſooner left London, than the citizens declared for the duke, and, by their example, drew in ſuch towns, as would not, as yet, have ventured to proceed ſo far.

The duke publiſhes a manifeſto. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the duke, who, upon his arrival in England, aſſumed the title of duke of Lancaſter, publiſhed a manifeſto, repreſenting, that he had taken up arms, purely, to obtain ſatisfaction, for all the injuſtices done him; and this manifeſto produced ſuch a ſurpriſing effect, that, when the regent would have iſſued out commiſſions to levy troops, he ſcarce found any willing to accept them. Every one ſaid, openly, that they would not oppoſe the lawful pretenſions of a prince ſo unjuſtly oppreſſed; and, this refuſal convincing the earl of Wiltſhire and the reſt of the miniſtry, that they ran the riſque of being ſacrificed to the publick hatred, they deſerted the duke of York, and retired to Briſtol-caſtle. The regent, after the flight of the counſellors, perceiving that it was impoſſible to ſtem the torrent, threw up the care of the publick affairs, and withdrew to his own houſe, leaving the kingdom, like a ſhip expoſed to the winds and waves, without a pilot or mariners; and all the other lords, who had, as yet, remained neuter, in order to join the ſtrongeſt party, finding the king's intereſt abandoned, no longer delayed publickly to declare for the duke.

The duke marches to London, and is well received. Froiſſart.

The duke, improving theſe advantages, marched, with all expedition, to London, where the citizens had invited him; and he was triumphantly received by that noble city, with the greateſt demonſtrations of zeal and affection, that could be given by a people extremely incenſed againſt their ſovereign, and who conſidered themſelves, as delivered from tyranny; but, notwithſtanding this honourable reception, he ſtaid no longer among the Londoners, than was neceſſary to ſecure their allegiance; and then he marched directly towards Briſtol. Upon his arrival, the gates being opened to him, with joy, he commanded the caſtle to be aſſaulted, where the counſellors were retired; and the ſiege was puſhed 1399. ſo vigorouſly, that, in four days, the beſieged were compelled to ſurrender, at diſcretion. The people's indignation, againſt the earl of Wiltſhire and his companions, was ſo furious, that the duke, though the power, he aſſumed, was ſtill more illegal than the king's uſurpations, ordered the earl of Wiltſhire to be beheaded, with ſome others of the council, to ſatisfy the vengeance of the people, who loudly called for their death; and the good ſucceſs of this expedition induced the whole nation to embrace the duke's party; nay, ſhortly after, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his uncle, the duke of York, come and aſſiſt him with his councils.

The wind hinders the king from hearing from England. Walſing.

During theſe tranſactions, in England, Richard continued, in Ireland, in a perfect ſecurity; and the contrary winds, above three weeks, prevented his receiving intelligence; but, as ſoon as he heard of the duke of Lancaſter's deſcent, he impriſoned his brothers, with the duke of Lancaſter's ſons, and reſolved to return, immediately, into England, and fight his enemy. However, the duke of Albemarle adviſed him to ſtay, a few days, in order to prepare ſhips to tranſport all his forces, at once; and the king fell in with this fatal advice; for, during that interval, London declared for the duke, which, perhaps, would not have abandoned the king, had he been known to be in England, with a reſolution vigorouſly to oppoſe the deſigns of his enemies. Richard, being determined to ſtay, ſome days longer, in Ireland, ſent the earl of Salisbury before, to levy troops, in Wales, aſſuring him, that he would quickly follow him; and the earl uſed ſo much expedition, that, in a few days, he aſſembled an army of 40,000 men, the Welch and Cheſhire-men zealouſly taking up arms for the king. If Richard had arrived, with his forces, by the time he had promiſed, he might, at leaſt, have had the ſatisfaction of hazarding a battle, in defence of his crown; but the wind, returning to the eaſt, detained him, 18 days longer, in Ireland, and would not permit him to make ſo ſhort a paſſage. In the interim, a rumour being ſpread, in the earl of Salisbury's army, that the king was dead, in Ireland, the troops would have disbanded themſelves; and it was with extreme difficulty, that the earl prevailed on them to ſtay, a few days, in order to have certain intelligence of the king; but, this delay being expired, and Richard not appearing, the Welch and Cheſhire-men deſerted their colours, and retired to their habitations.

The king arrives, and knows not what courſe to take. Walſing.

Richard landed, a few days after; and, as he was entirely ignorant of the earl of Salisbury's army being diſperſed, marched to Caermarthen, expecting to meet them; but, when he found, that he had loſt that refuge, and all the nobility had declared againſt him; that his miniſters were beheaded, at Briſtol, and the people ardently eſpouſed the duke of Lancaſter's cauſe, he was altogether at a loſs, how to proceed, in his preſent extremity. The officers and ſoldiers would have had him march 1399. at their head, and give his enemy battle, promiſing to ſpill the laſt drop of their blood, in his ſervice; and they inſpired him with hopes, that his army would daily increaſe, by the junction of thoſe, who, through force, or the belief of his death, had deſerted him. Some adviſed him to return and fortify himſelf, in Ireland; whilſt others thought, that it would be better for him to fly for refuge into France, to the king his father-in-law, till a more favourable opportunity offered. Amidſt theſe uncertainties, the king, incapable of taking the beſt advice, and having none about him that had either courage, or capacity, could not come to any reſolution; though, as he diſtruſted every body, he could not continue long in a ſituation, which he apprehended to be ſo very dangerous; and, therefore, he, on a ſudden, without conſulting any perſon, privately withdrew from his army, in the night, and ſhut himſelf up in Conway-caſtle, which was accounted impregnable, but, at that time, unprovided of all things; yet he had no ſooner diſappeared, than the lord Thomas Piercy, earl of Worceſter, maſter of the houſhold, broke his white ſtaff, before the king's domeſticks, and went to meet the duke of Lancaſter, who advanced towards Cheſter, at the head of his army.

Richard, who was almoſt alone in the caſtle he had choſen for his ſanctuary, without the leaſt proſpect of being able to defend himſelf, was afraid, if he attempted to eſcape, of falling into the hands of an enraged people, who gave him but too many proofs of their averſion; wherefore, perceiving no other remedy, but to throw himſelf upon the generoſity of his enemy, he ſent him word, by one of his attendants, that he was ready to ſubmit to what terms he himſelf ſhould think reaſonable, and deſired him to ſend ſome perſon, to confer with him. The duke, forthwith, diſpatched the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the earl of Northumberland, both avowed enemies to the king, to know his intentions; and, in the ſhort conference with theſe deputies, Richard offered, provided his life was ſecured, with an honourable penſion for himſelf and eight perſons he ſhould nominate, to reſign his crown, and ſpend the reſidue of his days, as a private perſon. The deputies giving him hopes, that his propoſal would be accepted, he requeſted to have an interview with the duke; upon which, he went to Flint, not above 10 miles from Cheſter, where the duke was now arrived. On the morrow, the duke, coming to Flint, went to the king, who ſaid to him, with a chearful countenance: "Couſin of "Lancaſter, you are welcome." Then the duke, thrice bowing to the ground, made anſwer, "My lord the king, I am come ſooner "than you appointed me, becauſe the com-"mon fame of your ſubjects is, that you have, "for theſe 21 years, governed very ill, and ri-"gorouſly, with which they are greatly diſſatiſ-"fied; but, if it pleaſe God, I will help you "to govern them better, for the future." To which the king only returned, "Fair couſin, "ſince it pleaſes you, it is agreeable to us "too." Some add, that Richard intreated 1399. the duke, in very humble terms, not to touch his life, on account of his having ſpared his brothers, whom he had only confined, in Ireland, and that the duke aſſured him, that he would not; and there are hiſtorians who affirm, that Richard was betrayed by the earl of Northumberland, who, perſuading him to demand this conference, laid an ambuſh for him, in the way, and carried him priſoner to the duke; but, however that be, the two princes ſet out, the ſame day, and lodged at Cheſter, from whence they proceeded together, for London.

An interview between the king and the duke. Walſing.

Chron. Lambeth.

Upon their approach, the Londoners came out, in crouds, to receive the one, with 1000 curſes, and the other, with exceſſive applauſes and commendations; and then the king was conducted to the tower, and confined there, whilſt the duke concerted meaſures with his friends, to compleat his deſign. The ſuddenneſs of this revolution, and the duke of Lancaſter's diligence, in traverſing ſo many counties, are extremely ſurpriſing; for, if it is conſidered, that, in 47 days, he marched from Ravenſpur, where he landed, to London, Briſtol, Cheſter, and from thence back to London, it will ſcarce be conceivable, that an army of 60,000 men could poſſibly run over ſo much ground, in ſo ſhort a ſpace. Richard is confined in the tower.

The king was no ſooner in the duke's power, than he took care to cauſe him to ſummon a parliament, at London; and, in the conferences he had with his friends, before the meeting of that aſſembly, the queſtion was not ſo much, about what was to be done, ſince the placing him upon the throne was reſolved, as how to proceed. Some were for his taking poſſeſſion, upon Richard's bare promiſe of reſigning the crown; but others were of opinion, that this promiſe was too conſtrained to be the foundation of any right, eſpecially, as there was a nearer heir than the duke, viz. Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, ſon to that Roger who was declared Richard's preſumptive ſucceſſor. The truth is, he was deſcended from Lionel, duke of Clarence, third ſon to Edward III; whereas the duke of Lancaſter was ſon to John, younger brother to to Lionel; and, tho' Edmund's right was only derived from a woman, that would have been no objection, if the uſual practice had been obſerved, ſince the Salick law did not take place, in England. Thus, by Richard's reſignation, the duke of Lancaſter had no right to claim the crown; and, therefore, they added, that, as there was a neceſſity of ſetting aſide the law, the authority of parliament was abſolutely requiſite; from whence they concluded, that Richard muſt be formally depoſed, and the duke elected, by the ſame authority; but this opinion was alſo attended with difficulties, as it aſcribed to the parliament a power to diſpoſe of the crown, contrary to the laws and cuſtoms, to the prejudice of the lawful heir, againſt whom nothing could be objected, to weaken his title. At laſt, after many debates, upon ſo nice a point, the duke of York adviſed to the uniting the three ways propoſed, in A conſultation between the duke and his friends. Walſing.

1399. in order to give the more vertue to what they had reſolved: That, in the firſt place, Richard ſhould be obliged to make an abſolute reſignation; ſecondly, the parliament ſhould depoſe him, before the crown was diſpoſed of; and, laſtly, theſe two ſteps being taken, the ſame parliament, in conſideration of the duke of Lancaſter's great ſervice to the ſtate, ſhould adjudge him the crown, by their ſupreme authority, which, in extraordinary caſes, was ſuperior to the laws. This opinion was unanimouſly approved; though, in, thus, puniſhing a king, for ſetting himſelf above the laws, a power was given the parliament no leſs contrary to them; ſo difficult is it, on ſuch occaſions, to keep within the bounds of juſtice and equity. This expedient, then judged proper to reſtore the peace of the kingdom, proved the real ſource of the calamities, which, afterwards, afflicted the nation, when theſe violent proceedings ſeemed to be entirely forgotten; and the deſcendants of the duke of York, who propoſed this opinion, found it for their advantage, to deſtroy the foundation on which it was built, and maintain that the parliament had exceeded their power, in tranſferring the crown to the houſe of Lancaſter.

Richard makes an abſolute reſignation of his crown. Walſing.

Purſuant to the foreſaid reſolutions, the duke of Lancaſter repaired to the tower, the day before the opening of the parliament, attended by a great number of lords; where, in the preſence of all, Richard delivered up the crown and ſcepter, with the other enſigns of royalty, and, by an inſtrument ſigned with his own hand, confeſſed himſelf unworthy and unfit to govern any longer. On the morrow, the parliament being met, the inſtrument of reſignation was produced, and unanimouſly approved; but, as this reſignation alone, according to the meaſures agreed upon, appeared inſufficient, the two houſes ordered articles of accuſation againſt Richard to be drawn up, to ſerve for reaſons of his depoſition; which articles, were as follows:

Articles of accuſation againſt Richard. Rot. Par. 1. Hen. 4. X. Script.

'I. Richard was accuſed of his evil government, by giving the goods and poſſeſſions of the crown to unworthy perſons, and indiſcreetly diſſipating the ſame; and, for this cauſe, impoſing inſupportable burdens upon the people, and, in other reſpects, committing innumerable evils; having, by his aſſent and command, by the whole parliament, choſen and aſſigned certain prelates, and other lords temporal, who, with all their might, ſhould faithfully labour, at their own coſts, about the juſt government of the kingdom, made a conventicle of his accompliçes, propoſing to impeach of high treaſon the ſaid lords ſpiritual and temporal, ſo employed about the government of the kingdom, and violently drawn the juſtices of the realm to confirm his wicked purpoſe, for fear of death and torment of body, attempting to deſtroy the ſaid lords.

'II. The ſame king lately, at Shrewsbury, cauſed to come before him, and others in his intereſt, in a chamber, many perſons, and the greater part of the juſtices; where, by threats and divers terrors, he induced, cauſed, and forced them, ſingly, to anſwer to certain queſtions, on his behalf, relating to the laws of his kingdom, againſt their will; and, under the pretence of theſe anſwers, the ſaid king would have proceeded to the deſtruction of Thomas, duke of Glouceſter, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and other lords, with whom he was extremely incenſed, eſpecially, becauſe they deſired him to be under good government, if Divine Providence, and the reſiſtance and power of the ſaid lords, had not defeated his deſign. 1399.

'III. When the lords temporal, in their own defence, reſiſted his malice and craft, the ſaid king appointed a day for the parliament, to do them and others juſtice, who, upon faith and confidence therein, remained quietly in their own houſes; but the king privately, with his letters or commiſſion, ſent the duke of Ireland into Cheſhire, to raiſe arms againſt the ſaid lords, great men, and officers of the common-wealth, publickly erecting his banners againſt the peace he had ſworn to maintain; from whence homicides, captivities, diſſenſions, and other infinite evils followed, in the whole kingdom, and on which account he incurred perjury.

'IV. That, altho' the ſaid king had pardoned the duke of Glouceſter, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and all their adherents, in full parliament, and, for many years, had ſhewn chearful ſigns of peace and love towards them; yet, retaining continually malice in his heart, taking opportunity, he cauſed to be ſeized the duke of Glouceſter, and, the ſaid earls of Arundel and Warwick; and, ſending the duke to Calais, to be impriſoned, under the cuſtody of the earl of Nottingham, one of his appellants, without anſwer, or lawful proceſs, he ordered him to be ſtrangled, and inhumanly and cruelly murdered. The earl of Arundel, pleading his charter of pardon, and demanding juſtice, in parliament, was ſurrounded with great numbers of armed men, and had his head damnably ſtruck off; and he committed the earl of Warwick and lord Cobham to perpetual impriſonment, confiſcating their lands, contrary to juſtice, the laws of the land, and his expreſs oath, and giving them to their appellants.

'V. When, in his parliament, he cauſed the duke of Glouceſter, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be adjudged, that he might more freely exerciſe his cruelty upon them, and fulfil his injurious will on others, he aſſembled a great multitude of malefactors, out of the county of Cheſter, who, marching up and down the kingdom with the king, as well within his own houſe as without, cruelly killed his lieges, beat and wounded others, plundering the goods of the people, refuſing to pay for their victuals, and raviſhing men's wives and other women; and, altho' complaints were made to the king of theſe exceſſes, he took no care to reſtrain them, but countenanced them in their wickedneſs, confiding in them and their

'aſſiſtance,

1399. 'assistance, against all others of his kingdom; 'wherefore, his loyal subjects had just cause for 'commotion and indignation.

'VI. Tho' the said king caused proclamation to be made thro' the kingdom, that 'he caused his uncle, the duke of Gloucester, 'and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, to 'be arrested, not for any rebellious congregations, or marching with horse within the 'kingdom, but for many extortions, oppressions, and other things done against his regality; and that he did not intend, that any 'of their company, at the time of the congregation and marching with horse aforesaid, 'should, for that reason, be questioned or disturbed: yet the same king afterwards, in 'his parliament, impeach'd the said lords; 'not for extortions, oppressions, or other things 'aforesaid, but, for rebellious congregations 'and marching with horse adjudged, them to 'death; causing many of their company, for 'fear of death, to pay fines and ransoms, as 'traytors, to the great destruction of many of 'his subjects; and, thus, he craftily and maliciously deceived the lords, their followers, 'and people of the nation.

'VII. After many of these persons had paid 'their fines and ransoms, and had procured 'his letters patent of full pardon; yet they 'received no benefit by them, until they made 'new fines, for their lives, by which they were 'greatly impoverished; and this was much in 'derogation to the name and state of a king.

'VIII. In the last parliament held at 'Shrewsbury, the same king, in order to oppress his people, subtly obtained and caused 'to be granted, that the power of parliament, 'by consent of all the states of the realm, 'should remain in some particular persons, 'who, after the parliament should be dissolved, 'might answer the petitions depending in parliament, then undetermined, under the pretence of which they proceeded to other general matters, relating to that parliament, 'according to the king's will, in derogation 'to the state of parliament, to the great prejudice of the kingdom, and which was a 'pernicious example; and, that these actions 'might have some colour of authority, the 'king caused the rolls of parliament to be 'changed and blotted, contrary to the effect 'of the grant aforesaid.

'IX. Altho' the said king, at his coronation, swore, that he would do, in all his 'judgments, equal and right justice, with discretion, in mercy and truth, according to his 'power; yet the said king, in a merciless manner, amongst other things, ordained, under rigorous punishments, that no man 'should intercede with him, for any favour 'towards Henry, duke of Lancaster, then in 'exile; and, in so doing, he acted against the 'bond of charity, and rashly violated his oath.

'X. That, tho' the crown of England, the 'rights of the crown, and kingdom itself, have 'been always so free, that the pope, or any 'other foreign power had nothing to do in 'them; yet the said king supplicated the pope 'to confirm the erroneous statutes made, in 'his last parliament; upon which he obtained his apostolick letters, or bull, wherein 'were contained severe censures against all 'such as should presume to contravene them; 'all which things are known to be against the 'crown and royal dignity, and against the 'statutes and liberty of the kingdom. 1399.

'XI. Tho' Henry, now duke of Lancaster, 'by the king's command, exhibited his bill or 'accusation against the duke of Norfolk, concerning the state and honour of the king, and 'duly prosecuted it, so as he was ready to 'make it good, by duel, and the king had ordered it; yet the same king superseded it, 'and, without any lawful cause, banished the 'duke of Lancaster, for 10 years, against all 'justice, the laws and customs of the kingdom, and the military law, damnably incurring perjury.

'XII. After the said king had graciously 'granted to the now duke of Lancaster, by 'his letters patent, that, while he was in banishment, his attornies might sue for livery 'of any inheritance that might fall to him, for 'which homage was due, which should be respited, for a reasonable fine, he injuriously 'revoked those letters patent, against the laws 'of the land, incurring perjury.

'XIII. Altho' it had been ordained, that, 'every year, the king's officers, with the justices and others of his council, should nominate and elect the sheriffs of all counties, 'according to their discretion; yet he commanded others of his party, and such as were 'entirely devoted to him, to be sheriffs; to 'the great grievance of his people, contrary 'to the laws of his kingdom, notoriously incurring perjury.

'XIV. That, whereas the said king borrowed several sums of money from lords and 'others, by his letters patent, promising faithfully to repay them, at a limited term, he 'did not perform his promise, to the great 'grief of his creditors; and not only they, but 'many others thought him an unfaithful king.

'XV. Whereas the kings of England used 'to live upon the revenues of the kingdom, 'and patrimony of the crown, in time of 'peace, without oppression of the people, the 'same king, during his whole time, gave the 'greatest part of his revenue to unworthy persons, and imposed burdens upon his subjects, as it were, every year; by which he 'unreasonably oppressed his people, and impoverished his kingdom; not employing 'these goods to the advantage of the nation, 'but prodigally consuming them, in ostentation, pomp, and glory, owing great sums 'for victuals and other necessaries of his house, 'tho' his revenues exceeded any of his progenitors.

'XVI. The same king unwilling to keep 'and protect the just laws and customs of his 'kingdom, when those laws were declared to 'him, by the justices and others of his council, desiring that justice might be done, accordingly, he said expressly, with an austere 'countenance, That the laws were only in his 'mouth and breast, and that he alone could make 1399. 'make and alter the laws of this kingdom; 'and, being ſo ſeduced, he would not permit juſtice to be done to many of his lieges, 'but, by menaces and terrors, compelled many to ceaſe from the proſecution of common 'juſtice.

'XVII. That, whereas laws, made in parliament, are always binding, until revoked 'by another parliament, the ſame king, deſiring to enjoy a boundleſs liberty, and to do 'what he pleaſed, cunningly procured ſuch a petition, on behalf of the community of his 'kingdom, to be exhibited, in parliament, 'and to be granted, that he might be as free 'as any of his progenitors; and, under the 'colour of this petition and grant, he often 'commanded, and cauſed many things to be 'done, contrary to the laws not revoked, 'acting, expreſly and knowingly, againſt the 'oath taken, at his coronation.

'XVIII. Tho' it had been ordained, that 'no ſheriff ſhould continue in his office, above 'a year, and could not be again choſen to 'that office, in three years after, the ſame 'king, for his own profit, and ſometimes for 'the benefit of others, permitted ſome ſheriffs 'to remain in their offices, for two or three 'years, contrary to the tenor of the ſtatute, 'incurring perjury; and this was notorious.

'XIX. Although, by law and cuſtom, the people ought freely to chuſe knights to repreſent them, in parliament, to ſet forth their grievances, and provide remedies for them; yet the ſaid king, that he might obtain his own raſh will, in his parliaments, frequently, 'by writs, directed to the ſheriffs, to ſend 'ſuch as he named, ſome of whom he induced, by favours or bribes, and others, by 'menaces and terrors, to conſent to things 'prejudicial to the kingdom, and intolerable 'to the people; and eſpecially, by granting to 'him the ſubſidy of wooll, for his life, and another ſubſidy, for certain years, too much oppreſſing his ſubjects.

'XX. The ſame king, that, in all things, 'he might act, in an arbitrary manner, illegally made and commanded all the ſheriffs 'to ſwear, beyond their uſual oath, that they 'would obey all his commands ſent to them, 'under the great ſeal, privy ſeal, or ſignet; 'and, if they ſhould know any, in their bailiwicks or juriſdictions, that ſhould ſpeak 'any ill, publickly or privately, to the diſgrace of the king's perſon, they ſhould arreſt and commit them to priſon, there to 'remain, while they received other commands from the king, as it might be found 'upon record; which practice might, probably, tend to the deſtruction of any of his 'ſubjects.

'XXI. The ſame king, that he might ſupplant his people, and inrich himſelf with 'their eſtates, cauſed the people of 16 counties, by letters under his ſeals, to ſubmit to 'him, as traytors; under the pretence of 'which, he extorted from them great ſums of 'money, to procure his favour; and although, 'to pleaſe the people, theſe letters obligatory 'were reſtored to them, their procurators had 'full power to bind themſelves for them to 'the king, by which means he deceived his 'people. 1399.

'XXII. Although the ſame king ſwore, at 'his coronation, to maintain the liberties 'granted to the church of England; yet, by 'reaſon of his voyage into Ireland, he, by his 'letters, commanded many religious perſons, 'abbots, and priors, ſome to ſend him 'horſes, others wagons, or great ſums of 'money; and, by his way of writing, he 'compelled many, by fear, to comply with 'his demands; whereby they were impoveriſhed and oppreſſed, in manifeſt derogation 'to eccleſiaſtick liberty, and by which pretext 'he incurred perjury.

'XXIII. In many great councils, when 'the lords and juſtices were charged to counſel him faithfully, in things relating to himſelf and the ſtate of the kingdom, they were 'frequently ſo ſharply reproved, that they 'durſt not ſpeak truth, in giving advice, concerning the ſtate of the kingdom.

'XXIV. The treaſure, reliques, and jewels of the crown, which ought to be preſerved in the treaſury, for the honour of the 'king and conſervation of the kingdom, the 'ſaid king carried with him to Ireland, without the conſent of the ſtates of the kingdom; 'which would have greatly impoveriſhed the 'kingdom, if God had not otherwiſe provided, for the taking of thoſe goods from him, 'againſt his will; and farther he cauſed the 'records, relating to the ſtate and government 'of his kingdom to be razed, to the great 'prejudice of his people, and diſinheritance 'of the crown, and very probably, as it was 'believed, for the ſupport of his evil government.

'XXV. He diſſembled ſo much, in words 'and writing, and ſo contrary to himſelf, e'ſpecially, in writing to the pope, kings, and 'other lords, without and within the kingdom, 'and alſo to his ſubjects, that no man living, 'knowing his real character, could confide in 'him; and he was even reputed ſo unfaithful 'and inconſtant, that he was not only a ſcandal to his own perſon, but to the whole 'kingdom, and to all ſtrangers that knew 'him.

XXVI. Though the lands, tenements, 'goods, and chattels of all freemen, by the 'laws of the land, ought not to be ſeized, 'without forfeiture; yet the ſaid king, intending to enervate thoſe laws, in the preſence of many lords, and others of the community of the kingdom, often affirmed, 'that the life of every ſubject, and his lands, 'tenements, goods, and chattels were his, to 'be diſpoſed of, at his pleaſure, without forfeiture; which was altogether repugnant to 'the laws and cuſtoms of his kingdom.

'XXVII. Although it had been made a 'law, which had, hitherto, been confirmed, 'that no freeman might be taken, &c. nor 'any way deſtroyed, and that the king ſhould 'not proceed againſt him, but by the lawful 'trial of his peers, or the law of the land; 'yet, according to the will, command, and 1399. ‘ appointment of the ſaid king, very many of ‘ his lieges being maliciouſly accuſed, for ha- ‘ ving ſpoken publickly, or privately, words ‘ that might tend to the diſgrace of the king's ‘ perſon, were taken, impriſoned, and brought ‘ before the conſtable and marſhal, in the ‘ court military; where, being accuſed, they ‘ could not be admitted to give any other ‘ anſwer, than not guilty; and they could de- ‘ fend themſelves no otherwiſe than by their ‘ bodies, their accuſers being young men, ‘ luſty and ſound, whereas they were old, im- ‘ potent, lame, and infirm; from whence, not ‘ only the deſtruction of lords and great men, ‘ but of any particular perſons of the commu- ‘ nity of the kingdom, very probably, might ‘ have followed; and, when the ſaid king ‘ willingly contravened this law, doubtleſs, he ‘ incurred perjury.

‘ XXVIII. Although the people of Eng- ‘ land, by vertue of their liegance, were ſuf- ‘ ficiently bound to their king, and, if they ‘ offended, in any reſpect, he might correct ‘ and puniſh them, by the laws and cuſtoms ‘ of the kingdom; yet the ſaid king deſired ‘ to ſupplant and too much oppreſs his peo- ‘ ple; and, that he might more freely exe- ‘ cute and follow the fancy of his fooliſh and ‘ unlawful will, he ſent his letters into all ‘ counties of his kingdom, that all his lieges, ‘ as well ſpiritual as temporal, ſhould take ‘ certain oaths, in general, which were too ‘ burthenſome to them, and which, very pro- ‘ bably, might cauſe the final deſtruction of ‘ his people, and that, under their letters ‘ and ſeals, they ſhould confirm theſe oaths; ‘ which command the people obeyed, leſt ‘ they ſhould incur his indignation, and for ‘ fear of death.

‘ XXIX. When the parties, contending ‘ in the eccleſiaſtick court, in cauſes, merely, ‘ ſpiritual, endeavoured to procure prohibiti- ‘ ons, to hinder proceſs in the ſame, from the ‘ chancellor of England, who, out of juſtice, ‘ refuſed to grant them; yet the ſame king ‘ frequently granted them, under his ſignet, ‘ wickedly infringing the eccleſiaſtical liberties ‘ granted, in Magna Charta, which he had ‘ ſworn to preſerve, damnably incurring per- ‘ jury, and the ſentence of excommunication ‘ pronounced by the holy fathers, againſt the ‘ violaters of the liberties of the church.

‘ XXX. The ſaid king, in parliament, ‘ ſurrounded with armed men, without a juſt ‘ cauſe or legal proceſs, contrary to the laws ‘ of the kingdom, baniſhed Thomas Arundel, ‘ archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his ſpiritual ‘ father, being then abſent, by his contri- ‘ vance.

‘ XXXI. Upon peruſal of the ſaid king's ‘ will, under his great ſeal, privy ſeal, and ‘ ſignet, there was in it this clauſe: Alſo we ‘ will, that the debts of our houſe, chamber, ‘ and wardrobe being paid, for which we al- ‘ low 20,000l. and the leproſe, and chaplains ‘ we appointed to be maintained, at Weſt- ‘ minſter, and Bermondſey, for which we al- ‘ low five or ſix thouſand marks; the reſidue ‘ of our gold ſhall remain to our ſucceſſor, ‘ provided he approves, ratifies, confirms 1399. ‘ holds, and cauſeth to be holden and obſer- ‘ ved, all laws, ſtatutes, ordinances and judg- ‘ ments, made, had, or done, in the parlia- ‘ ment held at Weſtminſter, on the 17th of ‘ September, in the 21ſt year of our reign, ‘ and continued or adjourned to Shrewsbury, ‘ and all things done, at Coventry, on the ‘ 16th of September, in the 22d of our reign, ‘ as alſo what was done, at Weſtminſter, on ‘ the 18th of March, in the ſame year, by ‘ authority of the ſame parliament: But, if ‘ he ſhall refuſe to do theſe things, then we ‘ will, that Thomas, duke of Surrey, Edward, ‘ duke of Aumarle, John, duke of Exeter, ‘ and William le Scroope, earl of Wiltſhire, ‘ my debts, &c. as aforeſaid being paid, ſhall ‘ have the ſaid reſidue, for the defence of the ‘ ſtatutes, ordinances, and judgments afore- ‘ ſaid, to the utmoſt of their power, yea, to ‘ death, if it be neceſſary; all which things ‘ we charge upon their conſciences, as they ‘ will anſwer it, at the day of judgment.’ By which article it manifeſtly appears, that the ſame king endeavoured pertinaciouſly to maintain thoſe ſtatutes and ordinances, which were erroneous, wicked, and repugnant to all law and reaſon, not only in his life, but after his deceaſe, neither regarding the danger of his ſoul, nor the utmoſt deſtruction of his king- dom or liege people.

‘ XXXII. In the 11th year of the ſaid ‘ king Richard, at his manor of Langley, be- ‘ fore the dukes of Lancaſter and York, ‘ and many other lords, deſiring, in all ap- ‘ pearance, that his uncle, the duke of Glou- ‘ ceſter, there alſo preſent, might have confi- ‘ dence in him, of his own accord, he ſwore, up- ‘ on the venerable ſacrament of the lord's body ‘ placed upon the altar, that he would pardon ‘ unto him all things ſaid to be committed a- ‘ gainſt his perſon, and that he ſhould never ‘ receive any damage, for them; yet after- ‘ wards the ſaid king cauſed the duke, for ‘ thoſe offences, horribly and cruelly to be ‘ murdered, damnably incurring the guilt of ‘ perjury.

‘ XXXIII. After a knight of the ſhire, ‘ who had a vote in parliament, impeached ‘ the archbiſhop of Canterbury, before the ‘ king and all the ſtates of the kingdom, upon ‘ certain faults committed againſt the king, ‘ on no grounds, as it was ſaid; although he ‘ offered preſently to anſwer to the accuſations ‘ againſt him, and deſired to be admitted by ‘ the king ſo to do, ſufficiently truſting, as he ‘ declared, to demonſtrate his innocence; yet ‘ the ſame king contriving, by all poſſible ‘ means, to oppreſs and reduce to nothing the ‘ ſtate of the archbiſhop, kindly ſpake to, and ‘ earneſtly deſired him, that he would ſay no- ‘ thing then, but expect a more convenient ‘ time: That day being paſt, for five days and ‘ more together, the king deceived him, per- ‘ ſuading him not to come to parliament, but ‘ to remain at his own houſe, promiſing, that, ‘ in his abſence, he ſhould not receive injury; ‘ but the ſaid king, in that parliament baniſh- ‘ ed the archbiſhop, during his pleaſure, tho' ‘ abſent, 1399. ‘ abſent, and not called to anſwer, without any ‘ reaſonable cauſe, confiſcating all his goods, ‘ againſt the laws of the land and all juſtice, by ‘ which he incurred perjury. Richard is depoſed.

Theſe articles, being drawn up, were laid before the parliament, who unanimouſly acknowledged them to be well grounded and notorious, and pronounced, that Richard ſhould be depoſed; and they likewiſe appointed commiſſioners to give him notice of his depoſition, and to annul the oaths and homage of the people of England, after much the ſame manner, as in the caſe of Edward II. 1399.

The duke of Lancaſter claims the crown.

This affair being ſettled, and the throne declared vacant, the duke of Lancaſter roſe up; and, after croſſing himſelf, he claimed the crown; founding his pretenſions “ upon his “ being deſcended from Henry III, and on “ the right he had received from God, by the “ aſſiſtance of his relations and friends, for the “ recovery of his realm of England, which was “ upon the brink of deſtruction *.

Remarks on the duke's claim.

The duke affected to make uſe of obſcure expreſſions, in order to leave undetermined the foundation on which he built his pretended right; and, if he ſeemed to derive his title from Henry III, rather than from Edward III, his grandfather, it was on account of a rumour, that Edmund, earl of Lancaſter, ſirnamed Crouch-Back, was eldeſt ſon to Henry III, tho' by reaſon of his deformity, Edward I, his younger brother, was placed on the throne. The duke, by this ſuppoſition, would have made the ignorant believe, that he could ground his title upon being ſon to Blanche of Lancaſter, grand-daughter to Edmund Crouch-Back, and heireſs of that family; but, as he was ſenſible, that he could not impoſe upon every one, by ſo palpable a forgery, he, at the ſame time, intimated, that he likewiſe built his right upon the ſervice he had lately done the ſtate.

As it was reſolved to adjudge the crown to the duke, the parliament ſtudiouſly avoided too ſtrict an examination of his claim, being extremely willing to ſuppoſe it uncontеſtable; and, without the leaſt regard to the juſt rights of the earl of Marche, it was decreed, that Henry of Lancaſter ſhould be proclaimed king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, which was done, that very day, being the 30th of September †.

The end of the reign of Richard II.

Thus, ended the reign of Richard II, a prince, who, in his younger years, appeared to have noble and generous inclinations, but unfortunately ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted, by flattery. He was the deſcendant of a father and grandfather, ſo univerſally eſteemed, that, had he never ſo little anſwered the nobility of his birth, he might have been one of the moſt illuſtrious monarchs, that ever wore the Engliſh crown; but, like Edward II, his great grandfather, he was ſo weak as to give himſelf up to the guidance of his favourites. Accordingly, he underwent the ſame fate with that prince, whom he did but too much reſemble, in every other particular; for the

* He claimed the crown, in the form following: “ In the name of the Fader, Sonne, and Holy Ghoſt, “ I, Henry of Lancaſter, chalenge this reume of Ynglonde and the croune, with all the membres and the appurte- “ nances, als I, that am deſcendit, be right lyne, of the blode comyng fro the gude lorde king Henry therde, and “ thorghe that ryght that God of his grace hath ſent me, with helpe of my kyn and of my friendes, to reco- “ ver it: The which rewme was in poynt to be ondone, for defaut of governance, and undoying of the “ good laws.”

1399. chief difference between them is, that Richard was of a more cruel and implacable temper, and uſurped a more abſolute power than Edward, which rendered him more odious, and leſs lamented. Let us conclude this reign with a remark on the ſad cataſtrophe of theſe two princes; namely, that in a government, like that of England, all the king's efforts, to uſurp an arbitrary power, are but ſo many ſteps towards his deſtruction *. 1399.

The State of the Church, from the reign of EDWARD I, in 1272, to the end of the reign of RICHARD II, in 1399.

EVER ſince king John became vaſſal and tributary to the ſee of Rome, the popes conſidered England, as a conquered country, for which they had not any regard; and the reigns of John and Henry III. afford us ſuch flagrant inſtances, to this purpoſe, that it would be needleſs to add any thing, to ſhew, to what exceſs the papal power was carried in the kingdom. It is ſufficient to obſerve, that, the incroachments of the court of Rome continuing inceſſantly, or rather daily increaſing, the Engliſh grew ſo weary of them, that, at length, in the reign of Edward I, they reſolved upon making uſe of effectual means, for their deliverance; tho' they did not come to this reſolution, till after frequent experience, that all their complaints and ſollicitations to the popes were entirely uſeleſs, wherein principally conſiſts what I have to offer, concerning religion, during the four laſt reigns; but, to render this matter more intelligible, it will be requiſite briefly to relate the occaſion of the conteſts England had, as well with the court of Rome, as with the clergy.

I. The firſt cauſe of complaint was the frequent appeals to the court of Rome, not one of which was rejected.

II. The frequent citations cauſed by theſe appeals, which obliged people to ſpend their ſubſtance in journies to Rome, to ſollicit their affairs.

III. That the pope had uſurped the collation of almoſt all the church-preferments, not excepting the biſhopricks and archbiſhopricks, contrary to the rights of the king, the chapters, and the patrons.

This incroachment was arrived to ſuch a height, that the popes diſpoſed of all the benefices in the kingdom; for, by the plenitude of the apoſtolick power, they reſerved to themſelves all the benefices that ſhould become vacant, by tranſlation, death, or any other way; by which means, they eluded all the canonical elections in England, without alledging other reaſons, except that they had reſerved to themſelves, before-hand, the right of nomination to the ſaid benefices. It was obvious, that they intended to procure, by degrees, the collation of all the benefices of the kingdom; for, when they could not make uſe of theſe pretences, they ſeldom failed to object againſt the party elected, and confer the benefice upon another; and very frequently, when the biſhop elect came to be confirmed, he found his ſee already diſpoſed of by the pope.

IV. But, as this generally occaſioned great conteſts, and, as thoſe that were canonically elected were, for the moſt part, ſupported by the king, the pope, to free himſelf from theſe importunities, beſtowed the biſhopricks, and other benefices, before they were vacant, by way of proviſion; and this was another great cauſe of complaint for the Engliſh.

V. It was likewiſe complained of, that moſt of the benefices, diſpoſed of by the pope, were conferred on foreigners, particularly on the cardinals, and their relations, who, by vertue of the pope's diſpenſation, enjoyed the profit, tho' they never reſided; and theſe benefices were commonly farmed out to the Engliſh, who, for their own advantage, got the cure ſerv'd, for a very ſmall ſalary; on which account, divine ſervice was neglected, the churches ran to ruin, hoſpitality was baniſhed, and the inſtruction of chriſtians almoſt wholly aboliſhed. Moreover, the money was carried out of the kingdom, for ever, and it will manifeſtly appear, how prejudicial this was to the country, if it be conſidered, that, according to a calculation made, in the reign of Henry III, the foreign eccleſiaſticks had greater revenues, in England, than the prince on the throne.

VI. Frequent taxes, impoſed on the clergy, by the popes; ſometimes, under the pretence of a Cruſade; at other times, to ſupply the neceſſities of the holy ſee; and, laſtly, by the tenths, which they liberally granted to the king, becauſe they generally had a ſhare.

VII. The legates and nuncio's, ſent into England, without any occaſion for them, were a great grievance to the Engliſh; for the clergy were not only obliged to bear their expences, but alſo to make them conſiderable preſents, and pay them procurations, beſides other impoſitions, which the pope impowered them to levy upon the eccleſiaſticks; ſo that the money went out of the kingdom, without any poſſibility of recovering the ſame. Act. Pub.

VIII. The popes were likewiſe poſſeſſed of the firſt-fruits of all the benefices; which greatly exhauſted the treaſure of the kingdom.

* In king Richard's reign, was introduced the cuſtom of wearing piked ſhoes, tied to the knees with chains of ſilver; ladies likewiſe wore high attire on their heads, piked horns, with long trained gowns, and rode on ſide-ſaddles, after the example of the queen, Ann of Bohemia, who firſt brought that faſhion into England; for women before uſed to ride aſtride, like men. Stow. -- In 1397, king Richard began to repair Weſtminſter-hall, and cauſed the walls, windows, and roof, to be pulled down and rebuilt, with a ſtately porch, as it continues to this day. Cambd.

IX. Peter-

IX. Peter-pence, which, at firſt, was no more than a charitable allowance, granted by the Saxon kings, for the maintenance of the Engliſh college at Rome, was converted into a tribute; which the pope collected, in a very rigorous manner, widely different from that practiſed, in former days.

X. Finally, the tribute king John had engaged to pay the holy ſee, and which the popes exacted, with great haughtineſs, was conſidered by the Engliſh, as an inſupportable yoke, and a ſtanding badge of their ſlavery.

XI. As to the diſputes between the crown and the clergy, the king and the magiſtrates complained, that the clergy continually endeavoured to incroach upon the prerogatives of the crown, as they were ſecure of being always ſupported by the court of Rome.

XII. That the clergy had extended their juriſdiction to many matters, purely civil, pretending that there is no caſe, in which religion is not ſomewhat concerned; and this complaint principally regarded matrimonial cauſes.

XIII. They farther alledged, that the eccleſiaſticks, inſtead of ſupporting, on occaſion, the rights and prerogatives of the crown, were always diſpoſed to join with the pope, as if he had been their only ſovereign.

Theſe are the chief grievances complained of by the Engliſh, and from which they attempted, from time to time, to free themſelves, either by acts of parliament, or orders of council; but theſe precautions furniſhed the popes, at the ſame time, with a pretence for complaining, in their turn, that the Engliſh ſtrove to rob the church of her privileges; and, in this, they had a great advantage, by loudly urging the cauſe of God, which they continually confounded with their own intereſt. In a bull of pope Clement V, inſerted in the Collection of Publick Acts, are ſpecified the complaints of the court of Rome againſt the Engliſh; and, as I have related the grievances of the Engliſh, it is reaſonable, that I ſhould alſo take notice of thoſe of the pope.

The grievances of the popes againſt the Engliſh.

I. The pope complained, that the cardinals were prevented from enjoying the prebends he conferred on them, tho' the profoundeſt reſpect was due to perſons ordained by God, to bear their part of the burden of governing the church.

II. That, although he had an inconteſtable right to collate benefices, as well in England as in all other ſtates, thoſe, on whom he had beſtowed them, were not allowed to take poſſeſſion; nor were they excommunicated, that had the boldneſs to oppoſe it.

III. That ſuch, as were ſummoned, on that account, were not permitted to obey the ſummons; and that notaries were prohibited to act, and the king's ſubjects to appear, out of the kingdom.

IV. That the pope's nuncio's were debarred from exerciſing their commiſſion, without the king's licenſe; and that ſome of them had even been publickly impriſoned, and not releaſed, without paying a large fine.

V. That the magiſtrates would not ſuffer the excommunicated to be impriſoned, after 40 days, which, according to a good and laudable cuſtom, were allowed them, to make the church ſatisfaction.

VI. That the king ſent frequent prohibitions to the eccleſiaſtical courts, not to try cauſes, the cognizance of which belonged to them.

VII. That the juriſdiction of the ſaid courts over the clergy was abriged, without conſidering, that eccleſiaſtical perſons are, in no reſpect, dependent upon the laity.

VIII. That the civil courts preſumed to condemn eccleſiaſticks, without the conſent of their ſuperiors.

IX. That clergymen were conſtrained to appear, in their ſhirts, in the civil courts, notwithſtanding they pleaded their privileges; that, indeed, they were ſent back to the eccleſiaſtical court, when they were demanded; yet it very frequently happened, that, if they were not found guilty, the civil judges were ſo bold, as fully to acquit them, without permitting the eccleſiaſtical court to take any cognizance of the matter.

X. That eccleſiaſticks were ſubjected to the trial of 12 lay-perſons, and were acquitted, or condemned, by the verdict of theſe 12 incompetent judges.

XI. That the great men often lodged in the monaſteries, and put them to a great expence, on the trifling pretence of their being founded by their anceſtors.

XII. That, during the vacancy of the abbies, thoſe, who were entruſted with the cuſtody by the king, conſumed the revenues, and committed great damages.

XIII. Laſtly, That the tribute of 1000 marks, due to the holy ſee, was not regularly paid; and that the arrears, which were to be ſent to Avignon, were applied to other uſes.

Theſe are the mutual complaints of the Engliſh and the popes; as to which, it may be remarked, that both parties agreed, as to facts, and differed only, as to right. To determine this point, it would be neceſſary to examine, whether the pope and clergy were, originally, poſſeſſed of the rights they aſſumed; or, they were granted by ſome authority; and, laſtly, whether that authority could lawfully confer them; but this would lead me into an old beaten diſpute, on which nothing new can be expected. I ſhall, therefore, only relate the means uſed by the Engliſh, to do themſelves juſtice, for the injuries they complained of, and the endeavours of the popes, to ſupport the privileges they were poſſeſſed off; but, firſt, it will be proper to obſerve, that, in theſe conteſts, all the popes conſtantly adhered to the ſame maxims, without the leaſt variation; tho' the monarchs of England, to pleaſe their humour, or gratify their paſſions, did not ſcruple, very frequently, to derogate from the prerogatives of the crown; which is the true cauſe of the ſlow progreſs of the Engliſh, in their deſign of freeing themſelves from the papal oppreſſions. The leaſt relaxation made them loſe a great deal of ground; and, perhaps, they would never have accompliſhed the redreſs of any one grievance, if the ſchiſms in the church had not afforded them opportunities, which they wiſely improved; for the popes, ſtanding often in need of the kings of England, were, at ſuch junctures, obliged to compliances, to which, doubtleſs, they would never have ſubmitted, at any other ſeaſon.

The advantages of the popes.

The means of redreſſing the grievances.

As the pope and clergy ſupported each other, one of the moſt effectual means practiſed, in England, to oppoſe the papal power, was to cheque the growth of the wealth of the clergy; and, with that view, the ſtatute of Mortmain was enacted, in the reign of Edward I. which, as they inceſſantly acquired, and never alienated, was a fatal blow to the clergy, who, without this ſtatute, would have been maſters of all the lands in the kingdom; yet this ſtatute was almoſt as prejudicial to the pope, ſince limits could not be preſcribed to the power of the clergy, without leſſening, at the ſame time, that of the court of Rome. Edward I. alſo ſtruck at the papal authority, at leaſt, with reſpect to the collation of the biſhopricks, by obliging the biſhops to renounce the article of the proviſion-bull, which gave them their temporalities; in which he was followed by his ſucceſſors.

The fruitleſs attempts under Edward II.

If Edward II. had diſcovered more ſteadineſs and reſolution, or had not been forced, by the circumſtances of the times, to keep fair with Rome, he might have greatly promoted the work of liberty, which the Engliſh had, ſo long and ſo paſſionately, deſired; for they never were in a better diſpoſition to ſhake of the galling yoke. This appears, in the king's letters to the pope, and in the vigorous efforts of ſeveral parliaments, in his reign; but Edward, expecting always to find, in the papal authority, a protection againſt his ſubjects, often ſtooped to condeſcenſions, for the court of Rome, deſtructive of the intereſts of his kingdom; which rendered the endeavours of the parliament abortive, during the courſe of his reign.

The ſtatute of Proviſors.

However, under Edward III, more effectual meaſures were taken, to be delivered from theſe intolerable oppreſſions; I mean the two ſtatutes, which tended to cut up, by the roots, two of the moſt conſiderable grievances, had they been punctually put in execution. The firſt was the ſtatute of Proviſors, by which it was enacted, that, if the pope collated any archbiſhoprick, biſhoprick, dignity or other benefice, contrary to the rights of the kings, chapters, or patrons, the collation was to devolve to the king, for one turn; and, if any perſon ſued for, and procured, reſervations, or proviſions from the court of Rome, he ſhould be impriſoned, till he had paid fine to the king, at his pleaſure, and found ſufficient ſecurity not to proſecute any man, in the court of Rome, on account of his impriſonment.

The ſtatute of Præmunire.

The ſecond act was the ſtatute of Præmunire, by which it was enacted, that, if any of the king's ſubjects ſhould carry into a foreign court cauſes, the cognizance whereof belonged to the king's court, they ſhould be impriſoned, and their lands, goods, and chattels, be forfeited to the king.

A memorial to the parliament againſt the court of Rome. Rot. Parl. 50 Edw. 3.

Altho' theſe two acts ſeemed to deprive the pope of all hopes of diſpoſing, for the future, of any benefice, and ought to have made him apprehenſive, that the parliament would proceed to redreſs other grievances, the court of Rome ſtill continued her oppreſſions; and, in 1376, about a year before the death of Edward III, a memorial was preſented to the parliament, ſhewing, that, by the death and tranſlation of biſhops, the pope exacted five times the yearly revenue of the vacant ſee, and, by that means, drew out of the kingdom 20,000 marks per annum; that the pope's agents collected the ſaid ſum, for the neceſſities of the holy ſee; that, this very year, the pope had ſeized the firſt-fruits of all the benefices, in England; that he had increas'd the number of the cardinals to 30, of whom not above two or three were well affected to England; that the pope's avarice was worſe than the plague; that, in ſpite of the ſtatute of Proviſors, perſons were daily provided with benefices, by the court of Rome, and that it was impoſſible to prevent it, without baniſhing all that ſhould dare to accept of theſe proviſions; and, in a word, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to put a ſtop to theſe oppreſſions, to prevent England from falling into a fatal ſlavery. Upon theſe complaints, which were carried to Gregory XI, there was a ſort of agreement made, between the king and the pope, but ſo full of equivocations and reſervations, on the part of the pope, that it was obvious, that he did not intend to deſiſt from his pretended rights; for he only promiſed, in general, that he would conſider the complaints of the Engliſh, and behave, with more moderation, for the future. Gregory dying, ſoon after, his ſucceſſors, regardleſs of his engagements, ſtill continued to beſtow Engliſh benefices upon foreigners; which obliged the houſe of commons to petition Richard II, to ſeize all the effects of the beneficed agents, and baniſh them the realm; and the king granted their requeſt.

An agreement between Edward III. and Gregory XI.

Freſh efforts of the Engliſh.

In the ſame reign, the ſtatute of Proviſors was confirmed and enlarged.

Two years before, Richard prohibited the clergy, under heavy penalties, to pay a tax impoſed by the pope.

The next year, he publiſhed a proclamation, commanding, on pain of death, and forfeiture of eſtate, all perſons that were gone to Rome, to ſollicit the repeal of the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, to return into England, within a limited time.

The ſtatute of Præmunire is enlarged.

All theſe precautions being inſufficient to cheque the popes, who pretended not to be obliged by acts of parliament, the ſtatute of Præmunire was reviv'd, in 1392, with enlargements, which ſeemed to leave the court of Rome no hopes of evading it; wherein it was enacted, that all perſons, that ſhould purſue, in the court of Rome, tranſlations, ſentences of excommunication, bulls, mandates, or any other things whatſoever, contrary to the rights of the king and crown, ſhould be denied the protection of the laws, and proſecuted, according to the ſtatute of Præmunire; that all thoſe, thoſe, that ſhould bring into the kingdom theſe foreign inſtruments, or receive and publiſh them, ſhould be liable to the ſame penalties; and, laſtly, that they, who purſued any proceſs, in a foreign court, to the prejudice of the king's, right, ſhould be treated, in the ſame manner.

The pope perſiſts notwithſtanding.

This rigid act curb'd the Engliſh, who were ſubject to the laws, but not the pope, who was out of their reach; and, accordingly, he did not deſiſt from his pretenſions. In 1398, he tranſlated the biſhop of Lincoln to the ſee of Cheſter, and gave the biſhoprick of Lincoln to Henry Beaufort, ſon of the duke of Lancaſter; but the biſhop of Lincoln, who had not ſued for this tranſlation, not daring to accept it, on account of the ſtatute of Præmunire, retired to a monaſtery; and the pope tranſlated the biſhop of Landaff to the ſee of Cheſter. Richard was extremely incenſed, that the pope ſhould preſume, without being deſired, to remove biſhops from one ſee to another; and, ſummoning the clergy, on this occaſion, he demanded their opinion of theſe tranſlations contrary to his will. This queſtion puzzled the clergy; who, fearing to diſpleaſe the king, or the pope, avoided giving a poſitive anſwer. Some time after, the pope ſent a nuncio into England, in order to procure a repeal of the foreſaid ſtatutes; but, tho' the nuncio met with an honourable reception, he could not ſucceed in his commiſſion; and, Richard being depoſed, the following year, the conteſts with the court of Rome continued in the ſame ſituation.

The deſign of the popes to extend their authority over temporals.

Doubtleſs, it was time for the Engliſh nation, as well as the reſt of Europe, to do all that was poſſible, to ſtop the growth of the papal power; for they muſt voluntarily ſhut their eyes, not to ſee, that all the proceedings of the popes tended to render them temporal ſovereigns of Europe. The decretal Unam Sanctam of Boniface VIII. evidently ſhews, that he thought himſelf inveſted with the temporal, as well as ſpiritual power; but, as it may be objected, that it is unreaſonable to aſcribe the ambitious deſign of Boniface to all the popes, this evidence may be ſupported by another, which demonſtrates, that Boniface did only tread in the ſteps of his predeceſſors. John XXII, by his ſole authority, publiſhed a truce, between England and Scotland, againſt the conſent of one of the parties, and commiſſioned his legates to conclude a peace between the two kingdoms, upon what terms they pleaſed; and likewiſe to compel the two kings and their ſubjects, punctually to obſerve the ſame, on pain of excommunication. Does not this proceeding ſhew, that all the popes acted, with the ſame ſpirit, and, if their ambition had been indulged, would have conſidered chriſtian princes but as ſubjects, or, at leaſt, as vaſſals to the ſee of Rome?

Hereſies.

Let us now proceed to the hereſies, or rather the opinions branded with that name, during the interval above-mentioned.

In 1286, or 1287, Peckham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, cenſured eight propoſitions maintained by Richard Knapwell, a Dominican friar; and ſome of theſe propoſitions from whence we may learn, what ſubjects were diſcuſſed in the ſchools, and wherein knowledge was made to conſiſt, were, as follows: Opinions are condemned. T. Wikes. Knighton. Spelman. Conc.

I. That the dead body of Jeſus Chriſt had not the ſame ſubſtantial form, as when alive.

III. That, if the euchariſtical bread had been conſecrated with theſe words, "This is "my body," during the three days Jeſus Chriſt lay in his grave, it would have been tranſubſtantiated into the new form, which the body of Chriſt aſſumed, at the ſeparation of his ſoul.

IV. That, after the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, the euchariſtical bread is tranſubſtantiated, by vertue of theſe words, "This is my body," into the whole living body of Chriſt; that is, the matter of the bread is converted into the matter of his body, and the ſubſtantial form of the bread, into the ſubſtantial form of his body, that is, into his intellectual ſoul, ſo far as it conſtitutes the form of his body.

VII. That, in the articles of faith, a man is not obliged to reſt upon the authority of the pope, or of any prieſt or doctor *; but that the holy ſcriptures, and evident conſequences from thence †, are the only foundation of our aſſent.

VIII. That the rational ſoul is the only form, by which a man is a man.

This laſt article was conſidered, as the foundation of the reſt; and all together were condemned by the archbiſhop.

In 1314, in the reign of Edward II, ſome ſtudents of Oxford maintained, in their diſputations, certain opinions, about the Trinity and creation of the world, which, being brought before the univerſity, were condemned, as heretical.

Wickliff publiſhes his doctrine.

Theſe opinions, being entirely founded on ſcholaſtick notions, were ſtifled, at once, becauſe the people were very ignorant in ſuch matters; but the caſe was otherwiſe, with reſpect to Wickliff's doctrine, publiſh'd, towards the end of the XIVth century, in the ſame univerſity; becauſe his doctrine was of another nature, and tended to reform the abuſes crept into the church. Accordingly, his opinions were embraced by great numbers; but, as this is the moſt material eccleſiaſtical affair of the XIVth century, it will be neceſſary fully to relate theſe opinions, and the zeal with which they were received by ſome, and condemned by others.

John Wickleſ, or rather Wickliff, was educated, at Oxford, in Merton-college, where he took his degree of doctor of divinity. He was ſo famous, for his learning, parts, and fine genius, that Simon Iſlip, archbiſhop of Canterbury, having founded Canterbury-college ‡ in Oxford, made him rector; and Wickliff behaved, in that poſt, with univerſal approbation, till the deceaſe of the archbiſhop, who had a profound eſteem for him. Langham, ſucceſſor to Iſlip *, deſirous of favouring the monks, and to introduce them into the college, attempted to turn out Wickliff, and put one Woodhull, a monk, in his room; but he could never prevail on the fellows of the college, to conſent to the removal of their old rector. This affair being brought to Rome, the monks of Canterbury ſollicited the pope ſo ſtrenuouſly, in behalf of Woodhull, that Wickliff was deprived of his rectorſhip; yet this did not, in the leaſt, injure the doctor's reputation. It was manifeſt, that the monks did not ſo much ſtrike at his perſon, as at all the ſeculars that were members of the college; and, indeed, they were all turned out, as well he, to make way for the monks. Shortly after, Wickliff was preſented to the living of Lutterworth, in the dioceſe of Lincoln; and then it was that he publiſhed, in his ſermons and writings, certain opinions which ſeemed to be novel, becauſe, contrary to the received doctrine of the preſent age. As he did not declare his ſentiments, till after the loſs of his rectorſhip, his enemies accuſed him of acting from a ſpirit of revenge, on account of the injury done him; but I ſhall not undertake to clear him from this charge; ſince, as God alone ſees into the hearts of men, it is raſhneſs to accuſe, or excuſe them, with regard to the ſecret motives of their actions; but, however that be, I ſhall only take notice, that Wickliff's moſt inveterate enemies have never taxed him with any immoralities. Theſe are the principal articles maintained by Wickliff, in his writings and ſermons.

Wickliff's doctrine. Walſing.

I. That the Euchariſt, after conſecration, is not the real body of Chriſt, but only its emblem or figure.

II. That the church of Rome is no more the head of the univerſal church, than any other church; nor was there any greater power given to St. Peter, than to the reſt of the apoſtles.

III. That the pope of Rome has no more juriſdiction, in the exerciſe of the keys, than any other prieſt.

IV. That, if the church misbehaves, it is not only lawful, but meritorious, to diſpoſſeſs her of her temporalities.

V. That, when a prince, or temporal lord, is convinced, that the church abuſes her endowments, he is obliged, on pain of damnation, to take them away.

VI. That the goſpel is a ſufficient directory to a chriſtian, in the conduct of his life.

VII. That all other rules inſtituted by holy men, and practiſed in the monaſteries, add no more perfection to chriſtianity, than whiteneſs to a wall.

VIII. That neither the pope, nor any other prelate, ought to have priſons, for the puniſhing offenders againſt the diſcipline of the church; but that every perſon ſhould be left at his liberty, in the conduct of his life.

It muſt be remarked, that Wickliff, in the laſt article, did not mean, as he explained himſelf afterwards, that the pope, or the prelates, had not the power of binding and looſing, but only, that the church had no right to inflict temporal puniſhments on ſinners.

Whether Wickliff and his followers enlarged theſe articles, by the conſequences which may naturally be deduced from them; or his adverſaries, from whom alone we have any account of him, made any additions, to render him odious, we find, in the hiſtorians, many other opinions aſcribed to him. Poſſibly, ſome of theſe additional opinions are not to be maintained; and there are others, which, being contrary to the articles of the church of England, have led ſome Engliſh writers to ſpeak of Wickliff, with contempt, and even called him heretick; but, as it would be too tedious fully to examine, here, all theſe opinions, let us reſt contented with thoſe that firſt appeared, which are really his, and have ſerved for a foundation to all the reſt.

Wickliff has many followers. Walſing.

Theſe opinions, maintained by Wickliff, with great vivacity, were, immediately, eſpouſed by great numbers, not only among the ſtudents of Oxford, but the lords at court; particularly, the duke of Lancaſter and the lord Piercy, earl marſhal, declared for him; but it muſt be obſerved, that this fell out, towards the end of the reign of Edward III, when that monarch, old and infirm, left the adminiſtration of the government to the duke of Lancaſter, his ſon, as we have ſeen, in his hiſtory.

The pope takes information againſt him; but he is ſupported by the duke of Lancaſter and the lord Piercy. Fox's Acts and Mon.

Gregory XI, hearing that theſe articles were publickly maintained, at Oxford, diſpatched an order to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the biſhop of London, to apprehend and examine Wickliff, and ſend the depoſitions to Rome; but it was no eaſy matter for theſe prelates, fully to execute theſe orders, the duke of Lancaſter and the earl marſhal having openly declared, that they would not ſuffer Wickliff to be impriſoned; and, indeed, there was not, then, any act of parliament, impowering the biſhops to impriſon hereticks, without the king's conſent. The two prelates, therefore, were ſatisfied with ſummoning Wickliff before them, in St. Paul's church, where there was a vaſt concourſe of people, to hear the examination; but the duke of Lancaſter and the lord Piercy, accompanying the doctor, aſſured him, that there was no danger; and that he might make a courageous defence, againſt men, who were no more than mere ignoramus's, in compariſon of himſelf. The following ſhort dialogue paſſed, between theſe two lords and the biſhop of London, upon Wickliff's account; for, the lord Piercy bidding the doctor ſit down, the biſhop of London oppoſed it, and commanded him to ſtand up; but the earl marſhal would not permit him.

Biſhop of London. "Lord Piercy, if I "could have imagined, that you would have "played the maſter here, I would have pre-"vented your coming."

* After the death of Simon Iſlip, William Edington, biſhop of Wincheſter, was offered the archbiſhoprick; but he refuſed it, ſaying, "That, tho' Canterbury was the higher rack, Wincheſter was the better manger."

The

The duke of Lancaſter. "Yes, he ſhall "play the maſter here, notwithſtanding your "oppoſition."

The lord Piercy. "Wickliff, ſit down, "you had need of a ſeat, for you have many "things to ſay."

Biſhop. "It is unreaſonable that a clergy-"man, cited before his ordinary, ſhould ſit "down, during his anſwer. He ſhall ſtand."

Duke of Lancaſter. "My lord Piercy is "in the right; and, as for you, my lord bi-"ſhop, who are grown ſo haughty and arro-"gant, I will take care to humble your pride, "and not only yours, but that of all the pre-"lates, in England. Thou relieſt upon the "credit of thy relations; but, far from being "able to help thee, they ſhall find it extremely "difficult to ſupport themſelves."

Biſhop. "I place no confidence either in "my relations, or in any man elſe, but in "God alone, who will give me the boldneſs "to ſpeak the truth."

The duke ſpeaking ſoftly to the lord Piercy:

"Rather than take this uſage from the bi-"ſhop, I'll drag him, by the hair of the head, "out of the church."

The duke of Lancaſter muſt certainly have been very paſſionate, ſince it is evident, the biſhop's laſt words were not ſo inſolent, as to occaſion ſuch a furious tranſport of anger; but, perhaps, the hiſtorians, being friends to the clergy, have ſoftened the biſhop's expreſſions, that the duke might ſeem to be in the wrong. However, the duke's words to the lord Piercy, being over-heard by ſome that ſtood near him, cauſed the tumult, mentioned, in the reign of Edward III, the particulars of which it will be needleſs to repeat; ſince it is ſufficient to remark, that, upon this accident, the aſſembly broke up, and Wickliff's examination was deferred.

Wickliff's proſecution drops.

Edward III. dying, ſoon after, and the duke of Lancaſter being preſident of the new king's council, the biſhops durſt not proſecute Wickliff; and, during that time, the number of his followers became ſo conſiderable, that the univerſity of Oxford debated, whether they ſhould receive the pope's bull, commanding them to proceed againſt Wickliff, with the utmoſt ſeverity. As the hiſtorian, who relates this particular, does not acquaint us with their final reſolution, the bull was, probably, rejected; whence it appears, that Wickliff's doctrine was not only embraced by ſome ignorant perſons, but by men of letters, and perſons of diſtinction. Some would perſuade us, that people were terrified into a feigned approbation of his doctrine; but it may be ſaid, on the contrary, with much more probability, that fear prevented many from being his followers; for a man ran no riſque, in adhering to the old, whereas it was dangerous to embrace the new doctrines.

Collier.

A bull is ſent to the archbiſhop to cite Wickliff. Spelman. Conc.

The pope, perceiving that his bull to the univerſity of Oxford produced no remarkable effect, ſent freſh orders to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and biſhop of London, to proſecute Wickliff; but, being informed, that the biſhops could not proceed in the affair, without the king's licenſe, he enjoined them to repreſent to Richard and his council, that Wickliff's errors were not only prejudicial to religion, but likewiſe to the ſtate. However, the king's council, it ſeems, were of a different opinion; and perhaps, no one was willing to offend the duke of Lancaſter, Wickliff's open protector.

They cite him, but drop the affair.

Nevertheleſs, the two prelates, willing to obey the pope, to the utmoſt of their power, ſummoned Wickliff, a ſecond time, before them, at Lambeth; who, appearing, by his manner of explaining his opinions, ſeemed ready to give the prelates ſome ſort of ſatisfaction; but, perhaps they would not have been contented with ſo general an explanation, if one Clifford, a gentleman, had not rudely entered the aſſembly, and prohibited their proceeding any farther. It is affirmed, that the two prelates were overawed by this abſolute order, though they knew not from whom it came; believing that Clifford durſt not act, thus, of himſelf; moreover, the populace intimated, by their menaces, that they would not ſee Wickliff ill-treated. Theſe conſiderations obliged the biſhops to diſmiſs the doctor, forbidding him to amuſe the people any more with diſputations of ſuch a dangerous conſequence; but, regardleſs of this injunction, according to the teſtimony of an antient hiſtorian, he continued to preach and defend his doctrine; which ſteadineſs, by the way, is inconſiſtent with the explanation of his opinions, that, it is pretended, he gave to the biſhops, and is repreſented, as full of equivocations and evaſions. The truth is, this diſguiſing of his ſentiments is not agreeable to his natural temper, which was far from being timorous; but, however that be, from that time, he lived in quiet upon his cure of Lutterworth, without the leaſt interruption; and, ſome time after, Courtney, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſucceſſor to Simon Sudbury, beheaded by the Kentiſh rebels, ſummoned a provincial ſynod, at London, where Wickliff's doctrine was condemned. An hiſtorian affirms, that Wickliff was cited, and explained his opinions, in a manner extremely different from the literal ſenſe of the words; but, as nothing like it is to be met with, in the records of the ſynod, that author has, very probably, confounded this ſynod with that of Lambeth.

Knighton.

A ſynod condemns his doctrine. Spelman.

Wickliff's followers increaſe. Knighton.

The condemnation of Wickliff's doctrine did not prevent its ſpreading all over the kingdom, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that the foreſaid hiſtorian aſſures us, that two men could not be found together, but one of them was a Lollard. Richard II, as we have already obſerved, permitting the biſhops to proſecute and impriſon hereticks, ſeveral Lollards were cited before their reſpective biſhops; ſome of whom recanted, whilſt others bravely ſtood the ſhock; but, among theſe latter, not ſo much as one was delivered over to the ſecular arm, there being, as yet, no law, to that purpoſe. It was not till the ſucceeding reign, that thoſe barbarous executions commenced, in England; ſo that, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the biſhops, Wickliff's opinions flew over the kingdom, with an amazing ſwiftneſs, the clergy not being at liberty to employ the only means they have, all along, thought expedient, to extirpate hereſy. Beſides, in all appearance, the biſhops durſt not perſonally attack Wickliff, leſt their ignorance ſhould be too much diſplayed by his ſuperior learning; but, however that be, Wickliff remained in quiet, at Lutterworth, till his death, in 1384*. Probably, in proceſs of time, his followers made ſome additions to his doctrine; wherefore, they have aſcribed to him whatever was advanced by his diſciples.

The loſs of the maſter did not diſpirit his followers; who continued to preach and maintain their opinions, with the ſame courage, as during his life; and ſuch was the daily progreſs of their doctrine, that, in 1386, the parliament thought themſelves obliged, to petition the king to take care, that the church and ſtate received no prejudice by the novel opinions of the Lollards. Upon this, the king appointed commiſſioners to peruſe Wickliff's books; but this commiſſion was executed, in a very negligent manner.

The Wickliffites ſeparate from the reſt of the church.

In 1389, the Wickliffites or Lollards began to ſeparate from the church of Rome, and appoint prieſts, from among themſelves, to perform divine ſervice, after their way; and, though ſome were, from to time time, proſecuted by the biſhops, theſe proſecutions were not very rigorous; their intent appearing to be only to hinder them from pleading preſcription; and, beſides, a petition, preſented to the king by a former parliament, to revoke the power granted the biſhops, to impriſon hereticks, reſtrained the moſt forward.

Remonſtrances to the commons.

However, in 1395, the attempts of the Lollards, in the king's abſence, to get their doctrine approved by the parliament, induced the biſhops to take other meaſures; for theſe pretended hereticks, being ſupported by an infinite number of followers, preſented to the houſe of commons a remonſtrance †, containing the 12 following articles.

I. That, when the church of England, treading in the ſteps of the church of Rome, began to make an ill uſe of their temporalities, faith and charity began to diſappear.

Spelman. Conc.

II. That the Engliſh prieſthood derived from Rome, and pretending to a power ſuperior to angels, is not the prieſthood ſettled by Chriſt upon his apoſtles.

III. That the celibacy of the clergy occaſioned many ſcandalous irregularities in the church.

IV. That the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation renders the greateſt part of Chriſtendom guilty of idolatry.

V. That exorciſms, benedictions, pronounced over water, bread, oil, ſtones, for the altar, church-walls, prieſts veſtments, the mitre, croſs, and pilgrim's ſtaff, have more of necromancy than religion.

VI. That it was a great crime to join, in the ſame perſon, eccleſiaſtical and civil offices.

VII. That prayers for the dead, in which one perſon is preferred to another, are not the charity preſcribed by the goſpel.

VIII. That pilgrimages, and offerings made to images and croſſes, and eſpecially the pictures repreſenting the holy Trinity, are a ſort of idolatry.

IX. That auricular confeſſion, ſerves only to make the prieſts proud, and, by letting them into the ſecrets of the penitent, gives opportunities, for many ſins and ſcandalous intrigues.

X. That the taking away any man's life, either in war, or courts of juſtice, is contrary to the doctrine of the goſpel, which is a diſpenſation of grace and mercy.

XI. That the vow of ſingle life, undertaken by women, is the cauſe of numberleſs diſorders, and of the murder of multitudes of children, unbaptiſed, or even unborn.

XII. That it is neceſſary to baniſh from civil ſociety all uſeleſs trades, which ſerve only to ſupport pride and luxury.

All theſe articles were enforced with proofs too long to be inſerted.

This remonſtrance, which, very probably, was privately approved by ſeveral members of parliament, ſo alarmed the clergy, that they, forthwith, deputed the archbiſhop of York and biſhop of London to the king, to intreat him to return, with all ſpeed, into England, that he might, by his preſence and authority, checque the growth of the new doctrine, as was related, in the reign of Richard II.

Some time after, Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, held a ſynod, at London, wherein 18 articles, extracted from Wickliff's book, entitled Trialogus, were condemned. Spelman. Conc.

Theſe are the principal particulars, relating to Wickliff and his doctrine, before the depoſing of Richard II; but it muſt be added, that certain Bohemian ſtudents, being at Oxford, when Wickliff began to publiſh his doctrine, carried it into their own country, where it ſpread, in a ſurpriſing manner. It is time, now, to proceed to other affairs, relating to the Engliſh church, and, firſt of all, to the councils.

The council of Lyons. 1274.

I ſhall begin this head with the general council of Lyons, opened, May 1, 1274; which was chiefly, to receive the Greeks into the communion of the church of Rome, from which they had ſeparated, a ſecond time, upon the expulſion of the Latins from Conſtantinople. This union, indeed, was accompliſhed; but it was of a ſhort duration. Another reaſon of the council's meeting was, to reſtore the affairs of the Chriſtians, in Syria; for, as great endeavours were pretended to be uſed, in their favour, the pope demanded a ſubſidy of every church. It was eaſy to perceive the pope's intereſt, in this demand; for his predeceſſors had ſo frequently uſed this means, to procure

procure money, that it was impoſſible to be deceived. However, none of the prelates, not even the archbiſhop of Canterbury, oppoſed it; and Richard Mepham, dean of Lincoln, was the only perſon that had the courage to ſpeak, in the behalf of the intereſts of England. He boldly ſaid, that the Engliſh clergy were unable to contribute to the war, by reaſon of the continual exactions of the court of Rome, which ſcarce left them what was neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence; but this freedom coſt him his deanery, of which the pope directly deprived him; from whence we may form an idea of the liberty, in this council. I come, now, to the councils held, in England, during the four laſt reigns.

Synod of Reading. 1279. Spelman. Conc.

The firſt was aſſembled, in the reign of Edward I, by John de Peckham, archbiſhop of Canterbury; in which were rectified the canons of the general council of Lyons, concerning pluralities; and then the archbiſhop paſſed ſome canons, directly contrary to the royal prerogative, and was, therefore, obliged to repeal them, afterwards.

The Iſt decreed excommunication againſt ſuch, as ſued for the king's letters, to forbid certain cauſes from being tried, in the eccleſiaſtical court.

The IId rendered liable to the ſame penalty the magiſtrates, who refuſed to impriſon excommunicated perſons, after the 40 days allowed by the canons.

By the IIId, they that invaded the church's lands, were alſo to be excommunicated.

The IVth prohibited, under the ſame penalty, the ſelling of proviſions to the archbiſhop of York, whenever he ſhould come, within the archbiſhop of Canterbury's juriſdiction.

This was a ſhort and certain way to end his diſpute with the archbiſhop of York, about carrying the croſs; for, if this canon had not been annulled, the archbiſhop of York would have found it difficult to be preſent at the parliament, which was generally held, at London.

The Vth ordered the copies of Magna charta to be ſet up, on church-doors, that every one might read them.

Theſe canons plainly diſcover, with what ſpirit this prelate, who continued a long time at Rome, returned to England; and how far he would have extended the church's power, if the king had not prevented his deſigns.

Synod of Lambeth. 1281.

In 1281, the ſame archbiſhop convened, at Lambeth, a provincial ſynod, which made, among others, the following canons.

The IId enjoined the prieſts to acquaint the more ignorant ſort of the laity, that the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt are delivered to them, together with the ſpecies of bread; and that what they receive, in the chalice, is not holy, but only mere wine, to enable them more eaſily to ſwallow the other ſpecies; for, as the canon proceeds, the blood of our Lord is allowed only to the prieſts, that celebrate divine ſervice in theſe leſſer churches*.

The IIId canon forbids prieſts to re-baptiſe the children, that had been baptiſed by the laity, unleſs there is reaſon to doubt, whether the child was baptiſed, or not.

In this caſe, the canon allowed the prieſt to baptiſe the infant, with theſe additional words, "If thou art not already baptiſed, I baptiſe "thee, in the name of the Father, &c."

The Xth obliges the prieſts to inſtruct the people committed to their charge, in plain and intelligible language, without ſcholaſtick terms and diſtinctions; and then the canon lays down the heads they were to explain, and the ſenſe they were to give them.

Synod of Exeter. 1287. Spelman. Conc. T. II. p. 350.

In 1287, Peter Quivil, biſhop of Exeter, aſſembled a dioceſan ſynod, which ordained, that care ſhould be taken to inſtruct the people, about the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation; who were to be told, that the adoration of the hoſt could not be carried too far, ſince "they received, under the ſpecies of bread, "the ſame body that hung upon the croſs, "for their ſalvation, and under the ſpecies of "wine, the blood which was ſhed from Chriſt's "ſide." It ſeems to be a natural inference, from hence, that, in the church of Exeter, the laity, then, received the ſacrament, in both kinds.

A Synod againſt the templars. 1310.

We find only one remarkable council, in the reign of Edward II, held, at London, in 1310, in which the Templars were condemned to perpetual impriſonment.

A ſynod at London. 1328.

In 1328, in the reign of Edward III, Mepham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, held a provincial ſynod, at London; by which Good-friday, and the Conception of the Bleſſed Virgin were made holy-days, and all work was forbidden; tho' the country people were allowed to follow their buſineſs, after divine ſervice. The ſame ſynod prohibited all monks, hermits, and canons regular, to take confeſſions; and a canon, made in a former ſynod, at Oxford, which admitted appeals only after a definitive ſentence, was revoked.

A ſynod at Magfield. 1332.

In 1332, Mepham convened another provincial ſynod, at Magfield, which ſettled all the holy-days obſerved, in the province of Canterbury; and, among the feſtivals, are St. George's day, and that of St. Auguſtin, the firſt archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A ſynod againſt the mendicant friars.

Stratford, archbiſhop of Canterbury, held, at London, in 1342, a provincial ſynod, of which the principal canons are theſe:

The IVth enjoined the monks, who had any appropriated livings, to relieve the poor, in proportion to the value of the benefice; and, for every failure, the biſhops were impowered to compel them to their duty, by ſequeſtring the profits.

The IXth was levelled againſt the Mendicant friars, who, abuſing the confidence of dying perſons, perſuaded them to make wills, to the prejudice of their families; and, as the ſynod durſt not directly attack the friars, who were under the pope's protection, thoſe, who were prevailed on to diſpoſe of their eſtates ſo unreaſonably reaſonably, were debarred the benefit of chriſtian burial.

* "Sollicite eos inſtruant ſub panis ſpecie ſimul eis dari corpus & ſanguinem Domini, immo Chriſtum integrum, vivum, & verum, qui totus eſt ſub ſpecie ſacramenti. Spelman. Conc.

During the reign of Richard II, the only remarkable councils were thoſe held, on occaſion of Wickliff and his followers; but, as theſe have been taken notice of, elſewhere, a repetition here, is entirely needleſs.

Of the ſchiſms.

Tho' England was no more concerned than other chriſtian ſtates, in the ſchiſms that divided the church; yet the knowledge of them is not only abſolutely neceſſary, for the underſtanding of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of thoſe times, but it may, in ſome meaſure, be ſaid, that the beſt part of that Hiſtory conſiſts of the conſequences of theſe ſcandalous ſchiſms.

John XXII. and Nicholas V.

From the beginning of the reign of Edward I. to the end of that of Richard II, two ſchiſms divided all Chriſtendom; but the firſt was of a ſhort continuance. Clement V, removing the papal chair to Avignon, died there, in 1314, and was ſucceeded by John XXII, who kept his reſidence, at the ſame place; but this pope was elected, after an extraordinary manner. The holy ſee remaining vacant, about two years after the deceaſe of Clement, becauſe the cardinals could not agree, they met, at length, at Lyons, in 1316, in order to chuſe a pope; but, the ſame diviſions ſtill reigning among them, they, by mutual conſent, referred the matter to the cardinal of Oſtia, biſhop of Oporto, who, immediately, nominated himſelf, and aſſumed the name of John XXII, At the ſame time, the empire was divided, by a double election, one part of the electors voting for Lewis of Bavaria, and the other for Frederick, duke of Auſtria; and John's refuſal, to acknowledge the firſt, cauſed a quarrel between them, which continually increaſed, till 1328, when Lewis, paſſing into Italy, degraded pope John, and procured Peter de Corbaria, a Cordelier, to be elected, who aſſumed the name of Nicholas V. and reſided at Rome. This anti-pope, being ſupported by the emperor, and the general of the Cordeliers, maintained his ground, for ſome time; but, at laſt, the emperor being forced to leave Italy, and a diſſenſion ariſing among the Cordeliers, Nicholas was taken, and conducted to Avignon; where he asked John's pardon, with a halter about his neck; and he was afterwards put into cloſe confinement, where he died, in a few months.

M. Weſt. Walſing.

A ſchiſm of Urban VI. and Clement VII.

The ſecond ſchiſm, between Urban VI. and Clement VII, was more conſiderable, and of a longer duration; but, as I have related the riſe of it, in the hiſtory of Richard II. I ſhall only ſhew its effects, to the cloſe of this century.

Urban VI. was ſucceeded, in 1389, by Boniface IX, who; as well as Clement, pretended to be deſirous to put an end to the ſchiſm; tho' nothing was farther from their intentions; and Clement VII, who died, at Avignon, in 1394, had, for his ſucceſſor, Benedict XIII.

All Chriſtendom being tired and offended at the ſchiſm, the court of France laboured to perſuade the two popes, to reſign their dignity, that another pope might be canonically elected; who both conſented, but violated their word. Benedict, eſpecially, made uſe of ſo many evaſions, that the king of France reſolved to withdraw his kingdom from his obedience, and, with this view, gained the cardinals of his party, who promiſed to deſert him; but Benedict, upon the news of this, introduced an Arragonian garriſon into his palace of Avignon. He was beſieged by Marſhal Boucicaut; who, ſoon after, received orders to raiſe the ſiege; and, thus, by the intrigues of ſome princes of the court of France, the ſchiſm ſtill continued, in ſpite of the king's endeavours to the contrary.

Nothing, now, remains, except to give a brief account of ſuch eccleſiaſticks as were eminent, for their merit and learning, during the four laſt reigns.

Kilwarby.

Robert Kilwarby, a Cordelier, or Minorite, was archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the reign of Edward I, and a prelate of great learning, conſidering the age in which he lived. He wrote ſeveral theological tracts, which were highly eſteemed, in thoſe days; and, his merit having advanced him to the dignity of a cardinal, he reſigned his archbiſhoprick, and went to reſide at Rome, where he died.

Burnell.

Robert Burnell, biſhop of Bath, was elected to be Kilwarby's ſucceſſor; but the pope, by the plenitude of his apoſtolick power, gave the ſee of Canterbury to John Pecham, an Engliſh Franciſcan, who was auditor of his chamber. This prelate had a great conteſt with Edward I, as well on occaſion of the canons of his ſynod, before-mentioned, as on other accounts; inſomuch, that the king was on the point of baniſhing him the realm. He was accounted very learned, particularly, in the civil and canon law; and there are extant ſome of his theological tracts, with commentaries upon ſeveral books of the ſcripture.

Pecham.

Winchelſey.

Robert Winchelſey, ſucceſſor to Pecham, preferred his archbiſhoprick to a cardinalate, offered him by the pope; but he is chiefly praiſed, for his charities; for he uſually relieved 4000 poor people, twice a week, at his houſe, beſides his maintaining many young ſcholars, at both the univerſities. Theſe charities gained him the affections of the people, who, after his deceaſe, flock'd, in crowds, to his tomb, and reverenced him, as a ſaint; but this prelate, ſo beloved by the people, had great conteſts with Edward I, for being deeply concerned in the intrigues of the lords, who oppoſed the king's deſigns. The pope, whom Edward gained to his intereſt, cited the archbiſhop to Rome, to juſtify his conduct, and laid him under a ſuſpenſion; and he was not reſtored, till the reign of Edward II.

M. Weſt. Walſing. Act. Pub.

Britton.

John Britton, biſhop of Hereford, was principally famous, for his knowledge of the common law; who wrote a book much eſteemed, De Juribus Anglicanis, and died, in 1275.

Duns Scotus.

Joannes Duns Scotus, commonly called Doctor Subtilis, lived, in the reign of Edward II; but, as he is univerſally known, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that he differed, in many points, from the opinion of Thomas Aquinas, and and was a great champion, for the immaculate conception of the bleſſed virgin; and, after being profeſſor in divinity, at Oxford and Paris, he died at Cologn, in the ſame office, in 1309, or 1310.

Stapleton. Walter Stapleton, biſhop of Exeter, was remarkable, for his learning and capacity, in the adminiſtration of the publick affairs; and, particularly, for his loyalty to Edward II, for which he loſt his life, as we have already related.

Stratford. Stratford, archbiſhop of Canterbury, under Edward III, was more famous, as a politician, than as an archbiſhop. I have elſewhere, taken notice of his conteſt with Edward III, who accuſed him of miſdemeanors; but, afterwards, the king commanded his accuſations againſt him to be cancelled, as containing things both falſe and unreaſonable.

Bradwardin. Thomas Bradwardin, ſucceſſor to Stratford, was a great philoſopher and mathematician, and alſo a very learned divine, being ſtiled the profound doctor, and wrote a book againſt the Pelagians, by which he acquired a great reputation, intitled, Of the Cauſe of God; but what rendered him ſtill more eſteemed, than his learning, was his humility, and his zeal to inſtruct the people committed to his care. Before his promotion to the archiepiſcopal ſee, he was confeſſor to Edward III, and, attended that glorious prince, in all his expeditions; and ſome even affirm, that the progreſs of Edward's arms, in France, was, in a great meaſure, owing to his prudent counſels.

Occam. William Occam, of the order of St. Francis, diſciple to Duns Scotus, is famous, for being head of the Nominaliſts againſt the Realiſts, of whom his maſter Scotus was the chief; but it is needleſs to explain, here, the difference between theſe two ſects of philoſophers, with which, God be thanked, the publick ſchools are, now, ſeldom troubled.

Fitz-Ralph. Richard Fitz-Ralph, archbiſhop of Armagh, born, at Dundalk, in Ireland, was a great enemy to the Mendicant friars; whom he attacked vigorouſly in his ſermons, preached at London, wherein he undertook to prove the nine following propoſitions.

I. That, with reſpect to the place where confeſſions are to be made, the pariſh-churches are to be preferred to thoſe of the friars.

II. That pariſhioners ought rather to confeſs to a curate, than to a friar.

III. That, altho' Jeſus Chriſt was poor, whilſt on earth, he never affected poverty.

IV. That Chriſt did never beg, nor make profeſſion of voluntary poverty.

V. That he never taught people to make profeſſion of beggary.

VI. That Chriſt held the contrary, viz. that men ought not to beg, by inclination and choice, but only when conſtrained to it, by neceſſity.

VII. That to profeſs beggary is contrary to religion and common ſenſe.

VIII. That the vow of voluntary poverty, is not agreeable to the rule of the friars, Minorites, or Cordeliers.

IX. That the bull of Alexander IV, which condemns the libel of the doctors of Paris, does not cenſure any of theſe eight propoſitions.

Theſe articles, which attacked the Mendicant friars, in the moſt ſenſible part, as it was by their voluntary poverty that they had gained and preſerved their credit with the people, were carried to the pope, who cited the archbiſhop before him; yet, appearing, he courageouſly maintained all his aſſertions; but, before this affair was decided, he died, at Avignon, in 1360. He tranſlated the Bible into Engliſh, and wrote two treatiſes, one in defence of the pariſh-prieſts, againſt the friars; and the other, De Audientia Confeſſionum.

Triviſa. John de Triviſa, a Corniſh-man, who lived, in the reign of Edward III, tranſlated the Bible, and ſeveral other books into Engliſh; and, being of the archbiſhop of Armagh's opinion, he maintained, that Jeſus Chriſt ſent the apoſtles, but never Mendicant friars, to preach the goſpel.

Theſe are almoſt all that were eminent, for piety or learning, during the four laſt reigns, unleſs we would rank, among the famous and learned men, a company of ſchoolmen, who, in my judgment, do not merit a place, in that claſs. Some add the founders of colleges and monaſteries, as deſerving to hold a conſiderable rank, among the devout; but theſe are too ambiguous marks of devotion. It appears from this ſmall number of learned perſons, how the ſciences were degenerated, ſince, of all thoſe above-named, there is ſcarce one truly learned; though, in ſpite of the prejudices of Wickliff's enemies, I ſhall not ſcruple to except that doctor, of whom I have, already, ſaid what is ſufficient to excuſe me, from making any farther additions.

† The moſt famous hiſtorians of the XIVth century were:

Thomas Wikes, whoſe hiſtory begins at the conqueſt, and ends at the death of Edward I, in 1304. He was a canon regular of Oſney, near Oxford, and writes as clearly and fully, eſpecially, in ſome paſſages relating to the barons wars, as a compendious chronicle would admit, which Dr. Gale has publiſhed, in his Hiſt. Angl.

The author of the chronicle, that bears the name of John Brompton, abbot of Joreval,, or Jorevaulx, in Yorkſhire, lived, about this time, and the chronicle begins with the coming of Auſtin, in 588, and ends with the death of Richard I, in 1198; but it is evident, as it takes no notice of the foundation of that monaſtery, &c. that neither Brompton, nor any member of that religious houſe, was the author of this chronicle, but that it was procured by that abbot, and by him beſtowed on his monaſtery. The author, whoever he be, is very copious in his collections, for the Saxon times, tho' he overlooks the chronological part, in the whole ſtory of the heptarchy. He relates the Saxon laws, at large, and tranſlates pretty faithfully; and his chronicle is publiſhed, among the Decem Scriptores.

Matthew, a Benedictin monk of Weſtminſter, ended his hiſtory, at the year 1307, tho' it was afterwards continued by other hands. He was a curious collector of the flowers of former hiſtorians, from whence he is ſtiled Florilegus; and he entirely tranſcribes Matthew Paris. His moſt eminent continuator was Adam Merimuth, a canon regular of St. Paul's, and an eminent civilian, who, in his latter days, applied himſelf wholly to the reading and writing Engliſh hiſtory; and, beginning his work, at 1302, he continues it to 1380.

HISTORY

OF

BOOK XI.

The Reigns of HENRY IV. and HENRY V; containing the ſpace of 22 years and 10 months.

13. HENRY IV. ſirnamed of Bullingbroke.

1399. HENRY IV.

HENRY, duke of Lancaſter, ſirnamed of Bullingbroke, the place of his nativity *, being proclaimed, the 30th of September, aſſumed, that very day, the reins of the government; and, as the parliament, then aſſembled, was called, in Richard's name, and their authority ceaſed, upon his being depoſed, Henry's firſt care was to call another. According to cuſtom, the repreſentatives ſhould have been choſen a-new; but Henry, unwilling to run the riſque, of having a leſs favourable parliament than that, which had ſo cordially eſpouſed his cauſe, impowered the ſame repreſentatives, to conſtitute, with the houſe of lords, a new parliament, under his authority. I ſhall not preſume to decide, whether this proceeding was ſomewhat irregular, or authorized by any former precedent; but, however that be, the ſame parliament, after a few days interruption, met again, on the 9th of October, as if they had been called by the new king.

The earl of Marche retires to Wigmore.

In the interim, Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, apprehenſive that it would be no leſs dangerous than fruitleſs, at ſuch a juncture, to aſſert his juſt right to the crown, retired to his lordſhip of Wigmore †, near the borders of Wales; for, the more inconteſtable his title was, the greater reaſon he had to dread Henry's jealouſy; and, therefore, he reſolved to live in retirement, without diſcovering the leaſt ambition, or uneaſineſs. Indeed, he had no other way to ſecure his repoſe, and even his life, ſince it was but too probable, that the new king would embrace the firſt occaſion, to free himſelf from the diſquiet, which might be created by ſuch a rival. 1399.

The parliament being aſſembled, Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury made a long ſpeech, repreſenting the great advantages procured to the kingdom, by the late revolution; and, enlarging chiefly on the diſorders of the late reign, he aſſured them, that the new ſovereign propoſed to preſerve to all their rights and liberties. This prelate was baniſhed, in the late reign; and Roger Walden, who was appointed in his room, had, hitherto, performed the archiepiſcopal functions; but, as Arundel was not canonically depoſed, the parliament, in their firſt ſeſſion, ordered, that he ſhould re-aſſume his dignity, and the rather, as the other had not, as yet, obtained the pope's confirmation. The archbiſhop's ſpeech and ſome preliminary formalities were the only things remarkable, in the firſt ſeſſion of the new parliament; which was adjourned to the 14th of October, in order to make preparations for the coronation, which was to be on the 13th. The archbiſhop harangues the parliament, in praiſe of the new king. Cotton.

The king fills the vacant poſts. Act. Pub.

During this interval, the king filled ſeveral poſts, which were vacant, or poſſeſſed by perſons diſagreeable to him; and, as Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, and Ralph Nevill, earl of Weſtmoreland, had ſhewn a 1399. great zeal for Henry, by joining him, at Ravenſpur, preſently after his landing, he made the firſt high-conſtable, and the other, earl-marſhal *. A few days after, the king gave to the earl of Northumberland the iſle of Man, with the privilege of carrying, at the coronation, the ſword called Lancaſter, on the king's left hand †; which was the ſame ſword the king wore, when he landed, at Ravenſpur.

Thomas, his ſecond ſon, is made high-ſteward. Act. Pub.

Henry, having requited theſe two lords, whom he conſidered, as moſt attached to his intereſt and perſon, made Thomas of Lancaſter, his ſecond ſon, high-ſteward; and it was abſolutely neceſſary to fill this poſt, before the coronation, becauſe to the high-ſteward's court all muſt apply, who claim any ſervice, in that ceremony, in order to be maintained in their rights; but, as the prince was only 10 years old, the king gave him for deputy, Thomas Piercy, earl of Worceſter, brother to the earl of Northumberland.

The king is crowned, and anointed with extraordinary oil. Walſing.

On the 13th of October, Edward the Confeſſor's day, Henry was crowned, with all the uſual formalities, being then 33 years of age; and he was anointed with a certain oil, pretended to be brought, by the bleſſed virgin, to St. Thomas of Canterbury, whilſt he was in France. The vial, which held this precious oil, fell into the hands of a hermit; who preſented it to Henry, duke of Lancaſter, grandſon to Henry III, with this prediction, "That the kings, who ſhould be anointed "with this ſacred oil, ſhould become true "champions for the church." The duke of Lancaſter gave it afterwards to the famous prince of Wales, ſon to Edward III, who reſolved to be anointed with it, at his coronation; but, after the deceaſe of that prince, the vial, which was of ſtone, having on the top a gold eagle ſet with diamonds, was laid up among the jewels, unregarded. Richard II, his ſon, finding it, ſome time before his laſt voyage into Ireland, intended to be crowned again, on purpoſe to be anointed with it; but the archbiſhop of Canterbury, oppoſing it, repreſented, that the unction of kings ought not to be repeated. At length, the vial was fallen into Henry's hands, who, either out of devotion, or becauſe it came from the duke of Lancaſter, his grandfather, by the mother's ſide, was pleaſed to be anointed with it, at his coronation; but, if we examine the reigns of this prince and ſeveral of his ſucceſſors, who were anointed with the ſame ſacred oil, we ſhall find, that the good hermits's prophecy was far from being accompliſhed.

Henry refuſes to own he holds the crown of the people.

I have obſerved, in the reign of Richard II, that, when Henry claimed the crown, he affected to uſe obſcure expreſſions, deſigning to make the people believe, that there was ſome foundation in the right, he pretended to derive from the firſt houſe of Lancaſter, of which he was heir, by his mother; but this pretence, tho' it might, then, have ſome influence over ſuch as voluntarily ſhut their eyes, was too palpable to deceive, any longer. It was, therefore, neceſſary for the new king, to find ſome plauſible title, to juſtify the nation's choice of his perſon; and there was none more lawful than the ſervice he had lately done the ſtate; but he judged it dangerous to build his right upon ſuch a foundation. Before he received the crown, he very readily owned the parliament's power to confer it upon him; but, as it was now placed on his head, he was apprehenſive, that it would from thence be inferred, that they, who had given the crown, had power to take it away. It did not a little perplex him, how he ſhould ſatisfy them, that the parliament could lawfully depoſe Richard, and that their authority was ſuperior to the regal; and, at the ſame time to convince them, that the ſame parliament, in placing Henry on the throne, did not proceed, by way of authority, nor could diſpenſe with owning him for king. In a word, they were to acknowledge, in the parliament, an unlimited power, with reſpect to Richard's depoſing, and to decline their authority, in the late election; which two things appeared irreconcilable; but, when a man has power, on his ſide, he does not ſo much ſtudy to find ſubſtantial reaſons, as to dazzle the publick with appearances. Henry, perſuaded that, at this juncture, no one would have the boldneſs to contradict him, reſolved to notify to his ſubjects, that he did not intend to derive his right from their bare conſent; and, on his very coronation-day, he publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that he aſcended the throne, firſt, by right of conqueſt; ſecondly, by vertue of Richard's reſignation, and deſignation of him, for his ſucceſſor; and, laſtly, as he was the next male heir of the late king ‡. Thus, he excluded the only lawful title he had, viz. the general conſent of the people, in order to build his claim upon three manifeſtly weak foundations. Firſt of all, How could he pretend to a right of conqueſt? He entered the kingdom only with 80 men, who, probably, were, for the moſt part, Engliſh; and his good ſucceſs was entirely owing to the concurrence of all England. In the next place, it was falſe, that Richard reſigned the crown to him; for we have ſeen, in the reign of that prince, that Henry himſelf, as well as his friends, did not think it expedient. Richard was only obliged to make an abſolute reſignation, leſt it ſhould ſeem too conſtrained, if he made it, in behalf of a prince, to whom he was actually a priſoner; beſides, if Richard had appointed Henry, for his ſucceſſor, how could a king, depoſed, for tyranny and inability, have a right to nominate

1399. minate the perſon, who ſhould ſucceed him, eſpecially, as the nomination was contrary to the laws of the land. Laſtly, It was ſtill leſs true, that Henry was Richard's next heir, unleſs the Salick law had been revived in England, as well as in France; and the deſcendants of the daughters were excluded from the ſucceſſion. Indeed, in the third title alledged by the king, there was a ſort of equivocation capable of deceiving; for he was couſin-german to the late king, and, conſequently, a nearer relation than the earl of Marche, who was, one degree, farther removed; but it could not be inferred, that he was next heir, ſince the branch, and not the degree of relation, was to be regarded, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion. Accordingly, after the death of Edward III, Richard, his grandſon, ſucceeded him, tho' he was, one degree, farther removed than his uncles; and again, ſuppoſing this rule had not been inviolably obſerved, Henry could not affirm, that he was the neareſt relation of Richard. He was firſt couſin; but the duke of York, being uncle, had no leſs right than he; ſo that, in which light ſoever, Henry's pretended titles were viewed, they muſt have appeared ill-grounded. The only plauſible title, he could have produced, was the conſent of the people; but this he declined, for the reaſon above-mentioned.

Act. Pub. The ſame day, the king iſſued out his proclamation, he created Henry, his eldeſt ſon, aged 13 years, duke of Cornwall, prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter; but not alſo duke of Aquitain, as ſome have aſſerted.

Cotton. The ceremony of the coronation being over, the parliament met, the next day, being the 14th of October; and the importance of the acts, paſſed in this ſeſſion, obliges me to deſcend to particulars, abſolutely neceſſary to illuſtrate the ſequel of this Hiſtory.

Acts of parliament. In the firſt place, was paſſed an act of indemnity, to ſcreen thoſe, who, during the late commotions, had taken up arms for the preſent king, then duke of Lancaſter; which act was abſolutely neceſſary, ſince the laws condemned, without diſtinction, all thoſe that oppoſed the eſtabliſhed government.

Walſing. After this, the parliament examined all the proceeding of the late reign, to ſtretch the royal prerogative beyond the uſual limits; and chiefly thoſe, of the parliament begun, at Weſtminſter, in 1397, and continued, at Shrewsbury, in 1398. All the acts, as well thoſe relating to the three lords unjuſtly condemned, as to the exorbitant privileges granted to the king, were ſo evidently deſtructive of the nation's liberties, that they were unanimouſly repealed; and they alſo revived and confirmed the ſtatutes of the parliament, in 1388, annulled by that of Shrewsbury. They, moreover, paſſed a particular act againſt the pope's bull, ratifying the ſtatutes of Shrewsbury; which bull was founded on a principle entirely oppoſite to the rights of the people; for the pope's power, to confirm acts of parliament, could not be acknowledged, without aſcribing to him a right of ſovereignty over England. The parliament, therefore, declared, 1399. in this act, that the kingdom of England was independent of all foreign power, particularly, of the court of Rome; and that the pope had no right to interpoſe in the civil government of the realm.

The Shrewsbury-parliament, intending to extend the royal authority, as far as poſſible, had ſo multiplied the caſes of high treaſon, that none, except ſuch as acknowledged, in the ſovereign, an unlimited power, could poſſibly avoid the penalty of it; wherefore, to redreſs ſo dangerous a grievance, tending to render the king abſolute maſter of the lives and fortunes of his ſubjects, the parliament revived a ſtatute, made in the reign of Edward III, and enacted, that nothing ſhould be adjudged to be treaſon, but what was therein ſpecified.

Richard's adviſers and favourites are called to an account. Walſing. The rights and privileges of the people being, by theſe acts, reſtored, the authors and adviſers of the late uſurpations were called to an account. When king Richard apprehended the duke of Glouceſter, and the earls of Warwick and Arundel, he was not inveſted with that abſolute power, ſo liberally conferred upon him afterwards by the Shrewsbury-parliament; ſo that he was obliged to proceed, according to law, in the condemnation of theſe lords. With this view, he ſo managed, that John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, his half-brother, Thomas Holland, earl of Kent, his nephew, Edward Plantagenet, earl of Albemarle, his couſin, ſon to the duke of York, John Beaufort, earl of Somerſet, ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, by his third wife, and the lord Thomas Spencer were the accuſers of the three impriſoned lords; the earl of Salisbury* and the lord Morley † were reported to be the chief contrivers of this plot; and, after condemnation, Richard diſtributed the eſtates of the three lords, among the accuſers and evidences; beſides, he made the earl of Albemarle a duke, the earl of Huntingdon duke of Exeter, the earl of Kent duke of Surrey, the earl of Somerſet duke of Somerſet, and Thomas Spencer earl of Glouceſter.

Walſing. As it was notorious, that the three lords were unjuſtly oppreſſed by the late king, the parliament judged it neceſſary to puniſh the authors and the inſtruments of this violence; and, therefore, after reverſing the ſentence againſt the earls of Arundel and Warwick, as directly contrary to the pardon that was granted them, it was reſolved, that the accuſers ſhould be deprived both of their new titles, and the eſtates diſtributed among them. As to their own lands, it was left to the king, either to continue them in poſſeſſion, or turn them out, at his pleaſure; and Henry, willing to ſhew his clemency, in the beginning of his reign, not only left them their eſtates, but alſo reſtored them to their honours. Moreover, he made the duke of Exeter, his brother-in-law, governor of Calais; and the earl of Salisbury and the lord Morley, Richard's deteſted miniſters, and principal authors of the violence

1399. violence practiſed upon the duke of Glouceſter and the other two lords, were releaſed, after a ſhort impriſonment, though the people loudly called for their death; but, as the friends of theſe lords alledged, in their excuſe, that Richard compelled them to act, the parliament took occaſion to enact, that, henceforward, compulſion ſhould be no legal excuſe, to juſtify actions contrary to law.

A genral pardon.

This affair being over, the parliament prevailed on the king to grant a general pardon, in which, however, were excepted the duke of Glouceſter's murderers; one of whom *, being apprehended and convicted, was hanged, at London, and his head ſent to Calais, to be fixed on one of the gates.

The ſucceſſion is ſettled on the houſe of Lancaſter. Walſing.

Though the injuſtice done to the earl of Marche was manifeſt, it might be coloured with the pretence of rewarding Henry, for the ſignal ſervice he had done the ſtate; and, if this reward had been limited to his perſon, perhaps, it would not have ſeemed very ſurpriſing, that, in ſuch an extraordinary caſe, the laws ſhould be ſuperſeded, in favour of a prince who had ſo readily expoſed himſelf, for the publick; but, at ſuch junctures, it is extremely difficult to keep within the bounds of equity. The parliament, not ſatisfied with adjudging to Henry the crown taken from Richard, in order to ſecure it to his poſterity, paſſed an act, ſettling the ſucceſſion on the houſe of Lancaſter; firſt, on the perſon of the prince of Wales, the king's eldeſt ſon and his heirs, and then on his three brothers and their iſſue.

The king conſults the parliament, about the diſpoſal of Richard. Cotton.

The commons, not content with the bare depoſing of Richard, in a very irregular manner, would have had him tried, in form, and petitioned the king, for that purpoſe; wherefore, Henry, deſirous of knowing, how the late king was to be diſpoſed of, wanted the advice of both houſes, before the breaking up of the parliament. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, being charged with his orders, after he had exacted an oath of ſecreſy from all the members, made the firſt motion; and it may be fairly preſumed, that Richard had not many friends in the houſe; or, if any diſapproved of the proceedings againſt him, they were too much overawed to venture to ſpeak, in his favour; yet Thomas Merks, biſhop of Carliſle, regardleſs of the motives which might induce him, as well as the reſt of Richard's friends, to keep ſilence, made a long ſpeech; wherein he alledged every thing that could, with any plauſibleneſs, be ſaid for the depoſed king, and againſt the prince on the throne.

The biſhop of Carliſle's ſpeech, in defence of Richard.

The biſhop undertook to prove, 'Firſt, 'that no authority could lawfully depoſe a 'king of England; ſecondly, that the offences, 'Richard was accuſed of, did not deſerve de'poſition, and, moreover, were not proved; 'and, thirdly, that the crown was unjuſtly 'adjudged to the duke of Lancaſter.

'He enlarged very copiouſly on the firſt, 'ſhewing the wide difference between the ſe'veral kinds of government eſtabliſhed in the 'world. He confeſſed, that, in ſome, the 'prince, or head, might be depoſed, becauſe 'the ſupreme authority was not ſolely veſted 'in his perſon, but the people, or nobles, had 'a ſhare; among which ſort he reckoned the 'republicks, the antient government of Rome, 'the empire of Germany, the kingdoms of 'Swedeland and Denmark, the earldom of 'Flanders, and ſome other ſtates; but he 'maintained, that it was otherwiſe in the go'vernments, where the ſupreme authority is 'lodged in the ſingle perſon of the ſovereign. 'In this claſs, he placed the kingdom of Iſ'rael, among the antients, with the three 'firſt empires; and, among the moderns, 'England, France, Spain, Scotland, Muſco'vy, Turky, Perſia, and, in general, all the 'kingdoms of Aſia and Africa. With reſpect 'to theſe, he affirmed, that, though the vi'ces of a ſovereign ſhould be not only preju'dicial, but even intolerable to his ſubjects, 'he could not be lawfully depoſed, by any 'means whatſoever; that force could not be 'uſed, without incurring the guilt of rebel'lion and treaſon; and much leſs authority, 'ſince there was not, in the ſtate, any lawful 'authority, but what was derived from him; 'and he advanced arguments and precedents, 'from the Holy Scriptures and profane au'thors, which cannot be repeated, without 'being exceſſively tedious.'

Upon the ſecond article, he boldly aſſerted, 'That the crimes, for which Richard was de'poſed, were either falſe, or agravated; that, 'indeed, he might be chargeable with ſome 'errors or overſights, but his faults could not 'be ſtiled tyranny; that, if his failings afford'ed juſt cauſe to depoſe him, how many ſove'reigns would daily be treated, as tyrants, 'and depoſed by their ſubjects? Every tax, 'execution of rebels, and, in a word, what'ever was diſliked by the people, would fur'niſh a pretence to dethrone the moſt lawful 'prince.' He paſſed over the more ſlightly the proofs of this ſecond head, as the parliament itſelf ſeemed to queſtion the truth of the accuſations againſt Richard, ſince no ſtep was taken to prove them, in a legal manner; and, by the way, it is very probabel, that, to avoid this reproach, the commons wanted to proceed, in form, againſt the depoſed king.

Upon the third article, the biſhop maintained, 'That, even ſuppoſing Richard guil'ty, and granting the nation had authority to 'depoſe him, there was not the leaſt colour 'of juſtice, in giving the crown to the duke 'of Lancaſter; that, if the duke was the true 'heir to Richard, as he pretended, he ought 'to wait his death, before he could inherit; 'but it was notorious, then, that there was a 'nearer heir, whoſe father was declared ſuc'ceſſor to Richard, by act of parliament.' As for Henry's pretended right from Edmund Crouch-back, ſon to Henry III, the biſhop diſdained to conſider it, affirming, "He was 'very certain, that men of ſenſe were aſhamed 'of a right, built on ſuch a ſlender foundation.'

After this, the orator proceeded to examine the two other titles, mentioned in the king's

* John Hall.

1399. proclamation, namely, conqueſt, and Richard's reſignation. To the firſt he ſaid, 'That a 'ſubject could never pretend to a right of 'conqueſt againſt his ſovereign, becauſe the 'victory itſelf was high and heinous treaſon.' As for the reſignation, he obſerved, 'it was 'extorted, by force; though, ſuppoſing it vo-'luntary, it could be of no validity; that, in 'Richard's ſituation, it was not in his power 'to make a valid act; that, beſides, ſince, 'by the laws of the land, the king could not 'alienate the crown-jewels, much leſs, ſurely, 'could he give away the crown itſelf.' Then he ſpoke of the general conſent of the people, though Henry had thought it improper to inſiſt upon it; 'That, as the kingdom of Eng-'land had never been elective, it was ridicu-'lous to aſcribe to the people the power of 'diſpoſing of the crown.' Laſtly, he replied to the objection, which might be alledged, from the depoſing of Edward II, 'That wiſe 'men muſt be guided by law, and not by ex-'amples and precedents. That, however, the 'depoſing of Edward II. was no more to be 'urged, than the poiſoning of king John, or 'the murder of any other prince; but even, 'in the depoſing of Edward II, care was taken 'to preſerve the rights of the lawful ſucceſſor.'

What the biſhop had, hitherto, ſaid might paſs for reaſons, to queſtion, whether Richard II. could be lawfully depoſed; at moſt, it might be conſidered, as the private opinion of the ſpeaker; but, towards the concluſion of his ſpeech, he launched out ſurpriſingly againſt Henry, and expreſſed a paſſion very injurious to the reaſons he had alledged. He ſaid, 'it 'was to be feared, that the people of Eng-'land would ſoon be in the condition of Æ-'ſop's frogs; boldly adding, that, whilſt Ri-'chard was alive, the Engliſh could not, with 'juſtice, acknowledge any other ſovereign. 'In fine, he maintained, that the perſon, 'whom they ſtiled king, had committed much 'more heinous crimes, than thoſe for which 'Richard was depoſed; that, tho' in exile, 'he had entered the kingdom, contrary to 'his oath, and without being legally recalled; 'that, not ſatisfied with diſturbing the quiet 'of the land, by an unjuſt and impious inſur-'rection againſt his ſovereign, he had alſo de-'throned him; that he had, moreover, de-'manded judgment againſt him, without of-'fering to prove his accuſation, or permitting 'the party accuſed to make his defence, con-'trary to the expreſs laws of the realm.' He concluded with affirming, 'That, if the in-'juſtice done to Richard was incapable of mo-'ving the hearts of the Engliſh, at leaſt, their 'common and manifeſt danger ought to ſtop 'the courſe of theſe violent proceedings.'

The biſhop is impriſoned.

This unſeaſonable ſpeech did not anſwer the ſpeaker's expectation; and, if the majority had been of his opinion, it was impoſſible to recede from what had been done; but moſt of the members perſiſted in the maxims they followed, when Richard was depoſed. Accordingly, the biſhop reaped no other fruit from his harangue, than to be confined in the abbey of St. Albans; from whence, however, he was, ſoon after, releaſed, without farther puniſhment.

1399. An extraordinary ſentence is paſſed upon Richard.

The biſhop of Carliſle's opinion being unanimouſly rejected, the parliament came, with reſpect to Richard, to a reſolution, in all appearance, ſo extraordinary, that there is reaſon to ſuſpect, that Hiſtory is defective, in this particular; and all the hiſtorians agree, that it was reſolved, Richard ſhould be confined, during life, with a princely allowance; but, if any perſon attempted his deliverance, Richard ſhould be the firſt man that ſhould ſuffer death. If this be fact, it cannot be denied, that he was really condemned to die, ſince his life was only granted him, on an impracticable condition; and, beſides, ſuch a condition cannot be annexed to the ſentence of a criminal, but on ſuppoſition that he is already condemned.

Remarks on the ſentence.

As it is not my buſineſs to determine, how far the authority of the parliament may be extended, with reſpect to the king's perſon; I ſhall only obſerve, that this is the ſecond inſtance of the depoſing of a king of England, without hearing his defence, or even obſerving the uſual formalities preſcribed by the law, in the trial of the meaneſt ſubject. The parliament, which depoſed Edward II, was content with decreeing his impriſonment, during life; but this parliament, to Richard's depoſing, adds the ſentence of death; which is the obvious meaning of the condition, on which his life is granted. Let us farther obſerve, that one of the principal articles of accuſation, againſt this prince, was his putting to death the duke of Glouceſter, his uncle, without a previous trial; and yet this very parliament condemns him, unheard, on his bare confeſſion, when a priſoner; not, that he is guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, but that he is, in his own opinion, unworthy to wear the crown. They not only ſtrip him of his royalty, but order him to be impriſoned, for life; nay, they, in reality, condemn him to die, ſince they grant him his life, on a condition, that, probably, muſt ſoon occaſion his death. If we cannot help deteſting the principles of the Shrewsbury-parliament, in the reign of Richard II, which ſubjected the lives, honours, and fortunes of the nation to the king's pleaſure, what ought we to think of the preſent? In the contrary extream, they put the life and honour of the king himſelf in the power of his ſubjects, and refuſe the ſovereign a privilege, which the meaneſt Engliſh ſubject has a juſt right to demand. The examples of theſe two parliaments evidently prove, that the Engliſh conſtitution can never pretend to that degree of perfection, boaſted by ſome, till the bounds of the royal prerogative and the privileges of parliament are preciſely determined.

The king aſſures the clergy of his protection.

Whilſt the two houſes acted, in common, and with equal ardor, for the intereſt of the prince they had placed on the throne, the convocation was ſitting in St. Paul's; and Henry, rightly judging, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to gain the friendſhip of the clergy, ſent the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, to aſſure them of his protection. The earls, 1399. earls, being admitted into the aſſembly, repreſented, that they were not ſent to demand money, as was cuſtomary, in the late reign, but to acquaint them with the king's reſolution to maintain their privileges and immunities; adding, that they had the king's orders, to aſſure the convocation, that he was ready to concur with them, in whatever means ſhould be thought proper to extirpate hereſy, and puniſh obſtinate hereticks; and they concluded, with deſiring the clergy's prayers, for the welfare of the king and kingdom. Nothing could have more influence to gain the hearts of the eccleſiaſticks, than the king's promiſe, with reſpect to hereſy; for the number of the Lollards, which daily increaſed, gave the clergy juſt cauſe to fear, that, at length, a reformation might be ſet on foot, which muſt, of courſe, be very prejudicial to their temporal intereſts; and, therefore, the aſſurances the king gave the convocation, were received, with great demonſtrations of joy and thankfulneſs.

The parliament is diſſolved.

Some days after, the parliament, having finiſhed the chief affairs, to the king's ſatisfaction, and, in appearance, with the approbation of the whole nation, was diſſolved, according to cuſtom.

Ambaſſadors are ſent to ſeveral courts. Walſing.

During the whole ſeſſion, Henry was regardleſs of foreign affairs; for thoſe at home appeared to him of much greater importance, ſince the buſineſs was to ſettle a revolution that procured him the crown; but he was no ſooner free from theſe firſt concerns, than he projected means, to juſtify to the other ſovereigns the late alterations, in England. The depoſing of a king being deteſtable in itſelf, and ſeeming to affect all princes, it was not eaſy to perſuade them, that a nation had ſufficient reaſon to uſe ſo violent a remedy, to deliver themſelves from tyranny; and, therefore, Henry diſpatch'd ambaſſadors to all the principal courts of Europe, to endeavour to vindicate Richard's depoſition, and his own promotion. He was particularly concerned to pacify the court of France; for he was not inſenſible, that Charles VI. had formed a deſign to revenge the injury done his ſon-in-law, and that his diſtemper, into which he relapſed, upon hearing the news, had prevented him from inſtantly breaking the 28 years truce, made with England. Henry choſe, for ambaſſadors, the biſhop of Durham and earl of Worceſter, who had inſtructions to propoſe a perpetual league and alliance between the two crowns; and, beſides, he ordered them to make overtures for a double marriage. The firſt was, between Henry, his eldeſt ſon, and a daughter of the French king, or one of his uncles; and the ſecond, between his own daughter and one of the ſame king's ſons, or neareſt relations. The ambaſſadors met with a cold reception, in France; but, having orders not to obſtruct their negotiation, by ſtanding on ceremony, they patiently waited, till the heat of the French was ſomewhat abated.

Henry's propoſals to the court of France. Act. Pub.

The diſpoſition of the other courts.

As for the other courts of Europe, Henry had no occaſion for ſuch precautions. The emperor Wenceſlaus, who was ſtill alive, was a prince grown ſtupid with drinking, and, like the reſt of the German princes, regardleſs of what paſſed, in England; and, as for the kings of Caſtile and Portugal, they were rather gainers than loſers, by a revolution, that advanced their brother-in-law to the throne; ſo that they readily approved, or, at leaſt, ſeemed to approve it.

The Gaſcoigns are diſpoſed to revolt.

However, another affair of greater importance created the new king great uneaſineſs; for Guienne was diſpoſed to revolt. The Gaſcoigns already publickly talked of putting themſelves under the dominion of France; and it was the city of Bordeaux, the place of Richard's nativity, that ſtirred up the whole province, prompted by her affection for that unfortunate prince; whilſt, on the other hand, the court of France had ſent the duke of Bourbon into Guienne, in order to foment theſe diſpoſitions. The famous Robert Knolles, governor of that province, who was no leſs remarkable for his prudence than valour, found it extremely difficult to curb the rebellious ſpirit of the Gaſcoigns; and, perhaps, he would never have accompliſhed it, had he not been timely aſſiſted by the earl of Worceſter, who, being in an ambaſſy at Paris, ſpeedily poſted to Bourdeaux; and the moderation and prudent conduct of theſe two lords, effected what could ſcarce have been executed, by force, and, at length, they had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the commotions appeaſed.

Moreover, as Henry was ſenſible, that, amidſt all the acclamations he was flattered with, it was impoſſible but that the late revolution had created many male-contents, it was his intereſt to keep peace with his neighbours; and, accordingly, this was his reſolution, leſt, a foreign war employing his forces abroad, he ſhould be unprovided, in caſe of any ſudden inſurrection; beſides, a war would have obliged him to demand ſupplies of the parliament, which he was willing to avoid, till his dominion was more firmly eſtabliſhed. On theſe accounts, he was extremely uneaſy, to hear that the Scots had violated the truce, and taken Werk-caſtle; yet he judged it moſt adviſable to overlook this inſult, till it was more in his power to revenge it; but, leſt this diſſimulation ſhould encourage the king of Scotland, he ſent ambaſſadors, to demand ſatisfaction; however, as the Scots complained likewiſe, of ſome breach, on the part of the Engliſh, he made uſe of that pretence, to demand a confirmation of the truce, by a mutual reparation of the damages the two nations had done each other. When Robert broke the truce, he imagined that France would eſpouſe his cauſe, and that the depoſing of Richard would raiſe commotions, in England, which he intended to improve; but, perceiving that France remained quiet, and England undiſturbed, without much ſollicitation, he agreed to put his affairs with Henry in negotiation.

An ambaſſy to Scotland. Act. Pub.

Henry tries to gain the peoples affection.

Things being in ſuch an agreeable ſtate abroad, Henry principally applied himſelf to what might contribute to ſupport him on the throne;

1399. throne; and, with that view, he endeavoured, firſt, to preſerve the affection the people had, hitherto, expreſſed for him; and, ſecondly, to guard Richard ſo ſtrictly, that it ſhould be impoſſible for him to make his eſcape. As to the firſt, to render himſelf popular, he ſhewed, on all occaſions, a deteſtation of his predeceſſor's tyrannical government, and a greater concern for the people's intereſt, than for his own; and, to this end, he ordered all the ſubſcribed blanks, extorted by Richard, from the inhabitants of London, and the condemned counties, to be brought into chancery and publickly burnt. Theſe blank bonds, which were called Ragmans, had been filled, not only with the ſums Richard exacted of the ſubſcribers, but alſo with an engagement to obſerve, under certain penalties, the ſtatutes of Shrewsbury and all the conſequent acts; and, in burning theſe bonds, Henry intended to inſinuate to the people, that he would not make any advantage of theſe extorted engagements, much leſs practiſe the like methods himſelf, to fill his coffers.

Richard is ſhut up in Pontefract-caſtle.

As for the depoſed king, he did not judge it expedient to keep him any longer, in the tower of London, leſt he ſhould move the compaſſion of the citizens, but ordered him to be conducted to the caſtle of Leeds, in the county of Kent; and, ſome time after, fearing ſtill, that Richard's neighbourhood to London would give too frequent occaſion to talk of him, he cauſed him to be removed to Pontefract-caſtle, in the north.

The death of the duke of Bretagne.

This year, in November, John the Valiant, duke of Bretagne, died, in his capital city; whoſe firſt wife was daughter to Edward III, by whom he had no iſſue; but, by his ſecond, Joan of Navarre, he left two ſons; and John, the eldeſt, ſucceeded him, under the guardianſhip of the duke of Burgundy and Oliver de Cliſſon.

Thus, the three firſt months of Henry's reign, paſſed in a deceitful calm, followed by violent ſtorms; and it was neceſſary to enlarge a little on the firſt events of it, becauſe they ſerve for a foundation to all the reſt.

1400. A conſpiracy againſt the king.

The year 1400 began with a conſpiracy againſt the king, from which he was, as it were, miraculouſly delivered; tho' hiſtorians ſomewhat differ, as to the firſt author of this plot, commonly aſcribed to the abbot of Weſtminſter; yet it is more probable, the abbot was only the agent of the lords conſpirators, and lent them his houſe for their meetings; and, perhaps, he was employed to ſound the inclinations of ſeveral perſons, according to the direction of men more powerful than he. However this be, it is agreed, that the plot was formed in his houſe, into which came, as heads, the dukes of Albemarle, Surrey, and Exeter, the earls of Glouceſter and Salisbury, the biſhop of Carliſle, and Sir Thomas Blount; who were all in great favour with Richard II, being the ſame perſons to whom the king had left their honours and eſtates taken from them by the parliament. Among theſe conſpirators, John Holland, duke of Exeter, was his brother-in-law, and Edward de Langley, duke of Albemarle, his firſt couſin; yet, in ſpite of theſe relations, and the favours they had all received from the king, they reſolved to aſſaſſinate him, and reſtore Richard to the throne. The affection ſhewn them by that unhappy prince, the deſire of revenging their late diſgrace, of which they conſidered the king, as the principal author, and, perhaps, the fear that the pardon granted them was not ſincere, concurred to inſpire them with this furious reſolution; and they had drawn into the plot Maudlin, one of Richard's domeſticks, who reſembled his maſter ſo perfectly, that many were deceived. The reſult of their debates was, that the duke of Exeter and John Montacute, earl of Salisbury, ſhould pretend to challenge one another, at a tournament to be held, at Oxford, and deſire the king to honour it with his preſence; and that an opportunity ſhould be taken to murder him, whilſt he ſhould be intent on the fight. That each of them might know, what part he was to act, in this tragedy, they carefully ſet down all the particulars, in writing; and then they tranſcribed ſix copies, under their hands and ſeals, of which each of the principal parties took one; and the duke of Exeter waited upon the king, at Windſor, and invited him, purſuant to their agreement. The king, not ſuſpecting a brother-in-law, to whom he had juſt given ſuch ſignal marks of his favour, promiſed to be, at Oxford, on the day appointed; upon which, the conſpirators, pleaſed with this firſt ſucceſs of their enterprize, went and prepared to put it in execution. 1400.

The conſpiracy is diſcovered.

Under the pretence of the pomp and magnificence uſual, on ſuch occaſions, the lords conſpirators came to Oxford, with a numerous train of domeſticks; and the duke of Albemarle was the only perſon wanting, at the rendezvous; who, firſt, made a viſit to his father, the duke of York, then at his ſeat, at Langley, not to diſcover the plot, but upon ſome other buſineſs. Whilſt they were at dinner, the duke of York, obſerving a paper in his ſon's boſom, asked him what it was; but the ſon, confounded at this unexpected queſtion, replied, tho' with a viſible concern, that the paper contained nothing of importance; yet, whether the old duke had received ſome dark hints of the conſpiracy, or his ſon's confuſion inſpired him with the curioſity, he ſnatched it out of his boſom. This paper was one of the ſix copies ſigned by the conſpirators; and, being extremely ſurpriſed at the diſcovery of all the particulars of the plot, he reproach'd his ſon the more juſtly, as, beſides the blackneſs of the crime, he had expoſed the life of his own father, who was bound for his allegiance; but, his reproaches being incapable of remedying the evil, he reſolved to prevent it, by imparting to the king what was come to his knowledge. With this view, ordering his horſes to be ſaddled, immediately, he went himſelf to Windſor; but the young duke, perceiving himſelf infallibly ruined, if the king was informed of the conſpiracy by any except himſelf, as he was better able, than the old duke, to take this journey, 1400. journey, rode, another way, and with ſuch expedition, that he reached Windſor, before his father. Upon his arrival, he threw himſelf at the king's feet, and diſcovered the whole plot; but Henry, believing, at firſt, that the duke of Albemarle had invented this accuſation, on purpoſe to ruin the lords whom he accuſed, told him, that, if his information ſhould prove true, he would pardon him, upon his repentance; whereas, if it was falſe and malicious, he ſhould find no favour. The duke of York, arriving, ſoon after, fully convinced him of the truth of what he had heard, by delivering him the paper taken from his ſon; upon which, the king broke off his journey to Oxford, where he was expected, the following day; reſolving to ſtay at Windſor, to ſee what courſe the conſpirators would take, when they found themſelves diſappointed.

The conſpirators are in perplexity.

In the interim, the lords were extremely uneaſy, at Oxford, on account of the duke of Albemarle's abſence; for they had already ſent to his houſe, to know the reaſon of his delay, and were informed, that he ſet out for Oxford, but by the way of Langley, to viſit the duke, his father. This viſit gave them ſome ſuſpicion; but their trouble increaſed, upon hearing that the king did not intend to come to Oxford, and had ſeen the dukes of York and Albemarle. As they no longer doubted, that they were diſcovered, they determined to accompliſh, by force, what they could not effect, by other means; and, accordingly, dreſſing up Maudlin, in royal robes, gave out, that he was Richard, who, having eſcaped out of priſon, came to implore the aſſiſtance of his loyal ſubjects.

The readineſs, with which the people liſted under the banner of the pretended king, evidently ſhewed, that all had not approved the depoſing of Richard, though the parliament acted, in the name of the whole nation; wherefore, there is nothing more liable to miſtake, than judging of the ſentiments of the people, by thoſe of their repreſentatives; for, as the repreſentatives debate upon matters laid before them, without any inſtructions from thoſe they repreſent, their reſolves can be conſidered, only as private opinions, tho' they are of force to bind the people. Accordingly, the people ſometimes appeal to arms from the deciſions of parliaments, when they are thought too prejudicial to the kingdom. Of this we have many inſtances, and particularly, in the reign of Henry IV. Though Richard was depoſed by the parliament, it appeared, on ſeveral occaſions, that the people ſubmitted to the ſentence, purely, by conſtraint; ſince they were always ready to run after any counterfeit Richard, that was preſented to them.

Walſing. In a very ſhort time, the lords conſpirators were at the head of ſuch a formidable army, that they imagined themſelves able to ſeize the king, at Windſor; for it is ſaid, that, in two or three days, their army conſiſted of 40,000 men. With theſe numerous troops, they marched to Windſor, which lies but 30 miles from Oxford, and arrived, at break of day, in great expectation of ſurpriſing the king; and, indeed, Henry, not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting, that they could be ſo ſoon in a condition to execute ſuch an enterprize, ſtaid, at Windſor, till that very night, having departed, only a few hours before their arrival; but, his retreat blaſting their deſign, they were in great perplexity. Some were for marching directly to London, before the king had leiſure to ſecure the city; whilſt others affirmed, that it was more adviſable to repair to Pontefract, to free Richard and place him at their head. This diverſity of opinion made them loſe, in debates, the time they ſhould have ſpent, in action; and, in the interim, the king, provided for his defence, having aſſembled an army of 20,000 men. As he did not doubt but the male-contents would take the road to London, he went and expected them, on Hounſlow-Heath, hoping that his army would daily increaſe; and he reſolved, tho' much inferior, to hazard a battle. This reſolution animated his troops, and induced them to believe, that the male-contents were not ſo formidable, as was reported; and many, obſerving the king march, unconcerned, towards his enemies, voluntarily joined him; which, doubtleſs, they would not have done, had he diſcovered, on this occaſion, the leaſt ſigns of fear or diffidence; for, at ſuch junctures, the majority of the people, regardleſs of right or juſtice, generally declare for the party, that is moſt likely to prove ſucceſsful.

The conſpirators avoid a battle.

In the mean while, the conſpirators, finding that the king was able to withſtand them, durſt not cope with him. Whether it proceeded from their little capacity, or from a fear of being deſerted by their army, in order to avoid a battle, inſtead of marching to London, to meet the king, they took the road to Reading, and encamped near Colebrook, where the young queen Iſabella reſided; and here they reſolved to put an end to Maudlin's acting the part he had, hitherto, played, judging it more proper to ſpread a report, that Richard was in Yorkſhire, at the head of 100,000 men. Their intent was not only to avoid the king, but, in all probability, to approach Wales, from whence they expected aſſiſtance, Richard being well beloved, in that country; but, however that be, the generals encamping, near Cirenceſter, whilſt the army lay without, took up their quarters in the town. The duke of Surrey and the earl of Salisbury lodged, at one inn, and the duke of Exeter and the earl of Glouceſter, at another; but, for want of experience, neglecting to ſet guards, at the gates, the mayor of the town, a man of ſenſe and courage, improved their negligence, to do the king a ſignal ſervice. He privately drew together, in the night, 400 townſmen; and, ordering the gates to be ſhut, and dividing his followers into two companies, he attacked, at once, the two inns, where the four generals were lodged; but though theſe lords had only their domeſticks with them, they defended themſelves, the beſt part of the night. During the conflict, one of their people, ſet fire to a neighbouring houſe, imagining that the townſ-

1400. men would run to extinguiſh the flames, and ſo give the lords an opportunity to eſcape; but the townſmen, ſtill more incenſed by this action, redoubled their efforts, and, at length, broke open the inn, defended by the duke of Surrey and the earl of Salisbury. Theſe two lords, being much wounded, were, by the mayor's order, immediately, beheaded; and the duke of Exeter and the earl of Glouceſter, perceiving that they were no longer in a condition to reſiſt, with ſo few attendants, found means to eſcape over the houſes, and get out of the town, by the help of ſome of the inhabitants. They deſigned to march the army into the town; but, coming to the camp, they found it deſerted. The report the ſoldiers had heard, and the fire they had ſeen, in the town, leading them to believe, that the king's army was there, they had all, on a ſudden, taken to flight, being ſeized with a panic conſternation, though, in reality, there was no danger; and the two lords, as it was out of their power to execute their deſign, parted, the better to make their eſcape; but they had the misfortune to be apprehended, and, ſhortly after, loſt their heads, on the ſcaffold. Maudlin was taken, as he was flying into Scotland, and condemned to be hanged; and the abbot of Weſtminſter likewiſe, withdrawing, was ſeized with ſo violent a fright, that he fell into a fit of the apoplexy, which occaſioned his death. The biſhop of Carliſle was alſo taken, and ſentenced to death; but, tho', out of regard to his character, the king pardoned him, he was not in a capacity to enjoy the benefit, when he received the news of it; for the terror of his puniſhment made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that he died, when mercy was influencing the king to ſpare his life.

The tragical death of Richard II. Walſing.

Fabian.

In all appearance, the ill ſucceſs of this enterprize haſtened Richard's end; for, tho' there is ſome diverſity, among the hiſtorians, about the manner of his death, they all agree, that it was unnatural. Some affirm, that he was ſtarved to death; but others, pretending to give a better account, relate it, with the following circumſtances. The troubles being appeaſed, by the death of the principal conſpirators, Sir Pyers Exton, came to Pontefract, with eight attendants; and, on the day of his arrival, Richard perceived, at dinner, that the victuals were not taſted, as uſual. He demanded the reaſon of the taſter; and, upon his telling him, that Pyers had brought an order from the king, he took up a carving-knife, and ſtruck him, on the face. Pyers coming in, with his eight attendants, at the noiſe, Richard found he was a loſt man; and, reſolving to ſell his life dearly, forced a pole-ax out of one of their hands, and defended himſelf ſo bravely, that he ſlew four of them; but, at length, ſtanding accidentally, near Pyers, who was got upon a chair, the villain diſcharged ſuch a blow on his head, as laid him dead at his feet.

Thus, died this unhappy prince, 33 years old, of which he had reigned 22; a melancholy reward, for the many ſignal ſervices his father had done England! He was carried to London, in a coffin, with his face uncovered, to be ſeen of all perſons; and his funeral was ſolemnized, at St. Paul's, the king himſelf being preſent. He was afterwards carried to Langley-abbey, and buried, without any ceremony; but Henry V. ordered his body to be removed to Weſtminſter-abbey, and laid among his anceſtors. Tho' it was reported all over the kingdom, that he was murdered, no inquiry was made; which confirmed the people, in their belief, that the king was not innocent; and, indeed, if Richard died of a natural death, it would have been neceſſary to undeceive the publick; but, if his life was taken away, by violence, it was difficult to do it, without the king's knowledge. 1400. Walſing.

Tho' Richard was deteſted, whilſt he ſat on the throne, his misfortunes excited the compaſſion of the very people, that were ſo ready to deſert him; for it is peculiar to misfortunes, eſpecially, to thoſe of princes, generally to turn hatred into pity; of which we ſhall ſee ſeveral inſtances, in the ſequel of the preſent reign.

The Engliſh authors pretend, that Charles VI. had made great preparations, to reſtore Richard to the throne; but there is not the leaſt notice taken of them, in the hiſtory of France. Indeed, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral of Henry's orders, relating to the preparations, in France, to invade England; but that might be an effect of Henry's policy, to ſhew, thereby, the neceſſity of Richard's death; for the truce of 28 years, between the two crowns, was confirmed, in May, this very year; and all the pretended motions of France ended only in a negotiation, to draw from England queen Iſabella, with whom Richard had not conſummated his marriage. It was neceſſary, for Henry, to preſerve the truce with France, by reaſon of a rupture between him and the king of Scotland, which would not ſuffer him to carry his forces out of the kingdom. Act. Pub. The truce with France is confirmed. Act. Pub.

Robert Stuart, king of Scotland, the third of that name, was deſirous to marry prince David, his eldeſt ſon, to a daughter of George Dunbar, earl of Marche, who joyfully received the propoſal, and even paid, before-hand, part of the portion; yet, ſoon after, by intrigues foreign to our purpoſe, prince David eſpouſed a daughter of Archibald earl of Douglaſs. Dunbar not only was extremely mortified at this affront, but alſo becauſe the king refuſed, or delayed, to pay the money he had received; and, to revenge himſelf, and make the king ſenſible, that he deſerved better treatment, he reſolved to throw himſelf into the arms of the king of England; and, with this view, he communicated his deſign to the earl of Northumberland, governor of the northern counties, who, preſently after, ſent him a ſafe-conduct from the king, his maſter. Upon this, he repaired to Henry, and had ſeveral interviews with him; and the king of Scotland, being ſenſible that the earl of Marche was contriving ſome plot againſt him, in England, diſpatched ambaſſadors to Henry, to demand The cauſe of the war with Scotland. Buchanan. Act. Pub.

1400. demand the fugitive, and, upon his refuſal, proclaimed war againſt him.

Henry marches into Scotland.

Henry, judging it imprudent to expect his enemy, in England, prepared to carry the war into Scotland; and, as ſoon as his enemy was in readineſs to march, he came to Newcaſtle, and ſent Robert a ſummons, to appear, in perſon, and do homage, for Scotland. In the ſummons, he revived the pretenſions of Edward I. to the ſovereignty of that kingdom, from the time of Locrinus, ſon to Brutus, firſt pretended king of the whole Iſland of Albion; and, upon Robert's refuſal to do any ſuch homage, Henry entered Scotland, and made ſome progreſs. Towards the end of September, he beſieged the caſtle of Edinburgh, defended by prince David and the earl of Dowglaſs, his brother-in-law; but, the ſeaſon being too far advanced, to continue the ſiege, he ſuddenly raiſed it, and retired into his own dominions. He was no ſooner gone than the Scots, under Sir Patrick Hepburne and Sir Thomas Haliburton, made an inroad into England, and cruelly revenged the ravages committed by the Engliſh, in Scotland; but, in return, they were met by the earl of Northumberland, who defeated and deprived them of their booty; and Hepburne, one of the Scotch generals, was ſlain, in the action. This victory procured, between the two nations, a ſix weeks truce, which was afterwards prolonged, on account of the poſture of Henry's affairs; and he had ſcarce begun the war with Scotland, when he received certain advice, that the Welch intended to raiſe commotions, in their country, which could not but be attended with fatal conſequences. This was the reaſon, that, notwithſtanding his ſucceſs againſt the Scots, he would not improve his advantages, leſt he ſhould too much exaſperate them; and Buchanan himſelf gives him this teſtimony, aſcribing to his generoſity what was entirely owing to his policy; for the motions of the Welch had rendered a treaty with Scotland abſolutely neceſſary.

The Welch, who, ſince the reign of Edward I, were ſubject, or rather united to England, imagined they could improve the preſent juncture, to recover their former ſtate; and Owen Glendour, or Glendourdy, as he is always called, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, was the perſon that inſpired them with this deſign. This man, tho' a private gentleman, was in all reſpects, qualified for ſuch an undertaking, if forces ſo inconſiderable, as thoſe of the Welch, could have promiſed him a happy ſucceſs; yet he ſo managed this project, that, for ſeveral years, he freed his countrymen from the ſervitude, in which they thought themſelves kept by the Engliſh. A law-ſuit, he had loſt, at London, with the lord Grey of Ruthin, his neighbour, firſt raiſed the diſguſt, he conceived againſt the Engliſh nation; and, the foreſaid conſpiracy breaking out, in England, at this very juncture, Glendour apprehended it to be a proper ſeaſon, to deliver his country from the Engliſh yoke. Having privately ſounded the Welchmen, and found them very inclinable to receive his impreſſions, he would have, immediately, diſcovered his intentions, were it not for the ill ſucceſs of the Engliſh conſpiracy; but, the moment he ſaw the king engaged in the war with Scotland, he entered upon the execution of his project. The Welch, by his influence and management, unanimouſly renouncing their allegiance to the crown of England, owned him, for their ſovereign; and it appears from ſeveral acts, that he, thenceforward, always ſtiled himſelf prince of Wales. 1400. Act. Pub.

His firſt exploit was againſt the lord Grey, his adverſary, whom he took priſoner, in a battle, and then obliged him to marry his daughter, without giving him his liberty, contrary to his word.

Glendour takes the earl of Marche priſoner. Walſing.

Glendour, flush'd with this firſt ſucceſs, made an incurſion into Herefordſhire; but Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, being retired to his lordſhip of Wigmore, as the king was employed, in Scotland, thought to do him a ſignal ſervice, by aſſembling the gentry of the country, in order to ſtop the rebel's progreſs. However, he had the misfortune to be taken priſoner, in a battle; and, tho' he offered a large ranſom, he could not procure his liberty. Glendour imagined, that a priſoner of ſuch diſtinction might be of uſe, hereafter, or, at leaſt, that the king would, at any rate, purchaſe his deliverance; and that, therefore, it would be more for his advantage to treat with the king, than with the priſoner himſelf; but he was miſtaken, in his conjecture. Henry was too well pleaſed with the earl of Marche's impriſonment, as it rendered him unable to hurt him, to contribute towards his releaſe; yet Glendour ſtill detained his priſoner, in hopes that, by his means, he ſhould, one day, give the king ſome diſturbance, as it, accordingly, happened. The earl was not, afterwards, ſorry, for being in the power of the Welch; for Henry's jealouſy of every thing relating to his crown, and his ſeverity to thoſe that diſputed it with him, convinced the captive earl, that his life was ſafer in priſon, than at his own houſe; and, in the interim, the king being buſied in the Scotch war, Glendour had ſufficient leiſure to ravage the country, on the weſt of the Severn, and carry off a great booty.

The emperor of Conſtantinople arrives in England. Walſing.

About the end of this year, Manuel Palæologus, emperor of Conſtantinople, arrived in England, to deſire aid againſt Bajazet, emperor of the Turks; and the king received, and preſented him, in an honourable manner; but, as for aſſiſtance, he put him off, till the affairs of his own kingdom were more firmly ſettled. The emperor went from England into France; from whence he did not depart, till two years after, upon the news, that Bajazet, his enemy, was vanquiſhed and taken priſoner by Tamerlane.

1401. Statutes in church-affairs. Cotton.

On the 20th of January, 1401, Henry called a parliament, which paſſed ſeveral acts, relating to the church; the firſt of which ratified the ſtatutes made, in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II, againſt ſuch as ſollicited for papal proviſions, or carried, to the eccleſiaſtical courts, cauſes belonging to the cognizance

1401. cognizance of the judges of the realm. This was the old ſubject of contention with the court of Rome; and, whatever rigour was uſed, to redreſs theſe abuſes, it was impoſſible to effect it, becauſe it was the intereſt of too many to countenance the pretended prerogatives of the holy ſee. However, this parliament, conſidering that the pope ſtill engroſſed the collations of all the church-preferments of the kingdom, and that the eccleſiaſtical courts continually incroached upon the civil, reſolved, at laſt, to oppoſe it effectually; and, with this view, they revived the ſtatute of Proviſors, in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II, commonly known by the name of Præmunire; but, as this term frequently occurs, in the Engliſh Hiſtory, it will be expedient to explain it. By Præmunire, then, is meant, either the ſtatute itſelf, or the penalty; for former parliaments, from the ſame motive as this, had ordained puniſhments againſt the Proviſors, that is, againſt ſuch as ſued for bulls, ſtiled Proviſiones or GratiæExpectativæ, to the court of Rome, for benefices that were, or ſhould be, vacant; and the ſame puniſhments were ordained againſt thoſe, that carried to the eccleſiaſtical courts what belonged to the civil. When any perſon was guilty of this ſort of crime, a writ or order was iſſued out againſt him, beginning with theſe words, Præmunire facias, by which he was commanded to appear in the kings court; from whence both the ſtatute and the penalty were called Præmunire, This penalty conſiſted, in the forfeiture of lands, and goods, and impriſonment, during the king's pleaſure; and, in proceſs of time, ſeveral other offences, of a like nature with thoſe that firſt occaſioned the ſtatute, were made liable to the ſame penalty; ſo that all the ſtatutes of Præmunire are only enlargements of thoſe made, in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II; and, in general, the Præmunire principally concerns offences commited, in eccleſiaſtical matters, belonging to the civil juriſdiction.

The clergy, on all occaſions, ſo zealouſly favoured the pretenſions of the court of Rome, that the decrees of the former parliaments were incapable of putting a ſtop to the courſe of this abuſe; and the ſtatute, I have juſt mentioned, was not much more effectual. The attempt, laſt year, to dethrone the king, inducing him to fear the like conſpiracies, for the future, he reſolved to ſhew a great regard for the clergy, in order to attach them to his intereſt. Accordingly, tho' he did not judge it proper to refuſe his aſſent to the new ſtatute, he connived at the violation of it, as much, or more, than any of his predeceſſors; but his condeſcenſion for them, in another article, of no leſs importance, drew on him the bleſſings of the whole body, who conſidered him, as a prince extremely zealous for the church.

A ſtatute againſt hereticks. Walſing.

Since Wickliff firſt publiſhed his opinions, his doctrine was ſo ſpread, that the clergy were in continual apprehenſions of its prevailing; and I have, already, related, that, in the reign of Richard II, the biſhops obtained a general licenſe to impriſon hereticks, without being obliged to have a particular order, from the court; but that the houſe of commons cauſed it to be revoked. From that time, this affair continued in the ſame ſtate, except that the king more frequently granted ſuch orders; yet, as the penalty of impriſonment did not cheque the pretended evil, dreaded by the biſhops, Henry, ever ſollicitous to gain the affection of the eccleſiaſticks, ſtrenuouſly recommended to the parliament the care of the church's concerns. How reluctant ſoever the houſe of commons might be to perſecute the Lollards, the credit of the court and cabals of the clergy obtained, at length, an act for the burning of obſtinate hereticks; which ſtatute was no ſooner paſſed, than the eccleſiaſtical court, immediately, condemned William Sawtre, a Lollard, who, being delivered over to the ſecular arm, was burnt alive, by vertue of the king's writ directed to the mayor of London. This man was the firſt that ſuffered death, in England, for the ſake of religion; and, during this ſeſſion, ſeveral acts were paſſed, about the diſputes between the Engliſh and the court of Rome, which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of, in another place. 1401.

A Lollard is burnt. Act. Pub.

Since the confirmation of the truce with France, Charles VI, or rather the duke of Orleans, his brother, and the dukes of Berri and Burgundy, his uncles, who governed, in his name, often demanded the young queen Iſabella, widow to Richard II; but Henry deferred giving a poſitive anſwer, being, for two reaſons, deſirous of keeping that princeſs. Firſt, as he juſtly dreaded a war with France, he wanted to make a ſolid and laſting peace with Charles VI, to which, he believed, the marriage of Iſabella with the prince, his ſon, would greatly contribute; wherefore, he frequently propoſed that marriage; but neither Charles's brother nor uncles would ever conſent to it, abhorring the thought of marrying the young queen to a prince, whoſe father was generally accounted the murderer of her former husband; however, the reaſon, they alledged, for declining it, was, that, her father being unable to manage his affairs, they durſt not treat of his daughter's marriage, without his conſent. A ſecond reaſon, why Henry deferred Iſabella's reſtitution, was, becauſe he knew the money, Richard received with her, would be demanded; yet, as he had no plauſible pretence, to detain her, he conſented, at laſt, to reſtore her, with part of her jewels. He managed ſo artfully, that, in the conventions made, at Lenlingham, there was not the leaſt mention of reſtoring her treaſure; which was the ſubject of another negotiation, as the ſequel will inform us.

A negotiation about ſending back Richard's widow.

In the mean while, Henry had, in Germany, another negotiation on foot, concerning a marriage between Blanche, his eldeſt daughter, and Lewis of Bavaria, grandſon to Robert, earl palatine of the Rhine, who was lately advanced to the imperial throne, vacant by the death of Henry of Brunſwick, ſucceſſor to Wenceſlaus; and this affair was concluded, in May, to the king's extreme ſatisfaction.

The king's expedition againſt the Welch.

Since the revolt of the Welch, Henry had neglected preparations, to reduce them to obedience; whilſt Glendour, improving this negligence, ravaged the counties bordering upon Wales; and, far from dreading the king's juſt indignation, he ſtudied to provoke him, by continual inſults. Many people were aſtoniſhed at Henry's indolence, being entirely ignorant of the cauſe of it; for, before he took up arms againſt the Welch, he was deſirous of finiſhing his affairs with France, and even deſigned to enter into a ſtrict alliance with that crown. As he was ſenſible, that it was from this court alone, that the rebels could expect any aſſiſtance, in depriving them of it, he thought he ſhould put it out of their power to ſupport themſelves long; but, the negotiations with France proceeding more ſlowly than he wiſhed, and Glendour ſtill continuing to infeſt his borders, he could no longer delay taking up arms. Before he put himſelf at the head of his army, he publiſhed a general pardon for the Welch, provided they ſubmitted, within a limited time; but, his clemency proving ineffectual, he marched to chaſtiſe them. Upon his approach, Glendour retired to the mountains, where it was impoſſible to attack him; and all the king could do was to ravage the country, and then return to London.

An invention, to kill the king, is diſcovered. Walſing.

The king's return to his metropolis was, immediately, followed by the diſcovery of a plot againſt his life, by the means of an iron inſtrument, with three ſharp ſpikes, placed in his bed; and, had he chanced to lie down, he muſt inevitably have been run through the body; but he fortunately perceived it, juſt as he was going into bed; and, what inquiry ſoever was made, the author of this traiterous attempt could not be diſcovered.

The death of the duke of York. Walſing.

It was this year, and not the laſt, as ſome affirm, that Edmund, duke of York, the king's uncle, died; who left two ſons, Edmund, duke of Albemarle, who aſſumed the title of duke of York, and Richard, earl of Cambridge; but I ſhall often have occaſion, hereafter, to ſpeak of the poſterity of the younger, who, by his marriage with a ſiſter of the earl of Marche, acquired to his iſſue rights, which cauſed ſuch terrible commotions in the kingdom.

1402. A tax is raiſed for the marriage of the king's daughter. Act. Pub.

In the beginning of the next year, the king, without the intervention of the parliament, laid a tax, for the marriage of his daughter; and though, in this, he had acted, by vertue of an antient privilege of the kings, on the like occaſions, the people ſeemed diſſatisfied; for there were not wanting in the kingdom perſons, who greedily catched at every thing, to find fault with his conduct. About the middle of the year, he had reaſon to apprehend, that there was ſtill a dangerous ferment among his ſubjects; and, if the male-contents remained quiet, it was only in expectation of a more favourable opportunity. On a ſudden, an unexpected rumour was ſpread over England, that Richard was alive, and had levied an army, in Scotland, in order to expel the uſurper; and the people muſt, of courſe, have wiſhed the news true, ſince it, every-where, met with ſuch credit. At the ſame time, on church-doors, and in other publick places, papers were poſted up, containing outrageous invectives againſt the king; and aſſerting, among other things, that the crimes, for which Richard was depoſed, were nothing, in compariſon of the tyrannical proceedings of Henry, ſince his acceſſion to the throne. The king was ſo incenſed at this audaciouſneſs, that he ſwore never to pardon the offenders; and Sir Roger Clarendon, natural ſon to Edward, the renowned prince of Wales, fell the firſt ſacrifice to his vengeance, being condemned to the ignominious death of a traytor. Eight monks, guilty of the ſame crime, were likewiſe hanged with him; and Walter Baldock, Prior of Laund, underwent the ſame fate, with a Franciſcan doctor of divinity, who was hanged, in his friar's habit, to the great mortification of his fraternity. Many more were apprehended, upon diſcovering, among the papers of a certain prieſt, a liſt of the names of thoſe, that declared Richard was alive; but, upon a ſtrict examination, it appeared, that he made that liſt, on purpoſe to render the news the more probable, or on groundleſs conjectures; ſo that he ſuffered alone the puniſhment of his raſhneſs; but the king's great ſeverity, on this occaſion, exceedingly contributed to efface the good opinion conceived of his clemency.

The marriage of the king. Act. Pub.

During theſe tranſactions, in England, Henry negotiated, in foreign courts, three marriages, at once; the firſt of which was between Philippa, his ſecond daughter, and Eric, king of Denmark, who was yet a minor, under the guardianſhip of queen Margaret, his mother; the ſecond, between the prince of Wales and a ſiſter of Eric's; and the third was his own, with Joanna of Navarre, widow to the duke of Bretagne. The firſt and laſt of theſe three marriages were concluded, this year; but that of the prince of Wales did not ſucceed.

The court of France get in their power the perſon of the young duke of Bretagne.

Henry, in reſolving to eſpouſe the dutcheſs dowager of Bretagne, had, probably, an eye, by vertue of this marriage, to the guardianſhip of the three princes, which the late duke of Bretagne had left, under age; at leaſt, the court of France, taking it for granted, ſeemed very much alarmed at this alliance, which might be vaſtly prejudicial to them. For this reaſon, the duke of Burgundy, guardian of the young princes, removed them from the dutcheſs, their mother, and carried them to Paris, where they were educated; and, by this means, the court of France had the direction of the affairs of Bretagne, during the young duke's minority; ſo that, if Henry had an eye to Bretagne, he not only was diſappointed, but drew upon himſelf freſh enemies. During the whole time the new duke was in France, the Bretons almoſt inceſſantly infeſted the coaſts of England, tho' no war was proclaimed, between their ſovereign and Henry; and the king's marriage was not conſummated, till the following year.

1402.

An expedition of the king into Wales.

These negotiations being concluded, Henry prepared, in good earneſt, to chaſtiſe the Welch; and, having drawn together a numerous army, heading them, in perſon, he advanced towards Wales. Upon his approach, Glendour withdrew to the mountains of Snowdon, where he knew it was impoſſible to attack him; and, in the interim, the king made preparations to ravage the country; but the weather ſuddenly became ſo tempeſtuous, that he was obliged to retire; for the ſtorms were ſo extraordinary, for the ſeaſon, that the Engliſh imagined, that Glendour had made a contract with the devil, to prevent the deſtruction of his country.

Another invaſion of the Scots. Buchanan.

Whilſt the king was employed, in thoſe parts, the Scots, under Hepburne, ſon to him ſlain, two years before, made an irruption into England, and advanced, as far as Newcaſtle; and the earl of Northumberland, general of the north, was in no condition to repulſe that invaſion; but, aſſembling a great body of troops, whilſt they continued their ravages, he went and expected them, at Niſbet, where he attacked and defeated them, ſeizing all their booty; and the Scotch general loſt his life, in the action.

Theſe troops were properly but the vanguard of an army, with which the earl of Douglas was advancing, to make a more powerful effort; and, upon the news of Hepburne's defeat, he haſtened his march into England, to fight the earl of Northumberland; who, being too weak to venture a battle, was conſtrained to retire, and leave the borders expoſed to his ravages. In the mean while, he laboured, without ceaſing, to augment his army; and he was no ſooner able to withſtand him, than he marched, in queſt of him, attended by Henry Hotſpur, his ſon, who was reputed the braveſt man, in England. The two armies meeting at Halidown-hill, a bloody battle enſued, in which the Engliſh were entirely victorious; and the Scotch general, having loſt an eye, fell into the hands of the conquerors, with the earl of Fife, nephew to the king of Scotland, the earls of Angus, Athol, Montieth, and a great number of other officers of diſtinction. The Engliſh hiſtorians affirm, that this battle was fought, in July, about a month after the former; but Buchanan places it, among the occurrences of the year 1401; tho', in this, he is certainly miſtaken.

The French and Engliſh blame one another, for breaking the truce.

During the whole ſummer, the ambaſſadors of France and England continued, at Lenlingham, by reaſon of the violation of the truce, particularly, in Guienne. The French hiſtorians caſt the blame upon England, and the Engliſh upon France; but, in caſes of this nature, the writers of both nations generally contradict each other, with mutual reproaches of partiality. Their honour, it ſeems, is concerned, to maintain, on all occaſions, the faith and ſincerity of their reſpective ſovereigns; but, however that be, the circumſtances of the two kings had, for ſome time paſt, been ſuch, that it could be to the advantage of neither, to renew the war. Henry believed, that the Welch, and the male-contents in England, could procure no aſſiſtance, except from France, which he intended to prevent, by means of the truce, but was miſtaken; and king Charles's diſtemper, with the diviſions in his court and council, gave the French no hopes of any remarkable ſucceſs of their arms; ſo that the truce was again confirmed, without examining too ſtrictly, by which ſide it was firſt broken. 1402.

The French demand Iſabella's portion. Act. Pub.

This affair being over, the French ambaſſadors demanded the reſtitution of what king Richard had received with his queen; but, as Henry foreſaw this demand, he had given inſtructions to his ambaſſadors; who pretended to be ſurpriſed at this propoſal, and ſaid, that they had received no orders about it. However, they added, as of themſelves, that they did not doubt, but, for the preſervation of a good underſtanding between the two crowns, their maſter would conſent to deduct that ſum out of the million and a half of crowns, ſtill due to England, for the ranſom of king John; which pretenſion aſtoniſhed the French plenipotentiaries, who deferred their anſwer, till they knew their maſter's pleaſure.

The parliament meets. Cotton. Walſing.

The parliament, that met, in October, granted the king a ſubſidy, and then confirmed ſeveral ſtatutes made, in the reign of Edward III, in behalf of the clergy *; and the ſeſſion ended with a petition to the king, recommending to him the concerns of the Scotch earl of Marche, who had done the ſtate conſiderable ſervices, ſince his putting himſelf under the protection of England †.

1403. The queen's arrival. Walſing.

The new queen, arriving in England, in February, 1403, was received by the king, at Wincheſter, where the marriage was conſummated; after which, ſhe was ſolemnly crowned, at London.

The French make a deſcent in the iſle of Wight.

Whilſt the court was entirely taken up with entertainments and diverſions, the king received intelligence, that the French deſigned to make a deſcent, in the iſle of Wight, under the conduct of Valeran, earl of St. Pol, of the houſe of Luxemburg; and this earl, having married a half-ſiſter of Richard II, pretended to act, in his own name, to revenge the death of the king, his brother-in-law. The court of France connived at the undertaking, and even furniſhed the earl with troops; yet, notwithſtanding this bravado, the earl of St. Pol, after plundering ſome villages, was diſhonourably forced to re-imbarque, tho' the inhabitants of the iſle were not ſupplied with any aſſiſtance. Henry complained to the court of France of this invaſion; but he could obtain no other anſwer, than that it was the king of France's intention to keep the truce. Had he not been reſolved to avoid a rupture,

* Namely, That a clerk convicted of treaſon, or theft, ſhall not make his purgation; and that, in appropriations of benefices, there ſhall not be a proviſion made for the year, &c.

1403. the earl of St. Pol's attempt would have been a very ſufficient reaſon, to renew the war; but, being ſenſible, that the kingdom abounded with male-contents, he would not give occaſion to France openly to ſupport them; and, therefore, without taking any farther notice of the inſult, he was ſatisfied with a freſh confirmation of the truce.

The duke of Orleans challenges Henry. Act. Pub.

They, who governed for king Charles, were not ignorant of Henry's reſolution; and this very year, the duke of Orleans ſent him a challenge to fight, either in ſingle combat, or with 100 knights, on each ſide. The reaſon of this challenge is not related by the Engliſh hiſtorians; and the French alledge no other, than the duke of Orleans's deſire to revenge the death of Richard II. In all probability, it was only a ſally of the young duke, to ſignalize himſelf, by ſending a challenge to a king of England; but he was diſpleaſed with the anſwer. Henry repreſented, that there was a vaſt diſparity between a king and any ſubject whatſoever; and, therefore, he could not accept his challenge; but they might chance to meet in a place, where, being both attended with a more numerous train than what he propoſed, they might meaſure ſwords with each other; to which anſwer the duke of Orleans returned a very reproachful reply, wherein he called him traytor, uſurper, and even murderer of his king. Henry ſent him a no leſs abuſive anſwer, giving him the lye, in form, and charging him with ſorcery, to throw his father into his preſent diſtemper; and he likewiſe ſent to know of the French ambaſſadors, who were ſtill with his at Lenlingham, whether this challenge was approved by the king, their maſter; for, if ſo, he conſidered it, as an open rupture. However, tho' the ambaſſadors were often called upon to return a poſitive anſwer, it was impoſſible to oblige them to ſpeak plainly; for they ſaid no more, than, that their maſter had not broke the truce, nor intended to break it, for the future. In fine, the Engliſh preſſing them for a declaration, from thoſe that governed, in Charles's name, during his illneſs, they expreſly told them, whether the king recovered his health, or not, no other anſwer was to be expected; but Henry, conſidering this ſilence, as a diſavowing, or rather thinking it adviſable to diſſemble, for the reaſons above-mentioned, was contented with this ſlight ſatisfaction.

A debate about Iſabella's portion. Act. Pub.

During the congreſs, the French ambaſſadors moved, again, the reſtitution of Iſabella's portion; and the Engliſh plenipotentiaries demanded the reſidue of king John's ranſom, attempting to evade the demand of the French, by alledging, that, as their maſter had not received Iſabella's dowry, he was not obliged to repay it; but, by this, they only gave occaſion to their adverſaries, to ſay, in their turn, that neither was their maſter under any engagement to Henry, with reſpect to king John's ranſom; however, as Henry demanded the arrears of the ranſom, purely, to be excuſed paying the dowry, he gained his ends, and the affair reſted there.

Whilſt the ambaſſadors of the two crowns were employed, in theſe mutual cavils, nothing leſs than his crown was at ſtake, in England. From the beginning of his reign, to the victory over the Scots, at Halidown-hill, no lord was in more favour with the king, than the earl of Northumberland; for, as it was properly, by the ſpeedy junction of that earl with Henry, at his landing in England, that his affairs proved ſo ſucceſsful, the king had, all along, retained a very grateful ſenſe of his ſervice. The government of the northern counties, the office of high-conſtable, the grant of the iſle of Man, and ſeveral other favours were demonſtrative proofs of his eſteem for the earl, who, on his part, had always ſeemed to be very zealouſly attached to Henry's intereſt. The laſt year, he had gained over the Scots two victories, the latter of which had diſabled them from giving his maſter any freſh diſturbance. This was a ſignal ſervice; but, beſides the foreſaid favours, the king had rewarded him with the grants of certain lands. One would have imagined, that nothing could break the correſpondency between the earl's ſervices and the king's favours; and yet an affair of intereſt created ſuch a quarrel, that theſe happy diſpoſitions were ſuddenly altered.

1403. A quarrel between the king and earl of Northumberland. Walſing.

I obſerved, that the earl of Northumberland had, in the battle of Halidown, taken ſeveral priſoners of great quality; but Henry, believing that theſe priſoners belonged to him, would not leave them, at the earl's diſpoſal; and, perhaps, his view was to raiſe a large ranſom, or, by their means, to procure an advantageous treaty with Scotland. However that be, immediately after the battle, he ſent an expreſs order to the earl, to releaſe none of his priſoners; and, ſoon after, he enjoined him to deliver them into his hands. The earl, expecting the benefit of their ranſom, forthwith, repaired to court, and intreated the king to leave the priſoners, at his diſpoſal; but, having the mortification to be refuſed, he exclaimed againſt the injuſtice that was done him; and the reproaches he dropp'd, on this occaſion, ſo diſpleaſed Henry, that he no longer looked upon him, with the ſame eye, as before. This coolneſs was carried ſo far, that, when the earl would have ſpoke with the king, he was denied admittance; but, as he was naturally very haughty, he could not bear this contempt, without ſeeking an opportunity to be revenged. It may be juſtly affirmed, that he placed the king on the throne; and he thought, that he was in a condition to pull him down. This was the reſult of ſeveral conferences with Henry Hotſpur, his ſon, the earl of Worceſter, his brother, and ſome other lords; and their deſign was to place the crown on the head of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, ſtill a priſoner in Wales, not out of affection to that prince, but becauſe there was not otherwiſe a plauſible pretence, to gain the people to their intereſt. Purſuant to this reſolution, they diſpatched ſecret agents to Glendour and Mortimer, to perſuade them to come into their plot; and Glendour engaged to em-

1403. ploy all his forces, in the execution of it. As for the earl of Marche, he very readily lent his name, to promote a project tending to fix him on the throne; but, that all three might find their advantage in it, it was agreed, that the earl of Marche ſhould take poſſeſſion of the kingdom, the earl of Northumberland hold all the country, north of the Trent, on condition of homage to the crown, and Glendour enjoy all the counties, weſt of the Severn. Upon this agreement, the earl of Northumberland feigned, for ſome time, to forget the affront offered him by Henry; and he even came to court, where he took occaſion to repreſent to the king, that, as the earl of Marche loſt his liberty, in his ſervice, it was but reaſonable, that he ſhould pay his ranſom to Glendour. Henry was too well pleaſed with the earl's being in the hands of the Welch, and unable, as he imagined, to hurt him, to contribute to his deliverance; and, therefore, he replied, with ſome ſigns of anger, that the earl, having marched againſt the rebels, of his own accord, and with the ſole view of ſaving his lands from plunder, it was his buſineſs to procure his freedom, as well he could; and that, for his part, he did not think himſelf obliged to obtain his liberty, much leſs to pay his ranſom. The earl was not ſurpriſed at this expected refuſal; for his intent was only, from this remarkable inſtance of the king's cruelty to the earl of Marche, to inſinuate, that he muſt needs be convinced of the juſtice of the priſoner's title to the crown, ſince he dreaded to ſee him at liberty. This denial making no alteration, in the project of the confederates, the earl of Northumberland retired into the north, where he privately ſecured ſome troops, who were to be in arms; upon the firſt notice; and then he ſettled a correſpondence with ſome Scotch lords, who promiſed to aſſiſt him. He alſo relieved ſeveral Scotch priſoners, that were yet in his power, upon their engaging to levy troops, for his ſervice; and, in the interim, Glendour made extraordinary preparations, which, coming to the king's ears, obliged him to be upon his guard, though he was ignorant, for what they were intended.

The male-contents take up arms.

As ſoon as the confederates were ready, the three Piercies ſuddenly appeared in arms, in the north; and, quickly after, the earl of Northumberland falling ill, his brother and ſon marched, with his troops, to join the Welch, who were advanced, as far as Shropſhire. The two armies being joined, the male-contents publiſh'd a manifeſto, ſetting forth, that the king treated his ſubjects with intolerable tyranny; that none but the clergy had acceſs to him, and the greateſt lords could not be admitted into his preſence, unleſs introduced by ſome biſhop; that he, moreover, converted to his own uſe the ſubſidies granted by the parliament, for the publick occaſions; and they likewiſe ſpread a report, that Richard II. was alive, and at Cheſter, with a body of troops, ready to aſſiſt them.

Henry was extremely ſurpriſed at the news of this rebellion; but, having, by good fortune, an army in readineſs, againſt the Welch, he did not diſcover any concern; yet, being apprehenſive, that the rebels manifeſto might poiſon the people, he judged it adviſable, in the firſt place, to efface theſe impreſſions, by an anſwer publiſhed, by way of proclamation. He cleared himſelf from the principal articles of the manifeſto, firſt, by denying that he had ever refuſed to admit into his preſence the very meaneſt of his ſubjects, much leſs any of the nobility; and he called his whole court to witneſs. As for the ſubſidies granted by parliament, he affirmed, that moſt part of the money was paid, on account of the Scotch war, to the earl of Northumberland himſelf, as he could prove, by his own receipts.

The king vindicates himſelf, in a proclamation. Walſing.

Having publiſhed his anſwer, he marched towards the rebels, who were encamped, at Shrewsbury; but, when the two armies were in ſight, and ready to engage, he ſeemed to dread the iſſue. His uneaſineſs induced him to offer ſuch advantageous terms to the male-contents, that Henry Piercy, moved by them, deſired the earl of Worceſter, his uncle, to wait on the king, and endeavour to procure an agreement; and it is ſaid, that, in the conference with this earl, the king made ſuch conceſſions, in favour of the rebels, that they would have had reaſon to be contented, had not the earl of Worceſter falſly intimated, that there was nothing to be expected. However this be, the negotiation proving ineffectual, the battle began; and the king, at firſt, was in danger of being entirely defeated. He had even his horſe killed under him, and the prince of Wales, his ſon, was wounded, in the face; but, he ſo ſeaſonably called in his body of reſerve, that, by their aſſiſtance, he recovered his ground, and inſpired his troops with freſh courage. From that moment, the whole face of the battle was changed, to the diſadvantage of the male-contents; and, the king's laſt charge putting their army in diſorder, they were ſo vigorouſly preſſed, that Henry obtained, in the end, a complete victory. Young Piercy was ſlain, and buried, after the battle, with the king's leave; but, afterwards, altering his mind, the king ordered his body to be taken up, quartered, and fixed on poles in the high-ways; and the earl of Worceſter, being taken priſoner, was beheaded, and his head ſet up over London-bridge.

The battle of Shrewſbury. Walſing.

In the mean while, the earl of Northumberland, being recovered, advanced with a body of troops, to reinforce the army of the male-contents, and take upon him the command; but, hearing, by the way, of his ſon's and brother's misfortune, he diſmiſſed his troops, not daring to keep the field, with ſo few forces, before a victorious army. The king marched towards the north, which he well knew to be the center of the rebellion, by reaſon of the earl of Northumberland's great intereſt, in thoſe parts; and, when he came to York, he took all imaginable care to ſecure the fidelity of the northern counties, as well by the oath of the inhabitants, as by other

When he thought he had taken proper measures, to prevent an insurrection, he summoned the earl of Northumberland, to appear before him; promising him an absolute pardon, provided he obeyed, without delay; but he threatened him, with utter ruin, if he refused the offered favour. The earl, having no way to free himself from his present condition, chose rather to cast himself upon the king's mercy, than live in perpetual exile; wherefore, immediately repairing to York, he threw himself at the king's feet, who punctually observed his word with him. He even left him all his estate, except the isle of Man, which he had given him, in the beginning of his reign; and this was a very slight punishment for such a heinous crime; but, probably, Henry, still retaining a sense of the services done him by the earl, thought he owed him this acknowledgment; moreover, the criminal was already sufficiently punished, in the death of his son and brother.

He pardons the earl of Northumberland. Walsing.

Whilst the king was employed, in the north, the court of France, hearing of the earl of Northumberland's rebellion, resolved to improve it to their own advantage; and it is evident, from the Collection of Publick Acts, that Henry received intelligence, that the duke of Orleans intended to make a descent, in England; whilst John, duke of Burgundy, was to besiege Calais. It is remarkable, that, tho' the truce was, almost every year, confirmed by the two crowns, France was ever ready to take the advantage of the troubles, during this reign; for they, who were at the helm, during king Charles's illness, and particularly the duke of Orleans, his brother, never thought themselves bound by any treaties made with Henry; which might be very manifestly proved. However, as Henry always overcame the troubles raised, in his kingdom, the court of France were often disappointed in their expectations; and, in all probability, Henry's late victory over the rebels frustrated the projects then formed against him. Nevertheless, not to leave him in perfect tranquillity, as they directed the affairs of Bretagne, during the duke's minority, they engaged the Bretons to make a descent, in the western coasts of England, where they committed great ravages; and this invasion, for which the Bretons could not alledge the least reason, gave the king the greatest uneasiness; yet, being willing to avoid an entire rupture with Bretagne, in hopes of gaining, one day, the young duke to his interests, he judged it most advisable to conceal his resentment. He was, therefore, satisfied with some slight excuses made by the regency of Bretagne, in disclaiming the persons concerned in the descent, as acting, without the government's orders; but, at the same time, he privately gave leave to the inhabitants of Plymouth, and other places, in those parts, to equip a fleet, under the command of William Wilford; who, tho' without the king's commission, set sail for Bretagne, and revenged the damages sustained by the English *.

The parliament summoned, last year, and afterwards prorogued, met again, in January, 1404; and the king obtained a subsidy, which must have been very extraordinary, since it is was not to be recorded †; but, in vain, are precautions taken to bury in oblivion such precedents, which princes, upon occasion, too frequently call to remembrance.

1404. A subsidy is granted to the king. Walsing.

The severities, exercised on the authors and accomplices of the two late rebellions, induced the parliament to petition the king, for a general pardon; and Henry very readily granted their request, but with such exceptions, as rendered the pardon of little effect, since he forgave only those whom he did not design to punish.

An act of indemnity. Act. Pub.

Henry's severe treatment of those, who were infatuated with the false notion of Richard's being still alive, was incapable of undeceiving the whole nation. A rumour being once more, spread, that Richard was in Scotland, one Serle, who had been gentleman of his bed-chamber, went to see his old master; and he met with people, who shewed him a man that somewhat resembled Richard, but not enough for a domestick, who had long served him, to be deceived; yet Serle, pretending that he was, in reality, Richard, wrote to several in England, that he was actually with him. The testimony of a man, who could not, in all appearance, be mistaken, produced such an effect, that many were seduced with this imposture; and the countess of Oxford, mother to the late duke of Ireland, Richard's favourite, believed, or feigned to believe, it, and took care to spread the report. She even sent to several persons, in Richard's name, little silver harts, such as that prince used to give his favourites. In the interim, the king's diligence prevented the ill consequences of this imposture; and he ordered the countess to be taken into custody, with her secretary, who was in the secret. Some time after, Serle was seized, on the borders of the north, and hang'd, at Berwick; and, as he confessed the cheat, and that he was concerned in the duke of Gloucester's murder, the report died away, by degrees.

This year, the Bretons made a descent, near Portland, and plundered some houses, on the coast; but, advancing farther into the country, they were attacked by a body of militia, who forced them back to their ships, and took several prisoners of distinction. Hitherto there was no declaration of war between England and Bretagne; yet the two nations continued to infest one another, tho' without the consent of their sovereigns. France, managing the Bretons, was extremely glad to sow discord

A truce with Scotland. Act. Pub.

It was, probably, with the ſame view, that he concluded with Scotland a truce, from the 20th of July, this year, to the Eaſter following.

However, he could not imagine, that all his precautions would, for ever, prevent the dreaded war; for, if France ſo induſtriouſly ſought an occaſion of rupture, Glendour, in Wales, not only perſiſted in his rebellion, but had even ſeized ſome places, on the weſt of the Severn; moreover, the truce with Scotland being to expire, in the ſpring, there would be a neceſſity of ſending an army into the north; which conſiderations determined him to call a parliament, in order to obtain an aid to enable him to carry on theſe wars.

The illiterate parliament. Walſing.

The parliament met, October the 6th; and it is ſaid, that the king, in the writs of ſummons, commanded the ſheriffs and mayors to return none but ſuch as were unlearned; from whence, this aſſembly was termed the Illiterate or Lack-learning parliament. However, it is a queſtion, whether the king's command was ſo expreſs, as is affirmed *; for the breach Richard II. had made, in the nation's liberties, by the like method, and the puniſhment, which followed, were yet too freſh, for Henry to expoſe himſelf to the ſame danger, in the preſent juncture. It muſt be confeſſed, that the court, on this occaſion, laboured to cauſe ſuch repreſentatives to be elected, as were not too much prepoſſeſſed, in favour of the clergy; but, however that be, the king repreſenting to the parliament, thus, compoſed, his preſſing want of an extraordinary aid, the commons addreſſed him, in a body, remonſtrating, "That, "without oppreſſing his ſubjects, he might "ſupply his neceſſities, by ſeizing the revenues of the clergy." They repreſented, "That the clergy poſſeſſed a third part of the "lands of the kingdom; and, as they did not "do the king, any perſonal ſervice, it was "but juſt that they ſhould contribute, out of "their revenues, towards the great exigences "of the ſtate; that it was manifeſt, the riches "of the eccleſiaſticks made them negligent, in "their duty; and the leſſening of their exceſſive incomes would be a double advantage to the ſtate and church."

The king's reception of this addreſs plainly ſhewed, it was not diſagreeable to him, and in all likelihood, it was he that, by his emiſſaries, had chalked out this way of raiſing the money he wanted. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, being preſent, judged it his duty to ſpeak, when the intereſt of the whole clergy was concerned; and he repreſented to the king, "That, though the eccleſiaſticks did "not ſerve him, in perſon, it was no juſt in-"ference, that they were unſerviceable, ſince "they ſent into the field their vaſſals and te-"nants, whenever there was occaſion; that "the depriving the clergy of their eſtates "would put a ſtop to their prayers, night and "day, for the proſperity of the ſtate; and "that God's protection of the kingdom could "not be expected, if the prayers of the "church were ſo little regarded." He added, with a menacing tone, "That, if theſe "conſiderations were inſufficient to ſuppreſs, "the plots againſt the clergy, it would be "found difficult to take away their eſtates, "without expoſing the kingdom to great danger; and that, whilſt he was archbiſhop of "Canterbury, he would oppoſe this injuſtice, "to the utmoſt of his power." Then, ſuddenly falling on his knees, he urgently preſſed the king, in point of conſcience, endeavouring to convince him, that, of all the crimes a prince could commit, none was ſo heinous as the invaſion of the clergy's revenues. Whether Henry was moved with the archbiſhop's ſpeech, or the ſtrong oppoſition he foreſaw, from the clergy, made him ſenſible, that it would be extremely difficult to accompliſh his deſign, he on a ſudden reſolved to deſiſt. He anſwered the archbiſhop, that, though he did not blame his zeal, he could not help ſaying, that his fears were groundleſs; for, when he aſcended the throne, he made a firm reſolution to favour the church, with all his power, and hoped, by God's grace, to leave her in a better condition than he found her. The archbiſhop, encouraged by this anſwer, turned to the commons, and told them, that their demand was entirely built on irreligion and avarice †; to which offenſive ſpeech the commons made no reply; but, when they came back to their houſe, they brought in a bill, to ſeize the clergy's revenues. However, it was impoſſible for them to ſucceed, in their project; for the ſollicitations of the archbiſhop and the reſt of the clergy were ſo prevalent with the lords, that they threw out the bill; ſo that the commons were forced to find other means, to ſupply the king's occaſions.

1405. The earl of Marche had artfully concealed his diſguſt, when Henry aſcended the throne; but his league, afterwards, with Glendour and the earl of Northumberland, was ſufficient to open the king's eyes, tho' he had ſuffered him-

He was too jealous of his crown, to believe that the earl was unmindful of his lawful rights; and, therefore, he always refuſed to promote the recovery of his liberty. For the ſame reaſon, he kept his children in ſafe cuſtody, at Windſor, as pledges of their father's allegiance; but, in ſpite of all his care, means were found to conveigh away the priſoners, and conceal them, for ſome time. However, the king cauſed ſuch diligent ſearch to be made, that they were, at length, diſcovered, and brought back to their confinement, at Windſor; and he would have ſeverely puniſhed this attempt, if he could have found out the authors of it. There was only a poor lock-ſmith hanged, for being concerned in it; but he would not diſcover, by whom he was employed.

The duke of York is apprehended. Act. Pub.

The duke of York was taken up, on ſuſpicion, and ſent to the caſtle of Pevenſey, where he remained a priſoner, above three months; but, at laſt, he was releaſed, for want of ſufficient evidence againſt him.

Prince Henry goes againſt the Welch.

The late attempt made the king apprehenſive, that his enemies would contrive ſome new plot, in the behalf of the earl of Marche; and that, before it broke out, they would ſecure theſe young princes. As Glendour was continually diſpoſed to countenance the malecontents, Henry reſolved to exert himſelf, to deſtroy that rebel; and, with this view, he gave the command of an army to Henry, his eldeſt ſon; who, in the beginning of the campaign, put their army to flight; and, two months after, this victory was followed by another ſtill more important, wherein Glendour's ſon was made priſoner. However, notwithſtanding both theſe defeats, the Welch made freſh efforts, in defence of their liberty; for the ſituation of their country, the aſſurances of a powerful diverſion from France; and, probably, Glendour's knowledge of a conſpiracy forming, in England, inſpired them with hopes of better ſucceſs, for the future.

France daily ſeeks to diſturb Henry.

It was not without reaſon, that the Welch relied on the aſſiſtance of France; for that crown, or rather the duke of Orleans, who, then, governed the kingdom, overlooked the truce, whenever he thought he could break it, with advantage. Tho' it was confirmed, in 1403, Mezerai owns, that the conſtable D'Albert and the earl of Armagnac had taken, from England, above 60 places, in Guienne; and, this very year, the duke of Orleans openly laid ſiege to Bourg and Blaye, tho' to no purpoſe. The duke of Burgundy was preparing to beſiege Calais; and, to facilitate this undertaking, the earl of St. Pol attempted to ſeize the caſtle of Merck; but the garriſon of Calais, poſting to its relief, obliged him to retreat, in diſorder, tho' he was, already, maſter of the inner-court.

The king is denied money by the nobles and clergy. Walſing.

Theſe frequent breaches of the truce taught Henry, what he might expect from France, if his affairs ſhould miſcarry in England; and, therefore, he was deſirous to end the Welch war, before he ſhewed his reſentment to the French, chuſing rather to ſuffer them to act privately, than give occaſion for an open rupture. With this intent, he ſent againſt the Welch the prince, his ſon; but, before he entered upon this expedition, he aſſembled the lords, to deſire a ſupply of money, being aſhamed to ask the parliament, who had lately granted him a conſiderable ſubſidy; but the lords flatly refuſed to comply with the king's requeſt, without the authority of the parliament; and the clergy, whom the king alſo founded, replied, with the ſame reſolution, being unwilling to eſtabliſh ſuch a precedent, leſt it ſhould be drawn into a cuſtom. Henry, extremely mortified with theſe denials, diſmiſſed both the nobility and clergy, with marks of his indignation; by which he afforded certain lords a pretence to haſten the execution of a deſign, which, probably, had been formed, ſome time before. 1405.

A conſpiracy formed by the archbiſhop of York. Walſing.

Richard Scrope, archbiſhop of York, being diſſatisfied, and wanting to revenge Richard, by whom he was promoted to that dignity, engaged ſeveral lords in a confederacy, to dethrone Henry; and the earl of Northumberland, having entered into the plot, tho' the king had forgiven him the like fault, by his intereſt in the north, drew the people of thoſe parts into the ſame confederacy. Thomas Mowbray, earl-marſhal, the lords Bardolf, Haſtings, Falconbridge, and ſeveral other nobles and gentlemen levied a great number of troops, which they led to York, the place of rendezvous; and, when theſe forces, which made a numerous army, were joined, in a body, the leaders publiſhed a manifeſto, againſt the king, and cauſed it to be fixed on the doors of the churches, in York, for publick view. The ſubſtance of the articles, contained in the manifeſto, was, as follows:

The rebels manifeſto. Walſing. Com. Hiſt.

I. That Henry, at his return into England, had proteſted and ſworn, that he only came to recover his private inheritance, without any deſign upon the crown, and yet had procured himſelf to be proclaimed king.

II. That, as an arch-traytor, he had impriſoned his ſovereign, compelled him to reſign his crown, and then barbarouſly murdered him.

III. That, ever ſince the death of Richard, he had unjuſtly detained the crown from Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, to whom it lawfully belonged.

IV. That he had unjuſtly put to death ſeveral perſons of quality, who were guilty of no other crime, than endeavouring to redreſs the abuſes of the government; and that, contrary to law, he impriſoned the biſhops, by his ſole authority.

V. That he had oppreſſed the people with unneceſſary taxes, and, by his menaces, hindered them from complaining.

VI. That he had violated the privileges of the nation, and his oath to maintain them, by preventing the free election of parliaments.

VII. That, in a parliament held, at Wincheſter, he had given his aſſent to a very pernicious ſtatute againſt the church of Rome, and the authority conferred upon St. Peter and his ſucceſſors; by which he had been the cauſe of ſimony, perjury, and other diſorders, among 1405. mong the clergy and gentry, who ſold the vacant benefices to perſons unqualified to ſerve the cure.

VIII. That, in ſpite of the frequent inſtances of ſeveral lords of his council, he had refuſed to ranſom the earl of Marche, and evaded his juſt petition, by falſly accuſing that prince of voluntarily making himſelf a priſoner to the Welch.

IX. That, on all theſe accounts, they had taken up arms, with an intent to free the nation from the oppreſſions of this tyrant, and place the lawful heir on the throne.

The earl of Weſtmoreland ſeizes the heads of the conſpiracy, by fraud. Walſing.

Some time before the king received advice of this rebellion, he ordered a body of troops to march into the north, under Ralph Nevil, earl of Weſtmoreland, to oppoſe the Scots, who ſeemed inclined to renew the war. The earl was, near York, when he heard of the inſurrection; and, the ſuperiority of the rebels troops not permitting him to advance any farther, leſt he ſhould be engaged in an unequal fight, he politickly diſpatched a truſty meſſenger to the archbiſhop of York and the earl-marſhal, to aſſure them, from him, that, conſidering their great prudence and zeal for the publick good, he did not doubt but weighty reaſons had induced them to take up arms, and deſired them to acquaint him with the ſame; upon which, the confederates ſent him word, that they had no other deſign, than to procure the welfare of the kingdom, and intreated him to come and join them, in defence of the publick. This anſwer led him to apprehend, that it would not be impoſſible to over-reach perſons, who thought him capable of ſo readily eſpouſing their cauſe; and, to confirm them in this belief, he told them, by the ſame meſſenger, that he was not ſo blind but he could ſee the injuries done to the nation; tho' he was afraid, that they had been too raſh, in their proceedings: That, before all things, care ſhould have been taken, to ſecure the concurrence of all the principal lords, or, at leaſt, the majority; and that, as for himſelf, he could not communicate all his ſentiments, by a third perſon; but, if they would conſent to an interview, he would more freely open his mind. The archbiſhop of York, being fully convinced, that the earl ſecretly entertained the ſame thoughts with the confederates, preſſed the earl-marſhal to accompany him to the interview; and, notwithſtanding his reluctance, he prevailed with him, at laſt; and the place, aſſigned for the conference, being in an open plain, and the guards advancing, at an equal diſtance on both ſides, the three lords began to confer together. The earl of Weſtmoreland proteſted, that he was as cordially concerned for the proſperity of the ſtate, as themſelves, and approved of all the articles of the manifeſto, except a few particulars which he wiſhed they would alter; and then he propoſed certain means, to execute their deſign, which appeared very judicious, and they no longer doubted of his ſincerity. Having, thus, gained their confidence, he ordered ſome wine to be brought; and they all three drank together. In the interim, he affected to ſhake them, by the hand, and give them proofs of a hearty correſpondence; and, in a word, he commanded his guards to withdraw, who, immediately, obeyed. This frankneſs obliged the archbiſhop and earl-marſhal to ſend away theirs alſo, being unwilling to appear more ſuſpicious than he; but their guards were ſcarce out of ſight, when the others returned, upon the gallop; and, before the archbiſhop and Mowbray could be relieved, they were both taken and conducted to the royal army. The confederates were thrown into ſuch a conſternation, by the ſeizure of their leaders, that it was impoſſible for the earl of Northumberland, who continued at York, to keep them together; ſo that, every one ſhifting for himſelf, the earl was conſtrained to retire to Berwick, of which he was governor. Some time after, the king arriving at Pontefract, the earl of Weſtmoreland brought his two priſoners to him, who were both condemned to be beheaded; and the archbiſhop ſuffered death, with great reſolution, being honoured, by the people, as a martyr, till Henry, by his authority, put a ſtop to their ſuperſtition. The king from Pontefract went to York, and ſeverely puniſhed the inhabitants; and then, advancing towards the north, to beſiege the caſtle of Berwick, he took, in his way, the lord Haſtings and Falconbridge, who likewiſe loſt their heads. Upon the king's approach, the earl of Northumberland and the lord Bardolf deſpaired of being able to defend themſelves, and dreading to fall into the hands of a juſtly incenſed prince, retired into Scotland, at the lord Flemming's, by whom they were received; and, in the mean while, Henry became maſter of Berwick, and ſeveral caſtles belonging to the earl of Northumberland, after which, he returned to London.

The French lands in Wales. Act. Pub.

Tho' moſt hiſtorians aſcribe the riſe of this conſpiracy to the king's threatening the clergy and nobility, upon their refuſal of the aid he demanded, in all appearance, it was formed before; for, whilſt Henry was in the north, the marſhal de Montmorency arrived in Wales, with a fleet of 140 ſail, and 12000 men; and, joining Glendour, as ſoon as he landed, they marched together, and took Carmarthen, Worceſtter, and ſeveral other neighbouring places, where they met with a great booty. Mezerai, who places this event, in the laſt year, affirms, that the earl of Marche, of the houſe of Bourbon, occaſioned the miſcarriage of the undertaking, by his too long delay; which ſhews, the court of France thought, that, at the very time when the archbiſhop's plot broke out, their army would land in Wales. Poſſibly, the preparations were begun, the preceding year, which might lead Mezerai into this miſtake; for it is much more probable, that he ſhould be miſtaken, in the date of this event, than the Engliſh hiſtorians, who refer to this year the taking of their towns, and the great booty made by their enemies, on that occaſion; moreover, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, an order from the king, dated at Pontefract, mentioning the deſcent of the French. Indeed, in this order, their leader 1405. leader is, ſtiled Hugevyle, and not Montmorency; but, as there were not two deſcents, the ſame year, and in the ſame country, it may be fairly preſumed, that Hugevyle made the deſcent, under the marſhal's direction.

The king marches againſt them. Walſing. Henry had no ſooner finiſhed his affairs, in the north, than he marched towards Wales, to defend the borders againſt the French; but he was ſo retarded, by the weather, that they had leiſure to re-imbarque; and the king could do nothing againſt the Welch, though deprived of the aſſiſtance of their friends, as well becauſe the ſeaſon was too far advanced, as becauſe, in his march, he had loſt a great part of his baggage.

The French court's breach of faith. After ſo direct a violation of the truce, the French, one would have imagined, intended openly to renew the war; but, as the conſpiracy, in England, did not anſwer their expectation, they did not think it expedient to carry the rupture any farther; and, in the interim, at the very time they had ſent a powerful aid to the Welch rebels, and their forces had taken towns, and ravaged counties, in England, they aſſured Henry, that they always deſigned to keep the truce, as if bare words were more conducive than directly contrary facts, to prove the ſincerity of their intentions. This behaviour was entirely founded on the frivolous pretence of the duke of Orleans's private quarrel with Henry, for the murder of Richard II, wherein he believed, or pretended to believe, he might employ the forces of France, which were at his diſpoſal, without any violation of the truce, between the two crowns; and all Henry's complaints were fruitleſs, ſince he could only apply, for juſtice, to the duke of Orleans himſelf, the principal author of all theſe violations. The court of France had ſuch an inſight into the temper, character, and politicks of Henry, that they inſulted him, on all occaſions, during almoſt the whole courſe of his reign; but Henry V, his ſon, who was not ſo gentle, knew how to revenge the affronts his father had received *.

1406. Towards the end of this year, Philippa, the king's daughter, was ſent to the king of Denmark, her husband.

The parliament meets. Tranquillity being reſtored to England, after the retreat of the French, the king called a parliament, which met, March 1, 1406; and, as his view was to demand money, he readily gave his aſſent to an act, to ſecure the freedom of elections; which ſhews, that, in the elections for the late parliament, the king had endeavoured to abridge the liberty of voting. As ſoon as this act was paſſed, Henry demanded an aid of money; but they plainly told him, that there was no viſible occaſion for it. He was extremely offended at this denial; tho' he durſt not openly diſcover his reſentment. In the mean while, he kept the parliament aſſembled, till they ſhould, of their own accord, grant his demand; for, without any freſh application, he continued the ſeſſion, till the end of Auguſt. This was very inconvenient to the members, who had buſineſs, at home, and likewiſe very expenſive to the people, who bore their charges; ſo that, at length, the commons, impatient of returning to their habitations, voted him a ſubſidy, not without loud murmurs, at this compulſive proceeding. 1406.

An act excluding the women from the crown. During this ſeſſion, the parliament paſſed an act, limiting the ſucceſſion of the crown to the king's male iſſue, excluſive of the female; but, as it was repealed, this year, and, probably, raſed out of the parliament-rolls, we can only gueſs at the foundation of it; though it is not improbable, that the king demanded this extraordinary act, on the following pretence.

A reflection on that act. During the Saxon monarchy, or, at leaſt, ſince the union of the ſeven kingdoms, there is not a ſingle inſtance of the deſcendants of the daughters ſucceeding to the crown; but, from the Norman conqueſt to the time I am ſpeaking of, we find, in the Engliſh Hiſtory, two precedents, in favour of the women. The firſt is that of king Stephen, ſon to a daughter of William the Conqueror, to which may be added that of Matilda, daughter to Henry I, who diſputed the crown with the ſaid Stephen; and the ſecond is that of Henry II, ſon to Matilda, who was acknowledged, for king, without oppoſition. Theſe two precedents ſeemed to eſtabliſh the right of the females, beyond all diſpute; and yet they were not unqueſtionable. It might be objected, that Stephen aſcended the throne, purely, by the cabals of ſome of the nobility; and that Henry II. received his crown, only by vertue of a treaty extorted from his predeceſſors, by force of arms; moreover, it might be alledged, that, as there is no expreſs law, two examples, ſince the beginning of the monarchy, could not have the force of a law, principally by reaſon of the circumſtances with which they were attended.

When Henry IV. aſcended the throne, he pretended to be the next heir to Richard II, making no account of the earl of Marche's right, deſcended only from a daughter; and, indeed, ſuppoſing the invalidity of the right of the females, it could not be denied, that he was nearer than the earl of Marche, who was ſet up againſt him; but this pretended invalidity was a point that was not decided. In the interim, the people, for the moſt part, believed, that the daughters had a right to the ſucceſſion, ſince, without producing examples or precedents, it was ſufficient that they were not excluded by any law; and, upon this foundation, the late rebellion was raiſed, as appeared by the manifeſto of the rebels. It is, therefore, vrey probable, that, to remove this pretence from the male-contents, Henry would have determined the point by an act, which, in

* This year, on October 3, the king made a grant to Sir John Stanley of the iſle of Man; the poſſeſſion of which ſtill remains in that noble family, honoured in the 1ſt of Henry VII, with the title of earl of Derby. Rymer's Fœd.

1406. excluding the daughters and their iſſue, ſeemed to inſinuate, that the reigning king ſucceeded to the crown, purſuant to the cuſtom and laws of the realm; but this act, which, perhaps, was extorted, in the ſame manner as the ſubſidy, laſted only till the end of the year. The next parliament, which met, in December, made ſuch ſtrong remonſtrances to the king, that he conſented to the repeal; and, not ſatisfied with leaving the right of the daughters, in its former doubtful ſtate, they paſſed a new act, by which the females and their poſterity were eſtabliſhed, in their natural rights. The ſucceſſion was ſettled on the king's eldeſt ſon and his heirs, without exception, and then upon his brothers and their iſſue, not excluding the women; and this act was ſigned by the king, the houſe of lords, and the ſpeaker, in the name of all the commons, the 22d of December, 1406, as is evident from the Collection of the Publick Acts.

An act for the women.

The precaution taken by the king, to ſecure his right, by the firſt of theſe acts, was extremely prejudicial to his poſterity; for it gave occaſion for the ſecond, that ſtrengthened the title of the earl of Marche, and conſequently of the houſe of York, which became heir to that prince.

Whilſt the parliament, that paſſed the firſt of theſe acts, continued the ſeſſion, Henry carried on, in Scotland, a ſecret negotiation, to get into his hands the earl of Northumberland and the lord Bardolf, who had taken refuge there; for he was extremely uneaſy, on account of the former, whoſe valour, capacity, and revengeful temper were no leſs known to him, than his great intereſt, in the north. As he was apprehenſive, that, being ſo near thoſe parts, he would contrive ſome dangerous plot, Henry ſent an offer to certain Scotch lords, whoſe relations and friends were priſoners, in England, to releaſe them, without a ranſom, provided they would deliver up the earl of Northumberland and the lord Bardolf; which propoſal was joyfully received; but, as this deſign could not be concealed from the lord Fleming, who had entertained theſe two lords, at his houſe, he acquainted them with it, and they retired into Wales, under Glendour's protection. Some time after, the Scotch lords, mortified at their diſappointment, killed the lord Fleming, who was the occaſion of their friends ſtill remaining in captivity; but, his ſon revenging his death on ſome of the murderers, this quarrel, joined to ſeveral other cauſes of diſcord, that reigned among the great men, under the government of a very weak prince, raiſed many commotions, in Scotland.

A negotiation for delivering the earl of Northumberland to the king. Walſing.

Robert III, of the houſe of Stuart, then king of Scotland, was a prince more free from vices, than endowed with good qualities; and his eaſy temper, or incapacity, had given opportunity to Robert, his brother, duke of Albany, to ſeize, by degrees, the government of the kingdom, whilſt he left the king, his brother, little more than the external badges of royalty. Moreover, not being contented with a borrowed authority, he formed a deſign to ſeize the crown, or, at leaſt, to ſecure it to himſelf, after Robert's deceaſe. To this purpoſe, it was neceſſary to prevent the obſtacles, he would infallibly meet with, from the princes David and James, his nephews, the king's ſons; and he ſoon found an opportunity, to diſpatch the eldeſt; for, the young prince committing ſome outrage, for which he was complained of to the king, the duke of Albany procured an order from his brother, to keep David confined, till the heat of his paſſion was ſomewhat abated; upon which, cloſely confining the prince, he cauſed him to be ſtarved to death. How careful ſoever he might be to conceal this barbarous action, Robert was informed of it; but, being too weak, and his brother too potent, he durſt not attempt to be revenged. The only remedy, he could apply to his grief, was to put James, now his eldeſt ſon, out of the reach of the ſnares of his treacherous brother; wherefore, he reſolved to educate him, in the court of France, and, accordingly, put him on board a veſſel to go, by ſea. The young prince ſailing, near the coaſt of Norfolk, and finding himſelf ſea-ſick, went on ſhore, for refreſhment; but he no ſooner landed, than he was ſeized by ſome mariners, and brought to the king, who was ſo cruel as to confine him in the tower. In vain, did the Scotch prince deliver him a letter from the king, his father, recommending his ſon to him, if any accident ſhould oblige him to land, in his dominions; for Henry only anſwered, with a poor jeſt, that he had no occaſion to go to Paris, to learn French; he ſhould be taught it, at London. The king of Scotland died, three days after receiving this melancholy news; and the duke of Albany aſſumed the regency, during the impriſonment of the young prince, to whom the crown was devolved. 1406.

The affairs of Scotland.

The death of king Robert.

This year, the French came upon the coaſt of Wales, with 38 ſhips, in order to aſſiſt Glendour; but a violent ſtorm, deſtroying moſt of their fleet, defeated their deſign.

The French, in vain, try to aſſiſt the Welch. Walſing.

In all probability, the court of France had heard of a conſpiracy forming, in England, againſt the king, and, in order to countenance it, would have had an army ready, in Wales; but the diſperſion of the fleet blaſted their ill-concerted project. There were ſome indications of it, in the beginning of the year 1407, when certain perſons preſumed to poſt up, in ſeveral places in London, that Richard was living, and preparing to enter the kingdom, with a numerous army; but, what inquiries ſoever the king made, the authors could never be diſcovered; for only a poor wretch, employed in poſting up the papers, was hanged, without being able, or willing, to tell, who ſet him to work.

A plague at London. Walſing.

This year, a terrible plague raged, at London, which ſwept away above 30,000 inhabitants; upon which account, the king retired to the caſtle of Leeds, in Kent. Having ſpent there part of the ſummer, he reſolved to remove to another of his ſeats, in Norfolk; and, 1407. and, to go by ſea, he went on board a veſſel, which was followed by four more, with his baggage and attendants. Whilſt he ſailed, in ſight of land, without any precaution, and believing there was no danger, he was, on a ſudden, attacked by ſome French pyrates, who took four of his ſhips; and, that, where he was himſelf, very narrowly eſcaping, it was not doubted, that ſome treachery lurked under this accident, tho' it was impoſſible to be proved.

The death of Robert Knolles.

The famous Robert Knolles, who had abundantly diſplayed his valour, in the wars with France, in the reign of Edward III, died, this year, in a very advanced age; for, tho' of a mean extraction, he had raiſed himſelf, by his merit, to the higheſt poſts, and gained a reputation equal to that of the moſt renowned warriors. In the beginning of this reign, he was ſeneſchal of Guienne; but, being afterwards weary of a life of too much hurry and action, he retired to his eſtate, in Kent; where he ended his days, after acquiring a ſtill more ſolid glory, by many acts of piety, charity, and munificence, ſome of which ſubſiſt to this day.

The deſigns of the French upon Guienne and Calais. Act. Pub.

Henry was ſo ſenſible of the diſaffection of his ſubjects to his perſon and government, that, ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown, he had not dared to ſend any troops into Guienne, for fear of weakening himſelf, at home; whilſt the French, taking advantage of his negligence, became maſters, from time to time, of ſeveral places in that province, by bribing the governors; in which they followed the maxim introduced, during the war, between Edward III. and Philip de Valois, that "Buying and ſelling was no "violation of a truce." This year, the duke of Orleans attempted, notwithſtanding the truce, to take Bourg and Blaye, tho' to no purpoſe; and the duke of Burgundy had again formed the deſign of beſieging Calais, but, for want of due meaſures, durſt not purſue it. He complained, that the duke of Orleans had privately obſtructed it; which occaſion of complaint, with ſeveral others, creating in him a mortal averſion to that prince, he cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated, this year, in November; and he was ſo hardy as to avow his being author of the murder, and ſo powerful as to procure a pardon, tho' the deceaſed was the king's own brother.

A truce with Bretagne. Act. Pub.

Though war was not proclaimed, between England and Bretagne, the continual outrages, on both ſides, could not fail, at length, to produce an open rupture; for, tho' the duke of Bretagne was ſon to a father, who had an Engliſh heart, the young duke had imbibed, at the court of France, other inclinations and maxims. However, the death of the duke of Orleans and the troubles, in France, convincing the Bretons, that they might be abandoned, upon a rupture with England, they accepted of a truce offered by Henry; which was only to be for a year, the Bretons imagining, that they ſhould ſee, by that time, how matters went, in France, where diſorder began to reign.

Henry was not ignorant of the deſign of the Bretons; but he thought it his intereſt to diſſemble; for, ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown, he had conſtantly followed this rule, that it was better to connive at ſome things, in his neighbours, than be expoſed to the inſults of his ſubjects. The conſideration of the irregular means he had uſed, to aſcend the throne, kept him in continual dread of his domeſtick enemies; and it was not without reaſon, that he lived in perpetual apprehenſions. The earl of Northumberland, tho' humbled, was ſtill a formidable enemy; and, ſince he and the lord Bardolf retired into Wales, they had inceſſantly projected means with Glendour, to dethrone the king. The Welch, who were in open war with Henry, ſtrengthened their army, with great numbers of French and Flemiſh adventurers, drawn thither, by the proſpect of the booty promiſed them, in England; and the earl of Northumberland ſecretly ſecured the aſſiſtance of the people of the north, with whom he ſtill had great intereſt, in ſpite of his paſt diſgraces. When matters were brought to maturity, the earl and Bardolf returned to Scotland; from whence they entered England, by the northern counties, at the head of ſome Scotch troops, levied by the connivance of the duke of Albany; and they no ſooner appeared, in the north, than thoſe, that were gained, beforehand, ſpeedily joined them, and their army became, in a few days, very conſiderable.

As the king did not expect this inſurrection, the earl had leiſure to retake the caſtles he had loſt, in the firſt rebellion; and, upon this ſucceſs, he marched to Yorkſhire, hoping that, when once he was maſter of that county, nothing would hinder him from joining the Welch, who only waited for his orders, to put themſelves in motion. Upon his entering Yorkſhire, he publiſhed a manifeſto, which was much the ſame with thoſe publiſhed, in the former rebellions; whilſt, in the interim, as the king loſt a great deal of time, in preparations, Sir Thomas Rokeby, ſheriff of York, judged it his duty to levy ſome troops, in a readineſs againſt the king's coming, and, at the ſame time, to obſtruct the progreſs of the rebels. The earl of Northumberland, apprehending it to be of the laſt importance to diſperſe the ſheriff's forces, before they increaſed, advanced towards him, expecting that his approach would put him to flight; but Rokeby, though much inferior to the earl, ſtood his ground, and fought, with ſuch bravery and good fortune, that the rebels were entirely routed. The earl of Northumberland was ſlain, on the ſpot, and the lord Bardolf taken priſoner, but ſo mortally wounded, that he died, in a few days; and their heads, being ſent to the king, were ordered to be ſet on a pole on London-bridge. Thus, died the earl of Northumberland, who, from being the king's beſt friend, became his greateſt enemy; for he contributed moſt to place Henry on the throne, by his readineſs to join him, at Ravenſpur, an example followed by all the reſt of the kingdom; but afterwards he made ſeveral

1408. several attempts to dethrone him; so that it might be a question, whether he had done more for, than against, him, if, in an affair of this nature, a single rebellion did not preponderate numberless services.

Henry being on his march, when he received the news of the defeat and death of the earl of Northumberland, proceeded to York; and he made some stay in that city, to try the rebels, of whom some were executed; but others redeemed their lives, with large sums of money.

Before the king departed from London, he had ordered a fleet to be equipped against the French rovers, who, for some time, had infested the coast of England, and done great damage to the merchants; and Edmund Holland, earl of Kent, commander of the fleet, was long in quest of these rovers, to no purpose. At length, hearing that they were retired, on the coast of Bretagne, to the little isle of Brehac, which was expressly excepted, in the truce with the Bretons, he went and attacked them, in a town of the same name, where they had shut themselves up; and, in the first assault, he received a wound of which he died, in five days; tho' this did not prevent his troops from continuing the siege, and taking the town, where they put all to the sword.

A truce for Poictou and Guienne. Act. Pub.

As the French, notwithstanding the frequent ratifications of the truce, made continual attempts upon England, Henry was forced, at last, to conclude a new separate truce, for Picardy and Guienne, from the 30th of September, 1408, to the 1st of May, 1410; and Poictou was expressly included, because the French denied that province to be held of Guienne.

A brief account of the schism. Platina. Walsing.

The schism, which commenced, in 1378, by the double election of Urban VI. and Clement VII, still continued, to the great scandal of Christendom; but, Urban dying, in 1390, the cardinals of his party elected Boniface IX, who, at first, seemed very much inclined to put an end to the schism; upon which, the court of France laboured heartily to inspire Clement with the same resolution; yet, as he proved inflexible, the university of Paris was ordered to meet, who decided, that, to put an end to the schism, one of these three ways was absolutely necessary. The first was, that the two popes should resign; the second, that they should agree upon umpires to determine their difference; and the third, that the determination should be referred to a general council. This resolution, being communicated to Clement, gave him so much uneasiness, that he died, soon after, in 1394; and, when the king of France had notice of his death, he wrote to the cardinals, desiring them not to proceed to a new election; but, as they suspected the contents of his letter, they chose, before they opened it, the cardinal of Luna, an Arragonian, who assumed the name of Benedict XIII. Before the election, they all took a solemn oath, that whoever was chosen should renounce the papacy, if it was judged necessary for the good of Christendom; but Benedict, being elected, dispensed with the oath he had taken, when cardinal. On the other hand, Boniface IX. dying, in 1404, his cardinals chose Innocent VII; and, he likewise dying the following year, they elected Angelo Corario, a Venetian, who assumed the name of Gregory XII. 1408.

It would be tedious to relate all the evasions used by Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII, to decline the resignation sworn by each; for, tho' they were both willing to be thought well affected, they continually started fresh obstacles to the agreement desired by all Christendom. In a word, the Christian princes, tired with the delays of the two popes, found means to gain the cardinals of both sides, who, in their own name, summoned a general council, at Pisa, for the 25th of March, 1409.

1409. The council of Pisa. Act. Pub. Walsing.

The council being assembled, the two popes were cited; and, as they did not think fit to appear, they were declared perjured hereticks, and deprived of their dignity. At the same time, the cardinals were impowered to elect a new pope; and they chose Peter de Candia, who stiled himself Alexander V. Before the meeting of the council, Henry wrote to Gregory, to admonish him to comply with the method of resignation; but, his letter being ineffectual, when he heard of Alexander's election, he issued out a proclamation, enjoining all his subjects to own the new pope. It was believed, that the scandalous schism, which had now continued, 30 years, was, at length, ended; but, by Benedict's obstinacy, it was, some years, farther prolonged.

The progress of the Lollards alarm the clergy.

How scandalous soever this schism might be, it did not give the English clergy so much uneasiness, as Wickliff's doctrine; for, tho', during this reign, the Lollards were treated with great severity, their number continually increased; and there were, even at Oxford, doctors, that publickly defended the novel opinions, as well in their disputations as writings. The bishops, being extremely alarmed at it, obtained of the king an order to the university, to meet in convocation, and examine the books of Wickliff; but, as the majority were still attached to the old doctrine, his books were condemned; and the university published a decree, prohibiting all her members, on pain of degradation, to preach, or teach, the doctrine therein contained.

A truce with Bretagne.

This year, the truce with Bretagne was prolonged to the 1st of July, 1411.

Henry could not promise himself any solid tranquillity, whilst France was undisturbed; and this occasioned the rise of all the motions, as well of his own subjects as of the Welch and Scots. The war, kindled in that kingdom, between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy, was very advantageous to England; for Castile and Scotland were more ready to conclude a truce with Henry; the Welch also, receiving no farther assistance from that quarter, perceived, at length, that their pretended prince was very far from being in a condition to perform his promises, and began, by degrees, to desert him; and Henry reaped, moreover, this advantage, that he became more absolute,

1410. at home, ſince he had nothing to fear from his enemies, abroad. Tho' he had cauſed Richard to be depoſed, for uſurping an arbitrary power, contrary to the laws; yet he plainly ſhewed, by certain proceedings, that he would have been glad to govern, with an abſolute authority. This chiefly appeared, in the elections of members of parliament; for, by the directions of court, certain artifices were practiſed, to render the freedom of voting uſeleſs, ſince the ſheriffs took the liberty to return ſuch repreſentatives, as had not a majority of votes. This practice is of ſuch fatal conſequence, that it may be aſſerted, that the liberty of the Engliſh will no longer ſubſiſt, than whilſt the privilege of freely electing their repreſentatives in parliament remains inviolable; for, if once the ſovereign comes to chuſe what repreſentatives he pleaſes, the bounds of the royal authority will be, at laſt, ſo enlarged, as to leave nothing but the mere ſhadow of liberty. Of this we have ſeen a rematkable inſtance, in the reign of Richard II; but it may be farther added, that all the kings of England, who have enjoyed a more abſolute power than the reſt, acquired it, by procuring their creatures to be elected. When a parliament conſiſts of ſuch members, it is no longer the king, that is charged with incroachments on the people's liberty, but the nation itſelf, that voluntarily runs into ſlavery; and, if, afterwards, they reſolve to recover their freedom, they can only ſucceed, by violent methods; which, by the way, is the ſpring of moſt of the civil wars, ſo frequently kindled, in England. The parliament, which met, in January, 1410, conſidering the conſequences of the king's over-ruling the elections, believed, that the redreſs of abuſe this was the moſt preſſing affair; and, accordingly, in the beginning of the ſeſſion, they preſented a bill to the king, by which, the ſheriffs, who ſhould be found guilty of making falſe returns, were to be fined 100 l. ſterl. for every offence. The king would have been glad to evade this act; but, as he could not do it, without laying himſelf too open, and, beſides, deſigned to demand a ſubſidy, he gave it the royal aſſent.

Upon paſſing this act, the king demanded a ſupply of money of the commons, who, on that occaſion, renewed their former inſtances, with reſpect to the clergy; for Wickliff's doctrine had prevailed ſo much, that the majority of the houſe of commons, were inclined that way. Accordingly, the commons preſented to the king two petitions, one againſt the clergy, and the other in favour of the Lollards. In the firſt, they repreſented, 'That the clergy abuſed their riches, and 'conſumed their incomes, in a very different 'manner from the donor's intent; that their 'revenues were exceſſive, and, conſequently, 'it was neceſſary to leſſen them; that ſo 'many eſtates might eaſily be ſeized, as 'would provide for 150 earls, at the rate of '3000 marks per annum, each; 1500 barons, 'at 100 marks, each; 6200 knights, at 40 'marks; and 100 hoſpitals, at 100 marks; 'that, by this means, the kingdom's ſafety 'would be more effectually provided for, the 'poor better maintained, and the clergy more 'attached to their duty.' 1410.

Petition of the commons againſt the clergy. Walſing.

In the ſecond petition, the commons prayed, that the ſtatute, paſſed againſt the Lollards, in the ſecond year of his reign, might either be repealed, or, at leaſt, qualified with ſome reſtrictions.

If the parliament, that firſt moved the leſſening of the clergy's revenues, was ſtiled the Unlearned, the names of Lollard and Heretical were plentifully beſtowed on this; and the clergy conſidered the petition, as tending to undermine all religion; which was induſtriouſly inſinuated to the king, with all the aggravations, that parties concerned are capable of diſplaying, on ſuch an occaſion. It is difficult to know, whether the king himſelf was of this mind; however, he declared, that he was no leſs concerned for the intereſt of the church, than the clergy themſelves. After the death of the earl of Northumberland, there was not a lord in the kingdom, that could give him any diſturbance; and, tho' the people were diſſatiſfied, Henry was very ſenſible, that, of themſelves, they would never be induced to rebel; ſo that he was obliged to pleaſe the clergy, who alone were able to ſtir up the people, if they had ſo plauſible a pretence, as the loſs of their revenues. He, therefore, anſwered the commons very ſharply, that he neither could, nor would, conſent to their petitions, and expreſly prohibited them to meddle any more with the church's concerns; and, as for the Lollards, he ſaid, that, far from permitting the ſtatute againſt them to be repealed, he wiſhed it more rigorous, for the utter extirpation of hereſy out of the kingdom.

Another, in favour of the Lollards. Walſing.

The king rejects the two petitions. Walſing.

The commons being diſappointed, were contented with moving, that, at leaſt, clerks convicted ſhould not be delivered to the biſhops priſon, alledging that daily experience proved, that by, this means, they always eſcaped the puniſhment they deſerved. What the commons demanded was no leſs reaſonable, now, than in the reign of Henry II, when that prince, and all the peers of the realm, maintained that point ſo vigorouſly, againſt Becket and pope Alexander III; but Henry, to prevent his being expoſed to the like troubles with Henry II, refuſed alſo to give his aſſent to this bill; and, on the contrary, he affected to ſhew an extraordinary zeal for the intereſts of the church, and to take ſuch ſteps as he judged moſt agreeable to the clergy. Tho' it is manifeſt, that Wickliff's doctrine was the real cauſe of the motions made by the houſe of commons, the king was willing to convince them, how far he was from giving them any countenance, by ſigning a warrant, for burning Thomas Badby; and the prince of Wales, being diſpoſed to be preſent at the execution, as the poor wretch gave ſenſible proofs of the torture he endured, ordered the fire to be removed, and promiſed him a penſion, for life, provided he would recant; but Badby, recovering his ſpirits, refuſed this gracious offer, and ſuffered death, with heroick courage.

The king orders a Lollard to be burnt. Walſing. Act. Pub.

1410. The commons are offended, and refuse the king's demand. Walsing.

The commons considered this execution, as an insult, and a great aggravation of the king's late refusal; and, accordingly, when the king demanded a power to levy, annually, a certain subsidy, tho' the parliament should not sit, the demand was boldly rejected. The commons would have even denied a supply, for his necessary occasions, if, to compel them to it, he had not, as formerly, prolonged the sessions, till he obtained his desire. It evidently appeared, that the earl of Northumberland was dead; that the commotions, in Wales, were almost ended; and that France was no longer formidable; otherwise he would never have dared to treat the commons, in such a haughty manner.

The duke of Burgundy forms a design to besiege Calais. Walsing.

Notwithstanding the ill posture of affairs, in France, the duke of Burgundy resumed his design of besieging Calais; but, all his preparations, at St. Omer, for the carrying on the siege, being burnt to ashes, either by accident, or by means of an incendiary, sent on purpose by the governor of Calais, this project, like the preceding, vanished into air. The French historians take no notice of this attempt; tho' it seems, by the king's precaution, in sending the prince of Wales to Calais, at that very juncture, he had received some private intelligence of it; but, however that be, the truce with France, for Guienne and Picardy, was again prolonged, for some months. Act. Pub.

The English ravage Scotland.

This year, Robert de Humphreville, vice-admiral of England, entered the gulf of Edinburgh, and, daily landing his men, now in one place, then in another, carried off a great booty.

1411. The truce is prolonged. Act. Pub.

The whole year 1411 was spent in several negotiations, which ended, at length, in prolonging the truce with France, for five years; with Castile, till February, 1413; and with Bretagne, for 10 years.

These negotiations require no farther explication, since we have, already, seen the occasion of them; but the negotiation, this year, with the duke of Burgundy, deserves a more particular notice; and, to this purpose, it will be necessary to explain, as briefly as possible, the present situation of affairs, in France, on which depends a considerable part of the occurrences of this and the two following reigns.

The affairs of France. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

We have seen, how John, duke of Burgundy, assassinated the duke of Orleans, brother to king Charles VI, and, avowing the fact, had interest sufficient to procure a pardon; and he, afterwards, went into his dominions, in Flanders, with an intent to restore to the bishoprick of Liege his dutchess's brother, expelled by his people. Whilst he prepared for this war, the dutchess of Orleans, accompanied by her three sons, of whom Charles, the eldest, was only 15 years old, came; and, casting herself at the feet of the king, her brother-in-law, she demanded justice, for the death of her husband; but, tho' the duke of Burgundy had procured a pardon, his adversaries, improving his absence, had credit enough to have it revoked, and to cause him to be pronounced an enemy to the state. He was then marching to the relief of Maestricht, where the inhabitants of Liege held their bishop besieged; and, at his approach, they raised the siege; but, being afterwards informed, that the duke had no more than 16000 men, he resolved to attack him; and, tho' their army was three times as numerous as the duke's, they were routed, with the loss of 30,000 men. The duke's victory so alarmed his enemies, in France, that, believing themselves in danger, at Paris, where the duke had many adherents, they retired to Tours, and took the king with them; but the victorious duke, preferring his affairs, in France, to the war against the men of Liege, who were sufficiently humbled, put himself, immediately, at the head of 4000 horse, and came to Paris, where he was received, in triumph. At his arrival, he so managed, that the Parisians sent deputies to the king, beseeching him to return to their city; and Charles, then in one of his lucid intervals, judged it imprudent, in the present juncture, to protect the enemies of the duke of Burgundy. He repaired to Paris, as was desired, and, immediately, appointed considerable persons to negotiate an agreement, between the duke of Burgundy and the sons of the duke of Orleans, which was accomplished, tho' with exceeding difficulty; and the dutchess of Orleans died, with grief, to see her husband's murderer triumphant; whilst the young duke of Orleans, then only in his 16th year, was obliged to be reconciled to his mortal enemy; and, from thenceforward, the duke of Burgundy seized the government, the king, who often relapsed, being incapable of holding the reins himself.

In the interim, Henry, continually desirous of a peace with France, intended to marry the prince of Wales, with one of the daughters of the duke of Burgundy, who was so firmly established; but, whilst he studiously contrived, how to accomplish his project, such vicissitudes happened, in France, as convinced him, that this alliance was not so certain a method, as he had imagined, to attain his ends. The dukes of Berry, Orleans, Alenson, Bretagne, and the earls of Clermont and Armagnac, meeting at Gien, in August, 1410, entered into a league against the duke of Burgundy, and, shortly after, approached Paris; but the duke, having the king in his hands, opposed them, with equal forces; which shewed, that the execution of their design depended on a battle, the success whereof could not but be doubtful. In all probability, France itself would be ruined by a battle, that would be destructive to the kingdom, on which side soever victory inclined, had not an agreement been made between these princes, that the duke of Burgundy should depart from Paris; that the confederate princes should not enter there; and that none of the heads of either party, unless sent for by letters, under the great seal, should come to court. Act. Pub.

The duke of Burgundy, punctually observing this agreement, retired into the Low-Countries; but the duke of Orleans and his party were not so scrupulous; for, having disbanded their troops, 1411. troops, they levied others, and approached Paris, with a view of inriching themſelves with the plunder of the metropolis; which ſtill firmly adhered to the Burgundian party. The duke, being, thus, deceived, made an alliance with the king of England, who, believing it his intereſt to ſupport him, ſent him a conſiderable body of troops; and, with this aid, the duke, marching into France, and paſſing through the enemy's quarters, who were blocking up Paris, entered the city, amidſt the acclamations of the people, on the 30th of October, 1411. This gave the firſt riſe to the two potent factions of Orleans and Burgundy; the firſt of which were, afterwards, named Armagnacs, from the earl of Armagnac, who became their head.

A parliament in England. An act of indemnity.

During theſe commotions, in France, the parliament of England, meeting, about the end of this year, petitioned the king, for a general pardon for his ſubjects; and Henry readily granted their requeſt, excepting only Glendour and his adherents; from whence it appears, that Glendour was ſtill living, though, according to moſt hiſtorians, he died, in 1409. Indeed, after the earl of Northumberland's deceaſe, his affairs went to decay; for the Welch, finding that he was unable to perform his promiſes, had deſerted him, by degrees; and he was even apprehenſive, that they would make an attempt upon his life, or deliver him up to the king. He, for this reaſon, paſſed the reſidue of his days, in ſome retired place; ſo that it is no wonder the time of his death is unknown; yet that he lived, till 1417, is not to be diſputed.

1412. A continuation of the troubles in France.

The affairs of France were involved, more and more, by the mutual animoſity of the two factions, who did not ſcruple to ſacrifice, to their paſſions, the good of the publick. Henry had, hitherto, juſtly dreaded ſome miſchief, from that quarter; and, if the diſſenſions of the princes of the blood had not prevented thoſe that were at the helm, during the king's illneſs, from effectually ſupporting the Engliſh male-contents, he would, very probably, have been greatly diſtreſſed; but he no ſooner perceived, that the two factions, to the laſt degree, had deteſted each other, than his fears entirely vaniſhed. He even began to project means, to reap ſome advantage from the troubles, in France, as the French had frequently attempted to improve the inſurrections, in England; and, in this, the obſervation of the truce was no more regarded, on one ſide than the other.

The faction of Orleans ſue to him for aid. Act. Pub.

Henry ſoon met with as fair an opportunity, offered by the French themſelves, as he could have deſired: The dukes of Berry, Orleans, Bourbon, Alenſon, the earl of Armagnac and the lord d' Albret, heads of one of the factions, finding that they could not withſtand the duke of Burgundy, who had the king and all the royal family in his power, reſolved to ſtrengthen themſelves with the aſſiſtance of the king of England; but, as they were ſenſible, that the duke of Burgundy had hindered them, by making an alliance with Henry, they judged it neceſſary to diſſolve that union, by offering ſuch terms, as were capable of taking off Henry from his engagements with their enemy; wherefore, meeting at Bourges, they agreed on the conditions to be propoſed, and then ſent deputies, to treat with him. 1412.

The duke of Burgundy had, as yet, evaded Henry's propoſal, of marrying the prince of Wales with one of his daughters; and, probably, with other views; but, being informed of what was contriving, in England, he preſs'd, in his turn, the concluſion of the marriage. Henry pretended to hear the propoſal, with pleaſure; but it was only to procure better terms from the Orleans faction; and, indeed, the deputies of the princes, hearing of this negotiation, inſiſted no farther upon any article, but concluded the treaty, juſt as Henry propoſed, on the 18th of May, 1412.

A treaty between Henry and the Orleans faction. Act. Pub.

By this treaty, the confederate princes were obliged,

I. To ſurrender to the king of England about 1500 towns, caſtles, and bayliwicks, which they held, in Guienne, or Poictou.

II. To conquer for him what remained of theſe provinces in the hands of the French, and reſtore to him Guienne, with all its dependences, in the ſame condition and extent, as enjoyed by his predeceſſors.

III. The king allowed, that the duke of Berry ſhould hold Poictou, for life, provided he did him homage, and delivered up Poictiers, Niort, and Luſignan; and, as for the reſt of the fortified towns, in that province, he ſhould place ſuch governors in them, as would bind themſelves, by oath, to reſign them, after his deceaſe, to the king of England. The duke of Orleans was to have the dutchy of Angouleſme, on the ſame terms; and the earl of Armagnac certain caſtlewards, in Guienne.

IV. The king was obliged, on his part, to lend the princes an aid of 1000 men at arms, and 3000 archers, who were to go to Blois, where they ſhould be received by the princes, and paid, before-hand, according to the ſtipulated pay.

Prince Thomas commands the ſuccours. Walſing.

The treaty being ratified, Henry gave the command of this aid to Thomas, his ſecond ſon, created, a few days after, duke of Clarence; and he ſent with him, in this expedition, the duke of York and Thomas Beaufort, high admiral of England. Theſe troops departed, in July; and it appears, from ſeveral pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the king was preparing to go, in perſon, to take poſſeſſion of Guienne.

He arrives and finds a peace concluded.

However, whilſt theſe forces had been buſily raiſing, in England, the ſituation of affairs was altered, in France; for the duke of Burgundy, improving his advantages over his enemies, cloſely beſieged them, in Bourges, and had brought the king with him; and, tho' the beſieged made a vigorous defence, in hopes of ſupplies from England, they would have found it, perhaps, extremely difficult to hold out, if the duke of Burgundy had not thought fit to offer them peace. He was afraid of the arrival of the Engliſh troops; and the confederates had reaſon to apprehend, that 1412. that they would not come, timely enough; which different fears rendering both ſides more tractable, the treaty, propoſed by the duke of Burgundy, was accepted, without heſitation, and, at the ſame time, proclaimed.

In the interim, the duke of Clarence, landing in Normandy, advanced towards Blois, with all poſſible diligence, without committing hoſtilities, by the way; but, when he heard, that the confederates had accepted a peace, he conſidered France, as an enemy's country. It was the duke of Orleans's buſineſs, chief of the faction, who had drawn him into France, to give him ſatisfaction; but, as he had no money, to pay what was already due to the Engliſh, he was obliged to deliver to him, in hoſtage, the earl of Angouleſme, his brother; and the duke of Clarence, finding himſelf in the heart of an enemy's country, with a few troops, and not without apprehenſions, that the two parties would join againſt him, did not judge it expedient to ſtand upon terms; and he only ſtipulated for leave to lead his troops into Guienne, where they ſerved to recover ſome places, by the aid of the earl of Armagnac and the lord d'Albret, who were not pleaſed with the peace.

Walſing.

Henry enjoys a profound peace.

This affair being over, Henry enjoyed a profound tranquillity, having nothing more to fear from France; which, by inteſtine diviſions, was become unable to hurt him. The Welch ſought only to make their peace; and the regent of Scotland, content to ſee the king, his nephew, in the power of the Engliſh, minded only his private concerns. In fine, the male-contents, in England, being no longer ſupported by foreign princes, remained quiet; and Henry made uſe of this calm, to efface the ill impreſſions, his ſeverity and proceedings, with reſpect to the parliament, had made in the minds of his ſubjects. He affected popularity, and laboured, by all poſſible means, to ſhew, that he deſigned nothing leſs than ſtretching the royal prerogative. His endeavours were ſo ſucceſsful, that, notwithſtanding his ſevere treatment of his enemies, and refuſals to the houſe of commons, he was accounted a generous, mild, and moderate prince. What was, before, conſidered, as an effect of his cruel and revengeful temper, was, now, readily aſcribed to pure neceſſity, and the circumſtances of his affairs; and it was, doubtleſs, the latter conduct of this prince, which induced hiſtorians to give him ſuch extravagant encomiums. This example ſhews, how eaſy it is for a ſovereign to efface diſadvantageous impreſſions entertained of him by his ſubjects, provided he is ſo wiſe and fortunate, as to perſuade the world, that he ſincerely intends to reform his behaviour.

Exceſſes of the prince of Wales. Hall.

Whilſt Henry endeavoured to recover his reputation, which had ſuffered a little, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, the prince of Wales entirely deſtroyed his own, by his daily exceſſes; for, tho' he had naturally a great and generous heart, he ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by perſons, who, to ſerve their own ends, flattered his vicious paſſions, and diverted him from the paths of virtue. His court was the receptacle of libertines, debauchees, buffoons, paraſites, and the like; and nothing was diſcourſed of, but the riotous and wild pranks of the prince, or his companions. Such a conduct in a prince, heir apparent to the crown; greatly aſtoniſhed the conſiderate, who dreaded the conſequences; yet, amidſt theſe apprehenſions, a ray of hope ſhined, in a very unexpected mark of moderation given by the prince. One of his favourites being arraigned, for felony, before the chief juſtice, he determined to be preſent at the trial, with an intent to overawe the judge; but, his preſence not preventing the criminal's condemnation, he was ſo tranſported with rage, that he ſtruck the judge, on the face. The chief juſtice, thus, affronted, conſidering the conſequences of ſuch an action, without regarding the quality of the offender, commanded him to be arreſted, on the ſpot, and committed to priſon; but, then, what could never be expected, the prince, quiet as a lamb, ſubmitted to the judge's orders, and ſuffered himſelf to be conducted to priſon, without reſiſtance, like a private perſon. 1412.

He gives a judge a blow on the face. Hall.

The judge's courage and the prince's moderation were equally agreeable to the king; yet Henry, being exceſſively jealous of his crown, gave ear to ſome people's inſinuations, that his ſon had formed evil deſigns againſt him; and he would, perhaps, have proceeded to extremities, in order to avert the imagined danger, had not the prince taken timely care, to remove his ſuſpicions. He no ſooner was informed of the king his father's ſentiments of him, than he deſired a private audience, and, obtaining it, caſt himſelf at his feet, and ſaid, 'Sir, I am told, that you have 'entertained a ſuſpicion of me, injurious to 'my honour, and to the veneration I have 'for your perſon, or government. Indeed, I 'ingenuouſly confeſs, that I have been guilty 'of ſome intemperate ſallies, which deſerve 'your indignation; but I never had the leaſt 'thought of any attempt upon your perſon, or 'government. They, that dare charge me 'with ſuch a monſtrous crime, ſtudy only to 'diſturb your quiet and mine; and, to clear 'myſelf of this imputation, I have preſumed 'to come and throw myſelf at your feet, hum-'bly intreating you, to cauſe all my actions 'to be as rigorouſly examined, as thoſe of 'your meaneſt ſubjects; for I am ready to 'undergo the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny, being confi-'dent, that you will be fully convinced of my 'innocence.' The king, upon this frank declaration, grew perfectly eaſy, and reſtored him to favour.

who vindicates himſelf. T. Livius. Forojul.

In the beginning of 1413, Henry was ſeized with a diſtemper, that occaſioned his death; and Mezerai affirms, that it was the leproſy; but others ſay, that it was a ſort of apoplexy, which had frequent returns, and threw him into fits that deprived him of his ſenſes. However this be, his diſtemper, which ſeized him, at ſeveral times, laſted, near three months, and then brought him to his end. A certain perſon, having formerly told him, that he ſhould die, 1413.

The king is ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper. Walſing.

1413. die, at Jeruſalem, he verily believed, that God would make him his inſtrument, to reſcue that city, out of the hands of the Infidels; and, in this belief, fancying that his death was not ſo near, he judged it his duty to dedicate the remainder of his days to that glorious expedition. Accordingly, he took the croſs, and, calling a great council, communicated his deſign, ordering all things to be ſpeedily prepared for his voyage; but, preſently after, the returns of his diſtemper being more frequent than uſual, he found, that he ought to employ all his thoughts, in preparations for death. His continual fear of loſing his crown, on account of the many attempts to wreſt it from him, increaſing with his years, every time he went to bed, it was, by his orders, laid on his pillow, leſt he ſhould be ſeized, before he was dead. One day, being fallen into ſo ſtrong a fit, that he was thought to reſign his laſt breath, the prince of Wales took up the crown and carried it away; but, ſoon after, the king, recovering his ſenſes, and miſſing the crown, enquired, what was become of it; and, being informed that the prince had taken it, he ſent for him, and asked him, whether he would rob him of his royalty, even before his deceaſe. The prince replied, "He never had entertained any ſuch "thoughts, but, believing him dead, he took "the crown, as his lawful heir, and the only "perſon that had a right to it; nevertheleſs, "he thanked God, that he was again reco-"vered, and heartily wiſhed, that he might "long live, to wear it himſelf;" and, at the ſame time, he went for the crown, and laid it in its place.

The king's laſt fit.

Henry's laſt fit ſeized him, in St. Edward's chapel, as he was worſhipping, at that ſaint's ſhrine; and he was carried to the abbot of Weſtminſter's lodgings, which were nearer than his own. Some time after, recovering his ſpeech, and finding himſelf in a ſtrange place, he asked, where he was; and being told, at the abbot of Weſtminſter's, in a chamber, called Jeruſalem, theſe words reminding him of the foreſaid prediction, he thought only of dying. Before he expired, he ſent for the prince, his eldeſt ſon, and gave him many excellent inſtructions, among which he could not forbear diſcovering ſome doubts, about his right to the crown; and he alſo repreſented to him, that he was afraid his brother, the duke of Clarence, would diſturb him, in the enjoyment of the throne. It does not appear, whether theſe fears were occaſioned by his ſecond ſon's turbulent temper; or by ſome engagement with him, when he conceived a ſuſpicion of his eldeſt; but, however that be, the prince anſwered, that, as he was his lawful heir, he would endeavour to ſecure the crown, by the ſame methods he had himſelf preſerved it, during his life. As for the duke of Clarence, if he behaved, as he ought, he ſhould always find him a kind brother; but, if he acted otherwiſe, he knew how to make him return to his duty. The king ſaid nothing more, except that he implored the protection of Heaven; and, a few moments after, he reſigned his laſt breath, on the 20th of March, 1413, in the 46th year of his age, after a reign of 13 years, 5 months, and 21 days *.

The character of Henry IV.

Moſt of the hiſtorians applaud Henry's mildneſs, clemency, generoſity, valour, and many other virtues; but they appear more in their writings than in his actions; for, if he had ſome reputation, whilſt a private perſon, he does not ſeem to have increaſed, or maintained it, after his acceſſion to the throne. His diſtinguiſhing character was an extreme jealouſy for a crown, acquired by ways not univerſally approved, and preſerved by ſhedding a torrent of noble blood; and, tho' his uſurpation of the crown could be juſtified, the death of Richard II. will be an indelible ſtain to his memory. In a word, he performed nothing remarkable, to afford matter for panegyrick. His expedition into Scotland and Wales did not, in the leaſt, contribute to his honour; and, if he fortunately freed himſelf from all the conſpiracies againſt him, he was principally indebted to the mayor of Cirenceſter, the ſheriff of Yorkſhire, and the earl of Weſtmoreland. The battle of Shrewsbury, in which he vanquiſhed young Piercy, is the only notable action, in the courſe of his reign; for his continual fear of inſurrections cauſed him to neglect ſeveral opportunities of humbling France, and recovering the provinces loſt by his predeceſſors. He even ſuffered many inſults from the French, Scots, Welch, and Bretons, without diſcovering much reſentment; and, in fine, he employed all his thoughts, in preſerving his crown. This prudent policy ought to be the chief, if not the only ſubject of his praiſe, as it was the ſole motive of his actions, none of which render him eminent; for, though he had cauſed Richard II. to be depoſed, for uſurping an unlimited power, he ſhewed, by his conduct, that he had not ſuch a great averſion for that crime, as he pretended, when it was his intereſt to expoſe it. Indeed, towards the end of his days, he ſeemed to have formed a deſign, to purſue maxims more conformable to the nation's liberties; but God was not pleaſed to allow him time, to demonſtrate the effects of this reſolution.

When I conſider the exceſſive encomiums beſtowed on this prince, I cannot help ſuſpecting, that the glory of being the firſt burner of hereticks, and of protecting the clergy againſt the attempts of the houſe of commons, were the main ſprings of all theſe commendations; for it is notorious, that the eccleſiaſticks are as zealous, in extolling their benefactors, as in defaming their oppoſers.

* His body was conveighed, by water, to Feverſham; and from thence, by land, to Canterbury, where he was ſolemnly interred. His tomb is of alabaſter, parcel-gilt, and appears to have been erected by queen Joan of Navarre, his ſecond wife, whoſe effigies lies, on his right-hand, and is placed betwixt two pillars, on the north-ſide of the chapel of St. Thomas Becket, oppoſite to the monument of Edward, the Black Prince. During this reign, the famous Robert Knolles, William Wickham *, bishop of Winchester, and Richard Whittington †, mayor of London, were famous for works of charity and useful foundations.

1413. Henry IV's issue.

Henry had, by Mary Bohun , daughter to the earl of Hereford, four sons and two daughters, viz. Henry, his successor, Thomas, duke of Clarence, John, duke of Bedford, and Humphrey, created duke of Gloucester by Henry V, his brother. Blanche, the eldest daughter, was married to Lewis Barbatus, elector Palatine; and Philippa, his second, was wife to Eric, king of Denmark and Norway.

14. HENRY V. sirnamed of Monmouth.

HENRY V.

HENRY IV. not being beloved by the English, his death was very little regarded; for the clergy alone lamented his loss, because, in his reign, they had met with great favour and protection. The rest of the nation easily forgot a prince, who, after his accession to the throne, had performed nothing memorable, but shed more of his subjects blood than of the enemies of the state; and the very tranquillity they enjoyed, during his whole reign, was not agreeable to them; for, they would have preferred a war, since a fairer opportunity had never offered, to recover what was lost, in France. In expectation, that the prince, his son, would revive the glory of the English name, which seemed buried in oblivion, since the reign of Edward III, they joyfully beheld him succeeding a father, from whom nothing very beneficial to the kingdom could be expected, tho' his reign had been longer; and, in the present juncture, England wanted an active and warlike king, who knew how to take advantage of the commotions, in France; moreover, war was become necessary, to dispel the ill humours spread over the kingdom, in the late reign.

The education of Henry V.

Henry of Monmouth, so named from the place of his nativity, was exactly of the temper desired by the English, being naturally of an elevated and enterprising genius; and, for this reason, the king, his father, had always kept him at a distance from publick affairs. He had been a student, at Queen's-college, in Oxford, under the tuition of the bishop of Winchester, his uncle ††, chancellor of that university; where, in his tender years, the principles of honour and virtue were so carefully impressed on his mind, that they could, never after, be effaced. In his very childhood, he discovered a strong inclination for war, which increasing with his years, the king, his father, judged it expedient to indulge it; for, at 18 years of age, he commanded an army against the Welch, and defeated them, in two battles; but his victories did him an inexpressible prejudice. The king, his father, extremely jealous of his authority, and dreading the consequences of such a noble beginning, removed him from all military, as he had done from all civil offices, lest it should be out of his power to cheque his flight, when once he should take wing. The prince, reduced to a state of

* He was so named from Wickham, in Hampshire, where he was born, in 1324; and his father's name was John Perrot. After he had been educated, at Winchester and Oxford, he returned to his patron, Nicholas Wedal, who had been at the expence of his education; and, afterwards becoming known to Edward III, having a genius for architecture, he was made surveyor of the king's buildings. His directions for rebuilding Windsor-castle gave great satisfaction, and occasioned his promotion, at court, where he passed thro' the offices of secretary of state, privy-seal, &c; and he was preferred to the see of Winchester, in 1367, and, soon after, made lord chancellor of England. It is said, that, the king being told, that he was a man of no learning, and not qualified for a bishoprick, he represented to him, that he would supply his own want of learning with being the founder of learning. Accordingly, he began with the building of New-college, in Oxford, and laid the first stone himself, March 1, 1379; and it was finished, in seven years. In 1387, on the 26th of March, he also laid the first stone of his college, at Winchester, which he intended as a nursery for that, at Oxford. Upon this foundation, he settled an estate for a warden, 10 fellows, 2 schoolmasters, and 70 scholars; and he died, in the fourth year of Henry IV, aged 80 years, and lies buried in St. Swithin's church, in Winchester, in a stately monument of his own erecting.

† Among other things, he built Newgate, in 1402, above half of St. Bartholomew's hospital, in West-Smithfield, and the library in Grey-Friars, now named Christ's Hospital; and king Henry IV. instituted the dutchy-court, in honour of the house of Lancaster, that the lands, belonging to the dutchy, might, in all succeeding ages, be distinguished from the lands of the crown; and, in 1411, the Guild-hall, in London, began to be rebuilt, as it now stands. Stow's Survey.

‡ Jeffrey Chaucer was a man of quality, wit, and learning; and he was in great favour with king Edward III. and Richard II, by whom he was employed in some important negotiations, both at home and abroad. In 1374, king Edward III. allowed him a pitcher of wine, a day, out of his cellars; and, in 1398, Richard II. made him a grant of a hogshead of wine, every year, besides a pension of 20 l. per annum, out of the exchequer; both which were continued by Henry IV. Rymer's Fœd. He lived, for the most part, about Woodstock and New-Elm, in Oxfordshire, where he had a considerable estate; and, dying in 1400, he was buried, in Westminster-abbey. His son, Thomas Chaucer, was speaker of the house of commons, in the second year of Henry V; and Alice, Thomas's daughter, married, first, Sir John Philips; secondly, Thomas de Montacute, earl of Salisbury; and, thirdly, William de la Pole, duke of Suffolk; by which two last matches, as well as her father's descent, the family of Chaucer became allied to the greatest families in England. His friend and companion, John Gower, who joined with him, in refining the English language, was of the family of the Gower's of Sittenham, in Yorkshire; and he lies buried, in St. Mary Overrey's church, in Southwark, part of which he rebuilt. idleness, 1413. idleneſs, being naturally active, ſought employment; and, unhappily, by the inſtigation of ſome about him, and, perhaps, by the direction of the king, his father, he ran into diſhonourable courſes, and abandoned himſelf to exceſſes, unbecoming his birth, and injurious to his reputation *. However, his good diſpoſition did not fail to diſcover itſelf, on certain occaſions; and his moderation, in ſuffering himſelf to be conducted to priſon, by order of the judge he had affronted, evidently ſhewed, that the ſeeds of virtue were not entirely deſtroyed in his mind, by ſenſuality. Accordingly, the king, his father, by reaſon of his abilities, was afraid of him, tho' a young prince, in a manner, drowned in pleaſures, did not appear likely to give him any diſturbance; but the Engliſh themſelves were not prejudiced againſt him. Indeed, his wild ſallies might lead them to apprehend, that they ſhould, one day, be unhappy, under his government; but, on certain occaſions, they obſerved in him tokens of generoſity, virtue, and greatneſs of ſoul, which inſpired them with hopes of a happy reformation, in his perſon.

Henry V. is proclaimed king.

Immediately after the deceaſe of the king, his father, the prince was proclaimed, by the name of Henry V; and, inſtead of diſputing his title, thoſe, who had been moſt averſe to the advancement of the houſe of Lancaſter, were the firſt to pay him their duty. The earl of Marche himſelf, depending on his generoſity, voluntarily put himſelf into his hands, to give him an evident proof of his ſincere intention to leave him in peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne; and, in fine, ſuch confidence did the Engliſh place in him, that, contrary to cuſtom, they offered to ſwear allegiance to him, even before his coronation; but he, in a modeſt and obliging manner, told them, that it was not reaſonable that they ſhould take an oath of fealty to him, before he himſelf had ſolemnly ſworn to govern them, with equity and according to law; which moderation, charming all the world, totally effaced the diſadvantageous impreſſions made by his former conduct, on thoſe to whom he was not thoroughly known.

He is crowned. Act. Pub.

He was crowned on the 9th of April; and he granted, that very day, a general pardon, for all crimes, except murders and rapes. Theſe firſt proceedings manifeſtly ſhewed, that he was reſolved worthily to fill the throne, to which he was raiſed. Before he applied himſelf to the affairs of the ſtate, he exhorted the companions of his former riots to reform their lewd lives, and diſmiſſed them, with liberal preſents; but, at the ſame time, he ſtrictly charged them, on pain of his diſpleaſure, not to preſume to come near the court; and the aſtoniſhment of theſe men, who expected quite other things, was equal to the admiration of the witneſſes to a reformation, which afforded ſuch a pleaſing proſpect.

After this firſt proof of his wiſdom, the king continued inceſſantly to give many others that were inconteſtable; for, in the firſt place, he choſe, for his council, perſons of the greateſt gravity, capacity, and credit, among his ſubjects; and then he removed ſome of the judges, promoting ſuch, in their room, as, to the knowledge of the law, joined a perfect integrity. He did the ſame, with reſpect to inferior magiſtrates, and took particular care to fill the vacant benefices with perſons of ſound principles and approved merit. 1413. He chuſes a council. T. Livius.

Nothing remained to confirm the good opinion already entertained of him, but to diſplay his martial virtues, and to demonſtrate his piety; and, as to the firſt, he, during the whole courſe of his reign, ſhewed, that he was ſecond to none of his predeceſſors, as the reader will have reaſon to be convinced, hereafter. As for his piety, he ſoon became famous, by two remarkable inſtances; the firſt of which, indeed, might be very ambiguous; but it was conſidered, then, as the moſt infallible ſign of the ſincere intentions of a prince, to promote the glory of God; I mean his condeſcenſion for the clergy, in promiſing to perſecute the Wickliffites or Lollards. The other mark of his piety was his care to repair, as far as was poſſible for him, the injury done to Richard II; for he ordered the body of that prince to be removed, from the abbey of Langley, where it was indecently buried, to Weſtminſter-abbey, and laid by Ann of Luxemburgh, his queen; and he afterwards founded three religious houſes, near Shene †, where Richard's ſoul was to be prayed, for night and day. He gives proofs of his piety.

The parliament, that was ſummoned, ſome time before, met, on the 15th of May, well inclined to the new king; and ſeveral ſtatutes were enacted, tending to the preſervation of the publick tranquillity, and of the people's rights and privileges. Henry readily gave his aſſent to all theſe ſtatutes, and particularly to an act to prevent frauds, in the elections of members of parliament; which act the conduct of Richard II, and ſome attempts of the late king, rendered abſolutely neceſſary. His kind parliament.

Whilſt the parliament was employed, about the publick affairs, the convocation of the clergy was ſitting, under the direction of Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury; who, being extremely incenſed againſt the Lollards, had obtained of the late king an order, to ſend commiſſions to Oxford, to take informations, concerning the doctrine of the Wickliffites. The buſineſs of theſe commiſſioners was to diſcover the chief abettors of this hereſy, and how it came to be ſpread in the kingdom, and particularly in the dioceſes of London, Hereford, and Rocheſter; and, at their return, they preſented their informations to the archbiſhop, who laid them before the convocation. The archbiſhop, undertaking this affair, waited on the king, with complaints againſt Oldcaſtle; and he endeavoured to perſuade him, that fire and faggot were the only means of extirpating hereſy; and that it was abſolutely neceſſary, for the intereſt of religion, to proceed againſt Oldcaſtle, according to the utmoſt ſeverity of the law. The king, having calmly heard him, anſwered, That he could never approve of force, in reclaiming hereticks, and the rather, as experience had but too frequently ſhewn, that perſecuting methods were as effectual againſt truth, as againſt error; that he would talk himſelf with Oldcaſtle, and attempt to reſtore him to the right way; and, if he could not ſucceed, he would then conſent to a proceſs againſt him. In the mean time, to give the clergy ſome ſatisfaction, he iſſued out a proclamation, prohibiting the Lollards to hold any meetings, and charging his ſubjects not to be preſent at their preachings *; and a few days after, he was pleaſed to confer with Oldcaſtle; but, finding him immoveable, he no longer oppoſed the requeſt of the clergy.

They reſolve to proſecute Oldcaſtle. Act. Pub.

The archbiſhop, upon this, ſent a ſummons to Oldcaſtle; who, diſowning the juriſdiction of the biſhops, deſpiſed the citation; and he would not even ſuffer it to be ſerved upon him; ſo that it was fixed on the great gates of the cathedral, in Rocheſter. Henry, offended at ſuch a haughty proceeding, ordered him to be apprehended and committed to the tower. On the 28th of September, the priſoner was brought before the archbiſhop, aſſiſted by two other prelates and ſeveral eccleſiaſticks; but, as they could get no anſwers from him, except what were directly repugnant to the eſtabliſhed opinions of thoſe days, they pronounced him a heretick, and delivered him over to the ſecular power. His death would have, immediately, followed his condemnation, if, by the aſſiſtance of his friends, or negligence of his guards, he had not eſcaped out of priſon; but, tho' he went and concealed, himſelf in Wales, his perſecutors continued to moleſt him, as the ſequel will inform us. Theſe are all the remarkable particulars, with reſpect to domeſtick affairs, that occurred, from the 20th of March, 1413, to the end of December.

The king ſuffers Oldcaſtle to be proſecuted. Act. Pub.

I ſhall, now, enter upon the relation of the war, renewed by Henry V, againſt France; a war which had laſted, ever ſince the violation of the treaty of Bretigny, tho' often interrupted by truces, in the late reigns; but, in order to conveigh a juſt idea of this prince's motives, to carry his arms into France, it will be neceſſary to repreſent the then ſtate of that kingdom.

The neceſſity of joining here the French with the Engliſh Hiſtory.

Charles VI, afflicted with a diſtemper, which rendered him, for the moſt part of his reign, incapable of governing, had three ſons, Lewis, John, and Charles; the eldeſt of whom, dauphin and duke of Guienne, was a prince of an indifferent character. At 16 years of age, he had taken to a debauched life; and he, moreover, was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with principles, that led him to arbitrary power, and carried him into many exceſſes. His favourites indulged him, in this courſe of life, as they would have been great loſers, by his reformation; and, to prevent the execution of a certain project, formed for the better governing the kingdom, and approved by an aſſembly of the chief men, they inſpired their young maſter with a deſire to hold the reins of the government himſelf, during his father's illneſs. They repreſented to him, that the duke of Burgundy had ſeized it, without any right; and that none could claim it, to the prejudice of the king's eldeſt ſon, who exceeded the age fixed by the ordinance of Charles V, for the king's majority. Upon this foundation, they adviſed him to ſeize the Baſtile, in order to hinder the Pariſians from aſſiſting the duke of Burgundy; and this project was executed, preſently after, by means of the governor of that fortreſs, whom the dauphin had gained to his intereſt; but he had not long reaſon to rejoice, at the ſucceſs of his enterprize; for the rumour of it no ſooner reached Paris, than the citizens, privately encouraged by the duke of Burgundy, took up arms, to the number of 10 or 12000 men. One part inveſted the Baſtile; and the other, under the conduct of a ſurgeon, John de Troye, came before the dauphin's palace, who, being ſurpriſed at this inſurrection, found no other remedy but to appear at the window, to try to appeaſe them, but to no purpoſe. After breaking open the doors of the palace, they ruſhed into the apartments, and ſeized above 20 perſons, whom they accuſed of corrupting the prince, and threw them into priſon; and the governor of the Baſtile, being terrified, ſurrender'd the fortreſs to the duke of Burgundy, who, in ſpite of the dauphin's efforts, continued maſter of the government. It was, during theſe troubles, in March, 1413, that Henry IV. died, in England; and Henry V, his ſon, aſcended the throne.

The affairs of France.

Act. Pub.

Whilſt the new king was employed, in ſettling his domeſtick affairs, the commotions were renewed, in France; for, at the end of April, the ſeditious began to wear white hoods, as a badge of diſtinction. John de Troye, at the head of an armed mob, brought one to the dauphin, who durſt not refuſe it; and the king himſelf, as he was going to the church of Notre-Dame, was obliged by the ſeditious to take another. Two days after, their leader came to the palace of St. Pol, where the king lodged; where, before the 1413. whole court, he undertook to juſtify the impriſonment of the dauphin's officers; adding, that there were ſtill at court many more, that equally deſerved puniſhment; and, at the ſame time, regardleſs of the intreaties of the dauphin, or the king himſelf, he ſeized and impriſoned a great number of lords and ladies, and even Lewis of Bavaria, the queen's brother; and the king, being unable to withſtand the torrent, was forced to conſent, that ſome of the priſoners ſhould be proſecuted, and to go to Paris, in a white hood, to inroll certain edicts, demanded by the ſeditious.

The dauphin, who was, thus, checqued by the factious, or rather by the duke of Burgundy, his father-in-law, their private director, could not think of remaining in a ſituation ſo contrary to his temper; and the heads of the Orleans faction, who had been conſtrained to ſign a treaty, which removed them from Paris and the court, were the only perſons, from whom he could expect any aſſiſtance. He contrived, therefore, a ſecret negotiation with them; and, the better to conceal his intentions, he went and conferred with them, under the pretence of negotiating an agreement, between the two parties, in relation to ſome breaches of the peace of Bourges; and, having made a combination, he ſo managed, that a peace was confirmed; and, by the new treaty, ſigned, at Pontoiſe, the Orleans party were allowed to come and pay their reſpects to the king, at Paris.

The duke of Burgundy applies again to Henry. Act. Pub.

In the interim, the duke of Burgundy, judging, by the dauphin's former attempt, what he might expect from him, reſolved to ſecure aid, in caſe of neceſſity; and, with this view, in June, he ſent, as earl of Flanders, an ambaſſy to England; of which Ralph, provoſt of St. Donas of Bruges was chief, pretending to renew the treaty of commerce, between the Engliſh and Flemings; but, in reality, to propoſe an alliance with Henry. This is evident, from the king's commiſſion, at the ſame time, to the biſhop of St. David's and the earl of Warwick, to conclude a perſonal league, between him and the duke of Burgundy; and it is ſcarce to be doubted, that the duke had then formed a deſign to enter into an alliance with the king of England. We ſhall, hereafter, ſee much plainer proofs of this matter; tho' this deſign was not, ſo ſpeedily, put in execution; and, probably, the duke had no other intent, than to ſecure the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, if he ſhould be preſſed, as in the reign of Henry IV.

Henry ſends an ambaſſy to Paris. Act. Pub.

Whatever his intent was, Henry judged it imprudent to neglect ſuch a fair opportunity, to foment troubles, in France; and, therefore, he ſent, ſoon after, ambaſſadors to Paris. Their publick inſtructions were, to preſs the court of France to obſerve, more punctually than hitherto, the 28 years truce; to confirm the ſame, or make a new truce; and, laſtly, to adjuſt all the differences, between England and France. In all appearance, one of the king's motives, in ſending this ambaſſy, was to be perfectly informed of the poſture of the French affairs; but his principal view was to conclude, with the duke of Burgundy, the alliance propoſed by that prince. This is evident from a fourth commiſſion, impowering them to ſign a league, between him and the duke, and between their reſpective dominions; and it cannot be doubted, that the provoſt of St. Donas laid the foundation of this negotiation, in his firſt journey to London; which was tranſacted, in July, 1413. 1413.

A new revolution, in the court of France. Act. Pub.

The next month produced a great alteration, in the affairs of France, not a little to Henry's advantage; for the Orleans party, at the head of which were the duke of Orleans, the king's nephew, the duke of Berry, his uncle, the duke of Bourbon, the duke of Alenſon, the earls of Eu and Vendoſme, were arrived, at Paris, purſuant to the liberty given them; and, at the ſame time, the dauphin, by his intrigues, had brought over great numbers of the citizens, who promiſed to aſſiſt him; upon which, he ordered his friends to take up arms, and marched about the ſtreets of Paris, at the head of 30,000 men. Such was the conſternation of the oppoſite party, that they quitted the Louvre, the Town-houſe, and the Baſtile, of which they were poſſeſſed, without the leaſt reſiſtance; and the duke of Burgundy, finding that he could not withſtand the torrent, and dreading, beſides, the arrival of the Orleans party, who were not far off, choſe to retire into Flanders.

Edicts againſt him.

He had no ſooner departed, than the Orleans faction became uppermoſt, at court, without the dauphin's reaping any advantage; and the king, being then in one of his lucid intervals, aſſumed the government, and entertained ſo ſtrong an affection for the duke of Orleans, his nephew, that he permitted himſelf to be wholly guided by his counſels. The young duke, upon this, cauſed divers edicts to be publiſhed, againſt the duke of Burgundy, and the authors of the former ſedition to be proſecuted; and ſeveral of them were put to death.

A truce between the two crowns. Act. Pub.

Shortly after, the ambaſſadors of France and England, meeting at Lelingham, in Picardy, agreed, that the truce ſhould be inviolably maintained, till the firſt of June next enſuing; and, during the negotiation, the Engliſh ambaſſadors intimated, that the king, their maſter, expected, that France ſhould reſtore whatever was taken from England, ſince the treaty of Bretigny. The war had ſubſiſted, ever ſince the violation of that treaty; and, conſequently, this demand contained nothing extraordinary; yet the court of France, having flattered themſelves, that, after the death of Edward III, the kings of England would drop their pretenſions, were extremely alarmed at this declaration. The poſture of their affairs made them juſtly apprehenſive of the renewal of the war; and, therefore, without loſs of time, they diſpatched to London the archbiſhop of Bourges, the conſtable d' Albret, and Col, one of the king's ſecretaries, under the pretence of negotiating a peace, but in reality to diſcover Henry's intentions; who arrived, at London, in October, and could only obtain a prolongation of the truce, for a year.

1413. In the interim, the court of France continued their proceedings, againſt the duke of Burgundy and his adherents, many of whom ſuffered, by the hand of the executioner; and Lewis d' Anjou, king of Sicily, who had with him a daughter of the duke of Burgundy, contracted to his eldeſt ſon, reproachfully ſent her back to her father. He, ſoon after, gave one of his daughters in marriage to Charles, earl of Ponthieu, the king's third ſon, who was not yet full 13 years of age; and nothing could prove more fatal to France, than this match; for the young prince, eſpouſing the intereſt and paſſion of the king, his father-in-law, became an avowed enemy to the duke of Burgundy. He likewiſe incurred the hatred of that duke; who, though in exile, had ſtill a potent party in the kingdom; but this mutual animoſity, continually increaſing, expoſed France to many calamities.

The duke of Burgundy offers his aſſiſtance to the dauphin, who accepts of it.

In the mean time, the dauphin, reaping no advantage from the late revolution at court, could not behold, without extreme concern, the duke of Orleans at the head of affairs, whilſt himſelf was without credit, and like a priſoner, in the Louvre, where he was narrowly watched; and, therefore, he readily liſtened to the duke of Burgundy's offer of aſſiſtance, to place him in the poſt to which he was entitled, by his birth; and they entered into a ſort of league, to expel the duke of Orleans from court. The duke of Burgundy, having, thus, ſecured the dauphin, approached Paris, at the head of an army, who declared, that his intent was to free the dauphin, his ſon-in-law, from captivity; and he imagined, that Paris would openly eſpouſe his cauſe; but ſuch care was taken, that nothing ſtirred. During theſe tranſactions, the king, who, for ſome time, had been in one of his uſual fits, recovering his ſenſes, publiſhed, againſt the duke of Burgundy, a thundering edict, ſtiling him a traytor, and enemy to the ſtate; which edict, joined to the ſmall proſpect he had, that Paris would declare for him, cauſed the duke to return into Flanders: But, let us leave, for a moment, the affairs of France, to which we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to return, ſince they are the principal ſubject of this reign, to take a view of what paſſed, in England, in the beginning of 1414.

Mention was made, in the late reign, of the two attempts of the commons, to deprive the clergy of a conſiderable part of their revenues, tho' without ſucceſs; and, as the eccleſiaſticks believed theſe attempts to be the fruit of the the doctrine of the Lollards, this was, probably, one of the principal cauſes of their hatred to theſe pretended hereticks. Accordingly, in the late convocation, they reſolved to uſe the moſt violent means, to extirpate a hereſy, to them, ſo deteſtable. Oldcaſtle, a perſon of a good family, and extraordinary merit, was deſtin'd to be the firſt victim, for a terror to the whole ſect; but, fortunately, he eſcaped out of the hands of his enemies. It was with extreme concern, that the archbiſhop heard the king ſay, that he did not approve of rigorous methods; and he even evidently ſhewed it to be his real opinion, ſince, after Oldcaſtle's eſcape, he took no care to have him purſued and apprehended. It was manifeſt, that, whilſt the king retained theſe moderate ſentiments, the clergy would hardly be able to obtain their deſire upon the hereticks; ſo that it was their intereſt, that the king ſhould have others, more agreeable to the barbarous zeal, with which eccleſiaſticks are generally animated; and nothing was more conducive to that purpoſe, than to perſuade him, that the Lollards had a deſign upon his perſon, and conſpired to ſubvert the ſtate. The late proclamation, againſt their aſſembling, quickly furniſhed the clergy with a fair opportunity; for the Lollards ſtill continued their meetings, tho' with all poſſible ſecrecy. As they durſt not meet in houſes, for fear of being diſcovered, they commonly choſe ſome unfrequented place in the country, to worſhip God, according to their conſciences; and ſome of them, reſolving to aſſemble, without one of the gates of London, in St. Giles's Fields, then covered with buſhes, were, as it often happens, on ſuch occaſions, betrayed by falſe brethren. The king was then, at Eltham, about ſeven miles from London, where he intended to keep his Chriſtmas; not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting a conſpiracy againſt his perſon, when, on a ſudden, towards night, he was informed, that Oldcaſtle was in St. Giles's with 20,000 Lollards; and that their deſign was to kill the king, the princes, his brothers, and all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, who were not their friends. Doubtleſs, it was very improbable, that 20,000 men ſhould aſſemble, at the very gates of London, without being obſerved; and it was ſtill more unlikely, that Oldcaſtle, an experienced warrior, ſhould chuſe St. Giles's Fields, overgrown with buſhes and ſhrubs, for the rendezvous of his troops; yet the news was confirmed by ſo many circumſtances, that the king gave credit to the report; and, immediately, drawing together as many armed men, as was poſſible, he ordered the gates of London to be ſhut, leſt the populace ſhould go and aſſiſt the rebels. As he was naturally very bold, he reſolved to attack them, before they had concerted all their meaſures; and, arriving at the place, about midnight, and finding about 80 or 100 perſons, he fell upon them, about 20 of whom were killed, and 60 taken. They had unhappily brought arms with them, for their defence, in caſe they were attacked by their perſecutors; which, probably, helped to convince the king of their evil deſign; but this, alone, would not have been capable of perſuading him, that they had really conſpired againſt him, if, among thoſe that were taken, there were not ſome that, gained by promiſes, or awed by menaces, confeſſed whatever their enemies deſired. They affirmed, that their intent was to kill the king, the princes, his brothers, and moſt of the lords ſpiritual and temporal; expecting that the confuſion, which, after ſuch a maſſacre, would enſue in the kingdom, would prove favourable to their religion; and ſome depoſed, depoſed, that, after the murder of the king and princes, they deſigned to make Oldcaſtle regent of the kingdom; and that the conſpiracy was formed, by that lord's direction; yet, in truth, it is ſcarce conceivable, that a prince, ſo judicious as Henry, could be impoſed upon, by ſuch a palpable fiction. Indeed, had he actually found 20,000 armed men, in St. Giles's, it would have been very ſuſpicious; but that 80 or 100 men, among whom there was not one ſingle perſon of rank, ſhould have formed ſuch a project, is, to the laſt degree, improbable; moreover, he knew Sir John Oldcaſtle to be a man of ſenſe; and yet nothing was more wild than the project fathered upon him; which, it was ſuppoſed, he was to execute, with a handful of men, without being preſent himſelf, or its being known, where he was, or that there was any other leader, in his room. However, the king believed him guilty; and, in that belief, he ſet 1000 marks upon his head, with a promiſe, of perpetual exemption from taxes, to any town that ſhould ſecure him. Nevertheleſs, in all probability, the king, in time, perceived the falſhood of this imputation; and I am inclined to think ſo, for the following reaſons: Firſt, becauſe, how ſtrict inquiry ſoever was made over all the kingdom, to diſcover the accomplices of this pretended conſpiracy, not a ſingle perſon could be found, beſides thoſe taken, at St. Giles's; and yet it is evident, that, to execute ſuch a deſign, to any purpoſe, 80 or 100 perſons, of no diſtinction, were not ſufficient. In the next place, even of thoſe that were taken, at St. Giles's, but very few were, immediately, executed *, whilſt the prejudice againſt them was in its full ſtrength; and the king pardoned all the reſt. Thirdly, we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, not only a general pardon, for all the Lollards, but alſo ſeveral private pardons granted to ſome that were condemned, tho' they had conſtantly denied the fact; for, tho' it would not be extremely ſurpriſing, that the king ſhould pardon criminals, that confeſſed themſelves guilty, it is very unuſual with ſovereigns to forgive ſuch crimes, in obſtinate offenders who render themſelves unworthy of a pardon, by denying the fact of which their ſentence ſuppoſes them convicted; beſides, clemency was ſo far from being Henry's favourite virtue, that he leaned very much to the ſide of ſeverity, as will appear from ſeveral inſtances, in his reign. Is it likely, therefore, that he ſhould pardon perſons condemned, for intending to murder him, with all the royal family and great men of the kingdom, at the very time they obſtinately perſiſted, in denying the fact, had he really believed them guilty? Laſtly, the principles of the Lollards were entirely inconſiſtent with ſuch barbarities. It is, therefore, more than probable, that this accuſation was forged, to render the Lollards deteſtable to the king, that they might obtain his licenſe, for their perſecution; and that the king himſelf was convinced of its falſhood, after his firſt prejudice was removed. Indeed, it muſt be confeſſed, that, in all theſe pardons, he ſuppoſed the crime to be proved; but, in order to a pardon, it was neceſſary to take the crime for granted.

In February, 1414, Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, went to give an account to God, for all the innocent blood he had cauſed to be ſhed; and he was ſucceeded by Henry Chicheley, biſhop of St. David's; who was no leſs an enemy to the Lollards than his predeceſſor.

The death of archbiſhop Arundel.

Chicheley ſucceeds him.

I left the archbiſhop of Bourges and the conſtable d'Albert, at London, where they ſoon diſcovered the king's intentions; and the commiſſioners, that treated with them, demanded, in Henry's name, whatever had been taken from England, ſince the treaty of Bretigny. The French replied, that they had no inſtructions, upon that head; yet they propoſed, as of themſelves, a proper means, in their opinion, to procure a peace, between the two kings; namely, a marriage, between the king of England and Catharine, the youngeſt daughter to Charles IV. This princeſs had four ſiſters, of whom one was a nun, and the other three married; ſo that ſhe alone could be offered to Henry; and this propoſal was not wholly rejected. Tho' it was Henry's intereſt to inſiſt on the reſtitution he demanded, as being the ſpeedieſt and moſt effectual way to a laſting peace, the offer of the French ambaſſador not being inconſiſtent with the reſtitution, he thought he might accept it, without any prejudice to himſelf; but, as the ambaſſadors had not ſufficient powers to treat, on this affair, it was only agreed, that the truce ſhould be prolonged to the 2d of February, 1415.

Walſing. Henry demands the re-eſtabliſhment of the treaty of Bretigny. Act. Pub.

Preſently after the departure of the French ambaſſadors, Henry ſent five into France, to continue the negotiation begun, at London, about the reſtitution and marriage; who were impowered to promiſe, in the king's name, that he would not engage in any other marriage-treaty, till the 15th of May, and that they might even prolong that, if they ſhould think it convenient.

Henry ſends ambaſſadors to France.

The court of France not believing the powers of theſe ambaſſadors ſufficient, Charles wrote to Henry, that, if he would ſend ambaſſadors, with fuller powers, he would readily give them audience; upon which, Henry diſpatched five more, all eminent for their high birth and ſtations, viz. the biſhop of Norwich, the earls of Dorſet, Warwick, Salisbury, and the lord Grey.

Theſe ambaſſadors, immediately, held a conference with king Charles's commiſſioners, the principal of whom was the duke of Berry, his uncle; and they demanded, at firſt, the whole kingdom of France, for their maſter, by vertue of his right, as heir to Edward III; but, after a ſhort pauſe, they added, that, being very apprehenſive, that, tho' their demand might cauſe ſome diſguſt, they would make another,

1414. another, with a proteſtation, that it ſhould not be prejudicial to the rights of their ſovereign; and then they limited their demands to the following articles.

I. Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, in full ſovereignty.

II. The right of ſovereignty over the earldom of Flanders and dutchy of Bretagne.

III. All the poſſeſſions of France, in Guienne.

IV. All, in general, that was reſigned to Edward III, by the treaty of Bretigny.

V. The whole country poſſeſſed by France, between the Somme and Gravelin.

VI. The reſignation of all theſe countries to the king of England, in full ſovereignty, to hold them, as a neighbour, and not as a vaſſal to the crown of France.

Before an anſwer was returned to theſe demands, the duke of Berry ſtrenuouſly preſſed the ambaſſadors to begin with the negotiation of the marriage, affirming it to be the proper means to ſettle a ſolid and durable peace, between the two kingdoms; and he even offered a very conſiderable dowry, for the princeſs Catharine; but the Engliſh would conſider this match, only as a conſequence, and not as the foundation of the peace. They, therefore, inſiſted on ſettling, firſt, the terms of the peace, before any mention of the marriage; and, after many diſputes, on both ſides, the Engliſh ambaſſadors confined themſelves to the three following articles, to which they required a poſitive anſwer, before any other affairs ſhould be taken under conſideration.

I. They demanded whatever was reſigned to England, by the treaty of Bretigny.

II. One half of Provence, with the earldoms of Beaufort and Nogent.

III. The 600,000 crowns, which remained unpaid, of king John's ranſom.

As for the marriage, they expreſly ſaid, that the king, their maſter, would never eſpouſe the princeſs Catharine, unleſs he was ſecure of a firm and laſting peace with king Charles; that, beſides, as the propoſals, hitherto made, were very inconſiderable, they had no power to treat on that affair; and that, therefore, it would not only be fruitleſs to talk of the marriage, but they durſt not meddle with that article, before the reſt were ſettled; adding, however, that, in hopes of more reaſonable offers, they were willing to ſpeak their ſentiments; and that no leſs could be offered with the princeſs, than two millions of gold-crowns.

Some days after, the duke of Berry delivered them a writing, containing the propoſals of France, in order to a peace, with the anſwers to their demands; namely,

I. That the king of France offered Agenois, Baſadois, Auch, in part, Perigord, Eſcarre, Oleron, Bigorre, Xaintonge beyond the Charente, Quercy, (Montauban excepted, with all the country, between the Tarn and the Aveiron) Angouleſmois, and Rovergne. 1414.

II. That the king could not diſpoſe of Provence, as he did not poſſeſs it, nor had contributed to the putting it in the hands of the preſent poſſeſſors.

III. That, ſince, for the ſake of peace, he was willing to reſign ſo many fine and rich provinces, which he lawfully poſſeſſed, the king of England ought to deſiſt from any farther demands.

IV. As for the marriage, though the dowry of a daughter of France was fixed to a much leſs ſum, than was already offered, he would, for the ſake of peace, give 600,000 crowns.

Theſe demands and anſwers were the ſubject of ſeveral conferences, which continued, many days; but, without a tedious recital of particulars, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that the ambaſſadors of England reduced, at length, all their demands to the treaty of Bretigny, and a million of crowns, for the princeſs's portion. However, the French, ſtill thinking this ſum exorbitant, the Engliſh intimated, that it might be leſſened, on the condition that, if two ſons ſhould come of this marriage, the youngeſt ſhould have Montrevil and Ponthieu, in full ſovereignty; but, the French returning no anſwer, the conferences ended, March 13th, 1414.

The duke of Burgundy is put to great ſtraits. Mezerai.

In the interim, the duke of Burgundy's enemies ſo incenſed king Charles againſt him, that, conſidering him, as an enemy to his perſon and government, he reſolved to make war upon him; and, with this view, he went and took the Oriflamme *, at St. Dennis, after which, he became maſter of Soiſſons and Compiegne, ſeized by the duke. Burgundy was in no condition to withſtand him, becauſe the Flemings refuſed to ſerve him againſt France, which gave the duke of Bourbon an opportunity of taking Bapaume alſo; and a farther progreſs was intended; but, fortunately, the king was ſeized with a freſh fit of lunacy, which afforded the duke of Burgundy leiſure to put a ſtrong garriſon into Arras.

The dauphin is regent.

King Charles being incapable of acting, the dauphin, his ſon, took poſſeſſion of the regency, as having an indiſputable right; but, whether that prince had reaſon to be diſguſted with the duke of Burgundy, or did not regard him, as he had no farther occaſion for him, he carried the king, his father, before Arras, which he deſigned to beſiege; but the place was ſo well provided, that it was not eaſy to take it. The difficulties of the ſiege, the ſollicitations of the counteſs of Hainault, the duke of Burgundy's ſiſter, and, perhaps, the dauphin's private intereſt cauſed a peace 1414. to be granted to the duke, about the end of September, though upon hard terms; for, in the pardon the king granted the duke, 500 of his adherents were excepted; and it was likewise agreed, that all his friends ſhould remove from court, and himſelf not come there, unleſs ſent for, with the conſent of the council, and by letters under the great ſeal; and, finally, that the king's banners ſhould be placed on the walls of Arras.

Several negotiations of the duke of Burgundy with Henry.

During the preparations, in France, for the war I am about to ſpeak of, the duke of Burgundy, being greatly embaraſſed, on account of the obſtinacy of the Flemings, ſent into England the provoſt of St. Donas, to renew the treaty begun with Henry; who was impowered not only to conclude an alliance, between the king and duke, but alſo to treat, about the king's marriage with the princeſs Catharine. In all probability, the duke deſired the king's aſſiſtance, to put him in poſſeſſion of the government of France, and then undertook to accompliſh the projected marriage, to his benefactor's ſatisfaction; which diſcovers what were, then, that prince's deſigns; ſo that Mezerai juſtly ſaid, that the arms of the Engliſh were drawn into France, by the betrayers of their country; but the peace of Arras put a ſtop, for ſome time, to this negotiation.

Henry tries to take advantage of the troubles in France.

In the interim, Henry perſiſted in his reſolution to improve the advantages, promiſed by the ſituation of the affairs of France; for he perceived, that he ſhould, at moſt, have to deal with only half the forces of the kingdom; and the other half would even make a diverſion, in his favour. Moreover, he had a near proſpect of concluding, very ſhortly, with the duke of Burgundy, a beneficial alliance; and, therefore, he, forthwith, ſummoned a parliament, at Leiceſter, for the 30th of April, to have their approbation of his deſign, and obtain the neceſſary aids, to accompliſh ſuch an important undertaking; and it muſt be obſerved, that the writs were iſſued out, in March, whilſt the provoſt of St. Donas was, at London.

Statutes againſt the Lollards. Raſtal. Stat.

The parliament being aſſembled, the clergy moved, by their emiſſaries, to revive, and even increaſe, the ſtatutes againſt hereticks; but, for once, their animoſity had like to have inſnared them. The project, formed by the commons, in the late reign, againſt the eccleſiaſticks, had twice miſcarried, by the exceſſive deſire of Wickliff's followers, to promote that affair; upon which, the clergy intimated to the late king, that ſuch a motion could proceed from none but hereticks, with whom the houſe of commons abounded; and that the deſtruction of the Catholick religion was to begin, with the downfal of the clergy. Henry IV, for this reaſon, vigorouſly oppoſed it, and ſo haughtily, as to give great offence to the commons; wherefore, though the members, that were no friends to Wickliff's doctrine, joined in the project, they could not hinder the immoderate zeal of the Lollards from invincibly obſtructing the execution. However, the projectors had not entirely dropped it, but only reſolved to take another courſe, to avoid the inconvenience, which had twice defeated their deſign; and, with this view, when a motion was made in the houſe of commons, for new ſtatutes againſt the Lollards, thoſe, who, before, oppoſed it, readily gave their conſent *. The clergy ſeemed extremely well pleaſed; and the pulpits, every-where, reſounded the praiſes of the preſent parliament. It was not a Lack-learning parliament, like that of 1404; but it was the wiſeſt, and moſt zealous for religion, that ever ſat, ſince the beginning of the monarchy. Indeed, nothing could be more agreeable to the clergy, than the act paſſed, on this occaſion; wherein it was enacted, that all the magiſtrates of the realm, from the lord chancellor to the meaneſt officer, ſhould ſolemnly ſwear to employ their power, to extirpate hereticks, and aſſiſt the biſhops, in ſo good a work; and this act was no ſooner paſſed, than a violent perſecution was raiſed againſt the Lollards. Several were burnt alive; others left the kingdom; and ſome abjured their religion, to eſcape the torments prepared for them. 1414.

The commons petition the king to ſeize the church-lands.

Nevertheleſs, ſhortly after, the ſcene was changed, with reſpect to the clergy; who did not dream, that the very perſons, who lately appeared ſo zealous for religion, ſhould think of deſtroying it, by depriving the eccleſiaſticks of the riches they enjoyed; and yet the ſame commons, who had, juſt before, ſecured themſelves, from the leaſt ſuſpicion of hereſy, in compliance with the king's demand of a ſubſidy preſented to him an addreſs, beſeeching him to ſeize the revenues of the clergy. This addreſs was founded on the ſame conſiderations, as that preſented to the late king, for the ſame purpoſe; and it was maintained, that the revenues of the church would be much better employed, in providing for a proportionable number of nobles, colleges, and hoſpitals. This proceeding, to the laſt degree, mortified the clergy; and the more, becauſe, after the late act, now in actual execution, there was not the leaſt pretence to repreſent the commons, as heretical or favourers of hereſy.

The king ſeems to approve of the petition.

The king himſelf, who was about to begin a great war, believed, or feigned to believe, that it was neceſſary to grant the requeſt of the commons; and, as his revenues would, of courſe, be greatly increaſed, that motive did not a little induce him to liſten to ſuch a beneficial motion.

The clergy ſeek to divert the blow.

The clergy, perceiving their ruin inevitable, unleſs ſome remedy was provided, againſt the gathering ſtorm, met, to conſult about means, to avert, or, at leaſt, to weaken it, as much as poſſible; and, after ſeveral debates, they came to the two following reſolutions. The firſt was, to reſign part of their riches to the king,

* Among other things, it was enacted, That whoever read the ſcriptures, in Engliſh, ſhould forfeit land, chattels, goods, and life, and be condemned, as hereticks to God, enemies to the crown, and traytors to the kingdom; that they ſhould not enjoy the benefit of any ſanctuary; and that, if they continued obſtinate, or relapſed, after pardon, they ſhould firſt be hanged, for treaſon againſt the king, and then burned, for hereſy againſt God. Bale.

1414. to ſave the reſt; and the ſecond, to divert the king's thoughts from domeſtick affairs, by engaging him in a foreign war; for the frequent ambaſſies, from Paris to London, and from London to Paris, leading them to conclude, that the king was projecting ſome enterprize againſt France, they reſolved to exert their utmoſt ſtrength, to excite him to carry war into that kingdom. Accordingly, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who undertook to be their ſpokeſman, repreſented to him, 'That the motion of the houſe of commons, 'tho' it appeared advantageous to the crown, 'was not ſo, in reality; that, if their project 'ſucceeded, the church's revenue would be 'applied to uſes, unprofitable to the king, in 'particular, and which, in time, might be 'extremely prejudicial to the ſovereign; that, 'the augmenting the number and riches of the 'nobility, as was deſigned, would enlarge a 'power, which, ever ſince the foundation of 'the monarchy, had, all along, oppoſed the 'ſovereigns, and even brought ſome to de'ſtruction; and that the founding of hoſpitals 'would only encourage people in idleneſs, 'when they ſhould ſee ſo many houſes ready 'to receive them, without being obliged to 'work: But that the clergy, more ſincerely 'loyal to the king than the commons, were 'very willing to give him, on this occaſion, a 'convincing proof of their zeal and attachment 'for his perſon, by delivering up the Alien 'priories, which being 110, in number, were 'poſſeſſed of lands, that would conſiderably 'increaſe the revenue of the crown; and that 'the eſtates of theſe houſes would be all his 'own, whereas, if the project of the commons 'was executed, he would reap no advantage.' Whether the king was perſuaded by theſe arguments, or judged it always adviſable to take what the eccleſiaſticks voluntarily offered, he accepted their propoſal; upon which, the Act. Pub. lands of theſe priories were given him, by act of parliament, without the leaſt oppoſition from the clergy.

In the mean while, the clergy, apprehenſive that, ſooner or later, the king would comply with the offer of the commons, were very intent on the execution of the project; and the archbiſhop endeavoured to prevail on the king to make war upon France; for Henry's character, his late motions, with reſpect to the affairs of France, and the univerſal deſire of the nation inſpired him with hopes, that his deſign would be crowned with ſucceſs; and, therefore, having prepared a proper ſpeech, he took occaſion to ſpeak it in parliament, before the king himſelf.

Hall. He began with encomiums on the king's virtues, ſaying, that he was worthy to wear not the crown of England only, but that of the whole world; and then, addreſſing himſelf to the king, he ſaid, 'That it was not for 'his glory, to leave the king of France, in 'the peaceable poſſeſſion of Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and part of Guienne, 'all theſe provinces having been taken from 1414. 'the kings of England, by downright violence, 'and on frivolous pretences; that he had not 'only an inconteſtable right, but might alſo 'very juſtly claim the whole kingdom of 'France, as heir and ſucceſſor to Edward III; 'and then he copiouſly urged the reaſons re'lated, in the reign of that monarch. He 'repreſented the Salick law, as a groundleſs 'chimera; tho', as it was repugnant to the 'law of nature, it could not be admitted, 'even if it was as real as imaginary. He aſ'ſerted, that Pepin the Short, who diſpoſſeſſed 'the family of Meroveus, laid claim to the 'crown, as heir to Blithilda, daughter to 'Clothaire I; and that Hugh Capet founded 'his title on his being deſcended from a 'daughter to Lewis le Debonnaire. He ad'ded, that theſe claims, which would have 'been ridiculous, if the Salick law had been 'in force, ever ſince Pharamond, were evident 'proofs of its being, then, unknown; that, 'moreover, this law was contrary to the law Nu. xxvii. 'of God himſelf, who diſpoſed, in a quite 'different manner, of the inheritance of Zelophehad, in favour of his daughters; and 'that the famous French civilians had con'feſſed, that the Salick law was a contradiction, both to the law of God and nature *. 'In fine, that the glorious ſucceſs, with which 'Heaven had crowned the arms of Edward III, 'clearly ſhewed, that God did not approve 'this pretended law; and that, if he permitted that monarch and the prince of Wales, 'his ſon, to end their days, before they could 'repair their loſſes, in France, no inference 'can be drawn from thence, againſt the juſtice of their rights; that, by his judgments, 'he was pleaſed to puniſh the ſins of the Engliſh nation, but never deſigned to deprive 'the heirs and ſucceſſors to Edward, of their 'juſt rights to the crown of France; that the 'interruption of the proſecution of theſe 'rights, by reaſon of the ſlothfulneſs of Richard II, and the troubles of the late reign, 'could not be conſidered, as an entire deſiſting; that, as England, now, enjoyed a 'happy tranquillity, under the government of 'a prince endowed with ſo many excellent 'qualities, to relinquiſh theſe lawful preten'ſions would be to renounce all the rules of 'prudence and policy; and that, beſides, the 'poſture of affairs, in France, preſented an 'opportunity, which it would be in vain to 'expect, hereafter. Finally, he exhorted the 'king to exerciſe the talents God had bleſſed 'him with, and not continue in an ignoble 'repoſe, but prepare, without dreading the 'difficulties, for ſo juſt and glorious conqueſt, 'which would render him the moſt potent 'prince, in Europe; and he concluded his 'ſpeech with ſaying, that, if the king 'would undertake ſuch a noble enterprize, 'the clergy would give him a larger ſub'ſidy than was ever granted to any of 'his predeceſſors, and he did not doubt

* The archbiſhop, or he that made this ſpeech, was doubtleſs, ignorant, that, without the Salick law, Edward III. could not have any claim to the crown of France. Rapin.

Moſt hiſtorians pretend, that this ſpeech made ſuch a ſudden and ſurpriſing impreſſion, that Henry, immediately, reſolved to proſecute his title to the crown of France; but the foreſaid negotiations, about this affair, evidently prove, that this reſolution was already taken; and that the buſineſs, at preſent, was, only to procure the approbation of the parliament. To this, perhaps, the archbiſhop's ſpeech greatly contributed; at leaſt, it is certain, that the commons, before they broke up, approved the deſign, and granted the king a ſubſidy of 300,000 marks, to begin the execution of it. Nay, it is probable, that the archbiſhop, on this occaſion, acted in concert with the king, either to ſound the inclination of the commons, or to excite them to a war; but, however that be, as this reſolution perfectly correſponded with the clergy's project, it is no wonder, that the archbiſhop ſo ſtrongly urged the neceſſity of a war; and, indeed, this affair was no ſooner reſolved, in parliament, than the bill, intended againſt the clergy, dropped, of itſelf, people's minds being otherwiſe employed.

The continuation of the negotiations between France and England. Act. Pub.

The remainder of this year was ſpent, in continual ambaſſies to London, or Paris; for the French were extremely deſirous, that Henry's marriage, with the princeſs Catharine, ſhould be an equivalent for the greateſt part of the demands of England; and Henry did not reject the propoſal, provided the marriage was conſidered, only as a conſequence of the peace, or, at leaſt, ſuch conditions were annexed to it, as might oblige the French to reſtore the provinces loſt, ſince the treaty of Bretigny. He feigned to ſuffer himſelf to be amuſed, to a certain degree, and he ſent power upon power to his ambaſſadors, to prolong the time of his engagement; but, when the match was propoſed, the ſame ambaſſadors refuſed to treat, till the terms of the peace were ſettled; and this was the ſubject of all the negotiations. However, it is certain, that both ſides had no other view than to gain time; that Henry was too wiſe, not to perceive, that France would never conſent to his demands, before ſhe had received ſome conſiderable loſs; and, as there had not been, for a good while, any remarkable alteration, in England, beſides the acceſſion of a new king to the throne, the court of France could not believe, that the Engliſh were able to ſupport the threatened war. Henry proceeded, gradually, without being diverted, as there was nothing, in his kingdom, capable of giving him any diſturbance; but France was full of diſſenſions; and thoſe, at the helm, were more ſollicitous to oppoſe the contrary party, than to prevent the king of England's deſigns; nay, it was next to impoſſible for them to take juſt meaſures, at ſuch a juncture. The dauphin, who had the management of affairs, was a prince of more heat than capacity; but, tho' he had been more capable, what could he have done, whilſt two factions divided the kingdom, and neither of them was, in reality, attached to his intereſt? Moreover, neither the dauphin, nor the Orleans faction, could imagine, that, after an intermiſſion, for two whole reigns, the king of England would, ſeriouſly aſſert his right to the crown of France; and it appears, from the Engliſh Hiſtory, that, after Henry had, the firſt time, demanded the crown of France, the dauphin, in deriſion of his youth, ſent him, for a preſent, a tun of tennis-balls, doubtleſs, intimating, that he thought him fitter for play, than for war *; but he ſoon altered his opinion. Such was the diſpoſition of the court of France, whilſt Henry was entirely employed in preparations, to accompliſh his deſigns.

France begins to take other meaſures.

The reſolution, taken by the parliament of Leiceſter, opened the eyes of thoſe who governed France; and they ſaw, at length, that Henry was, in earneſt, and perceived, not without confuſion, that, to over-reach them, he had uſed the very means practiſed by themſelves, to amuſe him; for the negotiations, about the marriage, and the frequent prolongations of his voluntary engagement, were only a decoy, to hinder France from preparing for her defence. Charles's, or the dauphin's council, upon the reſolution of the parliament, thought it time to think ſeriouſly of giving Henry ſome ſatisfaction; and, with this view, ſecretary Col was diſpatched, with freſh offers, but very ſhort of his pretenſions. It may be ſaid, that, before the parliament of Leiceſter, Henry had demanded the whole kingdom of France, tho' ſlightly, and to ſerve as a foundation for his other demands; but, being ſupported by his parliament, he talked, at a much higher rate, and ſeemed unwilling to be ſatisfied with what he, at firſt, demanded. However, to amuſe France, he ſtill pretended to deſire, that the affair might be determined, by a negotiation; and he readily conſented, that the marriage ſhould be treated of, and the term of his engagement prolonged, to the 15th of Auguſt, impowering his ambaſſadors, to extend it farther, at their diſcretion; but, notwithſtanding all this, he did not delay, nor interrupt, his preparations for war.

Henry continues his negotiations with the duke of Burgundy.

In the interim, the negotiation with the duke of Burgundy ſtill continued, whilſt that prince was moſt preſſed by his enemies; and, in June, Henry ſent to him Philip Morgan, a perſon of great abilities, whom he always employed, in the moſt important negotiations. Morgan's publick inſtructions were, only to renew the truce with the Flemings; but the choice of this ambaſſador, and the miſſion of Copin de la Vieuville into England, from the duke, with the circumſtances of the time, evidently prove, that the intent of theſe ambaſſies was not, merely, to prolong a truce of commerce, in which there was no great difficulty; beſides, the diſcovery, hereafter, will ſhew, what the duke of Burgundy was then projecting. The gaining of that prince to his intereſt was very material to Henry; and a fairer

1414. fairer opportunity could not offer, ſince the court of France did not ſhew the leaſt regard for him; but he demurred, it ſeems, being unwilling to have recourſe to Henry, without an abſolute neceſſity. In all theſe negotiations, was ſpent the year 1414.

1415. Act. Pub. In the beginning of the enſuing year, Henry conſented to a prolongation of the truce, to the firſt of May; and, in the interim, the the court of France, alarmed at the great preparations, in England, ſent again the archbiſhop of Bourges, with 11 more ambaſſadors. Probably, the archbiſhop made ſome new propoſal to Henry; but he could only obtain a farther prolongation of the truce, to the 8th of June.

Henry tells the lords, that he is reſolved to go into France.

Whilſt theſe ambaſſadors were, at London, the king aſſembled the lords ſpiritual and temporal, at leaſt, as many as were at a convenient diſtance; and he acquainted them, by the biſhop Wincheſter, his uncle, and lord chancellor, with his reſolution, of going, in perſon, to carry war into France, in order to recover the inheritance of his anceſtors. This declaration ſeemed unneceſſary, as the great men had been ſufficiently informed of his deſign; but, probably, his intent was, to oblige the French ambaſſadors to diſcover, at once, what they had to offer, imagining, that they ſtill concealed part of their inſtructions. The preſent poſture of affairs, in France, induced him to hope, that they would put things upon the foot of the treaty of Bretigny; and, if ſo, he would, doubtleſs, have been contented with ſo conſiderable an advantage, tho' he had, for ſome time, claimed the whole kingdom of France. The archbiſhop of Bourges, no longer, doubting the king's deſigns, told him, that he wanted to go to France, for freſh inſtructions; upon which, Henry agreed, that the truce ſhould be again prolonged, to the 15th of July. The ſame prelate, returning to England, a few days before the expiration of the truce, added ſomething more to the former offers; but nothing was capable of ſatisfying Henry, except the treaty of Bretigny. The archbiſhop demanded his anſwer, in writing; and the king ordered it to be given him, immediately. Some add, that this prelate, upbraiding the king, told him, that, not content with a crown unjuſtly wreſted from Richard II, by his father, he would invade that of France too; but he ſhould find it more difficult than he imagined.

He embarques his troops, and continues his negotiation with the duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub.

All things being in readineſs, for their departure, Henry ordered all his troops to repair, immediately, to Southampton, where they were to embarque, and went thither himſelf, to give orders, as the troops and tranſports arrived; and, in the mean time, he gave freſh powers to Philip Morgan, to conclude a treaty of alliance with the duke of Burgundy; which ſhews, that the duke, who was ſtill at the court of France, held private intelligence with Henry, and had, probably, not a little conduced to engage him in this undertaking; tho' their treaty was not concluded, till two years after.

Henry was preparing to depart, about the end of July, or beginning of Auguſt; and moſt part of his troops were already embarqued, when he received notice of the conſpiracy againſt his perſon, formed by thoſe, whom he leaſt ſuſpected. If we believe the Engliſh hiſtorians, the court of France, dreading the ſucceſs of the war, had employed a vaſt ſum of money, to bribe men to kill the king; and they mount this ſum to a million of livres, which is not ſurprifing, conſidering the quality of the conſpirators; namely, Richard, earl of Cambridge, brother to the duke of York, Henry Scrope, lord-treaſurer, who commonly lay in the ſame room with the king, and Thomas Grey, a knight of Northumberland, and privy-counſellor. However, it is not very certain, that they had a deſign upon the king's life; at leaſt, the earl of Cambridge's confeſſion, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, contains nothing like it; for it only appears, that they conſpired to ſet the earl of Marche at their head, and conduct him, where they expected to raiſe an army, by making uſe of the name of Richard II, as if he were ſtill alive; and that, if they could not deceive the people, by a means ſo often practiſed, they intended to publiſh a manifeſto, in the name of the earl of Marche, inviting the people to reſtore that prince to his rights, uſurped by the houſe of Lancaſter. As they could not uſe the earl of Marche's name, without having him in their power, or, at leaſt, in their party, it was neceſſary for them to inform him of the plot; who was extremely embarraſſed, when he heard the ſecret. A crown, which he thought to be his lawful right, deſerved the pains of running ſome riſque, to obtain it; but on the contrary, he was convinced, that the conſpirators did not act, from a motive of juſtice, or affection for his perſon; moreover, the iſſue of this proceeding was uncertain. In the mean while, he was very preſſingly ſollicited to enter into the conſpiracy; but, not being able to reſolve, immediately, he deſired time, to conſider of ſuch an important affair; and it was with exceeding difficulty, that they allowed him the reſt of that day. During this interval, his reflections induced him to diſcover the whole to the king. Henry, aſtoniſhed at the news, forthwith, ordered the conſpirators to be ſeized, who, confeſſing their guilt, were condemned and executed. The earl of Cambridge and Sir Thomas Grey were beheaded; but the lord Scrope ſuffered the uſual puniſhment of traytors. This was, as it were, the firſt ſpark of that flame, which conſumed, at length, the two houſes of Lancaſter and York; and, as the earl of Cambridge had eſpouſed a ſiſter to the earl of Marche, in all probability, he engaged in the plot, with a view to procure the crown for Richard, his ſon, preſumptive heir to that earl, who had no children.

1415. A plot againſt the king is diſcovered. Act. Pub.

The authors are puniſhed. Walſing.

This affair detaining Henry, at Southampton, longer than he imagined, he could not ſail, till the 18th, or 19th, of Auguſt; whoſe fleet conſiſted of 1500 tranſport-ſhips, in which were embarqued 6000 men at arms, and 20,000 archers, making, in all, an army of 1415. of about 50,000 men; and he was attended by the earls of Dorſet, Kent, Cornwall, Salisbury, Huntingdon, and many other nobles. On the 21ſt of Auguſt, he landed his troops, at Havre-de-Grace, in Normandy, and, directly, marched to Harfleur, about nine miles diſtant, a place that was ſtrong and well ſtored. He ſent thither, a little before, 400 men at arms, beſides a great number of neighbouring lords, that voluntarily came there; and the garriſon made a vigorous defence; but, in a ſhort time they were obliged to capitulate, and promiſe to ſurrender the place, unleſs relieved, within three days; which term being expired, and no relief come, Henry took poſſeſſion of the town, and, expelling the inhabitants, planted an Engliſh colony, in their room, as Edward III. had formerly done, at Calais.

This place being of the laſt importance, Henry would not leave it, till it was entirely repaired, and put in a good ſtate of defence; and, in the interim, he ſent a written challenge to the dauphin, offering to decide all their differences, by a ſingle combat, between their two perſons. Theſe differences, the king apprehended, concerned the whole kingdom of France; and, if he directed himſelf to the dauphin, it was on account of his father's diſtemper, which rendered him incapable of accepting ſuch a challenge; but, as the dauphin could not hazard, in a ſingle combat, the crown of France, which did not belong to him, Henry offered, provided he was conqueror, to let king Charles enjoy it, during his life. He alſo proteſted, that this propoſal entirely proceeded from himſelf, without any ſuggeſtion from his council, or family; and, therefore, he pretended, that it could not be prejudicial to his rights, or thoſe of his ſucceſſors. This challenge was dated, at Harfleur, September 16, 1415; but it does not appear, that the dauphin ſent any anſwer. Indeed, the offer was too diſadvantageous to him, ſince he would have ventured a crown, of which his father was actually poſſeſſed, and to which he was the heir apparent; whereas Henry would have hazarded only bare pretenſions.

The ill ſtate of the Engliſh army.

The conqueſt of Harfleur might have rendered Henry ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his firſt campaign, begun ſomewhat too late, were it not for the ill ſtate of his army; for the flux, prevailing amongſt his troops, had made, and ſtill did make, ſuch ravage, that not above the fourth part of his army were able to carry arms; and this diſtemper had not only ſeized the common ſoldiers, but even the moſt conſiderable perſons. The biſhop of Norwich and the earl of Suffolk were already dead of it; and the duke of Clarence, the king's brother, the earl of Arundel, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction were ſo dangerouſly ill, that they were forced to return to England, in hopes of a cure.

Henry reſolves to retire to Calais. T. Livius. Walſing. Elmham.

At the ſame time, Henry learned, from all parts, that the French were very induſtrious, in aſſembling their forces, to give him battle. Till the taking of Harfleur, the court of France ſeem not to have believed, that Henry deſigned to wage war, ſince they had made no preparations, for their defence; but, now, king Charles's council eaſily perceived, that it was neceſſary to aſſemble all the forces of the kingdom, to ſtop the progreſs of ſuch a formidable enemy. The great armament France was preparing, the ill ſtate of the Engliſh army, and the approach of winter obliged Henry to think of retreating; and he might have reimbarqued, at Harfleur; but, whether he thought it would too much reſemble a flight, or did not foreſee all the obſtacles he, afterwards, encountered, or for ſome other unknown reaſon, he reſolved to retire, by land, to Calais. 1415.

The difficulties of the march. Walſing. T. Livius. Hall.

The march he undertook was difficult, as the rains began to ſpoil the roads; but it became much more ſo, by unexpected accidents. The French, foreſeeing, or hearing of, his deſign, ſpeedily broke down the bridges and cauſeways, in his rout, and deſtroyed, or removed into the fortified towns, the proviſions and forage that he might have found, in the country; whilſt the conſtable d'Albret, with a body of troops drawn together, whilſt the reſt were preparing, continually haraſſed the Engliſh, conſtraining them to march very cloſe, and to be always upon their guard; and, by reaſon of all theſe difficulties, they could not advance ſo ſpeedily as was neceſſary, to free themſelves from their ill ſituation.

He is not able to paſs the Somme T. Livius.

Amidſt all theſe obſtacles, Henry proceeded along the Somme, expecting to paſs that river, at the ford of Blanchetaque, as Edward III. had done, the day before the battle of Creſſy; but at his arrival, he found that paſs rendered impracticable, by ſharp ſtakes fixed in the river, and defended, beſides, by a body of troops, poſted on the oppoſite bank. He was extremely concerned at this diſappointment; and yet it was neceſſary either to paſs the Somme, or return to Harfleur, thro' the ſame difficulties he had, already met with, and even without knowing, when he came there, how to ſubſiſt his army. In this extremity, he determined to march higher up the river, even to its ſource, tho' it was much out of his way; but he every-where found the bridges broken down, and the fords guarded by troops, intrenched on the other ſide.

The French army is reinforced. Hall.

As patience was his only remedy, in his ill ſituation, Henry took all poſſible care to inſtil it into his troops, by taking his ſhare of the wants and hardſhips to which they were expoſed; but, theſe hardſhips increaſing their diſtemper, great numbers fell ſick, in the march; and, at laſt, to compleat his misfortune, Henry was informed, that the king of France was arrived at Roan, and had ſent to the conſtable 14000 men at arms, with all the princes and great lords of the kingdom, except the dukes of Berry and Burgundy. The dauphin was extremely deſirous of commanding the army; but he could not obtain the king's leave. The conſtable, who had likewiſe aſſembled many other troops, called a council of war, in which it was unanimouſly reſolved, to give the Engliſh battle; but,

1415. the French generals being confident, that they should prove victorious, by reason of the superiority of their forces, judged it expedient to suffer the English to pass the Somme, and post themselves on the road to Calais; upon which, resolution they went and expected their enemies, in the earldom of St. Pol, with a view of drawing them over the Somme, into a place where they should not be able to return.

They go and expect the English, in the road to Calais.

Doubtless, Henry, by passing the river, ran into manifest danger, since there was no medium between victory and destruction. Indeed, it is true, he might have returned to Harfleur; but I cannot tell, whether that was less hazardous, considering the difficulties he must have encountered, and which he had not, without infinite trouble, surmounted. It is, therefore, in my opinion, a question hard to be decided, whether a battle was more dangerous than a retreat; but, however that be, it is to be presumed, that he chose what to him appeared least disadvantageous, in continuing his march along the Somme, resolving to face the danger that waited, on the other side; and, as the passages were no longer defended, he found one between St. Quintin and Peronne, where he caused his army to pass; but, tho' this obstacle, that, hitherto, seemed the greatest, was removed, the English army found themselves in no better condition; for that of their enemies, six times more numerous, expected them, upon their passage, whom it was necessary to vanquish, in order to open a way to Calais. The French historians relate, that Henry, in this extremity, offered to restore Harfleur, and repair all the damages he had done, in France, since his landing, if he might be permitted to proceed, unmolested; but, that his proposal was rejected. On the contrary, the constable and princes, in the French army, sent three heralds, to offer him battle, leaving him the choice of the time and place; and Henry replied, 'As he had long been upon his march 'to Calais, they might have fought him, 'when they pleased; and, if they designed 'it, there was no occasion to appoint the 'time, or place; for, being resolved to pursue his march, they should always find him 'ready to receive them.'

He meets the enemy, who offers him battle, which he accepts.

As the French army was posted, on his rout, it was impossible to pass, without fighting; and he determined, therefore, to prepare for a battle. On the 22d of October, the French generals sent him word, by a herald, that, on Friday following, they would give him battle; and Henry, accepting the challenge, presented the herald with a robe, worth 200 crowns. During the three days before the battle, Henry continually inspired his troops with courage, by the promise of rewards and honours, and by all other means most conducive to that purpose; for he reminded them of the glory of their ancestors, who obtained the signal victories of Cressy and Poictiers, and demonstrated to them the necessity of conquering, to free themselves from their present, and avoid still greater miseries. His exhortations had such an amazing effect, that 1415. the officers and soldiers, far from dreading the great number of their enemies, were extremely eager to engage; and, the day before the battle, Henry, having sent David Gam, a Welch captain, to view the strength of the enemy, this brave officer gallantly reported, 'There are enough to be killed; enough to 'be taken prisoners; and enough to run a-'way.' This assurance was pleasing to the king, as being a sign, that his troops were firmly resolved to do their duty; and, in the interim, the French, confident of victory, made rejoicings in their camp. Mezerai owns, that they were four times superior to the English; and Monstrelet says, six times; which diversity may partly proceed from Mezerai's reckoning all the soldiers, sick and well, of the English army, and from Monstrelet's meaning only such as were able to fight. According to the English historians, the French army amounted to 150,000, and the English to no more than 9000; but, however that be, it is certain, the superiority of the French was very great; yet, what disproportion soever there was between the two armies, as to number, there was another no less considerable, with respect to the different state of each. The English, for the most part, sick of a flux, ever since their departure from Harfleur, were, besides, harrassed with a tedious march of a month, in very bad weather, and thro' an enemy's country; and they had, all along, been exposed to want of provisions, and would, doubtless, have been all starved, if the exact discipline, the king caused to be observed, had not engaged the country-people to supply them with victuals, for the sake of selling them, at an extravagant rate. The French, on the other hand, were were fresh and healthy, abounded with provisions, and laboured under no inconveniency; and, if we may believe the English historians, so confident of success were the French leaders, that they sent to the king, to know what he would give, for his ransom; but Henry, despising this bravado, the same authors add, replied, that a few hours would discover whose care it would be to provide a ransom.

The confidence of the French. T. Livius. Pol. Virg.

On the 25th of October, the day appointed for the battle, the two armies were drawn up, as soon as it was light; but the constable d'Albret, very imprudently chusing, for the the field of battle, a narrow ground, flanked on one side by a rivulet, and on the other by a large wood, lost all the advantage, which the superiority of number, and especially in horse, could give him. Questionless, this general ought to have posted himself, in a large and open place, where he might have surrounded the English, who were but a handful of men, in comparison of his army; but, by drawing up on such a narrow ground, he could not make a front larger than that of the enemies, and so deprived himself of a very manifest advantage; and yet that the choice of the field of battle was entirely in his own breast is not to be disputed. As the English were marching to Calais, it was his business to expect them 1415. them on a ſpacious plain, where his whole army might have fought, at once; and, his blindneſs, therefore, is aſtoniſhing, and can be aſcribed only to his preſumption. Probably, his intent was to ſtop up that narrow paſſage, that the Engliſh might not proceed; whereas he ſhould have conſidered, that ſuch a precaution can be only advantageous to the weakeſt. I have inſiſted the longer on this error, as it ſeems to have been the principal cauſe of the unfortunate ſucceſs of the French, in this action; for the conſtable, blinded by the number of his troops, drew them up on this narrow ground, ſo cloſe, that it was eaſy to foreſee, confuſion would enſue, during the battle. He divided his army into three bodies, the firſt of which he commanded himſelf, with the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the earls of Eu, Vendoſme, Richemont, the renowned marſhal Boucicaut, grand-maſter of the croſs-bow-men, the lord Dampier, admiral of France, the dauphin of Auvergne, and ſeveral other officers of the greateſt diſtinction; and all theſe princes and lords, extremely well pleaſed with their being in the firſt line, flattered themſelves, that the other two would have nothing to do. The duke of Alenſon had the command of the ſecond body, with the duke of Bar, the earls of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, Rouſſi, and Grand-Pre; and, at the head of the third line, were the earls of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenbergh, and the lord de Lauroi.

Whilſt the French were drawing up, Henry detached 400 lances, to go and poſt themſelves, out of ſight of the enemy, behind the wood, on the left of the field of battle; and he likewiſe lodged 200 archers, in a low meadow, fenced with buſhes, on the right. In drawing up his army, he could only make two lines, on account of the ſmall number of his troops; the firſt of which was commanded by Edward, duke of York, with the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The king appeared at the head of the ſecond, with a gold crown on his helmet, for a creſt, and near him was the ſtandard of England; who expected, that the French would advance to attack him; and, in the interim, riding along the front of his battalions, he exhorted his troops not to fear a multitude of raw and undiſciplined ſoldiers. He repreſented to them, that victories did not depend on numbers, but on valour, and, above all, on the aſſiſtance of God, in whom he admoniſhed them to place their whole confidence. In fine, finding that the French did not move, he ſent for ſome of his principal officers and ſaid to them, with a chearful countenance, 'Since 'our enemies have intercepted our way, let us 'break thro' them, in the name of the Holy 'Trinity.' Upon theſe words, he gave the ſignal of battle; and, immediately, the ſoldiers of the foremoſt ranks removing the ſtakes, ſet in the front, to reſiſt the fury of the cavalry, the whole army, with a mighty ſhout, moved forward. Having advanced, a little, they made a halt, expecting their enemies; but, perceiving they did not ſtir, they proceeded, in good order. When they came, within bow-ſhot, the foremoſt ranks fixed the ſtakes; interweaving, and bending them, a little, towards their enemy; and, at the ſame time, a body of choſen archers, advancing, ſome paces, began, very near, to let fly upon the enemy a ſhower of arrows, a yard long, which, being ſhot by men of ſtrength and dexterity, did the greater execution among the French, as they had ſcarce room to move; but, the French cavalry advancing, at length, to repulſe the archers, the latter nimbly retreated, behind the ſtakes, with a ſurpriſing diſcipline, in which they had been exerciſed, for ſome days, by the king himſelf. In the mean while, the 200 bow-men, concealed in the meadow, riſing up, on a ſudden, plied the horſe, with their arrows; who were put in the greater diſorder, as the horſes ſunk up to their knees in the ground, ſoftened with the rains. The Engliſh, upon this confuſion, threw away their bows, and attacked their enemies, ſword in hand; and it is ſaid, that they were, for the moſt part, forced to fight naked, from the waiſte downwards, by reaſon of their diſtemper. However, as the firſt line of the French conſiſted of all the beſt troops in their army, this charge, tho' very vigorous, was repulſed, with ſome loſs, on the ſide of the Engliſh; but this was incapable of diſheartening men, reſolved to conquer, or die; who, after breathing a while, charged again, with ſuch reſolution, that it was impoſſible for their enemies to ſuſtain the ſhock. This ſecond attack was the more difficult to be repulſed, as the French, were at the ſame time, ſet upon, in the flank, by the Engliſh horſe, ambuſhed behind the wood; and then it was, that the utmoſt diſorder enſued among the troops, ſo vigorouſly preſſed by their enemies, who ſlew, without mercy, all that came in their way; but, the firſt line of the French, at length, taking to flight, the conſtable being killed, with a great number of other officers, and moſt of the princes and generals made priſoners, the Engliſh were ſtopped by the ſecond line, who came to repair the diſorder.

1415. Walſing. Monſtrelet. Le Fevre. T. Livius.

In the interim, Henry, advancing with his ſecond line, as the firſt gained ground, ſtood ready to ſupport his men, who would have been in danger of being routed, if he had been at a greater diſtance; and, whilſt the firſt body, after ſo brave a fight, were retiring to the right and left, to make way for the king, and to rally, in his rear, Henry, alighting from his horſe, preſented himſelf to the enemy, with an undaunted countenance. The duke of Alenſon, prince of the blood-royal of France, advanced, at the head of his body, with great intrepidity, hoping, by his conduct and valour, to repair the diſgrace received by his countrymen; and he had detached 18 ſtout gentlemen, to keep cloſe to the king of England, and not leave him, till he was ſlain, or taken priſoner. Henry, marching, with a fierceneſs heightened by the ſucceſs of his firſt troops, charged the ſecond line, with a reſolution equal to that of the moſt renowned heroes; for he fought, on foot, at the head of Henry is exposed to great danger. Elmham.

In the mean time, the 18 cavaliers, who undertook to kill Henry, charged up so close to him, that one of them gave him such a stroke, with a battle-ax, on the head, that he was stunned, for a while, though the goodness of his helmet resisted the violence of the blow; and, at the same time, the rest were striving to approach him. Probably, he would scarce have escaped these desperate men, had not the valiant David Gam, the Welch captain, with two other officers of the same nation, saved him, at the expence of their lives. The king, who was somewhat recovered, seeing them extended at his feet, and still breathing, knighted them all three, being unable, in their present condition, to reward their loyalty, any other way; whilst the 18 Frenchmen, who still made prodigious efforts, to execute their design, were all killed, on the spot.

The heat of the battle increasing, Henry, still more animated by his past danger, gave signal proofs of his bravery, and drew upon him the bravest of the enemies; and, the duke of Gloucester, his brother, who fought, by his side, being knocked down, he long covered him with his own body, to prevent his being slain; tho', by this bold action, he so exposed himself, that, at length, he received such a blow, on the head, that he fell on his knees; but his guard, advancing, repulsed the enemy, and gave him time to rise. The king's danger, and the wonders he performed, inspired his troops with a sort of fury; who, suddenly, as it were by consent, rushed upon their enemies, and, by this violent and unexpected attack, put them in such disorder, that their commanders could never repair it. Henry vigorously pressed them, in the midst of their surprize; being sensible, that, this was the moment, by which the victory was to be decided; and, their disorder increasing, because of their great numbers, and want of room, they began, at length, to fight only, in retreat, plainly shewing, that they would, presently after, take to flight.

Monstrelet. Paradin.

The duke of Alenson, enraged to see the battle lost, by the defeat of the second line, and despairing that the third would be able to restore the fight, generously resolved to die honourably, rather than survive the disgrace of his country; wherefore, regardless of a life, he determined to lose, with a small number of brave and resolute persons, he furiously forced a passage, with his sword, through the English troops, and every-where sought the king of England, in expectation of revenging, by one single blow, the loss, France had, that day, sustained. It was easy to find Henry, who thought of nothing less than concealing himself; and, the moment the duke saw him, he ran at him, and crying out, that he was the duke of Alenson, discharged such a violent blow on his head, that it cleaved off one half of the gold crown on his helmet. Henry, not being able to parry this blow, to revenge it, struck the duke to the ground, and, with repeated blows, slew two of his valiant attendants; and, in an instant, the duke was surrounded by a crowd of enemies, who put an end to his life, notwithstanding the king's endeavours to save him; but, the death of the duke of Alenson entirely discouraging his troops, they openly took to flight. 1415.

The third line of the French retreats.

The third line of the French, being still fresh and in good order, might have renewed the battle; but they were so intimidated, at the sight of the present and past slaughter, that it was not in the power of their leaders to make them advance; who, being reduced to a necessity of retreating, left the flying troops of the second line exposed to the fury of their enemies, who closely pursued them. Then it was that the English, having nothing to do, but to kill, and take prisoners, exercised pity, or cruelty, according to each of their natural inclinations; and, as it was impossible for the French, in their present disorder, to rally, and their numbers were an obstacle to their flight, they voluntarily offered themselves to death, or captivity, at the pleasure of their victorious enemies. In the interim, the troops, that retired, without fighting, still appeared, at some distance, and seemed resolved to withstand the English, harassed with so long a battle; but the king, perceiving that they were still more numerous than his army, commanded them, by a herald, to quit the field, or he would give them no quarter. This menace answered his expectation; for, whether these troops were not fully resolved on their course, or were apprehensive of falling into the hands of an implacable enemy, if they should prove unsuccessful, they retired, and left Henry master of the field of battle.

The occasion of the king's killing all the prisoners.

Henry, being, thus, secure of the victory, thought that he had nothing more to do, when, on a sudden, he was informed, that the enemies were in his rear, and had already plundered his camp, upon which, he hastily ran to the top of a hillock, between the army and the camp; from whence, he really saw the troops, left to guard the camp, dispersed about the field, and endeavouring to save themselves, by flight; and, imagining that the enemies had rallied, to renew the fight, he proclaimed, that the prisoners should be slain, except the most eminent. This order being, immediately, put in execution, he speedily rallied his troops, and marched directly to the enemies, who took care not to expect him; for they were only a company of run-aways, headed by Robert de Bournonville, who, retiring, betimes, out of the battle, and knowing that the English camp was but weakly guarded, pillaged it, whilst the two armies were engaged. The duke of Burgundy, afterwards, would have severely punished the captain of these plunderers, who was his subject, for causing so great a disaster; but the earl of Charolois, his son, saved his life; who, it is said, was presented with a sword set with diamonds, found among the king's baggage. It is a pity, that such a glorious victory was sullied, by this rash massacre; yet it may 1415. may be excuſed, from the impoſſibility of the Engliſh being able to guard their priſoners, and the king's juſt fears, that theſe very priſoners would turn againſt him, during the fight, which he perceived himſelf upon the point of renewing.

Henry returns God thanks, for his victory. Le Fevre.

Nothing more oppoſing the king's victorious arms, he, firſt of all, returned God thanks, for ſo ſignal and unexpected a victory, and publickly acknowledged, that it it was entirely owing to his bleſſing; and then he ſent for a French herald, who was in the army, and required him to declare, to whom the victory was to be aſcribed. The herald anſwered, that, doubtleſs, the victory was his; upon which, the king asked him the name of a caſtle, in ſight, near the field of battle, and being told, that it was named Azincourt, he ſaid, "Let this battle be, "hereafter, called the battle of Azincourt." As the fight did not begin, till 10 in the morning, and continued, till almoſt five in the afternoon, Henry, judging it improper to proceed on his march, leſt he ſhould fatigue his army too much, returned to Maſconcelles, where he had encamped, the preceding night.

The loſs of the French.

In this memorable battle, ſo fatal to France, the French loſt the conſtable d'Albret, the duke of Alenſon, prince of the blood, the duke of Brabant and the earl of Nevers, brothers of the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Bar, the earls of Vaudemont, Marle, Rouſſi, Fauquenberg, and many more officers of diſtinction, beſides 10,000 private ſoldiers; and an Engliſh hiſtorian affirms, that, among the ſlain, were one archbiſhop, three dukes, ſix earls, 90 barons, 1500 knights, and 7000 eſquires or gentlemen. Among the priſoners, who would have been very numerous, were it not for the maſſacre, after the battle, the moſt eminent were the dukes of Orleans * and Bourbon, the earls of Eu, Vendoſme, Richmont, Etouteville, and marſhal Boucicaut; but, of the Engliſh, there were ſlain only the duke of York, the earl of Suffolk, and, if we may believe certain Engliſh hiſtorians, not above four knights, one eſquire, and 28 common ſoldiers. Some, however, with more probability, affirm, that the Engliſh loſt 400 men; and Mezerai mounts the number to 1600, and lowers the loſs of the French to 6000; but it is very common, on ſuch occaſions, to ſee the like diverſity, in the hiſtorians of two oppoſite parties.

Henry continues his march to Calais.

On the morrow, Henry purſued his march towards Calais; and, paſſing over the field of battle, he commended the valour of his troops; but, at the ſame time, he exhorted thoſe near him, not to be vainly proud of a victory, gained, purely, by the miraculous aſſiſtance of the Lord of hoſts. In the mean while, he was extremely civil to the French princes, his priſoners, and told them, "That he had "not obtained the victory, by the ſuperiority "of his merit; but, becauſe God was pleaſ- 1415. "ed to employ him, as his inſtrument, to "puniſh the ſins of the French nation; and "that the advantages, he might expect, were "ſo far from rendering him averſe to a peace, "that he was even more inclined to it, than "the day before the battle."

Some days after, the duke of Burgundy ſent him a cartel of defiance, and acquainted him, by a herald, that he deſigned to revenge the death of his brothers, the duke of Brabant and the earl of Nevers; who, probably, were killed in the maſſacre of the priſoners, after the battle. Henry, willing to keep fair with that prince, whom he ſtill hoped to bring over to his intereſt, told the herald, in delivering the gantlet, received from his hand, that the French themſelves could witneſs, that he was not guilty of the death of the duke's brothers; but his own ſubjects were anſwerable for their blood; which he ſaid, becauſe Bournonville, who occaſioned the ſlaughter of the priſoners, was a Burgundian.

Henry returns to England.

About the middle of November, Henry embarqued for England, taking with him the principal priſoners; and he met with a violent ſtorm, which put him in extreme danger, and even ſunk ſome of his ſhips; but, at laſt, after great fatigue, he arrived, on the 16th of November. He was received by his ſubjects, with loud acclamations; and they were never tired with praiſing a prince, that had made the Engliſh name ſo formidable and glorious. His firſt care was to appoint a day of publick thankſgiving, for the ſucceſs of his arms; and then he cauſed the bodies of the duke of York and the earl of Suffolk, who were ſlain, in the battle, to be honourably interred; but, the duke of York leaving no iſſue, Richard, his nephew, ſon to the earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton, was his heir.

The troubles are renewed in France.

The damage France ſuſtained was not ſo great, on account of Henry's advantages by his victory, which did not ſo much as procure him a ſingle foot of land, as for its cauſing the civil wars to be rekindled, with greater fury than ever; for the duke of Burgundy, at this juncture, reſolved to claim the adminiſtration of affairs, from which he had been long excluded, and particularly, by the peace of Arras. He alledged, that, as the kingdom was threatened with utter ruin, a prince of the blood, firſt peer, and doubly peer of the realm, was indiſpenſably obliged to aſſiſt the king with his counſels, and could not be debarred the court, without injuſtice and danger; but, being very ſenſible, that his reaſons would be ineffectual, unleſs he approached Paris, with an army, he ſeized ſome poſts about the city. The dauphin, being determined not to admit to court the duke of Burgundy, though his father-in-law, ſent for the earl of Armagnac, and gave him the 1415. conſtable's ſword; and this lord, a ſworn enemy to the duke of Burgundy, did not ſpare the duke's adherents, commonly called the Burgundians; for he ordered ſome to be hanged, and great numbers to be impriſoned, by which he ſo heightened the animoſity of the two factions, that, from thenceforward, nothing was capable of uniting them againſt the common enemy. The dauphin ſeconded the conſtable's revenge, entirely regardleſs of the ruinous affairs of his country, tho' the government was in his hands; but, ſoon after, on the 24th of December, this prince was poiſoned.

By the death of Lewis, the new conſtable remained ſole maſter of the king's perſon, and of the government of the kingdom, till the return of John, duke of Tourain, to whom the title of dauphin was devolved, and who was then in Hainault, with the earl, his father-in-law; but, this young prince, reſolving to eſpouſe neither party, ſent orders to both factions, to lay down their arms. The duke of Burgundy, loſing his time before Lagny, out of deference, as he pretended, to the dauphin's orders, retired into his dominions; but the conſtable, as he had the king's perſon in his power, did not believe, that the dauphin had any right to command him, till actually poſſeſſed of the regency, which he deſigned to oppoſe, unleſs he would declare againſt the Burgundians; and it was this that prevented the dauphin's return to court.

Henry is applied to by both parties. Act. Pub.

In the interim, it was next to impoſſible for France, to take proper meaſures for her defence, againſt the attacks threatened from England; for the duke of Burgundy privately treated with Henry; and the earl of Hainault alſo ſollicited that monarch, to put the dauphin, his ſon-in-law, in poſſeſſion of the regency. On the contrary, Lewis of Anjou, king of Sicily, then head of the Orleans faction, projected to deprive the dauphin of his birth-right, by procuring the crown for Charles, earl of Ponthieu, his ſon-in-law; and, with this view, he endeavoured to ſecure the aſſiſtance of England. Thus, all France, as it were, with one conſent, tho', to different ends, earneſtly ſought the alliance of the Engliſh, againſt whom the whole nation ſhould have firmly united, if private intereſt had not prevailed, above the good of the publick; and, in this manner, paſſed the year 1415, which the battle of Azincourt has rendered memorable, for ever.

1416. Henry purpoſes to gain the duke of Burgundy.

The preſent conſternation of France, with the diſcord between the duke of Burgundy and the conſtable, ſeemed to promiſe Henry freſh laurels, if he had continued the war; yet that prince, whoſe wiſdom equalled his valour, very prudently judged, that, by fomenting the troubles of France, and inſpiring the two factions with jealouſy, he ſhould procure more certain and durable advantages, than by means of his arms. The truth is, by puſhing the French too vigorouſly, he would run the riſque of uniting them all againſt him; but, by granting them ſome reſpite, he gave them opportunity to deſtroy one another. Accordingly, contrary to every one's expectation, he laid aſide his military affairs, for near 18 months, applying himſelf wholly to negotiation, which afforded him the proſpect of leſs doubtful advantages; tho' he did not continue in a ſtate of idleneſs; for the occurrences of 1416, and part of the year following, will ſhew, how attentive he was to the execution of his projects. 1416.

Henry's principal deſign was to gain the duke of Burgundy, who, now, appeared inclinable to enter into an alliance with him; and the ſucceeding, in this affair, he perceived, would be more advantageous, than another Azincourt-victory. To attain his ends, it was neceſſary, that France ſhould remain in her preſent ſituation; and that the conſtable, with the other heads of that faction, ſhould ſtill have it in their power to perſecute the duke of Burgundy. This alone was capable of throwing that prince into a deſperate reſolution, that he beheld, with dread, and which the ſole deſire of revenge could induce him to take; for if, by the continuance of the war, France had loſt towns and battles, the conſtable, who held the reins of the government, would, doubtleſs, have forfeited all his credit; and the duke of Burgundy would have infallibly obtained the regency again, and no longer ſtood in need of the Engliſh. This is the true reaſon of Henry's conſenting to all the overtures, for concluding a truce, or for renewing the negotiations of peace; and, in the mean time, his and the duke of Burgundy's envoys paſſed, from London to Flanders, and from Flanders to London, ever under the pretence of a treaty of commerce, in which freſh difficulties were continually ſtarted, the better to conceal their chief deſign. Act. Pub.

The duke, whom nothing but neceſſity would have forced to an alliance with the king, was apprehenſive, that the diſcovery of this project would alienate the affections of the French, and eſpecially of the Pariſians; and Henry, on the other hand, had reaſon to fear, that, if the court of France came to the knowledge of this negotiation, they would find means to diſconcert his meaſures. However, his deſiſting entirely from war, ſince the battle of Azincourt, might well cauſe his deſigns to be ſuſpected; but the arrival of the emperor Sigiſmund gave him occaſion to pretend, that he diſcontinued the war, at the inſtance of that prince.

Sigiſmund arrives in France.

In the beginning of the year, Sigiſmund, arriving at Paris, declared, that the ſole end of his journey was to mediate a peace, between the two crowns of France and England; which end was noble and charitable, and worthy a chriſtian monarch, if it had been entirely diſintereſted; but ſeveral circumſtances render it probable, that he undertook this voyage, to favour Henry rather than France, and in hopes of promoting his own advantage. At his arrival in France, he propoſed a four years truce, between the two kings; but the court rejected this propoſal. The French hiſtorians charge the conſtable with refuſing this truce, for his own private intereſt; but they do not ſhew, how the war could be for his advantage. I ſuppoſe, that he was then projecting the

ſiege

1416. ſiege of Harfleur, which he begun, the next June; and, poſſibly, he found, that the emperor was not an impartial mediator. However this be, Sigiſmund, not being able to prevail, at Paris, came into England *, in March; and the Engliſh hiſtorians affirm, that, being about to land, he was met by the duke of Glouceſter and ſome other lords, who, ſtepping into the water, with their drawn ſwords, ſtopped the boat. Sigiſmund, ſurpriſed at this uſage, asked the reaſon; and the duke told him, if he was come, to challenge any authority in England, they had orders to prohibit his landing; but, if he came, only as a mediator of peace, he ſhould meet with all the reſpect due to the imperial dignity. This was to warn him not to exerciſe authority, in England, as he had done, in France, during his ſtay.

Sigiſmund and the earl of Holland prevail on the two kings to conſent to a truce.

The arrival of Sigiſmund, at London, was preceded by that of William of Bavaria, earl of Holland and Zealand, who was come upon the ſame errand; and theſe two princes ſoon perceived, that they ſhould find it difficult to procure a peace. Henry added, to his former demands, the town of Harfleur, with part of the adjacent country, for the maintenance of the garriſon; whilſt France, perſiſting in her firſt offers, would not hear of peace, unleſs Henry reſtored Harfleur. The two mediators, as a peace ſeemed to be almoſt impoſſible, were content with obtaining the conſent of the two kings to a truce, for three years, during which, Harfleur ſhould remain in truſt in their hands, for certain ſecurities, promiſed by the French priſoners, in England; but, juſt as the treaty was going to be ſigned, the priſoners receded from their word; for the conſtable who, reſolved to beſiege Harfleur, agreed to this negotiation, only to amuſe Henry, and prevent him from diſcovering his deſign.

A conflict between the earl of Dorſet and the conſtable of France.

Shortly after, under ſome pretence, he carried king Charles to Roan, to be ready againſt the arrival of ſome Genoeſe ſhips, which were to join the French fleet, in order to inveſt Harfleur, by ſea; and he managed matters ſo ſecretly, that Henry not, in the leaſt, ſuſpecting his deſign, neglected to reinforce the garriſon. During the French court's ſtay, at Roan, the earl of Dorſet, governor of Harfleur, made an incurſion, even to the gates of that city, and carried off a great booty; but, in his return, he was purſued and overtaken by the conſtable, who gained ſome advantage over him. On the morrow, the conſtable, ſtill preſſing the Engliſh, who was haſtily retreating, forced them to halt, and ſtand upon their defence; but, in this ſecond skirmiſh, the earl of Dorſet, tho' inferior, in number of troops, compelled his enemy to retire, with precipitation, to Roan.

The conſtable beſieges Harfleur. T. Livius. Act. Pub.

Notwithſtanding this ill ſucceſs, the conſtable, upon the arrival of the Genoeſe ſhips, ordered his troops, whom he had purpoſely diſperſed, to rejoin at a certain place, where he came and headed them, in perſon; and then he marched directly to Harfleur, where he was not expected, ſo unable were the French thought by the Engliſh to make any attempt. Whilſt the conſtable beſieged the town, by land, the viſcount of Narbonne blocked it up, by ſea; and it extremely mortified Henry to be, thus, over-reached. He was, now, convinced, that the negotiation was intended only to amuſe him; and he reſolved, in his turn, to uſe ſtratagem, and circumvent the conſtable. With this view, he feigned a ſtrong inclination to peace, and deſired an interview with his couſin, for ſo he then called the king of France, whereas, before, he ſtiled him his adverſary. He was in hopes, that if an interview was granted, a truce would enſue, which would afford him leiſure to relieve Harfleur; but his propoſal was rejected. After this, he commiſſioned Morgan to demand a truce; but the court of France took care not to give him ſuch an advantage, in the preſent juncture. In fine, finding that the conſtable was not to be amuſed, he commanded a fleet to be equipped, reſolving to go himſelf and relieve the place; and he depended upon the valour and experience of the earl of Dorſet, the governor, being ſenſible, that he would do his utmoſt, to give him time to prepare for his relief. In this, he was not miſtaken; for, tho' the ſiege was begun, about the middle of June, it was not much advanced, at the end of July, when Henry was ready to embarque; but the emperor diſſuaded him from hazarding his perſon, in an expedition, wherein, in ſpite of all his prudence, he might receive ſome diſgrace, by the accidents of the ſea. The king, prevailed on by the emperor's inſtances, gave the command to the duke of Bedford his brother, who ſailed, about the end of July, and he ſoon met with the enemy's fleet, lying before Harfleur. The viſcount de Narbonne, preparing for his defence, withſtood, for ſome time, the efforts of the Engliſh; but, at length, he was forced to yield the victory, after ſeeing five Genoeſe caracks taken, and ſeveral of his own ſhips ſunk; and, nothing more preventing the duke of Bedford from throwing the ſuccours into the town, the conſtable raiſed the ſiege and retired.

The negotiation between the king and duke of Burgundy continues Act. Pub.

During theſe tranſactions, the duke of Burgundy continued, under various pretences, his ſecret negotiations with Henry; ſometimes to renew the truce, between England and Flanders; at other times, about affairs relating to the church, depending before the council of Conſtance. In May, the truce I, juſt, mentioned, which was to expire, the 15th of June, was renewed, for a year; and yet the duke of Burgundy ſent four ambaſſadors more to England. In the beginning of Auguſt, the king appointed commiſſioners to treat with them, concerning ſome eccleſiaſtical affairs; and this publick commiſſion 1416. ſerved for a colour to the private conferences; but, by another of the ſame date, theſe commiſſioners were impowered to agree with the ambaſſadors, upon an interview, between the king and the duke of Burgundy. This negotiation muſt have been, now, in great forwardneſs, ſince, two days after, the king diſpatched orders to ſeveral officers, to be ready to attend him, beyond ſea, where he was to have a conference with ſome of his enemies; which evidently ſhews, that the duke's frequent ambaſſies were not wholly intended to treat about trade, or eccleſiaſtical affairs. The duke had, now, long demurred, upon concluding his treaty with Henry; for, as he was of the blood royal of France, and firſt peer of the realm, this alliance was directly contrary to his honour and duty; and, moreover, ſuch a ſtep could not but be prejudicial to him, in France, among his own party. For theſe reaſons, he had, hitherto, been ſatisfied with keeping the negotiation on foot, in order to conclude it, only in caſe of neceſſity; but the earl of Armagnac's revenge, at length, threw the duke upon this action, which, doubtleſs, he would have longer delayed, or, perhaps, never have done, had he not been, as it were, compelled to it, by the perſecutions of his enemies.

I have, already, ſaid, that the conſtable d' Armagnac had, under various pretences, prevented John the dauphin, then in Hainault, from returning to court; but the young prince, impatient of being, thus, controuled by that haughty miniſter, longed to be at the head of affairs, and to obſerve a neutrality between the two factions, which would procure him the eſteem and regard of both; yet this was impoſſible, ſince he had no forces at his diſpoſal, except thoſe of the earl of Hainault, his father-in-law, which were inſufficient for the execution of ſuch a project, againſt the conſtable's will. In the interim, the duke of Burgundy, perceiving no likelihood of his acquiring the government, whilſt the conſtable had the king's perſon in his power, judged it adviſable, to ſtrengthen himſelf with the new dauphin's aſſiſtance; and, with this view, he had conferred, in the beginning of the year, at Valenciennes, with him and the earl of Hainault; when it was agreed, that the dauphin ſhould, once more, try, by fair means, to be admitted to court, in order to take the place due to his birth; and that, if he ſucceeded, he ſhould carry the duke with him; but, if he could not prevail, they ſhould take other meaſures, to diſpoſſeſs the conſtable, and free the king. Purſuant to this reſolution, the dauphin and the earl of Hainault repaired to Compiegne, from whence the earl went alone to Paris, to mediate the return of his ſon-in-law; but, on the firſt mention of recalling the duke of Burgundy, the conſtable, interrupting him, expreſly ſaid, that the dauphin ſhould never be admitted to the king his father's court, unleſs he openly declared himſelf an enemy to the Burgundian faction. The earl of Hainault, ſeeing this obſtinacy, could not forbear uttering ſome menaces, which diſcovered to the conſtable and his party, that the dauphin deſigned to rely on the duke's aſſiſtance; and, to prevent the ill conſequences of ſuch a union, they reſolved to diſpatch him. 1416.

A few days after, the dauphin was poiſoned, at Compiegne, the 16th of April, 1416, and not in 1417, as we find it, in Mezerai's Abridgement; and the king of Sicily was ſuſpected to be the author of this deed, to make way for prince Charles, his ſon-in-law; but, if he was guilty, his death, preſently after, hindered him from reaping any advantage. The dauphin is poiſoned.

Upon the deceaſe of John the dauphin, Charles, his brother, earl of Ponthieu, became dauphin, and heir-apparent to the crown; who, immediately eſpouſed the party of the Armagnacs, the preſent name of the Orleans faction; by which means, the duke of Burgundy deſpaired, more than ever, and the earl of Armagnac ſupported himſelf in the government, wherein nothing was done, without his orders. His hatred to the duke of Burgundy cauſed him to loſe no opportunity, to perſecute the Burgundians, who were very numerous, at Paris; and his cruel and tyrannical behaviour, joined to an extreme avarice, induced, at length, the Pariſians of the Burgundian party, to form a plot, to introduce the duke into their city. The plot being diſcovered, the conſtable treated the whole party, with ſo much ſeverity, that the duke of Burgundy did not think himſelf any longer obliged to regard the court; and, forthwith, to convince the world of his reſentment, he concluded with the king of England a truce, for all their reſpective dominions not excepting his poſſeſſions, in France. The duke's revenge did not ſtop here; for his ambaſſadors, as I ſaid, before, agreed, that the king and he ſhould meet, at Calais, and the duke own Henry, for the true king of France, and do him liege-homage; which interview was fixed to the beginning of October. Charles, his brother, ſucceeds him.

In the mean while, the emperor Sigiſmund departed from England, about the middle of Auguſt; and, in his way to Canterbury, he ſigned a treaty of perpetual alliance with Henry, and a league againſt France. He engaged to aſſiſt the king, in the recovery of that kingdom; and Henry promiſed to aid him, in conſtraining king Charles, and ſome other princes, to do him homage, for certain territories not ſpecified in the treaty; but probably, for the kingdom of Arles and the dauphin, to which the emperors had ſome ſtale pretenſions. This treaty, by the way, diſcovers one of the motives of Sigiſmund's journey to France and England; for, in all appearance, by procuring a peace, between the two kings, he expected to obtain, for himſelf, one of thoſe countries which he claimed; but, however that be, it may be conjectured, that he propoſed ſome private advantage, by the peace. Great princes rarely ſpend whole years out of their dominions, with the ſole view of mediating a peace, in which they have no concern; and Sigiſmund was, of all others, the fartheſt from this character. I do not know, whether, before his journey to England, he had contracted a friendſhip with Henry; but, after his departure, it appears by A treaty between Sigiſmund and Henry.

1416. by ſeveral records, that there was between them a ſtrict correſpondence and mutual confidence, very uncommon among princes *.

Henry goes to Calais.

The emperor, being arrived, at Calais, ſtaid there for Henry, who could not come, till about the end of September; and, in the mean time, the court of France, alarmed at the report of the duke of Burgundy's interview with Henry, at Calais, ſent thither the archbiſhop of Rheims, with ſome other ambaſſadors. The pretence was, to negotiate a peace with the king; but, in all probability, the chief intent of this ambaſſy was, to diſcover what ſhould paſs, at the conference. Henry was not ſorry, that the ambaſſadors of France would be witneſſes of the duke of Burgundy's arrival, at Calais; and, therefore, he readily diſpatched their ſafe-conducts, and, preſently after their coming, appointed commiſſioners, to treat with them; but he took ſuch precautions, that the French could never learn the real motive of his journey to Calais, at leaſt, with any certainty. He ſeemed to have no other view, than to confirm the late truce, between the king and himſelf, which was, already, publiſhed, at London; and, tho', afterwards, his proceedings made him ſuſpected of being in friendſhip with the Engliſh, this was no more than a bare ſuſpicion. The French hiſtorians ſpeak of it, in very doubtful terms, and we had properly nothing certain, till the publick records, printed, in England, diſcovered the ſecret; which give the following account of this affair.

The duke of Burgundy comes to Calais. Act. Pub.

The 1ſt of October, the king diſpatched a ſafe-conduct, for the duke of Burgundy and 800 attendants, and ſent him the duke of Glouceſter, his brother, in hoſtage; and, the next day, he appointed commiſſioners, to receive, in his name, the oaths of John, duke of Burgundy, and Philip, earl of Charolois, his ſon, purſuant to the articles agreed upon, that were in the form of preliminaries, as follows:

Articles of agreement between the king and duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub.

'The king, having informed the duke of 'Burgundy of his juſt claim to the crown of 'France, and his adverſary's refuſal to give 'him ſatisfaction, told him, that, by the 'help of God and St. George, he reſolved to 'obtain it, by force of arms; and, upon this 'declaration, the duke, perceiving the juſtice 'of the king's title, and conſidering the great 'victories Heaven had bleſſed him with, pro-'miſes to ſend him his letters patent, which 'run, thus:

'That, though, heretofore, for want of 'information, he had eſpouſed the oppoſite 'party, believing it juſt, he, now, pro-'miſes firmly to adhere to the king of Eng-'land, and his heirs and ſucceſſors, as to 'thoſe who are, and ever will be, the true 'and lawful kings of France, as much as 'if they were actually poſſeſſed of the crown.

'Though, for the preſent, the king has 'not deſired the duke's homage; yet, as he 'owns it to be due, he engages, as ſoon as 'the king of England ſhall be in poſſeſſion of 'a conſiderable part of France, to pay him 'liege-homage, and ſwear allegiance to him, 'as every vaſſal of the crown of France ought 'to do to his ſovereign.

'Item, The duke of Burgundy promiſes to 'endeavour, by all known and unknown ways, 'to place the king of England on the throne 'of France.

'Item, Whilſt the king ſhall be employed, 'in purſuing his rights, the duke of Burgundy 'will make war, with all his forces, upon his 'enemies, in France, viz. A. B. C. D. and 'upon all their dominions and adherents, 'refuſing obedience to the king of Eng-'land.

'Item, In all the alliances and letters pa-'tent, made, or to be made, between the 'king and duke, wherein the duke ſhould 'except, or have excepted, the king's ad-'verſary, or the ſon of his adverſary, he does 'not intend to do any thing contrary to his 'promiſes, by theſe preſents, which he is 'to give the king, but will punctually per-'form them.

'That, if, through diſſimulation, the duke 'excepted the king's adverſary, or the dau-'phin, his ſon, for a greater good, and for 'the better accompliſhment of the deſigned 'project, his will and meaning is, that all 'ſuch exceptions are null and void.

'And that all may know, that this pro-'ceeds from his own free conſent, he will pro-'miſe, and ſwear, by his faith and honour, 'to obſerve it, without fraud or deceit; 'and he will write all the articles, with his 'own hand, ſign them, and ſeal them, with 'his uſual ſeal.'

All theſe articles were drawn up, in the form of letters patent, written and ſubſcribed, by the duke of Burgundy's own hand, and ſealed with his privy ſeal.

Mezerai affirms, that "the deſire of rule "ſo tranſported the duke of Burgundy, that "he had an interview with the king of Eng-"land, at Calais, and renewed the truces, "for his dominions only, by which he tied "himſelf, in ſome meaſure, from aſſiſting the "king of France." What would that hiſtorian have ſaid, had he known all? It is farther to be obſerved, that the earl of Charolois, afterwards duke of Burgundy, entered into the ſame engagements with the duke, his father; after which, there is no room to doubt the ill deſigns of theſe two princes, againſt their native country; who choſe rather to ſee it under a foreign dominion, than governed by their enemies.

A truce with France.

Before Henry left Calais, he concluded a truce with France, till the 2d of February; and he returned into England, about the middle of October, in order to hold a parliament, the 19th of the ſaid month; and, during this ſeſſion, the parliament grant-

1416. ed a ſubſidy *, for carrying on the war; but this aid was ſo unequal to his wants and projects, that he was forced to pawn his crown to the biſhop of Wincheſter, his uncle, for 100,000 marks, and part of his jewels to the city of London, for 10,000 l. ſterling. This evidently ſhews, how many difficulties he would have met with, in the conqueſt of France, with his own forces, were it not for the inteſtine troubles of that kingdom; yet, notwithſtanding his preſſing neceſſities, he aſſigned the earl of Dorſet, who defended Harfleur, a penſion of 1000 l. upon creating him duke of Exeter.

Henry reſolves to renew the war.

Henry, having concluded the late private treaty, with the duke of Burgundy, thought it time to renew the war; knowing that one half of France would not oppoſe him, and that the Burgundian party would make a diverſion, in his favour. He, accordingly, made all the neceſſary preparations for his enterprize; but, as the ſupply granted him by parliament was inſufficient for his purpoſe, and as the money came ſlowly into the exchequer, he made uſe of the following means, in his great extremity. After he had ſettled the pay of each ſoldier, horſe and foot, and of each officer, according to every one's rank and character, he made private contracts with ſeveral lords and gentlemen, by which they were obliged to find him a certain number of horſemen, or footmen, for a certain yearly ſum to be paid, quarterly; and the firſt, quarteridge was advanced; but, when the ſecond became due, the king had no money. To remedy this inconvenience, he pawned to them the reſt of the jewels, with letters under the great ſeal, impowering them to ſell them, if the money was not paid, within a limited time. The term allowed was 12 or 18 months, as the creditors were more or leſs tractable; and, thus, he gained time, for the payment of his troops, ſince he could reimburſe his creditors, as the money came into the treaſury, without being obliged to pay all, at once; and people were ſo well convinced of his ſincerity, that they did not ſcruple to ſerve him, or lend him money, on ſuch ſecurities, as would have been inſignificant, under a prince of leſs probity.

The ſtate of the court of France.

Henry's preparations, in England, very juſtly alarmed the court of France, who were not in a condition to make the like; for the duke of Burgundy's late truce, publickly made with Henry, was a demonſtration, that no aid could be expected, either from the duke, or his adherents. Nay, the court was apprehenſive, that the duke had proceeded farther, at the conference held with the enemy of the kingdom; at leaſt, he was exceedingly ſuſpected of having evil deſigns; ſo that the conſtable was not a little embarraſſed, notwithſtanding his great authority. Moreover, ſince the death of John the dauphin, he was conſtrained to have a regard for the new dauphin, leſt the young prince ſhould think of governing, without his aſſiſtance; and, to all theſe difficulties, was added the war, the Engliſh were preparing to carry into France; for, as the kingdom was in an ill ſituation, and the enemy likely to make a great progreſs, he conſidered, that he ſhould be anſwerable for all the ill ſucceſſes of it; wherefore, he judged it adviſable to try to put a ſtop to the king of England's arms, by an extraordinary negotiation, which ſhould induce that prince to believe, that the court of France would be forced to make peace, though never ſo unwilling. He foreſaw, that, if he ſhould himſelf treat of a peace, it would be loſt labour, becauſe it was generally thought to be for his intereſt, that affairs ſhould remain embroiled, in order to preſerve his authority; and it was, therefore, unlikely, that the king of England would be amuſed by any propoſal from himſelf; for which reaſon, he conceived it proper to make uſe of the priſoners in England, and particularly of the duke of Bourbon. It appears from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that ſeveral ſafe-conducts were dated, about this time, for the duke of Bourbon's domeſticks, paſſing to, and repaſſing from France, under various pretences; whence it may be preſumed, that the plot was then formed, and that the duke of Bourbon did nothing, in the affair I am about to relate, but in concert with the court of France.

This plot was ſo artfully contrived, that, if the king had not been continually jealous, he would, doubtleſs, have been deceived; but his firm reſolution, not to interrupt the execution of his deſigns, for any offers ſhort of his demands, cauſed him to eſcape the ſnare. The dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the earls of Eu and Vendoſme, and ſome other priſoners, feigning to deſpair of the affairs of France, intimated to Henry, that they were willing to treat with him, for themſelves, in particular; which was told him, not poſitively, but as what they might poſſibly be brought to; but the king, ſuſpecting that, under this pretence, they intended to retard his voyage, gave very little attention to the propoſal.

A negotiation between Henry and the French priſoners. Act. Pub.

Some time after, theſe very princes, who had, hitherto, endeavoured to make the propoſal come from the king, finding that they could not ſucceed, at an audience, which they demanded, expreſſed their inclination, and intreated him to acquaint them with his pretenſions; adding, that they did not queſtion, but they ſhould return him a ſatisfactory anſwer, without any prejudice to their honour. The king, who was not to be amuſed, roundly told them, that he had nothing elſe to propoſe, except that they ſhould own him, for king of France and their lawful ſovereign; but the duke of Orleans exclaimed againſt this overture, and expreſly ſaid, that they had no anſwer to return to ſuch a demand; Particularly the duke of Bourbon. Act. Pub.

However, a few weeks after, the duke of Bourbon repreſented to the king, that, ſince they had the honour to confer with him, ſeveral of the priſoners, had ſent perſons into France, to inquire into his title to that kingdom, and had received better information, than ever before; adding, that for his part, he was fully ſatisfied of the juſtice of his rights. Then he ſaid, he was informed, that, notwithſtanding his juſt claim to the whole kingdom, he had offered to reſign it, if certain provinces were reſigned to him; and, in his judgment, that offer ought not to be refuſed. That the other priſoners were of his opinion, and had reſolved to do all that was poſſible, to procure him what he deſired; and, therefore, he begged leave to go into France, and declare to king Charles, in the name of all the priſoners, that, as loyal ſubjects, they could not but adviſe him, to cloſe with this expedient for peace, and beſeech him to accept ſuch a reaſonable propoſal. In a word, the duke added, that, if the court of France conſented to the offer, Henry might, this very year, take poſſeſſion of the provinces, which he claimed; but if, on the contrary, it was rejected, the princes would account themſelves acquitted from their oath of fealty to king Charles. The duke engaged, for his own part, to put all his fortified towns in the hands of ſuch perſons, as would certainly deliver them up, when he pleaſed; and he promiſed to return into England, by the time which ſhould be prefixed, and acknowledge Henry, for king of France, and pay him homage, as his lawful ſovereign. Moreover, he added, that he would ſo evidently demonſtrate the juſtice of Henry's right to the crown of France, that all the world ſhould be convinced, that he could not diſpenſe with doing him homage, without acting contrary to his honour; and, in fine, he intreated the king to be ſilent, till his return, on account of the danger he ſhould be expoſed to, if the thing was divulged, during his ſtay, in France.

Henry was at a loſs, what to think of ſuch a propoſal; for he knew France was not governed either by the duke of Orleans, or the duke of Bourbon; and that it was not the conſtable's intereſt to make a peace, upon theſe terms; but, at the ſame time, the hopes of recovering the provinces of France, loſt ſince the treaty of Bretigny, without renewing the war, were extremely agreeable; and the alternative, propoſed by the duke, could not but be beneficial to him. His only way was to be upon his guard, and not be perſuaded, on this pretence, to interrupt the execution of his projects; wherefore, reſolving not to ſuſpend his expedition, a ſingle day, on any account whatever, he thought there was no danger, in granting the duke of Bourbon the leave he deſired; but, firſt, he had one of the duke's ſons given him, in hoſtage, with ſecurity for the ſum of 200,000 crowns. Theſe particulars are in the Collections of the Publick Acts; where we find a letter, written, with the king's own hand, to Sir John Tiptoft, his ambaſſador to the emperor, ordering him to acquaint Sigiſmund with the ſecret, conſult his advice upon it, and aſſure him, that the negotiation ſhall not retard his expedition into France; enjoining him alſo, not to make the leaſt diſcovery to any other perſon, on pain of his heavy diſpleaſure; and, probably, his firm reſolution not to be amuſed, by any propoſal, was the reaſon, why this ſtratagem was carried no farther. The duke of Bourbon returned into England; but he did not perform his other engagements. It was, doubtleſs, for endeavouring to deceive Henry, that the priſoners, by his orders, were confined, in Pontefract-caſtle; whereas, before, they were upon their parole. Tho' there are no poſitive proofs, that this plot was formed by the conſtable, it is manifeſt from ſeveral conjectures, which, all together, amount to a ſort of demonſtration, tho' it would be too tedious to relate the particulars here; but, if the French priſoners acted ſincerely, without the direction of the conſtable, it muſt be inferred, that France was, then, in a very deplorable condition. King Charles, often ſeized with a frenzy, was incapable of managing his affairs; the duke of Burgundy, firſt peer of the realm, and head of a powerful party, had entered into a ſecret alliance with the enemy of the ſtate; the princes of the blood were on the point of owning Henry, for king of France; and, in fine, the kingdom was governed by a young prince of 14 years, and by the earl of Armagnac, a violent man, who, ſtudying only to be revenged on his enemies, openly ſacrificed the publick good to his ambition.
